they had offered injury: who alſo did condemne Caius Veturius to death, becauſe that he only would not give a Tribune place, coming through the Market-place. Where theſe, ſaid he, in your preſence, and before your faces, have ſlain my brother Tiberius with ſtaves, and have dragged his body from the mount of the Capitall, and all the City over, to throw it into the River: and with him alſo have moſt cruelly ſlain all his friends they could come by, without any law or juſtice at all. And yet by an ancient cuſtome of long time obſerved in this City of ROME, when any man is accuſed of Treason, and that of duty he muſt appear at the time appointed him, they do notwithstanding in the morning ſend a Trumpet to his houſe, to ſummon him to appear; and moreover the Judges were not wont to condemne him, before his ceremony was performed: ſo carefull and reſpective were our predeceſſors, where it touched the life of any ROMANE. Now Caius having firſt ſtirred up the people with theſe perſwaſions (for he had a marvellous loud voice) he preferred two lawes.

The firſt, that he that had once been put out of Office by the people, ſhould never after be capable of any other office.

The ſecond, that if any Conſul had baniſhed any Citizen without lawful accuſation, the ſentence and hearing of the matter ſhould pertaine to the people.

The firſt of theſe two laws did plainly deſame Oſtavius, whom Tiberius his brother had by the people depoſed from the Tribuſhip. The ſecond alſo touched Popilius, who being Prætor, had baniſhed his brother Tiberius friends; whereupon he ſtaid not the triall, but willingly exiled himſelfe out of ITALY. And touching the firſt law, Caius himſelfe did afterwards revoke it, declaring unto the people that he had ſaved Oſtavius at the requeſt of his mother Cornelia. The people were very glad of it, and confirmed it, honouring her no leſſe for reſpect of her ſons, then alſo for Scipioes ſake her father. For afterwards they caſt her image in braſſe, and ſet it up with this inſcription: Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many common matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, and eloquently pleaded in her behalf, by Caius againſt her adverſaries. As when he ſaid unto one of them: How dareſt thou preſume to ſpeak evil of Cornelia that Tiberius to her ſon? And the other party alſo that ſlandered her, being ſorely ſuſpected for a Sodomite: And art thou ſo impudent, ſaid he, to ſhew thy face before Cornelia? Haſt thou brought forth children as ſhe hath done? and yet it is well known to all men in ROME, that the being but a woman, hath lived longer without a man, then thou that art a man. Thus were Caius words ſharpe and ſtinging, and many ſuch like are to gathered out of his writings. Furthermore, he made many other laws afterwards to increaſe the peoples authority, and to imbaſe the Senates greatneſſe.

The firſt was, for the reſtoring of the Colonies to ROME, in dividing the lands of the Common-wealth unto the poor Citizens that ſhould inhabit there.

The other, that they ſhould apparel the ſouldiers at the charge of the Common-wealth, and that it ſhould not be deducted out of their pay: and alſo that no Citizen ſhould be billed to ſerve in the warre, under ſeventeen yeares of age at the leaſt.

Another law was, for their confederates of ITALY, that through all ITALY they ſhould have as free voices in the election of any Magiſtrate, as the natural Citizens of ROME it ſelf.

Another, ſetting a reaſonable price of the Corn that ſhould be diſtributed unto the poor people.

Another touching judgement, whereby he did greatly miniſh the authority of the Senate.

For before, the Senators were onely Judges of all matters, the which made them to be the more honoured and feared of the people, and the ROMANE Knights: and now he joyned three hundred ROMANE Knights unto the other three hundred Senators, and brought ſo to paſſe, that all matters judicial ſhould be equally judged among thoſe ſix hundred men. After he had paſſed this law, it is reported he was very curious in obſerving all other things, but this one thing ſpecially, that where all other Oratours ſpeaking to the people turned them towards the palace where the Senators ſate, and to that ſide of the Market-place which is called Comitium: he in contrary manner when he made his Oration, turned him outwards towards the other ſide of the Market-place; and after that kept it conſtantly, and never failed. Thus by a little turning and altering of his look onely, he removed a great matter. For he ſo transferred all the Government of the Common-wealth from the Senate unto the judgement of the people, to teach the Oratours by his example, that in their Orations they ſhould behold the people, not the Senate. Now, the people having not onely confirmed the law he made touching the Judges, but given him alſo full power and authority to chuſe among the ROMANE Knights ſuch Judges as he liked of, he found thereby he had abſolute power in his owne hands, inſomuch as the Senators themſelves did aſke counſel of him. So did he ever give good counſel; and did preſerre matters meete for their honour. As amongſt others, the law he made touching certaine Wheate that Fabius Vice prætor had ſent out of SPAIN, which was a good and honourable act; he perſwaded the Senate that the Corne might be ſold, and ſo to ſend backe againe the mo-ny thereof unto the Townes and Cities from whence the Corne came: and therewithal to puniſh Fabius for that he made the Empire of ROME hateful and intollerable unto the Provinces and ſubjects of the ſame. This matter wan him great love and comendation of all the Provinces ſubject to ROME. Furthermore, he made lawes for the reſtoring of the decayed Townes; for mending High-ways, for building of Garners for proviſion of Corne. And to bring all theſe things to paſſe, he himſelfe tooke upon him the onely care and enterpriſe, being never wearied with any paines taken in ordering of ſo great affaires. For, he followed all thoſe things ſo earneſtly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand: inſomuch that they who moſt hated and feared him, wondered much to ſee his diligence and quicke diſpatch in matters. The people alſo wondered much to behold him onely, seeing alwayes such a number of labourers, artificers, ambassadors, officers, souldiers, and learned men, whom he easily satisfied and dispatched keeping still his estate, and yet using great courtesie and civility, entertaining every one of them privately; so that he made his accusers to be found liars, that said he was a stately man and very cruell. Thus he wanne the good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his conversation and deeds then he was otherwise in his Orations. But the greatest paines and care he tooke upon him was, in seeing the high wayes mended, the which he would have as well done, as profitably done. For he would cast the canies by the line in the softest ground in the fields, and then would pave them with hard stone, and cast a great deal of gravell upon it, which he caused to be brought thither. When he found any low or watery places which the Rivers had eaten into, he raised them up, or else made bridges over them, with an even height equall to either side of the caufie; so that all his work carried a goodly level withall, even by the line or plummet, which was a pleasure to behold. Furthermore, he divided the high wayes by miles, every mile containing eight furlongs, and at every miles end he set up a stone for a marke. At either end also of these high wayes thus paved, he set certain stones of convenient height, a pretty way asunder, to help the travellers by to take their horse backs again without any helpe. The people for these things highly praising and extolling him, and being ready to make shew of their love and goodwill to him any manner of way, he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a request to make unto them, the which if it would please them to grant him, he would think they did him a marvellous pleasure; and if they denied him also, he cared not much. Then every man thought it was the Consulship he meant to aske, and that he would sue to be Tribune and Consul together. But when the day came to chuse the Consuls, every man looking attentively what he would do, they marvelled when they saw him come down the field of Mars, and brought Caius Fannius with his friends, to further his suite for the Consulship. Therein he served Fannius turne, for he was presently chosen Consul: and Caius Gracchus was the second time chosen Tribune again, not at his own suite, but by the good will of the people. Caius perceiving that the Senators were his open enemies, and that Fannius the Consul was but a slacke friend unto him, he began againe to curry favour with the common people, and to prefer new laws, setting forth the law of the Colonies, that they should send of the poor Citizens to replenish the Cities of HARENTEM and CAPUA, and that they should grant all the LATINES the freedom of Rome. The Senate perceiving his power grew great, and that in the end he would be so strong that they could not withstand him, they devised a new and strange way to plucke the peoples good will from him, in granting them things not altogether very honest. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Caius called Livius Drusus, a man nobly borne, and as well brought up as any other ROMANE: who for wealth and eloquence was not inferiour to the greatest men of estimation in Rome. The chiefeest Senators went unto him, and perswaded him to take part with them against Caius, not to use any force or violence against the people to withstand them in any thing, but contrarily to grant them those things which were more honesty for them to deny them with their ill-will. Livius offering to pleasure the Senate with his authority, preferred lawes neither honourable nor profitable to the Common-wealth, and were to no other end, but contending with Caius who should most flatter the people of them two, as plaiers do in their common playes, to shew the people pastime. Whereby the Senate shewed that they did not so much mislike Caius doings, as for the desire they had to overthrow him and his great credit with the people. For where Caius preferred but the replenishing of the two Cities, and desired to send the honestest Citizens thither, they objected against him, that he did corrupt the common people. On the other side also they favoured Drusus, who preferred a law, that they should replenish twelve Colonies, and should send to every one of them three thousand of the poorest Citizens. And where they hated Caius for that he had charged the poor Citizens with an annuall rent for the lands that were divided unto them, Livius in contrary manner did please them by disbursing them of that rent and payment, letting them have the lands scotfree. Furthermore also, where Caius did anger the people, because he gave all the LATINES the freedom of Rome to give their voices in chusing of Magistrates as freely as the naturall ROMANES, when Drusus on the other side had preferred a law that thencefore no ROMANE should whip any souldier of the LATINES with rods to the wars, they liked the law, and past it. Livius also in every law he put forth said in all his orations, that he did it by the counsell of the Senate, who were very careful for the profit of the people; and this was all the good he did in his office unto the Common-wealth. For by his meanes the people were better pleased with the Senate, and where they did before hate all the Noblemen of the Senate, Livius took away that malice, when the people saw that all that he propounded, was for the preferment and benefit of the Common-wealth, with the consent and furtherance of the Senate. The only thing also that perswaded the people to thinke that Drusus meant uprightly, and that he onely respected the profit of the common people, was, that he never preferred any law for himself, or for his own benefit. For in the restoring of these Colonies which he preferred, he alwayes sent others Commissioners, and gave them a charge of it, and would never finger any money himself: where Caius tooke upon him the care and charge of all things himself, and specially of the greatest matters. Rubrius also another Tribune, having preferred a law for the re-edifying and replenishing of CARTHAGE againe with people, the which Scipio had razed and destroyed, it was Caius hap to be appointed one of the Commissioners for it: whereupon he took ship and sailed into AFRIKE: Drusus in the mean time taking occasion of his absence, did as much as might be to seek the favour of the common people, and specially by accusing Fulvius who was one of the best friends Caius had, and

and whom they had also chosen Commissioner with him for the division of these lands among the citizens whom they sent to replenish these Colonies. This Fulvius was a seditious man, and therefore marvellously hated of the Senate, and withall suspected also of them that tooke part with the people, that he secretly practised to make their confederates of ITALY to rebell. But yet they had no evident proofe of it to justify it against him, more then that which he himself did verifie, because he seemed to be offended with the peace and quietnesse they enjoyed. And this was one of the chiefeest causes of Caius overthrow, because that Fulvius was partly hated for his sake. For when Scipio AFRICAN was found dead one morning in his house, without any manifest cause how he should come to his death so suddenly (saying that there appeared certaine blind markes of stripes on his body, that had been given him, as we have declared at large in his life) the most part of the suspicion of his death was laid to Fulvius, being his mortal enemy, and because the same day they had been at great words together in the pulpit for Orations. So was Caius Gracchus also partly suspected for it. Howsoever it was, such a horrible murder as this, of so famous and worthy a man as any was in Rome, was yet notwithstanding never revenged, neither any inquiry made of it, because the common people would not suffer the accusation to go forward, fearing lest Caius would be found in fault, if the matter should go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Caius at that time being in AFRIKE about the re-edifying and replenishing of the City of CARTHAGE againe, the which he named JUNONIA, the voice goeth that he had many ill signes and tokens appeared unto him. For the staffe of his Ensigne was broken with a vehement blast of wind, and with the force of the Ensigne bearer that held it fast on the other side. There came a flaw of wind also that carried away the sacrifices upon the Altars, and blew them quite out of the circuit which was marked out for the compasse of the City. Furthermore, the Wolves came and tooke away the markes which they had set down to limit the bounds of their circuite, and carried them quite away. This notwithstanding, Caius having dispatched all things in the space of thre score and ten dayes, he returned incontinently to Rome, understanding that Fulvius was oppressed by Drusus, and that those matters required his presence. For Lucius Holfilius that was all in all for the Nobility, and a man of great credite with the Senate, being the year before put by the Consulship by Caius practise, who caused Fannius to be chosen, he had good hope this yeare to speed, for the great number of friends that furthered his suite. So that if he could obtain it, he was fully bent to set Caius beside the saddle, and the rather, because his estimation and countenance he was wont to have among the people, began now to decay, for that they were full of such devices as his were: because there were divers others that preferred the like to please the people withall, and yet with the Senates great good will and favour. So Caius being returned to Rome, he removed from his house, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a house under the Market-place, to shew himself thereby the lowlier and more popular, because many of the meaner sort of the people dwelt thereabouts. Then he purposed to go forward with the rest of his lawes, and to make the people to establish them, a great number of people repairing to Rome out of all parts for the furtherance thereof. Howbeit the Senate counsell'd the Consul Fannius to make proclamation, that all those which were no naturall ROMANES, resident and abiding within the City selfe of Rome, that they should depart out of Rome. Besides all this there was a strange proclamation made, and never seen before: that none of all the friends and confederates of the ROMANES for certaine dayes should come into Rome. But Caius on the other side set up bills on every post, accusing the Consul for making so wicked a proclamation: and further, promised the confederates of Rome to aide them, if they would remaine there against the Consuls proclamation. But yet he performed it not: for when he saw one of Fannius Sergeants carry a friend of his to prison, he held on his way, and would see nothing, neither did he helpe him: either of likelihood because he feared his credit with the people, which began to decay, or else because he was loth (as he said) to picke any quarrel with his enemies, which fought it of him. Furthermore, he chanced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this occasion. The people were to see the pastime of the Sword players or Fencers at the sharpe, within the very Market-place, and there were divers of the Officers that to see the sport, did set up scaffolds round about, to take money for the standing. Caius commanded them to take them downe againe, because the poore men might see the sport without any cost. But not a man of them would yeeld to it. Wherefore he staid till the night before the pastime should be, and then he took all his labourers he had under him, and went and overthrew the scaffolds every one of them: so that the next morning all the Market-place was cleare for the common people to see the pastime at their pleasure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him marvellously, and tooke him for a worthy man. Howbeit his brethren the Tribunes were very much offended with him, and tooke him for a bold presumptuous man. This seemeth to be the chiefe cause why he was put from his third Tribune ship, where he had the most voices on his side: because his Colleagues, to be revenged of the part he had played them, of malice and spite made false report of the voices. Howbeit there is no great troth in this. It is true that he was very angry with this repulse, and it is reported he spake somewhat too proudly to his enemies that were merry with the matter, and laughed him to scorne: that they laughed a SARDONIANS laugh, not knowing how darkly his deedes were intangled. Furthermore, his enemies having chosen Opimius Consul, they began immediately to revoke divers of Caius lawes: as amongst the rest, his doings at CARTHAGE for the re-edifying of that City, procuring thus all the wayes they could to anger him, because they might have just occasion of anger to kill him. Caius notwithstanding did patiently beare it at the first: but but afterwards his friends, and specially Fulvius, did encourage him so, that he began againe to gather men to resist the Consull. And it is reported also, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, secretly hiring a great number of strangers which he sent unto ROME, as if they had been Reapers, or harvest men. And this is that she wrote secretly in her letter unto her son in Ciphers. And yet other write to the contrary, that she was very angry he did attempt those things. When the day came that they should proceed to the revocation of his lawes, both parties met by breake of day at the Capitoll. There when the Consull Opimius had done sacrifice, one of Caius Sergeants called Quintus Antyllus, carrying the intrailes of the beast sacrificed, said unto Fulvius, and others of his tribe that were about him: give place to honest men, vile Citizens that ye be. Some say also, that besides these injurious words, in icorne and contempt he held out his naked Arme to make them ashamed: whereupon they flew him presently in the field with great Bodkins to write with, which they had purposely made for that intent. So the common people were marvellously offended for this murder, and the chiefe men of both sides also were diversly affected. For Caius was very sorry for it, and bitterly reproved them that were about him, saying, that they had given their enemies the occasion they looked for, to set upon them. Opimius the Consull in contrary manner, taking this occasion, rose upon it, and did stirre up the people to be revenged. But there fell a shewre of raine at that time that parted them. The next morning the Consull having assembled the Senate by breake of day, as he was dispatching causes within, some had taken the body of Antyllus, and laid it naked upon the Beere, and so carried it through the Market-place (as it was agreed upon before amongst them) and brought it to the Senate doore, where they began to make great moane and lamentation, Opimius knowing the meaning of it, but yet he dissembled it, and seemed to wonder at it. Whereupon the Senators went out to see what it was, and finding this Beere in the Market-place, some fell a weeping for him that was dead, others cried out, that it was a shamefull act, and in no wise to be suffered. But on the other side, this did revive the old grudge and malice of the people, for the wickednesse of the ambitious Noblemen: who having themselves before slain Tiberius Gracchus that was Tribune, and within the Capitoll it selfe, and had also cast his body into the river, did now make an honourable shew openly in the Market-place, of the body of the Sergeant Antyllus (who though he were wrongfully slaine, yet had himselfe given them the cause that slew him, to do that they did) and all the whole Senate were about the Beere to bewaile his death, and to honour the funerals of a hireling, to make the people also kill him that was onely left the Protector and Defender of the people. After this, they went againe into the Capitoll, and there made a decree, whereby they gave the Consull Opimius extraordinary power and authority, by absolute power to provide for the safety of the Common-wealth, to preserve the City, and to suppress the Tyrants. This decree being established, the Consull presently commanded the Senators that were present there, to go arme themselves: and appointed the ROMANE Knights that the next morning betimes every man should bring two of their men armed with them. Fulvius on the other side prepared his force against them, and assembled the common people together. Caius also returning from the Market-place, staid before the image of his father, and looked earnestly upon it without ever a word speaking, onely he burst out a weeping, and fetching a great sigh, went his way. This made the people that saw him to pity him: so that they talked among themselves, that they were but beasts and cowards at such a straight to forsake so worthy a man. Thereupon they went to his house, stayed there all night and watched before his gate: not as that they did watch with Fulvius, that passed away the night in guzzling and drinking drunk, crying out, and making noise, Fulvius himselfe being drunke first of all, who both spake and did many things farre unmeet for his calling. For on the other side, they that watched Caius were very sorrowfull, and made no noise, even as in a common calamity of their Country, devising with themselves what would fall out upon it, waking and sleeping one after another by turnes. When the day brake, they with Fulvius did awake him, who slept yet foundly for the Wine he dranke over night and they armed themselves with the spoiles of the GAULES that hung round about his house, whom he had overthrowne in battell the same yeare he was Consull: and with great cries, and thundering threatens they went to take the mount Aventine. But Caius would not arme himselfe, but went out of his house in a long Gowne, as if he would have gone simply into the Market-place according to his wonted manner, saying that he carried a short dagger at his girdle under his Gowne. So as he was going out of his house, his wife staid him at the door, and holding him by the one hand, and a little childe of his in her other hand, she said thus unto him: "Alas Caius, thou doest not now go as thou wert wont, a Tribune into the Market-place to speak to the people, neither to preferre any new lawes: neither doest thou go unto an honest warre, that if unfortunately that should happen to thee that is common to all men, I might yet at the least mourne for thy death with honour. But thou goest to put thy selfe into bloody Butchers hands, who most cruelly have slaine thy brother Tiberius: and yet thou goest a naked man unarmed, intending rather to suffer than to do hurt. Besides, thy death can bring no benefit to the Common-wealth. For the worse part hath now the upper hand, considering that sentence passeth by force of sword. Had thy brother been slain by his enemies, before the City of NUMANTIA, yet had they given us his body to have buried him. But such may be my misfortune, that I may presently go to pray the River or sea to give me thy body, when as thy brothers, it shall likewise be throwne into the same. Alas, what hope or trust is left us now in the laws or gods, since they have slaine Tiberius? As Lutina was making this pittiful moan unto him, Caius faire and softly pulled his hand from her, and left her her giving her never a word, but went on with his friends. But the reaching after him to pull him by the Gowne, fell to the ground, lay flatting there a great while, speaking never a word, untill at length her servants took her up in a frowne, and carried her so unto her brother Crassus. Now Fulvius, by the perswasion of Caius, when all their faction were met, sent his younger son (which was a pretty fair boy) with an Herald's rod in his hand for his safety. This boy humbly presenting his duty, with the teares in his eyes, before the Consull and Senate, offered them peace. The most of them that were present thought very well of it. But Opimius made answer, saying, that it became them not to send messengers, thinking with fair words to win the Senate: but it was their duty to come themselves in person like subjects, and offenders to make their triall, and so to crave pardon, and to seek to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commanded the boy he should not return againe to them but with this condition he had prescribed. Caius (as it is reported) was ready to go and clear himselfe unto the Senate: but the residue would not suffer him to go. Whereupon Fulvius sent his sonne backe againe unto them, to speake for them as he had done before. But Opimius that was desirous to fight, caused the boy to be taken, and committed him to safe custody, and then went presently against Fulvius with a great number of footmen well armed, and of CRETAN Archers besides; who with their Arrows did more trouble and hurt their enemies, then with any thing else, that within a while they all began to flie. Fulvius on the other side fled into an old hot-house that no body made reckoning of, and there being found shortly after, they slew him and his eldest sonne. Now for Caius, he fought not at all, but being mad with himselfe, and grieved to see such blood-shed, he got him into the Temple of Diana, where he would have killed himselfe, had not his very good friends Pomponius and Licinius saved him. For both they being with him at that time, took his sword from him, and counseled him to flie. It is reported that then he fell downe on his knees, and holding up both his hands unto the goddesse, he besought her that the people might never come out of bondage, to be revenged of this their ingratitude and treason. For the common people (or the most part of them) plainly turned their coates, when they heard proclamation made, that all men had pardon granted them that would returne. So Caius fled upon it, and his enemies followed him so near that they over tooke him upon the wooden Bridge, where two of his friends that were with him staid, to defend him against his pursuers, and bad him in the meane time make shift for himself, whilst they fought with them upon the Bridge: and so they did, and kept them that not a man got the Bridge of them untill they were both slaine. Now there was none that fled with Caius, but one of his men called Philocrates: notwithstanding, every man did still encourage and counsel him, as they do men to win a game, but no man would helpe him, nor offer him any horse though he often required it, because he saw his enemies so near unto him. This notwithstanding, by their defence that were slaine upon the Bridge, he got ground on them so, that he had leisure to creep into a little grove of wood which was consecrated to the Furies. There his servant Philocrates slew him, and then flew himselfe also, and fell dead upon him. Other write notwithstanding, that both the master and servant were overtaken, and taken alive: and that his servant did so straight embrace his master, that none of the enemies could strike him for all the blowes they gave, before he was slaine himselfe. So one of the murderers strake off Caius Gracchus head to carry to the Consull. Howbeit one of Opimius friends called Septimuleius, tooke the head from the other by the way, because proclamation was made by Trumpet before they fought, that whosoever brought the heads of Fulvius and Caius, they should be paid the weight of them in Gold. Wherefore this Septimuleius carried Caius head upon the top of his spear unto Opimius: whereupon the scales being brought to weigh it, it was found to weigh seventeen pound weight and two third parts of a pound: because Septimuleius besides the horrible murder he had committed, had also holpen it with this valliancy, that he had taken out his brain, and in lieu thereof had filled his scull with Lead. Now the other also that brought Fulvius head, because they were poor men, they had nothing. The bodies of these two men, Caius Gracchus and Fulvius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thousand that were slaine) were all throwne into the River, their goods confiscate, and their widowes forbidden to mourne for their death. Furthermore, they took from Lutina Caius wife, her joynter: but yet they dealt more cruelly and beastly with the young boy, Fulvius sonne; who had neither lift up his hand against them, nor was in the fight among them, but onely came to them to make peace before they fought; whom they kept as prisoner, and after the battel ended they put him to death. But yet that which most of all grieved the people was the Temple of Concord, the which Opimius caused to be buile: for it appeared that he boasted, and in manner triumphed, that he had slaine so many Citizens of ROME. And therefore there were that in the night wrote under the inscription of the Temple these verses:

A furious fall and fall of beastly scheme
This temple buile, that beareth Concorde's name.

This Opimius was the first man at ROME, that being Consull, usurped the absolute power of the Dictator: and that without law or justice condemned three thousand Citizens of ROME, besides Opimius the first Fulvius Flaccus (who had also been Consull, and had received the honour of triumph) and Caius Consull, usurping the power of the Dictator. This notwithstanding could not keepe Opimius from thevery and extortion. For when he was sent Ambassadour unto Jugurth King of NUMIDIA, he was bribed with money: and thereupon with money of being accused, he was most shamefully convicted, and condemned. Wherefore he ended his dayes Jugurth and with this reproach and infamy, hated and mocked of all the people: because at the time of the condemned.

The Gracchi were marvelously desired of the people. The magnanimity of Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi.

overthrow he dealt bravely with them that fought for his quarrel. But shortly after it appeared to the world how much they lamented the losse of the two brethren of the Gracchi. For they made images and statues of them, and caused them to be set up in an open and honourable place, consecrating the places where they had been slaine: and many of them also came and offered to them of their first fruites and flowers, according to the time of the year, and went thither to make their prayers on their knees, as unto the temples of the gods. Their mother Cornelia, as writers report, did beare this calamity with a noble heart: and as for the Chappels which they built and consecrated unto them in the place where they were slaine, she said no more, but that they had such graves as they had deserved. Afterwards she dwelt continually by the mount Misene, and never changed her manner of life. She had many friends, and because she was a noble Lady, and loved ever to wellcome strangers, she kept a very good house, and therefore had alwayes great repaire unto her, of GRACIANS and learned men: besides, there was no King nor Prince but both received gifts from her, and sent her againe. They that frequented her company delighted marvellously to hear her report the deeds and manner of her fathers life, Scipio AFRICAN: but yet they wondred more to hear her tell the acts and death of her two sonnes, Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, without shedding tear, or making any shew of lamentation or grief, no more then if she had told an History unto them that had requested her. Inasmuch as some writers report, that age, or her great misfortunes, had overcome and taken her reason and sense from her to feel any sorrow. But indeed they were senseless to say so, not understanding how that to be nobly borne and virtuously brought up, doth make men temperately to digest sorrow: and that fortune oftentimes overcomes vertue which regardeth honesty in all respects, but yet with any adversity she cannot take away the temperance from them whereby they patiently bear it.

THE COMPARISON OF TIBERIUS and CAIUS GRACCHI, with AGIS and CLEOMENES.

Now that we be come to the end of this History, we are to compare the lives of these two men the one with the other. First, as touching the two Gracchi, their enemies that most hated them, and spake the worst they could of them, could not deny but that they were the best given to vertue, and as well taught and brought up as any ROMANS that were in their time. But yet it appeareth, that nature had the upper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they having been very ill brought up both for Learning and good Manners, for lacke whereof the oldest men were almost spoiled, yet did they notwithstanding make themselves the first masters and example of sobriety, temperance, and simplicity of life. Furthermore, the two first having lived in that time when ROME flourished most in honour and virtuous desires, they were more then ashamed to forsake the vertues inherited from their Ancestors. These two last also being borne of fathers that had a clean contrary disposition, and finding their Country altogether without any order, and infected with dissolute life, were not therefore any wit the more slack in their desire to do well. Furthermore the greatest praise they gave unto the two Gracchi, was, their abstinence and integrity from taking of money all the time they were in office, and dealt in matters of state, ever keeping their hands cleane, and tooke not a penny wrongfully from any man. Where Agis on the other side was offended if any man praised him, for that he took nothing from another man: seeing that he dispossessed himself of his own goods, and gave it to his Citizens, which amounted in ready coyn to the value of six hundred talents. Whereby men may easily judge, how grievous a sin he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man, seeing that he thought it a kind of avarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was marvellous great difference in their alterations, and renewing of the state, which they did both preferre. For the acts of the two ROMANS were to mend high wayes and to re-edifie and replenish decayed Towns: and the worthiest act Tiberius did, was the law Agraria, which he brought in for dividing of the lands of the Common-wealth amongst the poor Citizens. And the best act his brother Caius also did, was the mingling of the Judges, adding to the three hundred Senators three hundred ROMAN Knights to be indifferent Judges with them.

them. Whereas Agis and Cleomenes in contrary manner were of opinion, that to reforme small faults, and to redresse them by little and little, was (as Plato said) to cut off one of the Hydraes heads, of the which came afterwards seven in the place: and therefore they took upon them a change and innovation, even at once to roote out all the mischiefs of their Country (or to speake more truly, to take away the disorder which brought in all vice and mischief to the Common-wealth) and so to restore the City of SPARTA againe to her former ancient honourable estate. Now this may be said againe for the government of the Gracchi, that the chiefeest men of ROMA were ever against their purposes. Where, in that Agis attempted, and Cleomenes ended, they had the noblest ground that could be, and that was the ancient laws and ordinances of SPARTA, touching temperance and equality: the first, instituted in old time by Lycurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo. Furthermore, by the alterations of the first, ROMA became no greater then it was before: Where, by that which Cleomenes did, all GREECE in short time saw that SPARTA commanded all the rest of PELOPONNESUS, and fought at that time against those that were of greatest power in all GREECE, for the signiory thereof. Whereby their only marke and purpose was, to rid all GREECE from the wars of the GAULES and ILLYRIANS, and to restore it againe to the honest government of the race and line of Hercules. Their deaths (me thinkes) do shew great difference of their courages. For the Gracchi fighting with their own Citizens, were slain flying. Of these two also, Agis, because he would put never a Citizen to death, was slain in manner voluntarily: and Cleomenes receiving injury stood to his defence, and when he had no opportunity to do it, he stoutly killed himself. And so may it be said on the other side, that Agis did never any notable act of a Captain or Souldier, because he was slain before he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleomenes on the other side, may be opposed the scaling of the walls of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the first man that at the assault got up upon the wall, which was no small exploit: and the peace which he made also at the siege of NUMANTIA, whereby he saved twenty thousand fighting men of the ROMANES, the which had no meanes otherwise to save their lives. And Caius also in the selfe same war, at the siege of NUMANTIA, and afterwards in SARDINIA, did many noble feats of war; so that there is no doubt, but if they had not beene slain so soone as they were, they might have been compared with the excellentest Capitaines that ever were in ROMA. Again, touching their doings in civil policy, it appeareth that Agis dealt more slackly, being abused by Agefilus: who likewise deceived the poor Citizens of the division of the lands which he had promised them. In fine, for lacke of courage, because he was very young, he left the things undone which he had purposed to have performed. On the other side, Cleomenes went too roundly to work, to renew the ancient government of the Common-wealth again, by killing the Ephores with too much cruelty, whom he might easily have wonne, or otherwise by force have gotten the upper hand. For it is not the part of a wise Physician, nor of a good governour of a Common-wealth to use the sword, but in great extremity, where there is no other helpe nor remedy: and there lacked judgement in them both, but worst of all in the one, for injury is ever joyned with cruelty. The Gracchi on the other side, neither the one nor the other began to imbrue their hands in the blood of their Citizens. For it is reported, that though they did hurt Caius, yet he would never defend himselfe: and where it was knowne that he was very valiant in battel with his sword in his hand against the enemy, he shewed himselfe as cold againe in the uproare against his Citizens. For he went out of his house unarmed, and fled when he saw them fight, being more circumspect not to do hurt, then not to suffer any. Therefore they are not to be thought cowards for their flying, but rather men fearful to offend any man. For they were driven either to yeeld to them that followed them, or else if they stayed, to stand to their defence, because they might keep themselves from hurt. And where they accuse Tiberius for the faults he committed, the greatest that ever he did, was when he deposed Octavius his colleague from the Tribuneship, and that he himselfe made suite for the second. And as for Caius, they falsely accused him for the death of Antyllus the Sergeant, who indeed was slain unknown to him, and to his great grief. Where Cleomenes on the other side, though we should forget the murder he committed upon the Ephores, yet he set slaves at liberty, and ruled the Kingdome in manner himselfe alone: but yet for manners sake onely he joyned his own brother with him, which was of the selfe same house. And when he had perawked Archidamus (who was next heir to the Kingdom of the other royall house) to be bold to returne home from MESSINA unto SPARTA, he suffered him to be slain; and because he did not revenge his death, he did confirme their opinion that thought he was consenting to his death. Lycurgus on the other side, whose example he did counterfeite to follow, because he did willingly resigne the Kingdome unto his brothers son Charilau, and being afraid also, that if the young child should chance to miscarry, they would suspect him for his death, he exiled himselfe out of his own Country a long time, travelling up and downe, and returned not to SPARTA againe, before Charilau had gotten a son to succeed him in his Kingdome. But we cannot set another GRECIAN by Lycurgus comparable unto him. We have declared also that amongst Cleomenes deeds, there were many other great alterations then these, and also many other breaches of the law. So they that do condemne the manners of the one and the other, say, that the two GRECIANS from the beginning had an aspiring mind to be tyrants, still practising warres: whereas the two ROMANES onely, even by their most mortall enemies, could be blamed for nothing else, but for an extreame ambition; and did confesse that they were too earnest and vehement above their nature, in any strife or contention they had with their adversaries; and that they yeelded unto their choler and passion, as unto ill winds, which brought them to do those things they did in the end.

For what more just and honest intent could they have had, then the first was? had not the rich men (even through stoutnesse and authority to overthrow the laws) brought them against their wills into quarrel: the one to save his life, the other to revenge his brothers death, who was slain without order, justice, or the authority of any Officer? Thus thou mayest thy selfe see the difference that was betwixt the GRECIANS and the ROMANES: and now to tell you plainly my opinion of both, I thinke that Tiberius was the stoutest of the four; and that the young King Agis offended least; and for boldnesse and courage, Caius came nothing near unto Cleomenes.

THE LIFE OF DEMOSTHENES.

Ann. Mund.
356Ant. Christ.

That made the little Book of the praise of Alcibiades, touching the victory he wanne at the horse-race of the Olympian games (were it the Poet Euripides, as some thinke, or any other) my friend Sossius, said: that to make a man happy, he must of necessity be borne in some famous City. But to tell you what I thinke hereof, doubtlesse, true happinesse chiefly consisteth in the vertue and qualities of the mind, being a matter of no moment, whether a man be borne in a pelting village, or in a famous City: no more then it is for one to be borne of a faire or foule mother. For it were a madnesse to thinke that the little village of JULIDE, being the least part of the Isle of CEO (the whole Island of it selfe being but a small thing) and that the Isle of AEGINA (which is of so small a length, that a certaine ATHENIAN on a time made a motion it might be taken away, because it was but as a straw in the sight of the haven of Piræa) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comedians: and not breed an honest, just, and wise man, and of a noble courage. For, as we have reason to thinke that Arts and Sciences which were first devised and invented to make some things necessary for mens life, or otherwise to win fame and credit, are drowned, and cast away in little poor villages: so are we to judge also, that vertue, like a strong and fruitful plant, can take root, and bring forth in every place, where it is grafted in a good nature, and gentle person, that can patiently away with pains. And therefore if we chance to offend, and live not as we should, we cannot accuse the meannesse of our Country where we were borne; but we must justly accuse our selves. Surely he hath taken upon him to put forth any worke, or to write any history, in the which he is to thrust many strange things unknown to his Country, and which are not ready at his hand to be had, but dispersed abroad in diverse places, and to be gathered out of diverse books and authorities: first of all, he must needs remaine in some great and famous City through-thoroughly inhabited, where men do delight in good and vertuous things, because there are commonly plenty of all sorts of books: and that perusing them, and hearing talke also of many things besides, which other Historiographers peradventure have not written of, and which will carry so much more credit, because men that are alive may presently speake of them as of their own knowledge: where by he may make his work perfect in every point, having many and divers necessary things contained in it. But I my selfe that dwell in a poore little Towne, and yet do remaine there willingly lest it should become lesse, whilst I was in ITALY, and at ROME, I had no leisure to study and exercise the Latine tongue, aswell for the great businesse I had then to do, as also to satisfie them that came to learn Philophy of me: so that even somewhat too late and now in my latter time, I began to take Latine books in hand. And thereby (a strange thing to tell you, but yet true) I learned no nor understood matters so much by the words, as I came to understand the words, by common experience and knowledge I had in things. But furthermore, to know how to pronounce the Latine tongue well, or to speake it readily, or to understand the figures, translations, and fine joyning of the simple words one with another, which do beautifie and fet forth the tongue, surely I judge it to be a marvellous pleasant and sweet thing; but withall it requireth a long and laboursome study, meet for those that have better leisure then I have, and that have young years on their backs to follow such pleasure. Therefore in this present booke, which is the fifth of this worke, where I have taken upon me to compare the lives of Noblemen one with another: undertaking to write the lives of Demosthenes and Cicero, we will consider and examine their nature, manners and conditions, by their acts and deeds in the Government of the Commonwealth, not meaning otherwise to confesse their works and writings of eloquence, neither to define which of them two were sharper, or sweeter in his oration. For as the Poet John saith:

*In this behalfe a man may rightly say,
The Dolphins in their proper soile do play.*

Demosthenes compared with Cicero.

The which Cecilius little understanding, being a man very rash in all his doings, hath unadvisedly written and set forth in print, a comparison of Demosthenes eloquence with Ciceroes. But if it were an easie matter for every man to know himself, then the gods indeed have given us no commandment, neither could men have said that it came from heaven. But for my opinion, methinks Fortune even from the beginning hath framed, in manner, of one selfe mold Demosthenes and Cicero, and hath in their natures fashioned many of their qualities one like to the other: as both of them to be ambitious, both of them to love the liberty of their Country, and both of them very fearful in any danger of wars. And likewise their fortunes seem to me, to be both much alike. For it is hard to finde two Orators againe, that being so meanelly borne as they, have come to be of so great power and authority as they two: nor that have deserved the ill will of Kings and Noblemen so much as they have done, nor that have lost their daughters, nor that have been banished their Countries, and that have been restored again with honour, and that again have fled, and have been taken againe, nor that have ended their lives with the liberty of their Country. So that it is hard to be judged, whether Nature have made them liker in manners, or Fortune in their doings: as if they had both like cunning workmasters strived one with the other, to whom they should make them best resemble. But first of all we must write of the elder of them two.

of Demosthenes.

Demosthenes the father of this Orator Demosthenes, was (as Theopompus writeth) one of the chief men of the City, and they called him Macharompus, to wit, a maker of sword blades, because he had a great shop where he kept a number of slaves to forge them. But touching Eschines the Orators report of his mother, who said that she was the daughter of one Gelon (that fled from ATHENS being accused of treason) and of a barbarous woman that was her mother, I am not able to say whether it be true, or devised of malice to do him despite. Howsoever it was, it is true that his father died, leaving him but seven years old, and left him reasonable well: for his goods came to little lesse then the value of fifteen talents. Howbeit his Guardians did him great wrong, for they stole a great part of his goods themselves; and did let the rest runne to nought, as having little care of it, for they would not pay his Schoole-masters their wages. And this was the cause that he did not learn the liberal sciences which are usually taught unto honest mens sons: and to further that want also, he was but weakling and very tender, and therefore his mother would not much let him go to Schoole, neither also durst his masters keep him too hard to it, because he was but a sickly child at the first, and very weak. And it is reported also, that the surname of Battalus was given him in mockery by other schoole boyes his companions, because of his weaknesse of body. This Battalus (as diverse men do report) was an effeminate player on the flute, against whom the Poet Antiphanes to mocke him, devised a little play. Others also do write of one Battalus, a dissolute Orator, and that wrote lascivious verses: and it seemeth that the ATHENIANS at that time did call a certaine part of mans body uncomely to be named, Battalus. Now for Argus (which surname men say was also given him) he was so called, either for his rude and beastly manners (because some Poets do call a snake Argus) or else for his manner of speech, which was very unpleasant to the eare; for Argus is the name of a Poet that made alwayes bawdy and ill-favoured songs. But hereof enough, as Plato said. Furthermore, the occasion (as it is reported) that moved him to give himselfe to eloquence, was this, Callistratus the Orator was to defend the cause of one Oropus before the Judges, and every man longed greatly for this day of pleading, both for the excellency of the Orator, that then bare the bell for eloquence: as for the matter, and his accusation, which was manifestly known to all. Demosthenes hearing his Schoolemasters agree together to go to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his Schoolmasters agree together to go to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his School-master to be so good as to let him go with him. His master granted him: and being acquainted with the keepers of the Hall doore where this matter was to be pleaded, he so intreated them, that they placed their scholar in a very good place, where being at his ease, he might both hear and see all that was done: and no man could see him. Thereupon when Demosthenes had heard the case pleaded, he was greatly in love with the honour which the Orator had gotten, when he saw how he was waited upon home with such a traine of people after him: but yet he wondered more at the force of his great eloquence, which could so turne and convey all things at his pleasure. Thereupon he left the study of all other sciences, and all other exercises of wit and body, which other children are brought up in: and began to labor continually, and to frame himselfe to make Orations, with intent one day, to be an Orator among the rest. His master that taught him Rhetoricke was Isenes, notwithstanding that Isocrates also kept a Schoole of Rhetoricke at that time: either because that being an Orphan he was not able to pay the wages that Isocrates demanded of his Scholars, which was ten Minas: or rather for that he found Isenes manner of speech more proper for the use of the eloquence he desired, because it was more fine and subtle. Yet Hermippus writeth notwithstanding, that he had read certaine bookes having no name of any author, which declared that Demosthenes had been Platoes Scholar, and that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronunciation and eloquence. And he writeth also of one Ctesibius, who reporteth that Demosthenes had secretly read Isocrates works of Rhetoricke, and also Alcidamas bookes; by means of one Callias SYRACUSAN, and others. Wherefore when he came out of his wardship, he began to put his Guardians in suite, and to write Orations and pleas against them: who in contrary manner did ever use delays and excuses, to save themselves for giving up any account unto him, of goods and patrimony left him. And thus following this exercise (as Thucydides writeth) it prospered so well with him, that in the end he obtained it, but not without great paines and danger: and yet with all that he could do, he could not recover all that his father left him, by a good deal. So having now gotten some boldnesse, and being used also to speake in open presence, and withall, having a feeling and delight of the estimation that is wonne by eloquence in pleading, afterwards he attempted to put forward himself, and to practise in matters of state. For, as there goeth a tale of one Laomedon an ORCHOMENIAN, who having a grievous paine in the spleene, by advice of the Physicians was willed to runne long courses to helpe him: and that following their order, he became in the end so lusty and nimble of body, that afterwards he would needs make one run for games, and indeed grew to be the swiftest runner of all men in his time. Even so the like chanced unto Demosthenes. For at the first, beginning to practise Oratory for recovery of his goods, and thereby having gotten good skill and knowledge how to plead, he afterwards tooke upon him to speake to the people in assemblies touching the government of the Common-wealth, even as he should have contended for some game or price; and at the length did excell all the Orators at that time that go up into the Pulpit for Orations: notwithstanding that when he first ventured to speake openly, the people make such a noise, that he could scarce be heard; and besides they mocked him for his manner of speech that was so strange, because he used so many long confused periods; and his matter he spake was so intricate with argument one upon another, that they were tedious, and made them weary to hear him. And furthermore, he had a very soft voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had also a short breath, the which made that men could not well understand what he meant; for his long periods in his Orations were oftentimes interrupted, before he was at the end of his sentence. So at length perceiving he was thus rejected, he gave over to speake any more before the people, and halfe in despaire withdrew himself into the haven of Piræa. There Eunimius the THESSALIAN being a very old man, found him, and sharply reproved him, and told him, that he did himselfe great wrong, considering, that having a manner of speech much like unto Pericles, he drowned himselfe by his faint heart; because he did not seeke the way to be bold against the noise of the common people, and to arme his body to away with the paines and burthen of publike Orations, but suffering it to grow feebler for lacke of use and practise. Furthermore, being once againe repulsed and whistled at, as he returned home hanging down his head for shame, and utterly discouraged, Satyrus an excellent player of Comedies being his familiar friend, followed him, and went to speake with him. Demosthenes made his complaint unto him, that where he had taken more pains then all the Orators besides, and had almost even worne himself to the bones with study, yet he could by no means devise to please the people: whereas other Orators that did nothing but bib all the day long, and Mariners that understood nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the Pulpit with Orations: and on the other side that they made no account of him. Satyrus then answered him: Thou sayest true Demosthenes, but care not for this, I will helpe it straight, and take away the cause of all this: so thou wilt but tell me without book certain verses of Euripides, or of Sophocles, thereupon Demosthenes presently rehearsed some unto him, that came into his mind. Satyrus repeating them after him, gave them quite another grace, with such a pronunciation, comely gesture, and modest countenance becoming the verses, that Demosthenes thought them clean changed: Whereby perceiving how much the action (to wit, the comely manner and gesture in his Orations) do give grace and comeliness in his pleading, he then thought it but a trifle, and almost nothing to speake of, to exercise to plead well, unless therewithall he did also study to have a good pronounciation and gesture. Thereupon he built him a cellar under the ground, the which was whole even in cellar my time, and he would daily go downe into it, to fashion his gesture and pronounciation, and also to exercise his voice; and that with such earnest affection, that oftentimes he would be there two beginning: and that not onely he never changed all his life time, but to the contrary, he lost his life, because he would be no chaneling. For he did not like Demades: who to excuse himselfe for that he had oft turned coate in matters of Government, said, that he went oftentimes against his owne sayings, as matters fell out: but never against the benefit of the Common-wealth. And Melanopus also, who was ever against Calisthratus, having his mouth many times stopped with Money, he would up to the Pulpit for Orations, and tell the People, that indeed Calisthratus, which maintaineth the contrary opinion against me, is my enemy, and yet I yeeld unto him for this time: for the benefit of the Common-wealth must carry it. And another also, Nicodemus MæsiæNIAN, who being first of Cassanders side, tooke part afterwards with Demetrius, and then said, that he did not speake against himselfe, but that it was meete he should obey his superiours. They cannot detect Demosthenes with the like, that he did ever halt or yeeld either in word or deed. For he ever continued firme and constant in one minde in his Orations. Infomuch that Panæius the Philosopher saith, that the most part of all his Orations are grounded upon this Maxime and Principle: that for it selfe, nothing is to be taken or accepted, but that which is honest. As, the Oration of the Crowne, the which he made against Aristocrates: that also which he made for the Franches and Freedome: and in fine, all his Orations against Philip of MACEÐON; in all those he doth not perswade his Countrey men to take that which is most pleasant, easiest, or most profitable: but he proveth that oftentimes honesty is to be preferred above safety or health. So that had he in all his Orations and doings joynted to his honesty, courtesie, and franke speech, valiantnesse in Wars, and cleane hands from bribery, he might deservedly have beene compared, not with Miracles, Polyæulus, Hyperides and other Orators: but even with the highest, with Cimon, Thucydides, and Pericles. For Phocion, who tooke the worst way in government of the Common-wealth, because he was suspected that he tooke part with the MACEÐONIANS: yet for valiantnesse, wisdom and justice, he was ever thought as honest a man as Ephialtes and Aristides. But Demosthenes on the other side (as Demetrius saith) was no man to trust to for Wars, neither had he any power to refuse gifts and bribes. For though he would never be corrupted by Philip King of MACEÐON, yet he was bribed with Gold and Silver that was brought from the Cities of Susa and Ecbatana; and was very ready to praise and commend the deedes of their Ancestors, but not to follow them. Truly, yet was he the honestest man of all other Orators in his time, excepting Phocion. And besides, he did ever speake more boldly and plainly unto the People than any man else, and would openly contrary their mindes, and sharply reprove the ATHENIANS for their faults, as appeareth by his Orations. Theopompus also writeth, that the People on a time would have had him to accuse a man, whom they would needs have condemned. But he refusing to do it, the People were offended, and did mutiny against him. Thereupon he rising up, said openly unto them: My Lords ATHENIANS, I will alwaies counsell you to that which I thinke best for the benefit of the Common-wealth, although it be against your mindes: but falsely to accuse one to satisfie your mindes, though you command me, I will not do it. Furthermore, that which he did against Antiphon, sheweth plainly, that he was no People-pleaser, and that he did lean more unto the Authority of the Senate. For when Antiphon was quit by the People in the Assembly of the City, Demosthenes notwithstanding tooke him, and called him againe into the Court of the Areopagites, and did not paffe for the Peoples ill will, but there convinced him for promising Philip of MACEÐON to burne the Assemply of ATHENS: so by sentence of that Court he was condemned, and suffered for it. He did also accuse the Nunne Thyridides for many lewd parts committed, and amongst others, for that she taught Slaves to deceive their Masters: and so following the matter against her, she was condemned to death, and executed. As is thought also, that he made the Oration Apollodorus spake against the Prætor Timotheus, and proved thereby that he was a debtor to the Common-wealth, and so a naughty man; and that he wrote those Orations also intituled to Farmio and Stephanus, for the which he was justly reprovèd. For Farmio pleaded against Apollodorus with the Oration which Demosthenes selfe had made for him; which was even alike, as if out of one selfe Cutlers Shop he had sold his Enemies Swords one to kill another: and for his knowne Orations, those which he made against Androcion, Timocrates and Aristocrates, he caused them to give them unto others, when he had not yet dealt in matters of States. For indeede when he did put them forth, he was not passing seven or eight and twenty years old. The Oration which he had made against Aristogiton, and the other also of liberty, against Ctesippus the Sonne of Chabrias; he spake them, as he saith himselfe (or as others write) openly unto the People, because he intended to marry Chabrias Mother: howbeit he did not, but married a SAMIAN woman, as Demetrius MAGEÑIAN writeth in his Booke he made, intituled Synonyma. But that he wrote against Æschines, where he accuseth him that he dealt falsely when he was Ambassadour, it is not known whether it was recited or not, although Idomeneus writeth, that there lacked but thirty voices onely to have quit Æschines. But in this methinks he spake not truly, and doth not conjecture it by that one and the other have said in their Orations against the Crowne, in the which neither the one nor the other do say precisely, that this accusation proceeded to judgement. But rather that list decide this doubt. Now before the War began, it was evident enough, to which side Demosthenes would incline in the Common-wealth. For, he would never leave to reprove and withstand Philip doings. Therefore he being more spoken of in Philip Court, than any man else, he was sent unto him the tenth person with nine others in Ambassage: Philip gave them all audience one after another: howbeit he was more carefull and circumpect to answer Demosthenes Oration than all the rest. But otherwise out of that place, he did not desire Demosthenes so much honour, nor gave him so good entertainment, as to his other companions: Philip

Philip shewed more kindnesse, and gave better countenance unto Æschines and Philocrates then unto him. Wherefore when they did highly praise Philip, and said that he was a well-spoken Prince, a faire man, and would drinke freely; and be pleasant in company, Demosthenes smiled at it, and turned all things to the worst, saying, that those qualities were nothing commendable nor meete for a King. For the first was a quality meete for a Pleader, the second for a Woman, and the third for a Sponge. In fine, Wars falling out betwene them, because Philip of the one side could not live in peace, and the ATHENIANS on the other side were still incensed and stirred up by Demosthenes daily Orations, the ATHENIANS first sent into the Isle of Euboea (the which by means of certaine private Tyrants that had taken the Townes, became subject againe unto Philip) following a Decree Demosthenes had preferred, and so went to expulse the MACEÐONIANS againe. After that also he caused them to send aide unto the BYZANTINES, and to the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made War. For he so perswaded the ATHENIANS, that he made them forget the malice they did beare unto those two Nations, and the faults which either of both the Cities had committed against them in the Wars, touching the rebellion of their Confederates: and he caused them to send them aide, which kept them from Philip force and power. Furthermore, going afterwards unto all the great Cities of GREECE as Ambassadour, he did so sollicite and perswade them, that he brought them all in a manner to be against Philip. So that the Army which their Tribe should finde at their common charge, was fiftene thousand Footmen, all strangers, and two thousand Horlemen, besides the Citizens of every City which should also serve in the Warres at their charge; and the Money also leaved for the maintenance of this Warre, was very willingly disbursed. Theophrastus writeth, that it was at that time their Confederates did pray that they would set downe a certaine summe of Money, what every City should pay: and that Crobylus an Oratour should make answer, that the Warre had no certaine maintenance: inferring that the charges of Warre was infinite. Now all GREECE being in Armes, attending what should happen, and all these People and Cities being united in one League together, as the EUBOBIANS, the ATHENIANS, the CORINTHIANS, the MEGARIANS, the LEUCADIANS, and those of CORFU: the greatest matter Demosthenes had to do, was to perswade the THEBANS also to enter into this League, because their Countrey confined and bordered with ATTICA; besides, their force and power was of great importance, for that they carried the same of all GREECE at that time, for the valiantest Souldiers. But it was no trifling matter to winne the THEBANS, and to make them breake with Philip, who but lately before had bound them unto him by many great pleasures which he had done to them in the Warre of the PHOCIANS: besides also that betwixt ATHENS and THEBES, by reason of vicinity, there fell out daily quarrels and debates, the which with every little thing were soone renewed. This notwithstanding, Philip being proud of the Victory he had won by the City of AMPHISSE, when he came and invaded the Countrey of ELATIA, and was entered into PHOCIDE, the ATHENIANS were then so amazed with it, that no man durst occupie the Pulpit for Orations, neither could they tell what way to take. Thus the whole Assembly standing in a doubt with great silence, Demosthenes onely stept up, and did againe give them counsell to seeke to make league and alliance with the THEBANS: and so did further encourage the People, and put them in good hope, as he was alwaies wont to do. Then with others he was sent Ambassadour unto THEBES: and Philip also for his part, sent Ambassadours unto the THEBANS; Amyntas and Clearchus, two Gentlemen MACEÐONIANS, and with them Daechus, Thestalus, and Thracys, to answer and withstand the perswasions of the ATHENIANS Ambassadours. Thereupon the THEBANS began to advise themselves for the best, and laid before their eyes then miserable fruits and calamities of Warre, their wounds being yet greene and untured, which they got by the Warres of PHOCIDE. Notwithstanding, the great force of Demosthenes eloquence (as Theopompus writeth) did so inflame the THEBANS courage with desire of honour, that it trod under their feete all manner of considerations, and did so ravish them with the love and desire of honesty; that they cast at their heeles all feare of danger; all remembrance of pleasures received, and all reason perswading to the contrary. This act of an Oratour was of so great force, that Philip forthwith sent Ambassadours unto the GRECIANS, to intreat for peace; and all GREECE was up to see what would become of this stir. Thus, not onely the Capitaines of ATHENS obeyed Demosthenes, doing all that he commanded them; but the Governours also of THEBES, and of all the Countrey of BOEOTIA besides. And the Assemblies also of the Councell of THEBES were as well governed by him as the Assemblies of ATHENS, being alike beloved both of the one and the other, and having a like Authority to command both, and not undeservedly, as Theopompus saith, but by just desert. But some fatal destiny, and the revolution of times had determined the final end of the liberty of GREECE at that time; cleane contrary to his purpose and intent. There were also many celestiall signes that did foreflew and prognosticate what end should ensue thereof. And amongst others, Apollon's Nunne gave these dreadfull Oracles: and this old Prophecy of the SYBILS was commonly sung in every bodies mouth:

What time the blondy battell shall be fought at Thermodon;

God grant I may be far away; or else (to looke thereon)

Have Eagles Wings to soare above, among the clouds on his:

For there, the vanquisher side shall weepe, and Conquerour shall die.

Men do report that this Thermodon is a little River of the Countrey of CHIRONIA, which falleth into the River of Cephissus: howbeit at this present time there is never a River nor Brooke in all our Countrey, that I know, called Thermodon. And I thinke, that that River which we call now

Hamon,

Demosthenes stirreth up Greece against the MACEÐONIANS.

Demosthenes force of eloquence, joynted the THEBANS with the ATHENIANS, and won them from Philip King of Macedon.

The overthrow of the Grecians fore-shewed at Cheronæ, by signes and ancient Oracles.

The River of Thermodon or Hammon, in the Countrey of Chironæ.

Hæmon, was in old time Thermodon: for it runneth by the Temple of Hercules, where the GRECIANS lay in Campe. And it may be, that because it was filled with dead bodies, and that it ran bloud at the day of the Battell, it changed her name, and was surnamed Hæmon, because Hæma in the Greeke Tongue, signifieth bloud. Yet Duris writeth notwithstanding, that this Thermodon was no River, but that certaine men setting up their Tent, and trenching it about, found a little Image of stone, whereupon were engraven these Letters: whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermodon, who carried an AMAZON hurt in his armes; and that for this Image of Thermodon, they do sing such another old Oracle as this:

*Te Ernes and Ravens tarry till the field of Thermodon:
There will be store of carcases of men to feede upon.*

This notwithstanding, it is very hard to tell the troth of these things. But Demosthenes trusting to the valiantnesse and power of the GRECIANS, and being marvellously encouraged to see such a great number of valiant and resolute men, so willing to fight with the Enemy, he bade them be of good courage, and not to buz about such Oracles, and to give eare to such Prophecies. And furthermore he told them plainly, that he did mistrust the Nunne Pythia did leane unto Philip, as favouring him, and did put the THEBANS in minde of their Captaine Epaminondas, and the ATHENIANS of Pericles; and perswaded them, that those two famous men were alwaies of opinion, that such Prophecies were no other but a fine cloake for cowards, and that taking no heed to them, they did dispatch their matters according to their owne discretion. Untill this present time, Demosthenes shewed himselfe alwaies an honest man. But when it came to the Battell, he fled like a coward, and did no valiant act any thing answerable to the Orations whereby he had perswaded the People. For he left his ranke, and cowardly cast away his Weapons to run the lighter, and was not ashamed at all (as Pythias said) of the words written upon his Shield in golden Letters, which were, Good Fortune. Now Philip having won the Battell, he was at that present so joyfull, that he fell to commit many a fond part. For after he had drunke well with his friends, he went into the place where the Overthrow was given, and there in mockery began to sing the beginning of the Decree which Demosthenes had preferred (by the which the ATHENIANS accordingly proclaimed Warres against him) rising and falling with his voice, and dancing it in measure with his foote:

Demosthenes the Sonne of Demosthenes Paanian did put forth this.

But afterwards beginning to waxe fober, and leaving his drunkennesse, when he had remembered of himselfe what danger he had been in, then his haire stood bolt upright upon his head, considering the force and power of such an Oratour, that in a piece of a day had enforced him to hazard his Realme and life at a Battell. Now Demosthenes fame was so great, that it was carried even to the great King of PERSIA'S Court, who wrote unto his Lieutenants and Governours, that they should feede Demosthenes with money, and should procure to entertaine him above all the men in GREECE, as he that could best withdraw Philip, and trouble him with the Warres and tumults of GREECE. And this was afterwards proved by Letters found of Demosthenes himselfe, the which came to King Alexander's hands in the City of SARDIS, and by other Writings also of the Governours and Lieutenants of the King of PERSIA, in the which were named directly the expresse summes of Money which had been sent and given unto him. Now the GRECIANS being thus overthrowne by Battell, the other Orators, adversaries unto Demosthenes in the Common-wealth, began to set upon him, and to prepare to accuse him. But the People did not onely cleare him of all the accusations objected against him, but did continue to honour him more then before, and to call him to Assemblies, as one that loved the honour and benefit of his Countrey. So that when the bones of their Countreymen which were slaine at the Battell of CHÆRONEA, were brought to be openly buried according to the custome, the People gave him the honour to make the Funerall Oration in praise of the dead, and made no shew of sorrow or griefe for the losse they had received (as Theopompus witnesseth, and doth nobly declare) but rather in contrary manner shewed that they did not repent them in following of his counsell, but did honour him that gave it. Demosthenes then did make the Funerall Oration. But afterwards in all the Decrees he preferred to the People, he would never subscribe any, to prevent the sinister lucke and misfortune of his name, but did passe it under his friends names one after another, untill he grew courageous againe, shortly after that he understood of the death of Philip, who was slaine immediately after the Victory he wanne at CHÆRONEA. And it seemeth this was the meaning of the Prophecy or Oracle in the two last Verses:

And he that wins, with life escapeth not.*

Now Demosthenes hearing of Philip's death, before the news were openly knowne, to prevent them, he would put the People againe in good hope of better lucke to come. Thereupon he went with a chearfull countenance into the Assembly of the Councell, and told them there, that he had a certaine dreame that promised great good hap, and that out of hand unto the ATHENIANS: and immediately after, the Messengers arrived, and brought certaine newes of King Philip's death. Thereupon the ATHENIANS made Sacrifices of joy to the gods for this happy newes, and appointed a Crowne unto Pausanias that had slaine him. Demosthenes also came abroad in his best Gowne, and crowned with Flowers, seven daies after the death of his Daughter, as Æschines reporteth: who reproveth him for it, and noteth him to be a man having little love or charity unto his owne children. But indeed Æschines selfe deserveth more blame, to have such a tender womanish heart, as to believe, that weeping and lamenting are signes of a gentle and charitable nature, condemning them that with patience and constancy do passe away such misfortunes. But now to the ATHENIANS againe. I can neither thinke nor say that they did wisely to shew such open signes of joy, as to weare Crownes and Garlands upon their heads; nor also, to sacrifice unto the gods for the death of a Prince; that behaved himselfe so Princely and courteously unto them in the Victories he had won of them. For though indeed all cruelty be subject to the revenge of the gods, yet is this an act of a vile and base minde, to honour a man while he lived, and to make him free of their City; and now that another had slaine him, they to be in such an exceeding jollity withall, and to exceed the bounds of modesty so far, as to rampe in manner with both their feete upon the dead, and to sing Songs of victory, as if they themselves had been the men that had valiantly slaine him. In contrary manner also, I praise and commend the constancy and courage of Demosthenes, that he leaving the teares and lamentation of his home-trouble unto women, did himselfe in the meane time that he thought was for the benefit of the Common-wealth: and in my opinion, I thinke he did therein like a man of courage, and worthy to be a Governour of a Common-wealth, never to stoop nor yeeld, but alwaies to be found stable and constant, for the benefit of the Common-wealth, rejecting all his troubles, cares, and affections, in respect of the service of his Countrey; and to keepe his honour much more carefully, then common Players use to do, when they play the parts of Kings and Princes, whom we see neither weepe nor laugh when they list, though they be on the Stage, but when the matter of the Play falleth out to give them just occasion. But we omit those reasons, if there be no reason (as indeed there is not) to leave and forsake a man in his sorrow and trouble, without giving him some words of comfort, but rather to devise some matter to asswage his sorrow, and to withdraw his minde from that, to thinke upon some pleasanter thing: even as they should keepe sore eyes from seeing bright and glaring colours, in offering them greene and darker. And from whence can a man take greater comfort for his troubles and griefes at home, when the Common-wealth doth well, then to joyne their private griefes with common-joyes, to the end that the better may obscure and take away the worke? But thus far I digressed from my History, enlarging this matter, because Æschines in his Oration touching this matter, did move the Peoples hearts too much unto womanish sorrow. But now to the rest. The Cities of GREECE being againe stirred up by Demosthenes, made a new League againe together: and the THEBANS also having armed themselves by his practise, did one day set upon the Garison of MACEDONIANS within their City, and slew many of them. The ATHENIANS prepared also to maintaine Warre on the THEBANS behalfe, and Demosthenes was daily at all the Assemblies of Councell, in the Pulpit, perswading the People with his Orations: and he wrote also into ASIA unto the King of PERSIA'S Lieutenants and Captaines, to make Warre with Alexander on their side, calling him Childe, and Margites, as much to say, as Foole. But after that Alexander having set all his things at stay within his Realme, came himselfe in person with his Army, and invaded the Countrey of BOEOTIA, then fell the pride of the ATHENIANS greatly, and Demosthenes also plied the Pulpit no more as he was wont. At length the poore THEBANS being left unto themselves forsaken of every man, they were compelled themselves alone to beare the brunt of this Warre, and so came their City to utter ruine and destruction. Thereby the ATHENIANS being in a marvellous feare and perplexity, did suddenly choose Ambassadors to send unto this young King, and Demosthenes chiefly among others: who being afraid of Alexander's fury and wrath, durst not go to him, but returned from Mount Cythæron, and gave up the Ambassade. But Alexander sent to summon the ATHENIANS, to send unto him ten of their Orators, as Idomeneus and Duris both do write: or eight, as the most Writers and best Historiographers do report, which were these: Demosthenes, Polyæctus, Ephialtes, Lycurgus, Myrocles, Damon, Callisthenes and Charidemus. At which time they write that Demosthenes told the People of ATHENS the Fable of the Sheepe and Wolves, how that the Wolves came on a time, and willed the Sheepe, if they would have peace with them, to deliver them their Maltives that kept them. And so he compared himselfe and his companions that travelled for the benefit of the People, unto the Dogs that keepe the Flocks of Sheepe, and called Alexander the Woolfe. Moreover, he said, like as you see these Corne-masters bringing a sample of their Corne in a Dish or Napkin to shew you, and by that little do sell all that they have: so I thinke you will all wonder, that delivering of us, you shall also deliver your selves into the hands of your Enemies. Aristobulus of CASSANDRIA reporteth this matter thus. Now the ATHENIANS being in consultation, not knowing how to resolve, Demades having taken five Talents of them whom Alexander demanded, did offer himselfe, and promised to go in this Ambassade unto Alexander, and to intreate for them; either because he trusted in the love the King did beare him, or else for that he thought he hoped he should finde him pacified, as a Lion glutted with the bloud of Beasts which he had slaine. Howsoever it happened, he perswaded the People to send him unto Alexander, whom he so handled, that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the City of ATHENS. Thereupon Alexander being retired, Demades and his fellows bare all the sway and authority, and Demosthenes was under foote. Indeed when Agis King of LACEDÆMON, came with his Army into the Field, he began a little to rouse himselfe, and to lift up his head: but he shrunke collar againe soone after, because the ATHENIANS would not rise with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who were overthrowne, and Agis slaine in Battell. At that time was the cause of the Crowne pleaded against Ctesiphon, and the Plea was written a little before the Battell of CHÆRONEA, in the year when Charondas was Provost of ATHENS: howbeit no sentence was given till tenne yeares after, when Aristophan was Provost. This was such an open judgement, and so famous, as never was any, as well for the great Fame rise, and began to use the former perswasions to him, promising him that he would make Antipater his friend. Then Demosthenes feeling the poyson worke, cast open his Gowne, and boldly looking Archias in the face, said unto him: Now when thou wilt, play Creons part, and throw my body to the dogs, without further grave or buriall. For my part, O god Neptune, I do go out of thy Temple being yet alive, because I will not profane it with my death: but Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS, have not spared to defile thy Sanctuary with blood and cruell murder. Having spoken these words, he prayed them to stay him up by his arme-holes, for his feete began already to faile him; and thinking to go forward, as he past by the Altar of Neptune, he fell downe, and giving one gaspe, gave up the ghost. Now touching the poyson, Aristo reporteth, that he sucked and drew it up into his mouth out of his quill, as we have said before. But one Pappus (from whom Hermippus hath taken his History) writeth, that when he was laid on the ground before the Altar, they found the beginning of a Letter which said: Demosthenes unto Antipater, but no more. Now his death being thus sudden, the THACIAN Souldiers that were at the Temple doore, reported that they saw him pluck the poyson which he put into his mouth, out of a little cloth he had, thinking to them that it had beene a piece of Gold he had swallowed downe. Howbeit a Maid of the house that served him, being examined about it, told them, that he had carried it about him a long time for a preservative for him. Eratosthenes writeth, that he kept this poyson in a little boxe of gold made hollow within, the which he ware as a bracelet about his arme. There are many Writers also that do report his death diversly, but to recite them all were in vaine: saving that there was one called Demochares (who was Demosthenes very friend) who said, that he died not so suddenly by poyson, but that it was the speciall favour of the gods (to preserve him from the cruelty of the MACEDONIANS) that suddenly tooke him out of this life, and made him feele so little paine. Demosthenes died the sixteenth day of the Moneth Pynepsion (to wit, October) on the which day they do celebrate at ATHENS the Feast of Ceres, called Tefmophoria, which is the dolefullest Feast of all the yeare: on the which day also, the women remaine all day long in the Temple of the goddesse, without meate or drinke. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS to honour him according to his deserts, did cast his Image in brasse, and made a Law besides, that the oldest man of his House should for ever be kept within the Palace, at the charge of the Common-wealth: and ingraved these Verses also upon the base of his Image:

Hadst thou Demosthenes had strength according to thy heart,

The Macedons should not have wrought the Greekes such woe and smart.

For they that thinke that it was Demosthenes himselfe that made these Verses in the Isle of CALAU-RIA, before he tooke his poyson, are greatly deceived. But yet a little before my first coming to ATHENS, there went a report that such a thing happened: A certaine Souldier being sent for to come unto the Capitaine, did put such pieces of Gold as he had into the hands of Demosthenes Statue, which had both his hands joyned together: and there grew hard by it a great Plane-tree, divers leaves whereof either blowne off with winde by chance, or else put there of purpose by the Souldier, covered to this Gold, that it was there a long time, and no man found it: untill such time as the Souldier came againe, and found it as he left it. Hereupon this matter running abroad in every mans mouth, there were divers men that tooke occasion of this subject, to make Epigrams in the praise of Demosthenes, as one who in his life was never corrupted. Furthermore, Demades did not long enjoy the honour he thought he had newly gotten. For the justice of the gods, revenger of the death of Demosthenes, brought him into MACEDON, to receive just punishment by death, of those whom he dishonestly flattered: being before growne hatefull to them, and afterwards committed a fault where- by he could not escape. For there were Letters of his taken, by the which he did perswade and pray

* Perdiccas to make himselfe King of MACEDON, and to deliver GREECE from bondage, saying, that it hung but by a thread, and yet it was halfe rotten, meaning thereby Antipater. Dinarchus CORINTHIAN accused him, that he wrote these Letters: the which so grievously offended Cassander, that first he slew his owne Sonne in his armes, and then commanded they should afterward kill Demades, making him feele then by those miseries (which are the cruellest that can happen unto man) that Traytors betraying their owne Countrey, do first of all betray themselves. Demosthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would never believe him. Thus, my friend Sossius, you have what we can deliver you, by reading or report, touching Demosthenes Life and Doings.

THE LIFE OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO.

Ann. Mund.
870.

Ant. Christ.

As touching Ciceroes Mother, whose name was Helvia, it is reported she was Ciceroes Parentage. a Gentlewoman borne, and lived alwaies very honestly: but for his Father, the reports of him are divers and infinite. For some say, that he was borne and brought up in a Fullers shop: others report, that he came of Tullus Appius, who while he lived was honoured among the VOLSCS as King, and made very sharpe and cruell Wars with the ROMANS. But surely it seemes to me, that the first of that name called Cicero, was some famous man, and that for his sake his Offspring continued still that surname, and were glad to keepe it; though many men scorned it, because Cicero in English signifieth a chiefe pease: and Cicero had a thing upon the tip of his nose, as it had beene a little wart, much like to a chiefe pease; whereupon they surnamed him Cicero, why so called. But this Cicero, whose Life we write of now, nobly answered certaine of his friends on a time giving him counsell to change his name, when he first made suite for Office, and began to practise in matters of State: that he would endeavour himselfe to make the name of Ciceroes more noble and famous, then the Scouris or Catuli. After that, Cicero being made Treasurer in SICILE, he gave an Offering of certaine Silver Plate unto the gods, and at large engraved on it his two first names, Marcus Tullius: and in place of his third name, he pleasantly commanded the Workman to cut out the forme and fashion of a chiefe pease. Thus much they write of his name. Now for his birth, it was Ciceroes birth, said that his Mother was brought to bed of him without any paine, the third day of January: on which day the Magistrates and Governours of ROME do use at this present, yearly to make solemne Prayers and Sacrifices unto the gods, for the health and prosperity of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an Image to his Nurse, that did prognosticate unto her, she gave a Childe suck, which in time to come should do great good unto all the ROMANS. Now though such things may seeme but dreames and fables unto many, yet Cicero himselfe shortly after proved this Prophecy true: because that when he came of age to learne, he grew so toward, and wanne such fame among the Boyes, for his excellent wit and quicke capacity. For thereupon came the other Boyes Fathers themselves to the Schoole to see his face, and to be eye-witnesses of the report that went of him, of his sharpe and quicke wit to learne. But others of the rude and baser sort of men were offended with their Sonnes, because to honour Cicero, they did alwaies put him in the midst betweene them, as they went in the streetes. Cicero indeed had such a naturall wit and understanding as Plato thought meete for learning, and apt for the study of Philosophy. For he gave himselfe to all kinde of knowledge, and there was no Art nor any of the liberrall Sciences that he disdained: notwithstanding in his first young yeares he was apter and better disposed to to the study of Poetry then any other. There is a pretty Poem of his in Verses of eight staves, called Pontium Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he was but a boy. After that, being given more earnestly unto his study, he was not only thought the best Orator, but the best Poet also of all the ROMANS in his time: and yet doth the excellency of his eloquence, and commendation of his tongue continue even to this day, notwithstanding the great alteration and change of the Latine Tongue. But his Poetry hath lost the name and estimation of it, because there were many after him that became far more excellent therein than he. After he had left his childish studies, he became then Philos Scholar, the Academick Philosopher, the onely Scholar of Clitomachus Scholars, whom the ROMANS esteemed so much for his eloquence, and loved more for his gentle behaviour and conversation. He gave himselfe also to be a follower of Mutius Scavola, who at that time was a great man in ROME, and Prince of the Senate, and who did instruct Cicero in the Lawes of ROME. He did also follow Sylla for a time, in the Wars of the MARIANS. But when he saw that the Common wealth of ROME fell to Civill Wars, and from Civill Wars to a Monarchy, then he returned againe to his Booke and contemplative life, and frequented the learned men of GREECE, and alwaies studied with them, untill Sylla had gotten the upper hand, and that he saw all the Common-wealth againe at some stay. About that time, Sylla causing the Goods of one that was said to be flaine, to be sold by the Crier (being one of the Outlawes and Proscriptions, to wit, banished by Bills set up on Polls) Chrysogonus, one of Sylla's freed Bondmen, and in great favour with his Master, bought them for the summe of two thousand Drachmaes. Therewithall the Sonne and Heire of the dead person called Roscium, being marvellously offended, he shewed that it was too shamefull an abuse: for his Fathers Goods amounted to the summe of two hundred and fifty Talents. Sylla finding himselfe thus openly touched with publick fraud and deceit, for the onely gratifying of his man, he procured Chrysogonus to accuse him, that he had killed his owne Father: Never an Orator durst speake in Roscium behalfe to defend his cause, but shrunke backe, fearing Sylla's cruelty and severity. Wherefore poore Roscium the young man, seeing every man forsake him, had no other refuge but to go to Cicero, whom his friends did counsell and perswade boldly to take upon him the defence of Roscium cause: for he should never have a happier occasion, nor so noble a beginning to bring himselfe into estimation, as this. Thereupon Cicero determined to take his cause in hand, and did handle it so well, that he obtained the thing he sued for: whereby he won him great fame and credit. But yet being afraid Sylla's displeasure, he absented himselfe from ROME, and went into GREECE, giving it out, that his travell was for a disease he had upon him. Indeed Cicero was dog-leane, a little eater, and would also eate late, because of the great weaknesse of his stomack: but yet he had a good loud voice, though it was somewhat harsh, and lacked grace and comeliness. Furthermore, he was so earnest and vehement in his Oration, that he mounted still with his voice into the highest tunes: inso-much that men were afraid it would one day put him in hazard of his life. When he came to ATHENS, he went to heare Antiochus of the City of ASCALON, and fell in great liking with his sweete tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwise he misliked new opinions in Philosophy. For Antiochus had then forsaken the opinions of the new Academick Philosophers, and the Sect of Carneades: being moved thereunto, either through the manifest proofe of things, or by his certaine judgement, or (as some say) for that of an ambition or dissention against the Scholars and followers of Clitomachus and Philo, he had reprov'd the resolutions of the Academicks, which he had of long time defended, onely to leane for the most part to the Stoicks opinion. Howbeit Cicero had most affection unto the Academicks, and did study that Sect more then all the rest, of purpose, that if he saw he were forbidden to practise in the Common-wealth at ROME, he would then go to ATHENS (leaving all Pleas and Affaires of the Common-wealth) to bestow the rest of his time quietly in the study of Philosophy. At length, when he heard newes of Sylla's death, and saw that his body was growne to good state and health by exercise, and that his voice became daily more and more to fill mens eares with a sweete and pleasant sound, and yet was loud enough for the constitution of his body: receiving Letters daily from his friends at ROME, that prayed him to returne home; and moreover, Antiochus selfe also earnestly perswading him to practise in the Common-wealth, he began againe to fall to the study of Rhetoricke, and to frame himselfe to be eloquent, being a necessary thing for an Orator, and did continually exercise himselfe in making Orations upon any Speech or Proposition, and so frequented the chiefe Oratours and Masters of eloquence that were at that time. To this end therefore he went into ASIA unto RHODES, and amongst the Orators of ASIA he frequented Xenocles ADRAMETIN, and Dionysius MAGNESIAN, and studied also with Menippus CARIAN: at RHODES he heard Apollonius Molon, and the Philosopher Possidonius. And it is reported also, that Apollonius wanting the Latine Tongue, he did pray Cicero for exercise sake to declaim in Greeke. Cicero was very well contented with it, thinking that thereby his faults should be the better corrected. When he had ended his Declamation, all those that were present were amazed to heare him, and every man praised him one after another. Howbeit Apollonius all the while Cicero spake, did never shew any glad countenance: and when he had ended, he stayed a great while, and said never a word. Cicero misliking withall, Apollonius in length said unto him: As for me Cicero, I do not onely praise thee, but more then that, I wonder at thee: and yet I am sorry for poore GREECE, to see that Learning and Eloquence (which were the two onely gifts and honours left us) are by thee obtained with us, and carried unto the ROMANS. Now Cicero being very well disposed to go with good hope to practise at ROME, he was a little discouraged by an Oracle that was told him. For inquiring of the god Apollo DELPHIAN,

how he might do to win fame and estimation; the Nympe Pythia answered him; he should obtaine it, so that in his doings he would rather follow the disposition of his owne nature then the opinion of the common People. Wherefore when he came to ROME, at the first he proceeded very warily and discreetly, and did unwillingly seeke for any Office, and when he did, he was not greatly esteemed: for they commonly called him the GREEKIAN, and Scholar, which are two words which the Artificers (and such base mechanickall People at ROME) have ever ready at their tongues end. Now he being by nature ambitious of honour, and prickt forward also by the perswasion of his Father and friends, in the end he began to pleade; and there obtained not the chiefe place by little and little, but so soone as he fell to practise, he was immediately esteemed above all the Orators and Pleaders in his time; and did excell them all. Yet it is reported notwithstanding, that for his gesture and pronunciation, having the selfe same defects of nature at the beginning which Demosthenes had, to reforme them, he carefully studied to counterfeit Roscium, an excellent Comedian, and Asop also a Player of Tragedies. Of this Asop men write, that he playing one day Atrous part upon a Stage (who determined with himselfe how he might be revenged of his Brother Thyestes) a servant by chance having occasion to run suddenly by him, he forgetting himselfe, striving to shew the vehement passion and fury of this King, gave him such a blow on his head with the Scepter in his hand, that he flew him dead in the place. Even so Cicero's words were of great force to perswade, by means of his grace and pronunciation. For he mocking the Orators that thrust out their heads, and cried in their Orations, was wont to say, that they were like to lame men, who were driven to ride, because they could not go on foote: even so (said he) they cry out because they cannot speake. Truly pleasant taunts do grace an Orator, and shew a fine wit; but yet Cicero used them so commonly, that they were offensive unto many, and brought him to be counted a malicious scoffer and spitefull man. He was chosen Treasurer in the time of dearth, when there was great scarcity of Corne at ROME: and the Province of SICILE fell to his lot. At his first coming thither, the SICILIANS misliked him very much, because he compelled them to send Corne unto ROME: but after they had found his diligence, justice, and lenity, they honoured him above any Governour that ever was sent from ROME. Now there were divers young Gentlemen of ROME, of noble Houses, who being accused for sundry faults committed in Warres against their Honour and Martiall Discipline, had bene sent backe againe unto the Prator of SICILE: for whom Cicero pleaded, and did so excellently defend their cause, that they were pardoned every man. Thereupon, thinking well of himselfe, when his time was expired, he went to ROME, and by the way there happened a pretty jest unto him. As he passed through the Countrey of CAMPANIA (otherwise called the Land of labour) he met by chance with one of the chiefe ROMANS of all his friends. So falling in talke with him, he asked him what they said of him at ROME, and what they thought of his doings: imagining that all ROME had bene full of the glory of his name and deeds. His friends asked him againe: And where hast thou bene Cicero all this while, that we have not seene thee at ROME? This killed his heart straight, when he saw that the report of his name and doings, entering into the City of ROME as into an infinite Sea, was so suddenly vanished away againe, without any other fame or speech. But after that, when he looked into himselfe, and saw that in reason he tooke an infinite labour in hand to attaine to glory, wherein he saw no certaine end whereby to attaine unto it, it cutt off a great part of the ambition he had in his head: and yet the great pleasure he tooke to heare his owne praise, and to be over-much given to desire of honour and estimation, these two things continued with him even to his dying day, and did estoones make him swerve from justice. Furthermore, when he began thoroughly to practise in the affaires of the State, he thought it an ill thing that Artificers and Craftsmen should have many sorts of Instruments and Tooles without life, to know the names of every one of them; the places where they should take them, and the use whereto they should employ them: and that a man of knowledge and quality (who doth all things with the helpe and service of men) should be foolish and carelesse to learne to know the names of his Citizens. Therefore he gave himselfe to know, not onely mens names of quality, but the streets also they dwelt in; what part of the City soever it was: their goodly Houses in the Countrey, the friends they made of, and the neighbours whom they companied with. So that when he went abroad into ITALY, wheresoever he became, Cicero could shew and name his friends Houses: He was not very rich, and yet he had enough to serve his turne: the which made men make the more of him, and they loved him the better, because he tooke no Fee nor Gift for his pleading; what Cause soever he tooke in hand, but then specially, when he defended a matter against Verrus: This Verrus had bene Prator of SICILE, and had committed many lewd parts there; for the which the SICILIANS did accuse him: Cicero taking upon him to defend their Cause, made Verrus to be condemned; not by pleading, but in manner without pleading, and in this sort: The Prators being his Judges, and favouring Verrus, had made so many journallments and delays, that they had driven it off to the last day of hearing: Cicero perceiving that he should not have time to speake all that he had to say against him; and that thereby nothing should be done and judged, he rose up and said, that there needed no further plea in this matter, but onely brought forth the Witnesses before the Judges; and having caused their depositions to be taken, he prayed they would proceed to sentence, according to their evidence given on that behalf: for some do report, that Cicero gave many pleasant taunts and girds, in pleading the accusation of the SICILIANS against Verrus. The ROMANS do call a Bore, Verrus. There was one Calpurnius the Sonne of a freed Bondman, who was suspected to hold with the superstition of the JEWES: Calpurnius would have put by the the SICILIANS from following the accusation of Verres, and would have had the matter of his accusation only referred to him, for the prosecuting of it against him. Cicero scorning his suite, said unto him: What hath a JEW to do with a BORE? This Verres had a Sonne somewhat above twenty yeares of age, who (as the report went) had a very ill name for his beauty. And therefore when Verres one day thought to mock Cicero, saying, that he was too effeminate: Thy children (said he) are to be reproved of that secretly at home. In this accusation, Hortensius the Orator durst not directly defend Verres: but touching the condemnation of his fine, he was then contented to answer for him, for he had a Sphinx of Ivory given him by Verres for his reward. Thereupon Cicero gave him a pretty nip by the way: but Hortensius not understanding him, said, he could not skill of darke speeches. Well, said Cicero, yet hast thou a Sphinx in thy house. In the end Verres being condemned, and a fine set on his head to the value of three score and fiftene Myriades, Cicero notwithstanding was suspected to be bribed with money for agreeing to cast him in so small a summe. But yet when he came to be Ædilis, the SICILIANS to shew themselves thankfull to him, both brought and sent him many Presents out of SICILE. Of all that he took nothing to his owne use, but only bestowed their liberality in bringing downe the prices of Victuals at ROME. He had a goodly house within the confines of the City of ARPOS, a Farme also by NAPLES, and another about the City of POMPEII: but all these were no great things. Afterwards he had also the Joynter of his Wife Terenia, which amounted to the summe of twelve Myriades, and besides all this, there came to him by inheritance, eleven Myriades of their Denarij. Thereupon he lived very honestly and soberly, without excess, with his familiar friends that loved him, both GRECIANS and ROMANES, and would never go to supper till after Sun-set, not so much for any great businesse he had, as for the weaknesse of his stomacke. But otherwise he was very curious, and carefull of his person, and would be rubbed and anointed, and he would use also to walke a certaine number of turnes by proportion: and so exercising his body in that sort, he was never sicke, and besides was also very strong and lusty of body, able to abide great paines and forrowes which he fell into afterwards. He gave his Fathers chiefe mansion house to his Brother, and went to dwell himselfe in the Mount Palatine: because such as came to waite upon him to do him honour, should not take the paines to go so far to see him. For he had as many men daily at his gate every morning, as either Crassus had for his wealth, or Pompey for his estimation among the Souldiers, both of them being at that time the chiefe men of ROME. Yea furthermore, Pompeys selfe came unto Cicero, because his Orations stood him to great purpose, for the increase of his honour and authority. Now when Cicero came to make suite to be Prætor (which is, to be as an ordinary Judge) though he had many competitors, and fellow-suiters with him, yet was he first chosen afore them all: and he did so honestly behave himselfe in that Office, that they did not so much as once suspect him of bribery or extortion. And for prooffe hereof, it is reported, that Lucius Mæcer (a man that of himselfe was of great power, and yet favoured and supported besides by Crassus) was accused before Cicero of theft and extortion in his Office: but he trusting much to his supposed credit, and the great suite and labour his friends made for him, went home to his house, before sentence pronounced against him (the Judges being yet to give their opinions) and there speedily trimmed his beard, and put a new Gowne upon his backe, as though he had beene sure to have beene quit of his accusation; and then returned againe into the Market-place. But Crassus went to meete him, and told him, all the Judges had condemned him. Lucius Mæcer tooke such a griefe and conceit upon it, that he went home to his house againe, laid him downe on his bed, and never rose after. This judgement wan Cicero great fame, for they praised him exceedingly for the great paines he tooke, to see justice duly executed. Another also called Vatinus (a bedlem fellow, and one that behaved himselfe very unreverently to the Magistrates in his pleading, and besides had a swollen neck) came very arrogantly one day unto Cicero being in his Prætoriall seate, and asked him a thing which Cicero would not grant him there, but would thinke of it at better leisure. Thereupon Vatinus told him, that he would not be scrupulous to grant that; if he were Prætor. Cicero turning to him, answered him againe: No more have I (said he) such a swollen necke as thou hast. Towards the end of his Office, two or three daies before his time expired, there was one accused Manilius before him, that he also had robbed the Common-wealth. This Manilius was very well beloved of the common People, who were perswaded that he was put in suite, not for any fault he had committed, but onely to despight Pompey with, whose familiar friend he was. So he required certaine daies to answer the matter he was accused of: but Cicero would give him no further respite, but to answer it the next day. The People therewith were marvellously offended, because the other Prætors in such like cases, were wont to give ten daies respite unto others. The next morning when the Tribunes had brought him before the Judges, and also accused him unto them, he besought Cicero to heare him patiently: Cicero made him answer, that having alwaies used as much favour and courtesie as he possibly might by Law, unto those that were accused, he thought he should offer Manilius too great wrong, if he should not do the like to him: wherefore, because he had but one day more to continue Prætor in Office, he had purposely given him that day to make his answer before him. For he said, that to leave his accusation to the hearing of another Prætor, he could not have been thought a man that had borne him good will, and meant to pleasure him. These words did marvellously change the Peoples opinion and affection towards him, and every man speaking well of him, they prayed him to defend Manilius cause. He willingly granted them: and coming from the Bench, standing at the Barre like an Oratour to pleade for him, he made a notable Oration, and spake both boldly and sharply against the chiefe men of

of the City, and those specially that did envie Pompey. This notwithstanding, when he came to sue to be Consul, he found as great favour amongst the Nobility, as he did with the commonalty. For they did further his suite, for the Common-wealths sake, upon this occasion. The change and alteration of Government the which Sylla brought in, was thought strange at the first among the People: but now men by proceffe of time being used to it, it was thoroughly established, and no man misliked it. At that time many men practised to subvert the Government, not for the benefit of the common-wealth, but to serve their owne covetous mindes. For Pompey being then in the East parts, made Warres with the Kings of PONTUS and ARMENIA, and had not left sufficient force at ROME to resist these seditious persons, that sought nothing but rebellion. These men had made Lucius Catiline their Captaine, a desperate man to attempt any great enterprize, subtil and malicious of nature. He was accused before (besides many other vile faults) for deflowring of his own Daughter, and killing his Brother: and being afraid to be put in suite for it, he prayed Sylla to put his Brother amongst the number of the Out-lawes (or Proscriptes) as if he had been then alive. These wicked Rebels having chosen them such a Captaine, were sworn and bound one to another in this manner. They killed a man, and did eate of his flesh together, and had besides corrupted the most part of all the youth. For Catiline their Captaine suffered every man to take his pleasure, as his youth was inclined unto, as to banquet, to follow Harlots, and gave them Money largely to bestow in these vaine expences. Furthermore, all THUSCAN began to rise, and the most part of GAULE also, lying between the Alpes and ITALIE. The City of ROME it selfe was also in great danger of rising, for the inequality of the Goods of the Inhabitants. For the Noblemen and of greatest courage, had spent all their Lands in Plaies and Feasts, or in Buldings and common Workes, which they built at their owne charge, to curry favour with the common People, that they might obtaine the chiefe Offices: so that thereby they became very poore, and their Goods were in the hands of the meane men and wretches. Thus the state of ROME stood in great hazard of uproare, the which any man might easily have procured that durst have taken upon him any change or alteration of government, there was then such division among them in the State. Catiline notwithstanding, to provide him of a strong bulwarke to prosecute his intent, came to sue to be Consul, hoping that he should be chosen with Caius Antonius, a man that of himselfe was apt neither to do any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that he could be a great strength and aide unto him that would attempt any thing. Divers noble and wise men foreseeing that, did procure Cicero to sue for the Consulship. The People accepted him, and rejected Catiline. Antonius and Cicero thereupon were created Consuls, although that Cicero of all the suiters for the Consulship was but onely a Knights Son, and not the Son of a Senatour of ROME. Now, though the common People understood not the secret practise and meaning of Catiline, yet at the beginning of Ciceros Consulship, there fell out great trouble and contention in the Common-wealth. For they of the one side, whom Sylla had by his Ordinances deposed from their Dignities and Offices in ROME (who were no small men, neither few in number) began to creepe into the Peoples goodwill, alledging many true and just reasons against the Tyrannicall power of Sylla: howbeit spoken in ill time, when it was out of time to make any change or alteration in the Common-wealth. The Tribunes on the other side preferred Lawes and Ordinances to further this device. They preferred the Law to choofe the Decemviri, with soveraigne power and authority through all ITALY and SYRIA, and also through all the Countries and provinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of ROME: to sell, and release all Lands belonging to the State of ROME, to accuse any man whom they thought good, to banish any man, to restore the Colonies with People, to take what Money they would out of the Treasurie, to leave men of Warre, and to keepe them in pay as long as they thought good. For this great and absolute power of the Decemviri, there were many men of great account that favoured this Law, but Antonius chiefly, being Colleague and fellow Consul with Cicero, for he had good hope to be chosen one of these ten Commissioners: and furthermore, it was thought that he was privy unto Catilines conspiracy, and that he misliked it not, because he was so much in debt. And this was it that the Noblemen most feared of all other things. Thereupon Cicero, to provide first to prevent this danger, granted to him the Province of the Realme of MACEDON: and the Province of GAULE being offered unto himselfe, he refused it. By this good turne he wanne Antonius like a hired Player, making him to promise him that he would assit and aide him for the benefit of the Common-wealth, and that he would say no more, then he should will him. When he had brought him to this, and had wonne him to his minde, he then began to be the bolder, and more stoutly to resist them that were Authours of this innovation and new Lawes. Cicero therefore in open Senate, did one day sharply reprove and inveigh against this Law of the Decemviri, which the Tribunes would have established. And thereby he did so terrifie the Authours thereof, that there was not one man durst speake against him. This notwithstanding, the Tribunes afterwards attempted once againe to have it to passe, and appointed the Consuls to appeare before the People. Howbeit Cicero being nothing abashed at it, he commanded the Senate to follow him. So he did not onely overthrow this Law of the Decemviri, which the Tribunes did preferre, but furthermore they were utterly discouraged and out of hope to bring any of their matters to passe they intended, he strooke them so dead with his Eloquence. For Cicero onely of all men in ROME made the ROMANES know, how much Eloquence doth grace and beautifie that which is honest, and how invincible right and justice are, being eloquently set forth: and also how that a man that will be counted a wise Governour of a Common-weale, should alwaies in his doings rather preferre profit, then seeke to curry favour with the common People: yet so to use his words, that the thing which is profitable, may not be also unpleasant. And to prove his sweet and pleasant Tongue, may be alleadged that which he did in the time of his Consulship, touching the placing of men at the Theater to see the pastimes. For before, the Knights of Rome did sit mingled one with another amongst the common People, and took their place as they came. The first that made the difference between them, was  Marcus Ordo*, at that time Prator: who made a Law, by the which he appointed severall seats for the Knights, where they might from thenceforth see the pastimes. The People took this grievously, as a thing done to discountenance them: inasmuch that Ordo coming afterwards into the Theater, all the common People fell a whistling at him, to shame him withall. The Knights also in contrariwise made him roome among them, with great clapping of hands, in token of honour. Therewith the People fell a whistling lowder then before, and the Knights in like manner to clapping of their hands, and so grew to words one with another, that all the Theater was straight in uproare with it. Cicero understanding it, went thither himselfe, and calling the People to the Temple of the goddesse Bellona, he there so sharply reproved them, and therewith so perswaded them, that returning presently to the Theater, they did then welcome and receive Ordo with clapping of their hands, and contended with the Knights which of them should do him greatest honour. But now againe, the Rebels of Catiline's conspiracy (who were prettily cooled at the first for the feare they stood in) began to be lusty againe, and to gather together, boldly encouraging one another to broach their practise, before Pompey returned, who was said to be on the way towards Rome with his Army. But besides them, those Souldiers that had served before in the Warres under Sylla, being dispersed up and down ITALLIE (but specially the best Souldiers among them dwelling in the good Townes of THUSCAN) did stirre up Catiline to hasten the Enterprize, perswading themselves that they should once againe have goods enough at home, to spoile and ranke at their pleasure. These Souldiers having one Manlius to their Captaine, that had borne Office in the Field under Sylla, conspired with Catiline, and came to Rome to assist him in his suite: who purposed once againe to demand the Consulship, being determined at the Election to kill Cicero, in the tumult and hurly burly. The gods also did plainly shew by Earth-quakes, Lightning and Thunder, and by Vision of Spirits that did appeare, the secret practise and conspiracy: besides also, there fell out manifest conjectures and proofes by men that came to reveale them, howbeit they had no power sufficient to encounter so noble a man, and of so great power as Catiline was. Cicero therefore deferring the day of Election, called Catiline into the Senate, and did there examine him of that which was reported of him. Catiline supposing there were many in the Senate that had good wils to rebell, and also because he would shew himselfe ready unto them that were of his conspiracy, he gave Cicero a gentle answer, and said thus: What do I offend, said he, if that being two bodies in this Town, the one leane and weake, and thoroughly rotten, and hath a head; and the other being great, strong, and of power, having no head, I do give it one? meaning under this darke answer, to signifie the People and Senate. This answer being made, Cicero was more afraid then before, inasmuch that he put on a Brigantine for the safety of his Body, and was accompanied with the chieft men of Rome, and a great number of young men besides going with him from his house into the Field of Mars, where the Elections were made: and had of purpose left open his Jacket loose at the collar, that his Brigantine might be seen; thereby to let every man that saw him, know the danger he was in. Every man misliked it when they saw it, and came about him to defend him, if any offered to assaile him. But it so came to passe, that by voices of the People, Catiline was againe rejected from the Consulship, and Syllanus and Murana chosen Consuls. Shortly after this Election, the Souldiers of THUSCAN being joyned, which should have come to Catiline, and the day appointed being at hand to broach their Enterprize, about midnight, there came three of the chieft men of Rome to Cicero's house (Marcus Crassus, Marcus Marcellus, and Scipio Metellus) and knocking at his gate, called his Porter, and bad him wake his Master presently, and tell him how they three were at the gate to speake with him about a matter of importance. At night after Supper, Crassus Porter brought his Master a packet of Letters, delivered him by a stranger unknown, which were directed unto divers persons; among the which, one of them had no Name subscribed, but was onely directed unto Crassus himselfe. The effect of the Letter was, that there should be made a great laughter in Rome by Catiline, and therefore he prayed him that he would depart out of Rome to save himselfe. Crassus having read his own Letter would not open the rest, but went forthwith unto Cicero, partly for feare of the danger and partly also to cleare himselfe of the suspicion they had of him for the friendship that was betwixt him and Catiline. Cicero counselling with them what was to be done, the next morning assembled the Senat very early and carrying the Letters with him, he did deliver them according to their direction and commanded they should read them out aloud. All these Letters, and every one of them particularly, did bewray the conspiracy. Furthermore, Quintus Arrius a man of authority, and that had been Prator, told openly the Souldiers and men of Warre that were leaved in THUSCAN. And it is reported also, that Manlius was in the Field with a great number of Souldiers about the Cities of THUSCAN, gaping daily to hear newes of some change at Rome. All these things being thoroughly considered, a decree passed by the Senate, that they should referre the care of the Common-wealth unto the Consuls, to the end that with absolute authority they might (as well as they could) provide for the safety and preservation thereof. Such manner of decree and authority, was not often seen concluded of in the Senate, but in time of present feare and danger. Now Cicero having this absolute power, he referred all forreine matters to Quintus Metellus charge charge, and did himselfe take upon him the care and Government of all civill affaires within Rome. On the day time when he went up and down the Town, he had such a Troope of men after him, that when he came through the great Market-place, he almost filled it with his traine that followed him. Thereupon Catiline would no longer delay time, but resolved to go himselfe unto Manlius, where their Army lay. But before he departed, he had drawn into his confederacy one Martius, and another called Cethegus, whom he commanded betimes in the morning to go to Cicero's house with short Daggers to kill him, pretending to come to salute him, and to give him a good morrow. But there was a noble Woman of Rome called Fulvia, who went over-night unto Cicero, and bade him beware of that Cethegus, who indeed came the next morning betimes unto him; and being denied to be let in, he began to chafe and raile before the gate. This made him the more to be suspected. In the end Cicero coming out of his house, called the Senate to the Temple of Jupiter Stator; (as much to say as, Stayer) which standeth at the upper end of the holy street as they go to the Mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he meant to cleare himselfe of the suspicion that went of him: howbeit there was not a Senator that would sit down by him, but they did all rise from the bench where Catiline had taken his place. And further, when he began to speake, he could have no audience for the great noise they made against him. So at length Cicero rose, and commanded him to avoide out of Rome, saying, that there must needs be a leperation of wals between them two, considering that the one used but words, and the other force of armes; Catiline thereupon immediately departing the City with three hundred armed men, was no sooner out of the Precinct of the Wals, but he made his Sergeants carry Axes and bundels of Rods before him, as if he had been a Consul lawfully created; and did display his Ensignes of Warre, and so went in this order to seeke Manlius. When they were joyned, he had not much lesse then twenty thousand men together, with the which he went to practise the Townes to rebell. Now open Warre being thus proclaimed, Antonius, Cicero's Colleague and fellow Consul, was sent against him to fight with him. In the meane space, Cornelius Lentulus, surnamed Sura (a man of a noble house, but of a wicked disposition, and that for his ill life was put off the Senate) assembled all the rest which were of Catiline's conspiracy, and that remained behind him in Rome, and bad them be afraid of nothing. He was then Prator the second time, as the manner is when any man comes to receive againe the dignity of a Senator which he had lost. It is reported, that this surname of Sura was given him upon this occasion. He being Treasurer in Syllas Dictatorship, did fondly waite and consume a marvellous summe of Money of the common Treasure. Sylla being offended with him for it, and demanding an account of him before the Senate, he carelessly and contemptuously stepped forth, saying, he could make him no other account, but shewed him the calfe of his legges, as Children do when they make a fault at Tennis. And thereof it came, that ever after that they called him Sura, because Sura in Latine signifieth the calfe of the legges. Another time also being accused for a leud part he had committed, he bribed some of the Judges with Money; and being onely quit by two voices more which he had in his favour, he said, he had lost his Money he had given to one of those two Judges, because it was enough for him to be cleared by one voice more. This man being of this disposition, was first of all incensed by Catiline, and lastly married by certaine Wizards and false Prognosticators that had mocked him with a vaine hope, singing Verses unto him which they had fained and devised, and false Prophecies also, which they bare him in hand they had taken out of Sybilles Bookes of Prophecy, which said, that there should reigne three Cornelii at Rome, of the which; two had already fulfilled the Prophecy, Cinna and Sylla; and for the third, fortune laid it upon him, and therefore bad him go through withall, and not to dreame it out, losing opportunity as Catiline had done. Now this Lentulus undertook no small enterprise, but had an intent with him to kill all the whole Senate, and as many other Citizens as they could murder, and to set fire on Rome, sparing none but Pompey's Sons, whom they would reserve for pledges, to make their peace afterwards with Pompey: for the rumour was very great and certaine also, that he returned from Rome by Cicero's very great Warres and Conquests which he had made in the East Countries. So they laid a plot to kill him and put their Treason in execution, in one of the nights of Saturnes Feasts. Further, they had brought Flaxe and Brimstone, and a great number of Armour and Weapons into Cethegus house. Besides all this provision, they had appointed a hundred men in an hundred parts of the City, to the end that fire being raised in many places at one time, it should the sooner runne through the whole City. Other men also were appointed to stop the Pipes and water Conduits which brought water to Rome, and to kill those also that came for water to quench the fire. In all this stirre, by chance there were two Ambassadors of the ALLOBROGES, whose country at that time did much mislike of the Romans, and were unwilling to be subject unto them. Lentulus thought these men very fit instruments to cause all Gauls to rebell. Thereupon practising with them, he warned them to be of their conspiracy, and gave them Letters directed to the Councell of their Countrey, and in them did promise them freedom. He sent other Letters also unto Catiline, and perswaded him to proclaim Liberty to all bondmen, and to come with all the speed he could to Rome; and sent with them one Tullus of the City of CRONORA, to carry these Letters. But all their counsels and purposes (like fables that never met together but at Feasts, drinking drunk with light Women) were easily found out by Cicero, who had a carefull eye upon them, and very wisely and discreetly saw through them. For he had appointed men out of the City to spie their doings, which followed them to see what they intended. Furthermore, he spake secretly with some he trusted, (the which others also took to be of the conspiracy) and knew by them that Lentulus and Cethegus had practised with the Ambassa-

Ambassadors of the ALLOBROGES, and drawn them into their conspiracy. At length he watched them one night so narrowly, that he took the Ambassadors, and TITUS CROTONIAN with the Letters he carried, by help of the Ambassadors of the ALLOBROGES, which had secretly informed him of all before. The next morning by break of day, Cicero assembled the Senate in the Temple of Concord, and there openly read the Letters, and heard the evidence of the Witnesses. Further, there was one JUNIUS SYLLANUS a Senator that gave in evidence, that some heard Cethegus say that they should kill three Consuls and four Prætors. Piso a Senator also, and that had been Consul, told in manner the selfe same tale. And Caius Sulpicius a Prætor, that was sent into Cethegus house, reported that he had found great store of Darts, Armour Daggers, and Swords new made. Lastly, the Senate having promised TITUS CROTONIAN he should have no hurt, so he would tell what he knew of this conspiracy, Lentulus thereby was convinced, and driven to give up his Office of Prætor before the Senate, and changing his purple Gown, to take another meet for his miserable state. This being done, Lentulus and his Consorts were committed to ward to the Prætors houses. Now growing towards evening, the People waiting about the place where the Senate was Assembled, Cicero at length came out, and told them what they had done within. Thereupon he was conveyed by all the People unto a friends house of his hard by: for that his own house was occupied by the Ladies of the City, who were busie, solemnly celebrating a secret Sacrifice in the honour of the goddesse, called of the ROMANES the Good goddesse, and of the GÆCIANS Gynæcia, to wit, Feminine: unto her this yearly Sacrifice is done at the Consuls house, by the Wife or Mother of the Consul then being, the Vestall Nunnes being present at it. Now Cicero being come into his Neighbours house, began to betinke him what course he were best to take in this matter. For to punish the offenders with severity, according to their deserts, he was afraid to do it, both because he was of a courteous nature, as also for that he would not seeme to be glad to have occasion to shew his absolute power and authority, to punish (as he might) with rigour, Citizens that were of the noblest houses of the City, and that had besides many friends. And contrariwise also, being remisse in so weighty a matter as this, he was afraid of the danger that might ensue of their rashnesse, mistrusting that if he should punish them with lesse then death, they would not amend for it, imagining they were well rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and desperate then ever they were, adding moreover the sting and spite of a new malice unto their accustomed wickednesse; besides that he himselfe should be thought a coward and timorous man, whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cicero being perplexed thus with these doubtles, there appeared a Miracle to the Ladies, doing sacrifice at home in his house. For the Fire being thought to be cleane out upon the Altar where they had sacrificed, there suddenly rose out of the Imbers of the Rindes or Barkes which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amazed all the other Ladies. Howbeit the Vestall Nunnes willed Terentia (Ciceros wife) to go straight unto her Husband, and to bid him not to be afraid to execute that boldly which he had considered of, for the benefit of the Common-wealth; and that the goddesse had raised this great flame, to shew him that he should have great honour by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timorous nor faint-hearted Woman, but very ambitious, and furthermore had gotten more knowledge from her Husband of the Affaires of the State, then otherwise she had acquainted him with her housewifery in the house, as Cicero himselfe reporteth, she went to make report thereof unto him, and prayed him to do execution of those men. The like did Quintus Cicero his Brother, and also Publius Nigidius his friend and fellow Student with him in Philosophy, and whose counsell also Cicero followed much in the Government of the Common-wealth. The next morning the matter being propounded to the Arbitrement of the Senate, how these Malefactours should be punished, Syllanus being asked his opinion first, said, that they should be put in prison, and from thence to suffer execution. Others likewise that followed him were all of that minde, but Caius Caesar, that afterwards came to be Dictator, and was then but a young man, and began to come forward, but yet such a one, as by his behaviour and the hope he had, took such a course, that afterwards he brought the Common-wealth of Rome into an absolute Monarchy. For at that time Cicero had vehement suspicions of Caesar, but no apparent proof to convince him. And some say, that it was brought to near, as he was almost convicted, but yet saved himselfe. Others write to the contrary, that Cicero wittingly dissembled, that he either heard or knew any signes which were told him against Caesar, being afraid indeed of his friends and estimation. For it was a cleare case, that if they had accused Caesar with the rest, he undoubtedly had sooner saved all their lives then he should have lost his own. Now when Caesar came to deliver his opinion touching the punishment of the Prisoners, he stood up and said, that he did not think it good to put them to death, but to confiscate their Goods; and as for their Persons, that they should bestow them in Prison, some in one place, some in another, in such Cities of ITALY as pleased Cicero best, until the Warre of Catiline were ended. This sentence being very mild, and the Author thereof marvellous Eloquent to make it good, Cicero himselfe added thereunto a counterpoise, inclining unto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the first, and partly also the opinion of Caesar. His friends thinking that Caesars opinion was the safest for Cicero, because thereby he should deserve lesse blame, for that he had not put the Prisoners to death, they followed rather the second. Whereupon Syllanus also recanted that he had spoken; and expounded his opinion, saying, that when he spake they should be put to death, he meant nothing so, but thought the last punishment a Senator of Rome could have, was the Prison. But the first that contraried this opinion, was Catulus Lucilius, and after him Cato, who with vehement words enforced Caesars suspicion, and furthermore filled all the Senate with wrath and outrage:

Caesars opinion for the punishment of the conspirators.

rage: so that even upon the instant it was decreed by most voices, that they should suffer death. But Caesar stepped up againe, and spake against the confiscation of their goods, mistaking that they should reject the gentlest part of his opinion, and that contrariwise they should sticke unto the severest onely: howbeit because the greatest number prevailed against him, he called the Tribunes to aide him, to the end they should withstand it; but they would give no eare unto him. Cicero thereupon yielding of himselfe, did remit the confiscation of their goods, and went with the Senate to fetch the Prisoners, who were not all in one house, but every Prætor had one of them. So he went first to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy street and the Market-place, accompanied with the chiefe men of the City, who compassed him round about, and guarded his person. The People seeing that, quaked and trembled for fear, passed by, and said never a word: and specially the young men, who thought it had been some solemn Mystry for the health of their Countrey, that was so accompanied with the chiefe Magistrate, and the Noblemen of the City, with terror and feare. So when he had passed through the Market-place, and was come to the Prison, he delivered Lentulus into the hands of the hangman, and commanded him to do execution. Afterwards also Cethegus, and then all the rest, one after another, whom he brought to the Prison himselfe, and caused them to be executed. Furthermore, seeing divers of their accomplices in a Troope together in the Market-place, who knew nothing what he had done, and watched onely till night were come, supposing then to take away their Companions by force from the place where they were, thinking they were yet alive, he turned unto them, and said aloud, They lived. This is a phrase of speech which the ROMANES use sometime, when they will finely convey the hardnesse of the speech, to say he is dead. When night was come, and that he was going home-ward, as he came through the Market-place, the People did waite upon him no more with silence as before, but with great cries of his praise, and clapping of hands in every place he went, and called him Saviour, and second Founder of Rome. Besides all this, at every mans door there were Linkes and Torches lighted, that it was as light in the streetes as at noone daies. The very Women also did put lights out of the tops of their houses to doe him honour, and also to see him so nobly brought home, with such a long traine of the chiefe men of the City, (of the which many of them had ended great Warres, for the which they had triumphed, and had obtained many famous Conquests to the Empire of Rome, both by Sea and Land) confelling between themselves one to another, that the ROMANES were greatly bound to many Captaines and Generals of Armies in their time, for the wonderfull riches and spoiles, and increase of their power which they had wonne, howbeit that they were to thanke Cicero onely for their health and preservation, having saved them from so great and extreame a danger. Not for that they thought it so wonderfull an Act to have stricken dead the Enterprize of the Conspirators, and also to have punished the offenders by death: but because the conspiracy of Catiline, being so great and dangerous an insurrection as ever was any, he had quenched it and pluckt it up by the roots, with so small hurt, and without uproare, trouble, or actual sedition. For the most part of them that were gathered together about Catiline, when they heard that Lentulus and all the rest were put to death, they presently forsooke him: and Catiline himselfe also fighting a Battell with them he had about him, against Antonius the other Consul with Cicero, he was slaine in the Field, and all his Army defeated. This notwithstanding, there were many that spake ill of Cicero for this Fact, and meant to make him repent it, having for their heads Caesar, (who was already chosen Prætor for the yeare to come) Metellus and Bellia, who should also be chosen Tribunes. They so soone as they were chosen Tribunes, would not once suffer Cicero to speake to the People, notwithstanding that he was yet in his Office of Consul for certaine daies. And furthermore, to let him that he should not speake unto the People, they did set their benches upon the Pulpit for Orations, which they call at Rome Rostra: and would never suffer him to set foot in it, but onely to resigne his Office, and that done, to come down againe immediately. He granted thereunto, and went up to the Pulpit upon that condition. So, silence being made him, he made an Oath, not like unto other Consuls Oathes when they resigne their Office in like manner, but strange, and never heard of before, swearing that he had saved the City of Rome, and preserved all his Countrey and the Empire of Rome from utter ruine and destruction. All the people that were present confirmed it, and did sweare the like Oath. Wherewithall Caesar and the other Tribunes his Enemies were so offended with him, that they desired to breed him some new stir and trouble: and amongst others, they made a decree, that Pompey should be sent for with his Army to bridle the Tyranny of Cicero. Cato (who at that time was also Tribune) did him great pleasure in the furtherance of the Common-wealth, opposing himselfe against all their practices, with the like authority and power that they had being a Tribune and Brother with them, and of better estimation then they. So that he did not onely easily break all their devices, but also in a goodly Oration he made in a full assembly of the people, he so highly praised and extolled Ciceros Consulship unto them, and the things he did in his Office, that they gave him the greatest honours that ever were decreed or granted unto any man living. For by decree of the People he was called, Father of the Countrey, as Cato himselfe had called him in his Oration: the which Name was never given to any man, but onely unto him: and also he bare greater sway in Rome at that time then any man beside him. This notwithstanding, he made himselfe envied and mistaked of many men, not for any ill Act he did, or meant to do, but onely because he did too much boast of himselfe. For he never was in any Assembly of People, Senate, or Judgement, but every mans head was full still to heare the sound of Catiline and Lentulus brought in for sport, and filling the Bookes and Workes he compiled besides full of his owne praises: the which made his sweet and pleasant stile tedious and troublesome to those that heard him: as though this misfortune ever followed him to take away his excellent grace. But now, though he had this worne of ambition, and extreme covetous desire of honour in his head, yet did he not malice or envy any others glory, but would very frankly praise excellent men, as well those that had been before him, as those that were in his time. And this appeareth plainly in his Writings. They have written also certaine notable words he spake of some ancient men in old time, as of Aristotle, that he was like a golden flowing River: and of Plato, that if Jupiter himselfe would speake, he would speake like him: and of Theophrastus, he was wont to call him his delight: and of Demosthenes Orations, when one asked him on a time which of them he liked best: The longest, said he. There be divers Writers also, who to shew that they were great followers of Demosthenes, do follow Ciceroes saying in a certaine Epistle he wrote unto one of his friends, wherein he said, that Demosthenes sleep in some of his Orations: but they forgot to tell how highly he praised him in that place; and that he calleth the Orations which he wrote against Antonius (in the which he tooke great paines, and studied more then all the rest) PHILIPPIANS: to follow those which Demosthenes wrote against Philip King of MACEDON. Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his time, either in Eloquence or in Learning, whose fame he hath not commended in writing, or otherwise in honourable speech of him. For he obtained of Cesar; when he had the Empire of ROME in his hands, that Cratippus the PERIPATETICK Philosopher was made Citizen of ROME. Further, he procured that by decree of the Court of the Areopagites, he was intreated to remaine at ATHENS, to teach and instruct the youth there: for that he was a great Honour and Ornament unto their City. There are extant also of Ciceroes Epistles unto Herodes, and others unto his Son, willing him to follow Cratippus in his study and knowledge. He wrote another Letter also unto Gorgias the Rhetorician, and forbad him his Sons company, because he understood he incited him to drunkenesse, and to other great dishonesty. Of all his Epistles he wrote in Greek, there is but that onely written in choller, and another which he wrote unto Pelops BYZANTINE. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reason to be offended with him, and to taunt him in his Letter, because (as it seemed) he was a man of very leud life and conversation. But in contrary manner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding himselfe grieved with him, for that he was negligent in procuring the *BYZANTINE*s to ordaine some publique honours in his behalfe: that, me thinkes, proceeded of overmuch ambition, the which in many things made him too much forget the part of an honest man, and onely because he would be commended for his Eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munatius Cause before the Judges, who shortly after accused Sabinus a friend of his, it is reported, that he was so angry with him, that he told him, What Munatius, hast thou forgotten that thou wert discharged the last day of thine Accusation, not for thine innocency, but for a Mist I cast before the Judges eyes, that made them they could not discern the fault? Another time also, having openly praised Marcus Crassus in the Pulpit, with good Audience of the People, shortly after he spake to the contrary all the evill he could of him, in the same place. Why, how now, said Crassus, didst thou not thy selfe highly praise me in this place, the last day? I cannot deny it, said Cicero: but indeed I tooke an ill matter in hand to shew mine Eloquence. Another time Crassus chanced to say in an open Assembly, that none of all the Crassii of his house had ever lived above threescore yeares: and afterwards againe repenting himselfe, he called it in againe, and said, Sure I know not what I did, when I said so. Cicero answered him againe: Thou knewest well enough the People were glad to heare it, and therefore thou spakest it to please them. Another time Crassus liking the Opinion of the STOICK Philosophers, that said, the wise man was ever rich, Cicero answered him, and bade him consider whether they meant not thereby, that the wise man had all things. Crassus covetousnesse was defamed of every man. Of Crassus Sonnes, one of them did much resemble Aelius, and therefore his Mother had an ill Name by him: one day this Sonne of Crassus made an Oration before the Senate, which divers of them commended very much. So, Cicero being asked how he liked it: Me thinkes, said he, it is * Aelius of Crassus. About this time, Crassus being ready to take his Journey into SYRIA, he desired to have Cicero his friend rather then his Enemy. Therefore one night making much of him, he told Cicero that he would come and Suppe with him. Cicero said, he should be welcome. Shortly after, some of his friends told him of Vatinius, how he was desirous to be made friends with him, for he was his Enemy. What, quoth Cicero, and will he come to Supper too? Thus he used Crassus. Now this Vatinius having a swollen necke, one day pleading before Cicero, he called him the swolne Oratour. Another time when he heard say that he was dead, and then that he was alive againe: A vengeance on him, said he, that hath lyed so shamefully. Another time when Cesar had made a Law for the dividing of the Lands of CAMPANIA unto the Souldiers, divers of the Senate were angry with him for it, and among other, Lucius Gellius (a very old man) said, he would never grant it while he lived. Cicero pleasantly answered againe, Alas, tarry a little, the good old man will not trouble you long. Another time there was one Obavius, supposed to be an * AFRICAN borne: he when Cicero on a time pleaded a matter, said, that he heard him not: Cicero presently answered him againe, And yet hast thou a hole boared through thine eare. Another time Metellus Nepos told him, that he had overthrowne more men by his Witnesse then he had saved by his Eloquence. I grant, said Cicero, for indeed I have more Faith, then Eloquence in me. So was there also a young man that was suspected to have poysoned his Father with a Tart, that boasted he would revile Cicero: I had rather have that that of thee, quoth Cicero, then thy Tart. Publius Sextius also having a matter before the Judges, entertained Cicero, with other of his Counsellours: bus yet he would speake all himselfe, and give none of the Oratours leave to say any thing. In the end, when they saw plainly that the Judges would discharge him, being ready to give sentence, Cicero said unto him, Besirre thee hardly to day, for to morrow Sextius thou shalt be a private man. Another, one Publius Cotta, who would faine have been thought a wise Lawyer, and yet had little wit and understanding, Cicero appealed to him as a Witnesse in a matter; and being examined, he answered he knew nothing of it. Cicero replied to him againe: Thou thinkest peradventure they aske thee touching the Law. Againe, Metellus Nepos, in a certaine disputation he had with Cicero, did many times repaite, Who is thy Father? Cicero answered him againe: Thy Mother hath made this question harder for thee to answer. This Nepos Mother was reported to be a light housewife, and he as subtil-witted and unconstant. For he being Tribune, left in a geere the exercise of his Office, and went into SYRIA to Pompey upon no occasion: and as fondly againe he returned thence upon a suddaine. His Schoole-master Philager also being dead, he buried him very honestly, and set a Crow of Stone upon the top of his Tombe. Cicero seeing it, told him, Thou hast done very wisely: for thy Master hath taught thee rather to sile, then to speake. Another time Appius Claudius pleading a matter, said in his Preamble, that his friend had earnestly requested him to employ all his knowledge, diligence, and faith upon this matter. O gods, said Cicero, and hast thou shewed thy selfe so hard-hearted to thy friend, as to performe nothing of all that he requested thee? Now to use these fine taunts and girds to thy Enemies, it was a part of a good Oratour: but so commonly to gird every man to make the People laugh, that wanne him great ill-will of many, as shall appeare by some examples I will tell you. Marcus Aquinius had two Sonnes-in-law, who were both banished: Cicero therefore called him Adrastrus. Lucius Cotta by chance also was Censor at that time, when Cicero sued to be Consul: and following his suite at the day of Election, he was a thirft, and was driven to drinke. But while he dranke, all his friends stood about him, and after he had drunke, he said unto them: It is well done of ye (said he) to be afraid lest the Censor should be angry with me because I drinke Water: for it was reported the Censor loved Wine well. Another time Cicero meeting one Vocomsus, with three foule Daughters of his with him, he cryed out aloud:

This man hath gotten Children in despite of Phæbus.

It was thought in ROME that Marcus Gellius was not borne of free Parents by Father and Mother, who reading certaine Letters one day in the Senate very loud: Cicero said unto them that were about him, Wonder not at him, quoth he, for this man hath been a Cryer in his daies. Fausus, the Sonne of Sylla Dictatour at ROME, which set up Billes Out lawing divers ROMANS, making it lawfull for any man to kill them without danger where they found them, this man after he had spent the most part of his Fathers Goods, was so sore in debt, that he was driven to sell his household Stuffe, by Billes set up on every Post. Cicero when he saw them, Yea marry, said he, these Billes please me better, then those which his Father set up. These taunts and common quippes without purpose, made divers men to malice him. The great ill-will that Clodius bore him, beganne upon this occasion. Clodius was of noble houle, a young man, and very wilde and insolent: he being in love with Pompeia Cæsars Wife, found the meanes secretly to get into Cæsars house, apparelled like a young singing Wench, because on that day the Ladies of ROME did solemnly celebrate a secret Sacrifice in Cæsars house, which is not lawfull for men to be present at. So there was no man there but Clodius, who thought he should not have been known, because he was but a young man, without any haire on his face, and that by this meanes he might come to Pompeia amongst the other Women. He being gotten into this great houle by night, not knowing the Roomes and Chambers in it, there was one of Cæsars Mothers Maides of her Chamber, called Aurelia, who seeing him wandering up and down the houle in this sort, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being torced to answer, he said he sought for Aura, one of Pompeias Maides. The Maide perceived straight it was no Womans voice, and therewithall gave a great shriek, and called the other Women, the which did see the Gates fast shut, and then sought every corner up and down, so that at length they found him in the Maides Chamber, with whom he came in. His offence was straight blowne abroad in the City, whereupon Cesar put his Wife away: and one of the Tribunes also accused Clodius, and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy Ceremonies of the Sacrifices. Cicero at that time was yet his friend, being one that had very friendly done for him at all times, and had ever accompanied him to guard him, if any man would have offered him injury in the busie time of the conspiracy of Catiline. Clodius stoutly denied the matter he was burdened with, and said that he was not in ROME at that time, but farre from thence. Howbeit Cicero gave evidence against him, and deposed, that the selfe same day he came home to his houle unto him, to speake with him about certaine matters. This indeed was true, though it seemeth Cicero gave not this evidence so much for the truthe sake, as to please his Wife Terentia: for the hated Clodius to the death, because of his Sister Clodia that would have married Cicero, and did secretly practise the marriage by one Tullius, who was Ciceroes very friend; and because he repaired very often to this Clodia that dwelt hard by Cicero, Terentia began to suspect him. Terentia being a cruell Woman, and wearing her Husbands Breeches, allured Cicero to set upon Clodius in his adversity, and to Witnesse against him, as many other honest men of the City also did: Some that he was perjured, others others that he committed a thousand lewd parts, that he bribed the People with Money, that he had enticed and deflowed many Women. Lucullus also brought forth certaine Maidens, which depofed that Clodius had deflowed the youngest of his own Sisters, she being in the house with him, and married. And there went a great rumour also, that he knew his two other Sisters, of the which the one was called * Terentia, and married unto King Marius; and the other Clodia, whom Metellus Celer had married, and whom they commonly called Quadrantaria: because one of her Paramours sent her a Purse full of Quadrines (which are little pieces of Copper Money) instead of Silver. Clodius was slandered more by her, then with any of the other two. Notwithstanding, the People were very much offended with them that gave evidence against him, and accused him. The Judges being afraid of it, got a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his judgement, for the safety of their Persons: and in the Tables where they wrote their Sentences, their Letters for the most part were confusedly set down. This notwithstanding, it was found that he was quit by the greatest number: and it was reported also that some of them were close fifted. Catulus therefore meeting with some of them going home, after they had given their sentence, told them: Surely ye had good reason to be well guarded for your safety, for you were afraid your money should have been taken from you, which you tooke for Bribes. And Cicero said unto Clodius, who reproved him that his Witnesse was not true he gave against him: Cleanse contrary, quoth Cicero, for five and twenty of the Judges have beleevved me, being so many that have condemned thee; and the thirty would not beleevve thee, for they would not quit thee before they had figned Money. Notwithstanding in this judgement Cesar never gave evidence against Clodius: and said moreover, that he did not thinke his Wife had committed any adultery: howbeit that he had put her away, because he would that Cesar's Wife should not onely be cleane from any dishonesty, but also voide of all suspicion. Clodius being quit of this Accusation and trouble, and having also found meanes to be chosen Tribune, he began straight to persecute Cicero, changing all things, and stirring up all manner of People against him. First he wanne the goodwill of the common People by devising of new Lawes which he preferred for their benefit and commodity: to both the Consuls he granted great and large Provinces: unto Piso, MACEDON, and to Gabinus, SYRIA. He made also many poor men free Citizens, and had alwaies about him a great number of Slaves armed. At that present time there were three notable men in ROME, which carried all the sway: Cassius that shewed himselfe an open Enemy unto Cicero: Pompey the other, made much both of the one and the other: the third was Cesar, who was prepared for his Journey into GAULE with an Army. Cicero did leane unto him, (though he knew him no fast friend of his, and that he mistrusted him for matters past in Catiline's conspiracy) and prayed him that he might go to the Warres with him, as one of his Lieutenants. Cesar granted him. Thereupon Clodius perceiving that by this meanes he got him out of the danger of his Office of Tribuneship for that yeare, he made faire weather with him (as though he meant to reconcile himselfe unto him) and told him that he had cause rather to thinke ill of Terentia, for that he had done against him, then of himselfe: and alwaies spake very courteously of him as occasion fell out, and said, he did thinke nothing in him, neither had any malice to him, howbeit it did a little grieve him, that being a friend, he was offered unkindnesse by a friend. These sweet words made Cicero no more afraid, so that he gave up his Lieutenantcy unto Cesar, and began againe to pleade as he did before. Cesar tooke this in such disdain, that he heartned Clodius the more against him, and besides, made Pompey his Enemy. And Cesar himselfe also said before all the People, that he thought Cicero had put Lentulus, Cethegus, and the rest unjustly to death, and contrary to Law, without lawfull triall and condemnation. And this was the fault for the which Cicero was openly accused. Thereupon Cicero seeing himselfe accused for this Fact, he changed his usuall Gown he wore, and put on a mourning Gown: and so suffering his beard and haire of his head to grow without any combing, he went in this humble manner, and sued to the People. But Clodius was ever about him in every place and street he went, having a sight of Rascals and Knaves with him, that shamefully mocked him for that he had changed his Gown and countenance in that sort, and oftentimes they cast dirt and stones at him, breaking his talke and requests he made unto the People. This notwithstanding, all the Knights of ROME did in manner change their Gownes with him for company; and of them there were commonly twenty thousand young Gentlemen of noble house which followed him with their haire about their eares, and were suiters to the People for him. Furthermore, the Senate assembled to decree that the People should mourn in Blacks, as in a common calamity: but the Consuls were against it. And Clodius on the other side was with a band of armed men about the Senate, so that many of the Senatours ranne out of the Senate, crying and tearing their cloathes for sorrow. Howbeit, these men seeing all that, were nothing the more moved with pity and shame, but either Cicero must needs absent himselfe, or else determine to fight with Clodius. Then went Cicero to intreate Pompey to aide him, but he absented himselfe of purpose out of the City, because he would not be intreated, and lay at one of his houses in the Countrey, near unto the City of ALBA. So he first of all sent Piso his Sonne-in-law unto him to intreate him, and afterwards went himselfe in Person to him. But Pompey being told that he was come, had not the heart to suffer him to come to him, to looke him in the face: for he had been past all shame to have refused the request of so worthy a man, who had before shewed him such pleasure, and also done and said so many things in his favour. Howbeit Pompey being the Sonne-in-law to Cesar, did unfortunately (at his request) forsake him at his need, unto whom he was bound for so many infinite nite pleasures, as he had received of him afore: and therefore when he heard say he came to him, he went out at his back-gate, and would not speake with him. So Cicero seeing himselfe betrayed of him, and now having no other refuge to whom he might repaire unto, he put himselfe into the hands of the two Consuls. Of them two, Gabinus was ever cruell and churlish unto him, but Piso on the other side spake alwaies very courteously unto him, and prayed him to absent himselfe for a time, and to give place a little to Clodius fury, and patiently to beare the change of the time. For in so doing, he might come againe another time to be the preserver of his Countrey, which was now for his sake in tumult and sedition. Cicero upon this answer of the Consull, consulted with his friends; among the which Lucullus gave him advice to tarry, and said that he should be the stronger. But all the rest were of contrary opinion, and would have him to get him away with speed, for the People would shortly wish for him againe, when they had once been beaten with Clodius fury and folly. Cicero liked best to follow this counsell. Whereupon having had a Statue of Minerva a long time in his house, the which he greatly revered, he carried her himselfe, and gave her to the Capitoll, with this inscription: Unto Minerva Protectour of ROME. So his friends having given him safe conduct, he went out of ROME about midnight, and tooke his way through the Countrey of LUX by Land, meaning to goe into SICILE. When it was knowne in ROME that he was fled, Clodius did presently banish him by decree of the People, and caused Billes of inhibition to be set up, that no man should secretly receive him within five hundred miles compasse of ITALIE. Howbeit, divers men reverencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition: but when they had used him with all manner of courtesie possible, they did conduct him besides at his departure, saving one City onely in LUKE, called at that time HIPPONIUM, and now VIONE: where a SICILIAN called Vibius (unto whom Cicero before had done many pleasures, and specially among others, had made him Master of the Workes in the year that he was Consull) would not once receive him into his house, but promised him he would appoint him a place in the Countrey that he might goe unto. And Caius Virgilius also, at that time Prator and Governour of SICILE, who before had shewed himselfe his very great friend, wrote then unto him, that he should not come near unto SICILE. This grieved him to the heart. Thereupon he went directly unto the City of BRUNDISIUM, and there embarked to passe over the Sea unto DYRRACHIUM, and at the first had winde at will, but when he was in the maine Sea, the winde turned, and brought him backe againe to the place from whence he came. But after that he hoised saile againe, and the report went, that at his arrivall at DYRRACHIUM when he tooke Land, the Earth shooke under him, and the Sea gave backe together: whereby the Soothsayers interpreted, that his exile should not be long, because both the one and the other was a token of change. Yet Cicero, notwithstanding that many men came to see him for the good will they bare him, and that the Cities of GREECE contended who should most honour him, he was alwaies sad, and could not be merry; but cast his eyes still towards ITALY, as passionate Lovers doe towards the Women they love: shewing himselfe faint-hearted, and tooke this adversity more basely then was looked for of one so well studied and learned as he. And yet he oftentimes prayed his friends, not to call him Oratour; but rather Philosopher: saying, that Philosophy was his chieft Profession, and that for his Eloquentie he did not use it, but as a necessary Instrument to one that pleadeth in the Common-wealth. But glory and opinion, hath great power to take mans reason from him, even like a colour; from the minds of them that are common Pleaders in matters of State, and to make them feeble the selfe-same passions that common People doe, by daily frequenting their company: unless they take great heed of them, and that they come to practise in the Common-wealth with this resolute minde, to have to doe with the like matters that the common People have, but not to entangle themselves with the like passions and moodes that the which their matters doyle. Now Clodius was not contented that he had banished Cicero out of ITALIE, but further, he burnt all his houses in the Countrey, and his house also in ROME standing in the Market-place, of the which he built a Temple of Liberty, and caused his Goods to be sold by the Crier: so that the Crier was occupied all day long crying the Goods to be sold, and no man offered to buy any of them. The chieft men of the City beginning to be afraid of the violent parts, and having the common People at his commandement, whom he had made very bold and insolent, he began to envenom against Pompey, and spake ill of his doings in the time of his Warres, the which every man else but himselfe did commend. Pompey then was very angry with himselfe that he had so forsaken Cicero, and repented him of it, and by his friends procured all the meanes he could to call him home againe from his banishment. Clodius was against it all he could. The Senate notwithstanding with one full consent ordained, that nothing should be established him the Common-wealth, before Cicero's banishment were first repealed. Lentulus was at that time Consull, and there grew such an uproare and stirre upon it, that some of the Tribunes were hurt in the Market-place; and Quintus Cicero (the Brother of Cicero) was beaten down and hidden under the dead bodies. Then the People began to change their mindes. And Annius Milo, one of the Tribunes, was the first man that durst venture upon Clodius, and bring him by force to be tried before the Judges. Pompey himselfe also having gotten a great number of men about him, as well of the City of ROME as of other Townes adjoining to it, being strongly guarded with them, he came out of his house, and compelled Clodius to get him out of the Market-place, and then called the People to give their voices for the calling home againe of Cicero. It is reported that the

the People never passed thing with so great good-will, nor so wholly together, as the returne of Cicero. And the Senate for their parts also, in the behalfe of Cicero, ordained, that the Cities which had honoured and received Cicero in his exile, should be greatly commended: and that his houses which Clodius had overthrowne and razed, should be re-edified at the charge of the Common-wealth. So Cicero returned the sixteenth Moneth after his banishment, and the Townes and Cities he came by, shewed themselves so joyfull of his returne, that all manner of men went to meet and honour him. with so great love and affection, that Ciceroes report thereof afterwards came indeed short of the very truth as it was. For he said, that ITALIE brought him into ROME upon their shoulders. Inasmuch as Crassus himselfe, who before his banishment was his Enemy, went then with very good-will unto him, and became his friend, saying: That he did it for the love of his Sonne, who loved Cicero with all his heart. Now Cicero being returned, he found a time when Clodius was out of the City, and went with a good company of his friends unto the Capitoll, and there tooke away the Tables, and brake them, in the which Clodius had written all his Acts that he had passed and done in the time of his Tribuneship. Clodius would afterwards have accused Cicero for it, But Cicero answered him; that he was not lawfully created Tribune, because he was of the PATRICIANS, and therefore all that he had done in his Tribuneship was void, and of none effect. Therewith Cato was offended, and spake against him, not for that he liked of Clodius doings, (but to the contrary, utterly misliked all that he did) but because he thought it out of all reason, that the Senate should cancell all those things which he had done and passed in his Tribuneship, and specially, because amongst the rest, that was there which he himselfe had done in the Isle of CYPRUS, and in the City of BYZANTIUM. Hereupon there grew some strangnesse betwixt Cicero and Cato, the which notwithstanding brake not out to openenimy, but only to an abstinence of their wonted familiarity, and access one to another. Shortly after, Milo slew Clodius. Milo being accused of murder, prayed Cicero to pleade his cause. The Senate fearing that this Accusation of Milo, (who was a hardy man, and of quality besides) would move some sedition and uproare in the City, they gave Commission to Pompey to see justice executed as well in this cause as in other offences, that the City might be quiet, and judgement all executed with safety. Thereupon Pompey the night before tooke the highest places of the Market-place, by his Souldiers that were armed, whom he placed thereabout. Milo fearing that Cicero would be afraid to see such a number of harnesssed men about him, being no usual matter, and that it might peradventure hinder him to pleade his cause well, he prayed him he would come betimes in the morning in his Litter into the Market-place, and there to stay the coming of the Judges; till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearfull in Warres, but timorous also into pleading. For indeed he never beganne to speake, but it was in feare: and when his Eloquence was come to the best prooffe and perfection, he never left his trembling and timorousnesse. Inasmuch that pleading a case for Mutius Muræna (accused by Cato) striving to excell Hortensius, whose pleading was very well thought of, he tooke no rest all night; and what through watching and the trouble of his minde, he was not very well, so that he was not so well liked for his pleading as Hortensius. So, going to defend Miles cause, when he came out of his Litter, and saw Pompey set aloft as it had been in a Campe, and the Market-place campassed about with armed men, glittering in every corner, it so amazed him, that he could scant fashion himselfe to speake; all the parts of him did so quake and tremble, and his voice could not come to him. But Milo on the other side stood boldly by himselfe, without any feare at all of the judgement of his cause, neither did he let his haire grow, as other men accused did: neither did he weare any mourning Gowne, the which was (as it seemed) one of the chiefest causes that condemned him. Yet many held opinion that this timorousnesse of Cicero came rather of the good will he bore unto his friends, then of any cowardly minde of himselfe. He was also chosen one of the Priests of the Soothsayers, which they call Augures, in the roome of Publius Crassus the younger, who was slaine in the Realme of PARTHIA. Afterwards, the Province of SILICIA being appointed to him, with an Army of twelve thousand Footmen, and two thousand and five hundred Horsemen, he tooke the Sea to go thither. So when he was arrived there, he brought CAPPADOCIA againe into the subjection and obedience of King Ariobarzanes, according to his Commission and Commandement given by the Senate: moreover, both there and else where he tooke as excellent good order as could be devised, in reducing of things to quietnesse without Warres. Furthermore, finding that the CILICIANS were growne somewhat stout and unruly, by the overthrow the ROMANS had of the PARTHIANS, and by reason of the rising and rebellion in SYRIA, he brought them unto reason by gentle perswasions: and never received Gifts that were sent him; no nor from Kings and Princes. Furthermore, he did disburden the Provinces of the Feasts and Banquets they were wont to make other Governours before him. On the other side also, he would ever have the company of good and Learned men at his Table, and would use them well, without curiosity and excess. He had never Porter to his Gate, nor was seen by any man in his bed: for he would alwaies rise at the breake of day, and would walke or stand before his door. He would courteously receive all them that came to salute and visit him. Further they report of him, that he never caused man to be beaten with rodde, nor to teare his own Garments. In his anger he never reviled any man, neither did despitefully set fine upon any mans head. Finding many things also belonging to the Common-wealth, which private men had stolne and imbezeled to their own use, he restored againe unto the Cities, where by by they grew very rich and wealthy: and yet did save their honour and credit that had taken them away, and did them no other hurt; but onely constrained them to restore that which was the Common-wealths. He made a little Warre also and drave away the Thieves that kept about the Mountain AMANN, for the which exploit his Souldiers called him Imperator, to say, chiefe Captaine. About that time there was an Orator called Cecilius, who wrote unto him from ROME, to pray him to send him some Leopards or Panthers out of SILICIA, because he would shew the People some pastime with them. Cicero boasting of his doings, wrote to him againe, that there were no more Leopards in SILICIA, but that they were all fled into CARIA for anger, that seeing all things quiet in SILICIA, they had leasure now to hunt them. So when he returned towards ROME, from the charge of his Government, he came by RHODES, and stayed a few daies at ATHENS with great delight, to remember how pleasantly he lived there before, at what time he studied there. Thither came to him the chiefe Learned-men of the City, and his friends also, with whom he was acquainted at his first being there. In fine, having received all the honourable entertainment in GREECE that could be, he returned unto ROME, where at his arrivall he found great factions kindled, the which men saw plainly would grow in the end to civill Warre. Thereupon the Senate having decreed that he should enter in Triumph into the City, he answered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Cæsars Coach in Triumph. So he travelled very earnestly between Pompey and Cæsar, oftsoones writing unto Cæsar, and also speaking unto Pompey that was present, seeking all the meanes he could, to take up the quarrell and milking betwixt them two. But it was so impossible a matter, that there was no speech of agreement would take place. So Pompey hearing that Cæsar was not farre from ROME, he durst no longer abide in ROME, but fled with divers of the greatest men in ROME. Cicero would not follow him when he fled, and therefore men thought he would take part with Cæsar: but this is certaine, that he was in a marvellous perplexity, and could not easily determine what way to take. Whereupon he wrote in his Epistles: What way should I take? Pompey had the juster and honest cause of Warre, but Cæsar can better execute, and provide for himselfe and his friends with better safety: so that I have meanes enough to flie, but none to whom I might repaire. In all this stirre, there was one of Cæsars friends called Trebatius, which wrote a Letter unto Cicero, and told him that Cæsar wished him in any case to come to him, and to run with him the hope and fortune he undertooke: but if he excused himselfe by his age, that then he should get him into GREECE, and there to be quiet from them both. Cicero marvelling that Cæsar wrote not to him himselfe, answered in anger, that he would do nothing unworthy of his acts all the daies of his life thitherto: and to this effect he wrote in his Letters. Now Cæsar being gone into SPAIN, Cicero imbarcked presently to go to Pompey. so when he came unto him, every man was very glad of his coming, but Cato. Howbeit Cato secretly reproved him for coming unto Pompey, saying: that for himselfe he had been without all honesty at that time to have forsaken that part the which he had alwaies taken and followed from the beginning of his first practise in the Common-wealth: but for him, on the other side, that it had been better for the safety of his Countrey, and chiefly for all his friends, that he had been a neuter to both, and so to have taken things as they had fallen out: and that he had no manner of reason nor instant cause to make him to become Cæsars Enemy, and by coming thither to put himself into so great perill. These perswasions of Cato overthrew all Ciceroes purpose and determination, besides that Pompey himselfe did not employ him in any matter of service or importance, But hereof himselfe was more in fault then Pompey, because he confessed openly that it did repent him he was come thither. Furthermore, he scorned and disdaind all Pompeys preparations and counsels, the which indeed made him to be had in jealousie and suspition. Also he would ever be fltering and gibing at those that tooke Pompeys part, though he had no list himselfe to be merry. He would also go up and down the Campe very sad and heavy, but yet he would ever have one jest or other to make men laugh, although they had as little list to be merry as he: and surely, it shall do no hurt to call some of them to minde in this place. Domitius being very desirous to preferre a Gentleman to have charge of men, to recommend him, he said, he was an honest, wife, and sober man. Whereunto Cicero presently answered: Why dost thou not keepe him then to bring up thy Children? Another time when they commended Theophanes LESIAN (that was Master of all the Artificers of the Campe) because he had notably comforted the RHODIANS when they had received a great losse of their Navy: See, said Cicero, what a goodly thing it is to have a GRECIAN, Master of Artificers in the Campe? When both Battels came to joyne together, and that Cæsar had in manner all the advantage, and kept them as good as besieged, Lentulus told him on a time, that he heard say, all Cæsars friends were mad, and melancholy men. Why? quoth Cicero to him againe: dost thou say that they do envie Cæsar? Another called Martius, coming lately out of ITALY, said, that there ranne a rumour in ROME, that Pompey was besieged. What? quoth Cicero to him againe: and didst thou take ship to come and see him thy selfe, because thou mightest believe it when thou hadst seen it? Pompey being overthrowne, one Nonius said, there was yet good hope left, because they had taken seven Eagles within Pompeys Campe. Thy perswasion were not ill, quoth Cicero, so we were to fight but with Pies and Dawes. Labiænus repoled all his trust in certaine Oracles, that Pompey of necessity must have the upper-hand. Yea said Cicero, but for all this goodly stratageme of Warre, we have not long since lost our whole Campe. After the Battell of PHARSALIA, where Cicero was not by reason of his sicknesse: Pompey being fled, and Cato at that time at DYRRACHIUM, where he had gathered a great number of men of Warre, and had also prepared a great great Navy, he praised Cicero to take charge of all this Army, as it pertained unto him, having been Consul. Cicero did not onely refuse it, but also told them, he would meddle no more with this Warre. But this was enough to have made him been flaine: for the younger Pompey and his friends called him Traitor, and drew their Swords upon him to kill him, which they had done, had not Cato stepped between them and him; and yet had he much adoe to save him, and to convey him safely out of the Campe. When Cicero came to BRUNDISIUM, he stayed there a certaine time for Caesar coming, who came but slowly, by reason of his troubles he had in ASIA, and also in AEGYPT. Howbeit newes was brought at length that Caesar was arrived at TARENTUM, and that he came by Land unto BRUNDISIUM: Cicero departed thence to go meet him, not mistrusting that Caesar would not pardon him, but rather being ashamed to come to his Enemy being a Conquerour, before such a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to do or speake any thing unfeemly to his calling: for Caesar seeing him coming towards him farre before the rest that came with him, he lighted from his Horse and imbraced him, and walked a great way on foot with him, still talking with him onely; and ever after he did him great honour, and made much of him. In somuch as Cicero having written a Booke in praise of Cato, Caesar on the other side wrote another, and praised the Eloquence and Life of Cicero, matching it with the Life of Pericles, and Themistocles. Cicero's Booke was intituled Cato, and Caesar's Booke called Anticato, as much to say, against Cato. They say further, that Quintus Ligarius being accused to have been in the Field against Caesar, Cicero took upon him to defend his cause: and that Caesar said unto his friends about him, What hurt is it for us to hear Caesar speake, whom we have not heard of long time? for otherwise Ligarius (in my opinion) standeth already a condemned man, for I know him to be a valiant man, and mine Enemy. But when Cicero had begonne his Oration, he moved Caesar marvellously, he had so sweet a grace, and such force in his words, that it is reported Caesar changed colour often, and shewed plainly by his countenance, that there was a marvellous alteration in all the parts of him. For, in the end when the Orator came to touch the Battell of PHARSALIA, then was Caesar so troubled, that his Body shooke withall, and besides, certaine Bookes he had fell out of his hands, and he was driven against his will to set Ligarius at liberty. Afterwards, when the Common-wealth of Rome came to be a Kingdome, Cicero leaving to practise any more in the State, he gave himselfe to reade Philosophy to the young men that came to heare him: by whose access unto him (because they were the chiefe of the Nobility in Rome) he came againe to beare as great sway and Authority in Rome as ever he had done before. His study and endeavour was, to write matters of Philosophy Dialogue-wise, and to translate out of Greeke into Latine, taking paines to bring all the Greeke words, which are proper unto Logicke and naturall Causes, into Latine. For he was the first man by report, that gave Latine Names unto these Greeke words, which are proper unto Philosophers, as, κατασκευα, he termed, Visio. Κατάσκευα, Assensus. Εννοια, Assensus. Κατασκευα, Comprehensio. Τὸ ἀτομον, Corpus indivisibile. Τὸ ἀπυκτον, Corpus simplex. τὸ κενον, Vacuum, and many other such like words. But though he was not the first, yet was it he that most did devise and use them, and turned some of them by translation, others into proper termes: so that at length they came to be well taken, knowne, and understood of every man. And for his readinesse in writing of Verses, he would use them many times for his recreation: for it is reported, that whensoever he tooke in hand to make any, he would dispatch five hundred of them in a night. Now all that time of his recreation and pleasure, he would commonly be at some of his houses in the Countrey, which he had near unto THUSCULUM, from whence he would write unto his friends, that he led Laertes life: either spoken merrily as the manner was, or else pricked forward with ambition, desiring to returne againe to be practiser in the Common-wealth, being weary with the present time and state thereof. Howsoever it was, he came oftentimes to Rome, onely to see Caesar to keep him his friend, and would ever be the first man to confirme any honours decreed unto him, and was alwaies studious to utter some new matter to praise him and his doings. As that was he said touching the Statues of Pompey, the which being overthrowne, Caesar commanded them to be set up againe, and so they were. For Cicero said, that by that courtesie in setting up of Pompey's Statues againe, he did establish his own. So Cicero being determined to write all the ROMANES History, and to mingle with it many of the GRECIANS doings, adding thereunto all the fables and devices which they do write and report, he was hindered of his purpose against his will, by many open and privat troubles that came upon him at once: whereof notwithstanding he himselfe was cause of the most of them. For first of all, he did put away his Wife Terentia, because she had made but small account of him in all the Varres: so that he departed from Rome having no necessary thing with him to entertain him out of his Countrey; and yet when he came backe againe into ITALY, he never shewed any sparke of love or good will towards him. For the never came to BRUNDISIUM to him, where he remained a long time: and worse then that, his Daughter having the heart to take so long a Journey in hand to go to him, the neither gave her company to conduct her, nor Money, nor other furniture convenient for her; but so handled the matter, that Cicero at his returne to Rome found bare wals in his house and nothing in it, and yet greatly brought in debt besides. And these were the honest causes alleaded for their Divorce. But besides that Terentia denied all these, Cicero himselfe gave her a good occasion to cleare her selfe, because he shortly after married a young Maide, being fallen in fancy with her (as Terentia said) for her beauty: or, as Tyro his servant wrote, for her riches, to the end that with her Goods he might pay his debts. For she was very rich, and Cicero also was appointed her Gardian, she being left Sole-Heire. Now, because he ought a marvellous summe of

of mony, his parents and friends did counsel him to marry this young maiden, notwithstanding he was too old for her, because that with her goods he might satisfie his creditors. But Antonius speaking of this marriage of Cicero, in his answers and Orations he made against the PHILIPPANS, he doth reprove him for that he put away his wife, with whom he was grown old; being merry with him by the way, for that he had been an idle man, and never went from the smoak of his Chimney, nor had been abroad in the wars in any service of his Countrey or Commonwealth. Shortly after that he had married his second wife, his daughter died in labor of child, in Lentulus house, whose second wife she was, being before married unto Piso, who was her first husband. So the Philosphers and learned men came of all sides to comfort him: but he took her death so sorrowfully, that he put away his second wife, because he thought the did rejoyce at the death of his daughter. And thus much touching the state and troubles of his house. Now touching the conspiracy against Caesar, he was not made privy to it, although he was one of Brutus greatest friends, and that it grieved him to see things in that state they were brought unto, and albeit also he wished for the times past, as much as any other man did. But indeed the conspirators were afraid of his nature, that lacked hardinesse: and of his age, the which oftentimes murther the stoutest and most hardiest natures faint hearted and cowardly. Notwithstanding, the conspiracy being executed by Brutus and Cassius, Caesar's friends being gathered together, every man was afraid that the City would againe fall into civil wars. And Antonius also, who was Consul at that time, did assemble the Senate, and made some speech and motion then to draw things againe unto quietnesse. But Cicero having used divers perswasions fit for the time, in the end he moved the Senate to decree (following the example of the ATHENIANS) a general oblivion of things done against Caesar, and to assigne unto Brutus and Cassius some governments of Provinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded: for the people of themselves were sorry, when they saw Caesar's body brought through the Market-place. And when Antonius also did shew them his Gown all be bloodied; cut, and thrust through with swords, then they were like mad men for anger, and sought up and down the Market-place if they could meet with any of them that had slain him: and taking firebrands in their hands, they ran to their houses to set them on fire. But the conspirators having prevented this danger, saved themselves: and fearing that if they tarried at Rome, they should have many such alarmes, they forsooke the City. Then Antonius began to looke a lost, and became fearfull to all men, as though he meant to make himselfe King: but yet most of all unto Cicero above all others. For Antonius perceiving that Cicero began againe to increase in credit and authority, and knowing that he was Brutus very friend, he did mislike to see him come neare him; and besides there was at that time some jealousie betwixt them, for the diversity and difference of their manners and dispositions. Cicero being afraid of this, was first of all in mind to go with Dolabella to his Province of SYRIA, as one of his Lieutenants. But they that were appointed to be Consuls the next year following after Antonius, two noble Citizens, and Cicero's great friends, Hircius and Pansa, they treated him not to forsake them, understanding that they would plucke down this over-great power of Antonius, so he would remaine with them. But Cicero, neither beleiving nor altogether mistrusting them, forsooke Dolabella, and promised Hircius and Pansa, that he would spend the Summer at ATHENS, and that he would returne againe to Rome so soon as they were entered into their Consulship. With this determination Cicero tooke the sea alone, to go into GREECE. But as it chanceth oftentimes, there was some let that kept him he could not faile, and newes came to him daily from Rome (as the manner is) that Antonius was wonderfully changed, and that now he did nothing any more without the authority and consent of the Senate, and that there lacked nothing but his person to make all things well. Then Cicero condemning his dastardly fear, returned forthwith to Rome, not being deceived in his first hope. For there came such a number of people out to meet him, that he could do nothing all day long but take them by the hands, and imbrace them, who to honour him, came to meet him at the Gate of the City, as also by the way to bring him to his house. The next morning Antonius assembled the Senate, and called for Cicero by name. Cicero refused to go, and kept his bed, saying that he was wearie with his journey and paines he had taken the day before: but indeed the cause why he went not, was, for feare and suspicion of an ambush that was laid for him by the way, if he had gone, as he was informed by one of his very good friends. Antonius was marvellously offended that they did wrongfully accuse him, for laying any ambush for him: and therefore sent souldiers to his house, and commanded them to bring him by force, or else to set his house on fire: After that time, Cicero and he were alwaies at jarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heed of another: untill that young Caesar returning from the City of APOLLONIA, came as lawfull heire unto Julius Caesar Dictator, and had contention with Antonius for the summe of two thousand and five hundred Myriades, the which Antonius kept in his hands of his fathers goods. Thereupon Philip who had married the mother of this young Caesar, and Marcel- Cicerus and his who had also married his sister, went with young Caesar unto Cicero, and there agreed together, that Cicero should helpe young Caesar with the favour of his authority and eloquence, as joyned in well towards the Senate, as also to the people: and that Caesar in recompence of his goodwill should stand by Cicero, with his money and souldiers: for this young Caesar had many of his fathers souldiers about him, that had served under him. Now there was another cause that made Cicero glad to embrace the friendship of this young Caesar, and that was this. Whilest Pompey and Julius Caesar were alive and in good case, Cicero dreamed one might that the Senators sons were called into the Capitol, because Jupiter had appointed to shew them him that one day should come to be Lord and King of Rome, and that the ROMANES being desirous to see who it should be, ran all unto the Julian Caesar.

Temple: and that all the children likewise were waiting there in their goodly garded Gowns of purple, until that suddenly the doors of the temple were open; and then that all the children arose one after another, and went and passed by the image of Jupiter, who looked upon them all, and sent them away discontented, saving this young Caesar, unto whom he put forth his hand as he passed by, and said: My Lords of ROME, this child is he that shall end all your civil wars, when he cometh to be Lord of ROME. Some say, that Cicero had this vision in his dreame, and that he carried in good memory the look of this child, howbeit that he knew him not: and that the next morning he went of purpose into the field of Mars, where these young boyes did exercise themselves, who, when he came thither, had broken up from playing, and were going home: and that amongst them he first saw him whom he had dreamed of, and knew him very well, and musing at him the more, asked him whose son he was. The boy answered, that he was the son of one Octavius (a man otherwise of no great calling) and of Accia, the sister of Julius Caesar: who having no child, he made him his heire by his last will and testament, and left him all his lands and goods. After that time, it is reported, that Cicero was very glad to speake to him when he met with him, and that the boy also liked Cicero's friendship, and making much of him: for by good hap the boy was born the same year that Cicero was Consul. And these be the reasons alledged, why Cicero did favour this young Caesar. But in truth, first of all the great malice he bare unto Antonius, and secondly his nature that was ambitious of honour, were (in my opinion) the chiefest causes why he became young Caesar's friend: knowing that the force and power of his souldiers would greatly strengthen his authority and countenance in managing the affairs of the state; besides that the young man could flatter him so well, that he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epistles he wrote unto Atticus he sharply reproveth Cicero, saying, that for fear of Antonius he flattered this young Caesar: whereby it appeared, he did not so much seek for the liberty of ROME, as he did procure himself a loving and gentle master. This notwithstanding Brutus brought with him Cicero's son that studied Philosophy at ATHENS, and gave him charge of men under him, and employed him in great affaires, wherein he shewed himself very forward and valiant. Now Cicero's authority and power grew againe to be as great in ROME, as ever it was before. For he did what he thought good, and so vexed Antonius, that he drave him out of the City, and sent the two Consuls Hircius and Pansa against him, to fight with him: and caused the Senate also to decree, that young Caesar should have Sergeants to carry Rods and Axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prætor, as a man that fighteth for his Country. After that Antonius had lost the battel, and that both the Consuls were flaine, both the Armies came unto Caesar. The Senate then being afraid of this young man that had so great good fortune, they practised by honours and gifts to call the Armies from him, which he had about him, and so to minish the greatnesse of his power: saying, that their Country now stood in no need of force nor fear of defence, sith her enemy Antonius was fled and gone. Caesar fearing this, sent men secretly unto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be chosen Consuls, and that when they should be in office, he should do and appoint what he thought good, having the young man at his commandement, who desired no more but the honour onely of the name. Caesar himself confessed afterwards, that being afraid he should have been utterly cast away, to have been left alone he finely served his turne by Cicero's ambition, having perswaded him to require the Consulship through the helpe and assistance that he would give him. But there was Cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a young man, when he was contented to sue for the Consulship in his behalfe, and to make the Senate agreeable to it: wherefore his friends presently reproveth him for it, and shortly after he perceived he had undone himselfe, and together also lost the liberty of his Country. For this young man Octavius Caesar being growne to be very great by his meanes and procurement, when he saw that he had the Consulship upon him, he forsooke Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then joining his Army with theirs, he divided the Empire of ROME with them, as if it had been lands left in common between them: and besides that, there was a bill made of two hundred men and upwards, whom they had appointed to be flaine. But the greatest difficulty and difference that fell out between them, was about the out-lawing of Cicero. For Antonius would hearken to no peace between them, unless Cicero were flaine first of all: Lepidus was also in the same mind with Antonius: but Caesar was against them both. Their meeting was by the City of BOLOGNA, where they continued three dayes together, they three onely secretly consulting in a place environed about with a little River. Some say that Caesar stucke hard with Cicero the two first dayes, but at the third that he yielded and forsooke him. The exchange they agreed upon between them, was this. Caesar forsooke Cicero: Lepidus, his owne brother Paulus: and Antonius Lucius Caesar his Uncle by mothers side. Such place took wrath in them, as they regarded no kindred nor blood: and to speak more properly, they shewed that no brute or savage beast is so cruell as man, if with his licentiousnesse he have liberty to execute his will. While these matters were a brewing, Cicero was at a house of his in the Country, by the City of THUSCULUM, having at home with him also his brother Q. Cicero. Newes being brought them thither of these proscriptions of out-lawries, appointing men to be flaine, they determined to go to ASTYRA, a place by the sea side where Cicero had another house, there to take sea, and from thence to go into MACEDON unto Brutus. For there ran a rumor that Brutus was very strong, and had a great power. So they caused themselves to be conveyed thither in two Litters, both of them being so weake with sorrow and griefe, that they could not otherwise have gone their wayes. As they were on their way, both the Litters going as neare to each other as they could, they bewailed their miserable estate: but Quintus chiefly, who took it most grievously.

grievously. For, remembering that he took no money with him when he came from his house, and that Cicero his brother also had very little for himself, he thought it best that Cicero should hold on his journey, whilest he himself made an errand home to fetch such things as he lacked, and so to make hast again to overtake his brother. They both thought it best so, and then tenderly embracing one another, the teares falling from their eyes, they took leave of each other. Within few dayes after, Quintus Cicero being betrayed by his own servants, unto them that made search for him, he was cruelly flaine, and his son with him. But Marcus Tullius Cicero being called into ASTYRA, and there finding a ship ready, embarked immediately, and sailed along the coast unto Mount Circe, having a good gale of wind. There the Mariners determining forthwith to make saile againe, he came ashore, either for fear of the sea, or for that he had some hope that Caesar had not altogether forsaken him: and therewithal returning towards ROME by land, he had gone about an hundred furlongs thence. But then being at a straight how to resolve, and suddainly changing his mind, he would needs be carried backe againe to the sea, where he continued all night marvellous sorrowful, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in the mind to go secretly unto Octavius Caesar's house, and to kill himself by the hearth of his Chimney, to make the furies of hell to revenge his blood: but being afraid to be intercepted by the way, and cruelly handled, he returned from that determination. Then falling into other unadvised determinations, being perplexed as he was, he put himself againe into his servants hands, to be conveyed by sea unto another place called CAPITES. There he had a very proper pleasant Summer house, where the North winds, called Etesia, do give a trimme fresh aire in the Summer season. In that place also there is a little temple dedicated unto Apollo, not far from the sea side. From thence there came a great shole of Crowes, making a marvellous noise, that came flying toward Cicero's ship, which rowed upon the shore. This shole of Crowes came and lighted upon the yard of their sail, some crying, and some pecking the cords with their bills: so that every man judged straight, that this was a signe of ill lucke at hand. Cicero notwithstanding this, came ashore, and went into his house, and laid him down to see if he could sleep. But the most part of these Crowes came and lighted upon the Chamber window where he lay, making a wonderfull great noise: and some of them got unto Cicero's bed where he lay, the clothes being cast over his head, and they never left him, till by little and little they had with their bills plucked off the clothes that covered his face. His men seeing that, and saying to themselves that they were too vile beasts, if they would tarry to see their master flaine before their eyes (considering that brute beasts had care to save his life, seeing him so unworthily intreated) and that they should not do the best they could to save his life: partly by intreaty, and partly by force, they put him againe into his Litter to carry him to the sea. But in the mean time came the murders appointed to kill him. Herennius a Centurion, and Popilius Lena, Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand men, whose cause Cicero had once pleaded before the Judges, when he was accused for the murder of his owne father) having souldiers attending upon them. So Cicero's gate being shut, they entred the house by force, and missing him, they asked them of the house what was become of him. They answered they could not tell. Howbeit, there was a young boy in the house called Philologus, a slave infranchised by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought up in the Latine tongue, and had taught him the liberal Sciences: he told this Herennius that his servants carried him in a Litter towards the sea, through darke narrow lanes, shadowed with wood on either side. Popilius the Colonell taking some souldiers with him, ran about on the outside of the lanes to take him at his coming out of them: and Herennius on the other side entred the lanes. Cicero hearing him coming, commanded his men to set down his Litter, and raking his beard in his left hand, as his manner was, he stoutly looked the murderers in the faces, his head and beard being all white, and his face leane and wrinkled, for the extreme sorrows he had taken: diverse of them that were by, held their hands before their eyes, whilest Herennius did cruelly murder him. So Cicero being threefore and four years of age, thrust his necke out of the Litter, and had his head cut off by Antonius commandement, and his hands also, which wrote the Orations (called the Philippians) against him. For so did Cicero call the Orations he wrote against him, for the malice he bare him: and they do yet continue the same name until this present time. When these poore dismembered members were brought to ROME, Antonius by chance was busily occupied at that time about the election of certaine Officers: who when he heard of them and saw them, he cried out aloud, that now all his outlawries and proscriptions were executed: and thereupon commanded his head and his hands should straight be set up over the pulpit for Orations, in the place called Rostra. This was a fearful and horrible sight unto the ROMANES, who thought they saw not Cicero's face, but an image of Antonius life and disposition: who among so many wicked deeds as he committed, yet he did one Act onely that had some shew of goodnesse, which was this. He delivered Philologus into the hands of Pomponia, the wife of Quintus Cicero: and when she had him, besides other cruell torments she made him abide, she compelled him to cut his owne flesh off by little morfels, and to broile them, and then to eat them. Some Historiographers do thus report it: but Tyro who was a slave infranchised by Cicero, made no mention of the treason of this Philologus. Howbeit I understand that Caesar Augustus long time after that, went one day to see one of his Nephewes, who had a booke in his hand of Cicero's: and he fearing lest his Uncle would be angry to find that booke in his hands, thought to hide it under his Gowne. Caesar saw it, and took it from him, and read the most part of it standing, and then delivered it to the young boy, and said unto him: He was a wise man indeed, my childe, and loved his Country well. After he had flaine Antonius, being Consul, he made Cicero's son

arts do agree and differ.

HO first likened Arts to our Senses, seemeth to have respected especially that one property of them both, in receiving objects of contrary quality: for, in the use and end of their operation, there is great difference. The Senses receive indifferently, without discretion and judgement, white and blacke, sweet and fowre, soft and hard: for their office is onely to admit their severall objects, and to carry and referre the judgement thereof to the common sense. But Arts being the perfection of reason, receive and allow those things only which make for their operation, regarding and eschewing the contraries. The one chiefly, and for use: the other by way, and with intent to avoide them. So Physicke dealeth with diseases, Musicke with discords, to the end to remove them, and worke their contraries. And the great Ladies of all other Arts, Temperance, Justice, and Wisdom, do not onely consider honesty, uprightness, and profit: but examine withall, the nature and effects of leudnesse, corruption and damage. And innocency, which vaunteth her want of experience in undue practises, men call simplicity, and ignorance of things that be necessary and good to be known. And therefore the ancient MACEDONIANS in their solemne feasts forced their ILOTES the bondmen, to overcharge themselves with Wine: and such they shewed them unto their youth, by their apparent beaflinesse of drunken men, to worke in them an abhorring of so loathsome vice. Wherein although I cannot much praise them for humanity or wisdom, that corrupt and spoile one man, by example of him, to correct and reclaime another: yet (as I hope) it shall not be reprehended in me, if amongst the rest I put in one or two paire of such, as living in great place and account, have increased their fame with infamy. Which in truth, I do not, to please and draw on the Reader with variety of report, but as Ismenias the THEBAN Musician shewed his Scholars, both those that strake a clean stroke, with, Do so: and such as bungled it, with, Do not so: and Antigenidas thought men should like better, and with great desire contend for skill, if they heard and discerned untunable notes: so think I, we shall be the forwarder in reading and following the good, if we know the lives, and see the deformity of the wicked. This treaty containeth the lives of Demetrius, surnamed the Fort-gainer, and M. Anthony the Triumvir, and great examples to confirme the saying of Plato: That from great minds both great vertues and great vices do proceed. They were both given over to women and wine, both valiant and liberal, both sumptuous and high minded: for fortune served them both alike, not onely in the course of their lives, in attempting great matters, sometimes with good, sometime with ill successe, in getting and losing things of great consequence, overthrowing both when they feared not, restoring both when they hoped not: but also in their end there was no great difference, the one brought to his death by his mortal enemies, and the others fortune not so much unlike. But now to our history. Antigonus had two two sonnes by his wife Stratonice, the daughter of Corraus, the one of them he named Demetrius, and the other Philip after his fathers name. Thus far the most writers do agree: howbeit some hold Demetrius opinion, that Demetrius was not the sonne of Antigonus, but his Nephew. But because his father remeined leaving him a child, and that his mother was straight married again unto Antigonus, thereupon came the report that he was Antigonus son. Howsoever it was, Philip, that was not much younger then Demetrius, died. Now for Demetrius, though he was a very bigge man, he was nothing to high as his father, but yet so passing and wonderfull faire, that no Painter could possibly draw his picture and counterfeite to his likeness. For they saw a sweet countenance, mixed with a kind of gravity in his face, a fear with courtesie, and an incomparable Princely Majesty accompanied with a lively spirit and youth; and his wit and manners were such, that they were both fearful, and pleasant unto men that frequented him. For as he was most pleasant in company having leisure, and most given to banqueting, pleasant life, and more wantonly given to follow lust and pleasure, then any King that ever was: so was he alwayes very careful and diligent in dispatching matters of importance. And therefore he marvelously commended, and also endeavoured to follow Dionysius (as much to say, as Bacchus) above all the other gods, as he that had been a wife and valiant Capitaine in war, and that in peace invented and used all the pleasure that might be. He marvelously loved and revered his father, and it seemeth that the dutifullnesse he shewed unto his mother, was more to discharge the due obedience and duty of a sonne, then otherwise to entertaine his father, for fear of his power, or hope to be his heire. And for prooffe hereof we reade, that one day as he came home from hunting, he went unto his father Antigonus, giving audience to certaine Ambassadors; and after he had done his duty to him, and kissed him, he sate down by him even as he came from hunting, having his darts in his hand, which he carried out a hunting with him. Then Antigonus calling the Ambassadors aloud as they went their way, having received their answer: My Lords, said he, you shall carry home this report of my sonne and me, be witnesses I pray you, how we live one with another. As meaning to shew thereby that the agreement betwixt the father and the sonne together, is a great safety to the affaires of a King, as also a manifest prooffe of his greatnesse: so jealous is a King to have a companion, besides the hate and mistrust it should breed. So that the greatest Prince and most ancientest of all the successors of Alexander, boasted, that he stood not in fear of his sonne, but did suffer him to sit by him, having a dart in his hand. So was this house onely of all other the MACEDONIAN Kings, least defiled with such villany, many successions after: and to confesse a troth, in all Antigonus race there was not one but Philip onely, that slew his owne sonne. But we have many examples of diverse other houses of Kings, that have put their sonnes, wives, and mothers to death: and for their brethren, it was an ordinary thing with them to kill them, and never flinke at it. For like as Geometricians would have men grant them certain propositions which they suppose, without proof: even so was this holden for a generall rule, to kill their brethren, for the safety of their estate. But further, to shew you more plainly that Demetrius was of a noble and courteous nature, and that he dearly loved his friends, we may alledge this example. Mithridates the sonne of Ariobarzanes, was his familiar friend and companion (for they were both in manner of an age) and he commonly followed Antigonus Court, and never practised any villany or treason to him, neither was he thought such a man: yet Antigonus did somewhat suspect him, because of a dreame he had. He thought that being in a goodly great field, he sowed of the scrapings of gold, and that of that feed, first of all came up goodly wheat which had eares of gold: howbeit that shortly after returning that way again, he found nothing but the straw, and the eares of the wheate cut off; and that he being very angry and sorry for it, some told him, that Mithridates had cut off these golden eares, and had carried them with him into the Realme of PONT. Antigonus being marvelously troubled with this dreame, after he had made his sonne swear unto him that he would make no man alive privy to that he would tell him, he told him all his dream what he had dreamed, and therewith that he was determined to put this young man Mithridates to death. Demetrius was marvellous sorry for it, and therefore the next morning, this young noble Prince going as he was wont, to passe the time away with Mithridates, he durst not by word of mouth utter that he knew, because of his oath: howbeit, taking him aside from his other familiars when they were both together by themselves, he wrote on the ground with the end of his dart, Mithridates looking on him: Flie Mithridates. Mithridates found straight what he meant, and fled the very same night into CAPPADOCIA: and shortly after it was his destiny to fulfill Antigonus dreame. For he conquered many goodly Countries, and it was he onely that established the house of the Kingdom of PONT, the which the ROMANES afterwards overthrew, about the eighth succession. By these examples we may easily conjecture the good nature and courtesie of Demetrius. For like as the Elements (according to Empedocles opinion) are ever at strife together, but specially those that are nearest each to other: even so, though all the successors of Alexander were at continuall warres together, yet was it soonest kindled, and most cruel between them which bordered nearest unto each other, and that by being near neighbours had alwayes occasion of brawle together, as fell out at that time between Antigonus and Protony. This Antigonus lay most commonly in the Country of PHRYGIA: who having intelligence that Protony was gone into CYPRUS, and that he over-ranne all SYRIA, winning by force, or faire meanes, all the Townes and Cities subject unto him, he sent his sonne Demetrius thither, being at that time but two and twenty yeares of age; and it was the first time that ever he tooke charge, as General to his father, in matters of great importance. But he being a young man, and that had no skill of warres, fighting a battel with an old soldier (trained up in the discipline of warres under Alexander the Great, and that through him, and in his name, had fought many great battels) was soon overthrowne, and his Army put to flight, by the City of GAZA. At which overthrow were slaine five thousand men, and almost eight thousand taken: and besides, Demetrius lost his Tents and Pavilions, his gold and silver, and to be short all his whole carriage. But Ptolemy sent him all his things againe, and his friends also that were taken after the battel, with great courteous words: that he would not fight with them for all things together, but onely for honour and Empire, Demetrius receiving them at his hands, befought the gods that he might not long live a debtor unto Ptolemy for his great courtesie, but that he might quickly requite it with the like againe. Now Demetrius tooke not this overthrow like a young man though it was his first souldier-fare: but like an old and wife Captain that had abidden many overthrowes, he used great diligence to gather men againe, to make new Armors, and to keep the Cities and Countries in his hands under obedience, and did traine and exercise his souldiers in armes, whom he had gathered together. Antigonus having newes of the overthrow of his son Demetrius, said no more, but that Ptolemy had overcome beardless men: and that afterwards he should fight with bearded men. But now, because he would not discourage his sonne altogether, who craved leave once againe to fight a battell with Ptolemy, he granted him. So, shortly after came Cilles, Ptolemies General, with a great puissant Army, to drive him altogether out of SYRIA: for they made no great account of Demetrius, because he had been once overthrowne before. Howbeit Demetrius stole upon him, gave him charge on the suddaine, and made him so afraid, that he tooke both the Campe and the General, with seven thousand prisoners besides, and wanne a marvellous treasure of money: which made him a glad man, not so much for the gaine he should have by it, as for the opportunity he had thereby to come out of Ptolemies debt; nothing regarding the treasure nor the honour he had gotten by this victory, but onely the benefit of his requital of Ptolemies courtesie towards him. But yet he did nothing of his own head, before he had written to his father: and then receiving full grant and commission from him to dispose of all things as he thought good, he sent back Cilles unto Ptolemy, and all his other friends besides, with great and rich gifts which he bountifully bestowed on them. This misfortune and overthrow did utterly put Ptolemy out of all SYRIA, and brought Antigonus also from the City of CELENE, for the exceeding joy he had of this victory, as also for the great desire he had to see his son. After that he sent Demetrius into ARABIA, against a people called the NABATHENIANS, to conquer them: but there he was in great danger and distresse in the deserts for lacke of water, howbeit he never shewed any signe that he was afraid. Thereby he so astonished the barbarous people, that he had leisure enough to retire with safety, and with a great booty of a thousand Camels, which he brought away with him. About that time Seleucus (whom Antigonus had driven from BABYLON) returning thither againe, he came and conquered it without other aide then of himself: and went with a great Army against the people and Nations confining upon the INDIES, and the Provinces adjoining unto mount Caucasus, to conquer them. Thereupon Demetrius hoping to finde MESOPOTAMIA without any guard or defence, suddainly passed over the River of Euphrates, and came unlooked for unto BABYLON, and there distressed the Garrison of Seleucus, that kept one of the Castles or Citadels of the City, being two of them: and then putting in seven thousand souldiers to keep them, he commanded the rest of his men to get what they could, and to bring it away with them. After that he marched towards the sea to returne home, leaving thereby the Realme and Kingdom of Seleucus in better state and safety, then it was when he invaded it. For it appeared that he had taken all the Country from Seleucus, leaving him nothing in it, by spoiling and forraging all that was there. At this returne home, newes was brought him that Ptolemy lay at the siege of the City of HALICARNASSUS: whereupon he drew thither with speed to make him raise the siege, and thereby saved the City from him. Now because by this exploit they wan great fame, both of them (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a marvellous desire to set all GREECE at liberty, the which Ptolemy and Cassander kept in servitude and bondage. Never King tooke in hand a more honourable, nor juster warre and enterprise, then that was. For what power or riches he could gather together, in oppressing of the barbarous people; he bestowed it all in restoring the GRECIANS to their liberty; and onely to winne fame and honour by it. So, they being in consultation what way to take, to bring their purpose and desire to passe, and having taken order to begin first at ATHENS, one of Antigonus chiefe friends about him, told him, that he should take the City, and place a good Garrison there for themselves, if they could once win it: for (said he) it will be a good bridge to passe further into all GREECE. Antigonus would not hearken to that, but said, that the love and good will of men was a surer bridge, and that the City of ATHENS was as a Beacon to all the land, the which would immediately make his doings shine through the world, as a Cresset light, upon the top of a keep or watch-tower. Thus Demetrius hoisted saile, having five thousand silver talents, and a Fleet of two hundred and fifty saile, and sailed towards the City of ATHENS: in the which Demetrius PHALERIAN was Governour in the behalf of Cassander, and kept a strong Garrison there within the Haven and Castle of MUNYCHIA. He had an excellent good wind to further his journey, so that with this good foresight and speed he made, he arrived in the Haven of PIRÆA, the five and twentieth day of the month Thargelion (now called May) before any man knew of his coming. Now when this Fleet was within a kenning of the City, and lesse, that they might easily see them from thence, every man prepared himselfe to receive them, taking them to be Ptolemies ships. But in fine, the Captaines and Governours understanding too late who they were, did what they could to helpe themselves: but they were all in hurly burly, as men compelled to fight out of order, to keep their enemies from landing, and to repulse them, coming

ing so suddainly upon them. Demetrius having found the barre of the Haven open, launched in presently. Then being come to the view of them all, and standing upon the hatches of his Galley, he made signes with his hand, that he prayed silence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaimed aloud by one of his Heraulds, that his father had sent him in a happy houre to deliver the ATHENIANS from all their Garrisons, and to restore them againe to their ancient liberty and freedom, to enjoy their lawes and ancient government of their forefathers. After the proclamation made, all the common people straight threw downe their weapons and Targets at their feet, to clap their hands with great shouts of joy: praying him to land, and calling him aloud, their Saviour, and benefactor. Now for them that were with Demetrius PHALERIAN, they all thought good to let the stronger in, although he performed not that he promised, and also sent Ambassadors unto him to treat of peace. Demetrius received them very courteously, and sent with them for pledge, one of the dearest friends his father had, Arifodemus MILESIAN. Furthermore, he was not carelesse of the health and safety of Demetrius PHALERIAN, who by reason of the change and alteration of the Government of the Common-wealth of ATHENS, stood more in fear of the people of ATHENS, then of his enemies. Therefore Demetrius regarding the fame and vertue of the man, caused him to be conveyed (according to his desire) unto THEBES, with good and sufficient safe conduct. And for Demetrius himselfe, although he was very desirous to see the City, he said he would not come into it, before he had first restored it unto her ancient liberty and freedom, and also driven away the Garrison thence: and thereupon he cast trenches round about the Castle of MUNYCHIA. In the mean season because he would not be idle, he hoisted saile, and coasted towards the City of MEGARA, within the which Cassander also kept a strong Garrison. Demetrius busily following these matters, was advertised that Cratespolis, surnamed Polyperchon (who had been Alexanders wife) a Ladie of passing fame and beauty, and lay at that time in the City of PATRAS, would be glad to see him, he leaving his Army within the Territory of the MEGARIANS, took his journey presently unto her, with a few of his lightest armed men; and yet he stole from them, and made his Tent to be set up a good way from them, because this Ladie might not be seen, when she came unto him. Some of his enemies having present intelligence thereof, came and set upon him before he knew it. Demetrius was so scared, that he had no further leisure, but to cast an ill-favoured cloake about him, the first that came to hand, and disguising himself to flee for life, and escaped very hardly, that he was not shamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinency. But though they missed him, they took his tent and all his money in it. After that, the City of MEGARA was taken and won from Cassanders men, where Demetrius souldiers would have sacked all: howbeit the ATHENIANS made humble intercession for them, that they might not be spoiled. Demetrius thereupon, after that he had driven out Cassanders Garrison, he restored it againe to her former liberty. In doing that, he called to mind the Philosopher Stilpo, a famous man in MEGARA, though he lived a quiet and contemplative life. He sent for him, and asked him if any of his men had taken any thing of his. Stilpo answered him, they had not: for (quoth he) I saw no man that took my learning from me. This notwithstanding, all the slaves of the City were in a manner carried away. Another time, Demetrius making much of him, as he was going his way, said unto him. Well, Stilpo, I leave you your City free. It is true, O King (quoth he) for thou hast left us never a slave. Shortly after, he returned againe unto ATHENS, and laid siege to the Castle of Munychia, the which he took, and drave out the Garrison, and afterwards razed it to the ground. After that, through the intreaty and earnest desire of the ATHENIANS, who prayed him to come and refresh himself in their City, he made his entry into it, and caused all the people to assemble, and then restored unto them their ancient Lawes and Liberty of their Country; promising them besides, that he would procure his father to send them an hundred and fifty thousand bushels of Wheat, and as much wood and timber as should serve to make them an hundred and fifty Gallies. Thus the ATHENIANS, through Demetrius meanes, recovered the Democratia againe (to wit, their popular government) fifteen yeares after they had lost it, and lived all the time between their losse and restitution from the warre called Lamachus warre, and the battell that was fought by the City of CRANON, in the State of Oligarchia, to wit, under the government of a few governours in sight, but in truth a Monarchy or Kingdom, because they were under the government of one man Demetrius PHALERIAN that had an absolute authority over them. But by this meanes they made their saviour and preserver of their Country, Demetrius (who seemed to have obtained such honour and glory through his goodnesse and liberality) hateful and odious to all men, for the over-great and unmeasurable honors which they gave him. For first of all, they called Antigonus and Demetrius Kings, who before that time had alwayes refused the name, and the which (among all other princely honors and prerogatives granted) they that had divided between them the Empire of Philip and Alexander, durst never once presume to challenge nor to take upon them. So unto them onely they gave the stile and names of the gods favours, and took away their yearly Major, whom they called Eponymos, because they did shew the yeares of old time by the names of them that had been Majors. Furthermore, in stead thereof they ordained in the Council of the City, that there should yearly be chosen one by voices of the people, whom they should name the Priest of their favours, whose name they should write and subscribe in all publike grants and covenants, to shew the year: and besides all this, that they should cause their pictures to be drawn in the veile or holy banner, in the which were set out the images of their gods, the Patrons and Protectors of their City. And furthermore they did consecrate the place where Demetrius first came out of his Coach, and there did set up an Altar, and called it Demetrius Altar

Altar coming out of his Coach: and unto their tribes they added two other, the ANTI-GONIDES and the DE-METRIADES. Their great councill at large, which they created yearly of five hundred men, was then first of all brought unto six hundred, because every tribe must needs furnish of themselves fifty Counsellors. But yet the strangest act, and most new-found invention of flattery, was that of Stratocles (being the common flatterer and people-pleaser) who put forth this decree, by the which it was ordained: That those whom the Common-wealth should send unto Antigonus and Demetrius, should in stead of Ambassadors be called Theoroi, as much to say, as, Ministers of the Sacrifices. For so were they called, whom they sent to DELPHES to Apollo Pythias, or unto ELIDE to Jupiter Olympias, at the common and solemne feasts of all GREECE, to do the ordinary sacrifices and oblations for the health and preservation of the Cities. This Stratocles in all things else was a desperate man, and one that had alwayes led a wicked and dissolute life: and for his shamelesse boldnesse, he seemed wholly to defend the steps of Cleons foole-hardinesse and old insolency, which (when he lived) he shewed unto the people. He openly kept a harlot in his house, called Phylacion. One day he having bought for his supper, beastes heads and neckes commonly eaten, he said unto her: Why, how now? thou hast bought me acates which we toss like balls, that have to do in the Common-wealth. Another time when the Army of the ATHENIANS was overthrown by sea, by the Isle of AMORGOS, he would needs prevent the news of this overthrow, and came through the street of Ceranicus crowned with Garlands of flowers, as if the ATHENIANS had won the barrel: and was also the author of a decree whereby they did sacrifice unto the gods, to give them thanks for the victory; and meat was given amongst every tribe, in token of common joy. But shortly after the messengers arrived, which brought report of the shipwracke and overthrow. The people were in an uproar withal, and sent for Stratocles in a marvellous rage. But he with a face of brasse came unto them, and arrogantly defended the peoples ill will, and angrily told them: well, and what hurt have I done you, if I have made you merry these two dayes? Such was Stratocles impudency and rashnesse. But, as the Poet Aristophanes saith:

*But hotter matters were that time in hand,
Then fire that wasteth both by sea and land.*

For there was another that passed Stratocles in knavery, who procured a decree, that as often as Demetrius came into the City of ATHENS, he should be received with all ceremonies and like solemnity, as they use in the feasts of Ceres and Bacchus: and further, that they should give unto him that did excell all the rest in sumptuousnesse and riches at such time as Demetrius made his entry into the City, so much money out of the common treasure as should serve to make an image or other offering, which should be consecrated to the Temples in memory of his liberality. And last of all, they changed the name of the moneth Munichion (to wit, the moneth of January) and called it Demetrian: and the last day of the moneth, which they called before, The new a and old Moone, they then called it the Demetriad: and the feasts of Bacchus also, called then Dionysia, they presently named Demetria. But the gods by divers signes and tokens shewed plainly, that they were offended with these changes and alterations. For the holy banner: in the which (according to the order set downe) they had painted the images of Antigonus and Demetrius, with the pictures of Jupiter and Minerva, as they carried it a procession through the Street Ceranicus, it was torne asunder in the middest by a tempest of wind. And furthermore, about the Altars which were set up in the honour of Demetrius and Antigonus, there grew a great deale of Hemlocke, the which otherwise was impossible to grow there. On the feast day also of Bacchus, they were compelled to leave the pompe or procession for that day, it was such an extreme hard frost out of all season: and besides, there fell such a mil-dew and great frost upon it, that not onely their Vines and Olives were killed with it, but also the most part of the Wheat blades which were newly sprung up. And therefore the Poet Philippides (an enemy of the foresaid Stratocles) in one of his Comedies writeth certaine verses against him to this effect:

*The party for whose wickednesse the veile was rent in twaine,
Which with the honour due to God did worship men most vaine,
Is he for whom our budding Vines were blasted with the frost,
Those things and not our Comedies have us so deavly cost.*

This Philippides was very well beloved of King Lyfimachus, inasmuch that for his sake the King had done many pleasures to the Common-wealth of ATHENS. For he loved him so dearly, that as often as he saw him, or met with him at the beginning of any war, or matter of great importance, he was of opinion that he brought him good lucke. For indeed he did not so much esteeme him for the excellency of his art, but he was much more to be beloved and esteemed for his vertuous and honest conditions. He was no troublesome man, neither was he infected with the fineness of Courts, as he shewed one day when the King made much of him, and giving him good countenance, said unto him: What wilt thou have me give thee of my things Philippides? Even what it shall please thee, O King, so it be none of thy secrets. Thus much we thought good to speak of him in by-talke, because an honest Player of Comedies should match with a shamelesse and impudent Orator of the people. But yet there was another Democles, of the village of SPHETTUS, that dreamed out a more strange kind of honour, touching the consecration of their Targets, which they dedicated to the Temple of Apollo in DELPHES, that is to say, that they should go and aske the Oracle of Demetrius. But I will shew you the very effect and forme of the law, as it was set down. In good hour, the people ordaine that he should be chosen one of the Citizens of ATHENS, which shall go unto our favour: and after that he hath done due sacrifice unto him, he shall aske Demetrius our favour, after what sort the people shall with greatest holinesse and devotion, without delay, make consecration of their holiest gifts and offerings: and according to the Oracle it shall please him to give them, the people shall duely execute it. Thus laying upon Demetrius all these foolish mockeries, who besides was no great wiseman, they made him a very fool. Demetrius being at that time at leisure in ATHENS, he married a widow called Eurydice, which came of that noble and ancient house of Miltiades, and had been married before unto one Opeltas Prince of the CYRENIANS, and after his death returned againe to ATHENS. The ATHENIANS were very glad of this marriage, and thought it the greatest honour came to their City, supposing he had done it for their sakes. Howbeit he was loone wonne to be married, for he had many wives, but amongst them all he loved Phila best, and gave her most honour and preeminence above them all, partly for the respect of her father Antipater; and also for that he had been first married unto Craterus, whom the MACEDONIANS loved best when he lived, and most lamented after his death above all the other successors of Alexander. His father, I suppose, made him to marry her by force, although indeed her yeers was not meet for him: for he was marvellous young, and the very old. And when Demetrius seemed not to be contented withall, his father rounded him softly in the eare with this saying:

*Refuse no Woman nere so old, Whose marriage bringeth store of gold.
Wherein he cunningly alluded to these verses of Eurypides.
Refuse not to become a thrall,
Where lucre may ensue withall.*

But so much did Demetrius honour his wife Phila, and all his other wives he married, that he was not ashamed to keep a number of Curtizans, and other mens wives besides: so that he onely of all other Kings in his time, was most detected with this vice of lecherie. While these things passed on in this sort, he was commanded by his father to fight with Ptolomy for the Realme of CYPRUS. So there was no remedy but he must needs obey him, although otherwise he was very sorry to leave the warre he had begun, to let the GRECIANS at liberty, the which had been far more honourable and famous. Howbeit, before he departed from ATHENS, he sent unto Cleonides Ptolomies General, that kept the Cities of CORINTH and SYCONE, to offer him money if he would set their Cities at liberty. But Cleonides would not be dealt withall that way. Thereupon Demetrius straightway took sea, and sailed with all his Army towards CYPRUS, where at his first coming he overcame Mene-laus Ptolomies brother. But shortly after, Ptolomy went thither in person with a great Army both by sea and land, and there passed betwixt them fierce threatnings and proud words to each other. For Ptolomy sent to Demetrius to bid him depart if he were wise, before all his Army came together: which would tread him under their feet, and march upon his belly if he tarried their coming. Demetrius on the other side sent him word, he would do him this favour to let him escape, if he would sweare and promise unto him to withdraw his Garrisons which he had in the Cities of CORINTH and SYCONE. So the expectation of this battell made these two Princes not onely very pensive to fight one with the other, but also all the other Lords, Princes, and Kings: because the successe thereof was uncertaine, which of them two should prevail. But every man judged this, that which of them obtained the victory, he should not onely be Lord of the Realme of CYPRUS and SYRIA, but therewith also of greater power than all the rest. Ptolomy in person with fifty saile began to row against his enemy Demetrius, and commanded his brother Mene-laus, that when he saw them fast grapled in fight together, he should launch out of the haven of SALAMINA, and give charge upon the rereward of Demetrius ships, to breake their order, with the threescore Gallies he had in charge. Demetrius on the other side prepared ten Gallies against these threescore, thinking them enow to choke up the havens mouth being but narrow, so that none of the Gallies that were within could come out: and furthermore, he dispersed his Army by land upon the foreland points which reach unto the sea, and went himselfe into the maine sea with nine score Gallies, and gave such a fierce charge upon Ptolomy, that heavily made him flie. Who when he saw his Army broken, fled as speedily as he could with eight Gallies onely: for all the rest were either broken or sunke in fight, and those eight onely escaped, besides threescore and ten which were taken, and all their fouldiers in them. And as for his carriage, his traine, his friends, his officers and household servants, his wives, his gold and silver, his armour, engines of battery, and all such other warlike furniture and munition as was conveyed aboard his caricks and great ships riding at Anchor: of all these things nothing escaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his Campe. Among those spoiles also was taken that famous Curtizan Lamia, who at the first had her name onely for her passing playing upon the flute: but after she fell to Curtizan trade, her countenance and credit increased the more. So that even then when her beauty through yeares fell to decay, and that she found Demetrius much younger then her self, yet she so wanne him with her sweet conversation and good grace, that he only liked her, and all the other women liked him. After this victory by sea, Mene-laus made no more resistance, but yeelded up SALAMINA and his ships unto Demetrius, and put into his hands also twelve hundred horsemen, and twelve thousand footmen well armed. This so famous and triumphant victory was yet much more beautified by Demetrius great bounty and goodnesse, which he shewed in giving his enemies slaine in battell honourable funerals, setting the prisoners at liberty without ranfome paying, and giving moreover twelve hundred compleat armors unto the ATHENI-

Aristodemus a notorious flatterer in Antigonus Court.

The first time Antigonus and Demetrius were called Kings.

Note the force of flattery by Aristodemus Milesian. Antigonus and Demetrius journey against Ptolemy.

Antigonus smiteth with his sonne Demetrius.

ANS. After this Demetrius sent Aristodemus Milesian unto his father Antigonus, to tell him by word of mouth the news of this victory. Aristodemus was the greatest flatterer in all Antigonus Court, who devised then (as it seemeth to me) to adde unto this exploit the greatest flattery possible. For when he had taken land after he was come out of the Isle of Cyprus, he would in no wise have the ship he came in, to come neare the shoare, but commanded them to ride at Anchor, and no man so hardy to leave the ship: but he himself got into a little boat, and went unto Antigonus, who all this while was in a marvellous fear and perplexity for the successe of this battell, as men may easily judge they are which hope after so great uncertainties. Now when word was brought him that Aristodemus was coming to him all alone, then was he worse troubled then afore, inasmuch that he could scant keep within doors himself, but sent his servants and friends one after another to meet Aristodemus, to aske him what newes, and to bring him word presently again how the world went. But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on still faire and softly with a sad countenance, and very demurely, speaking never a word. Wherefore Antigonus heart being cold in his belly, he could stay no longer, but would himself go and meet with Aristodemus at the gate, who had a marvellous preface of people following of him, besides those of the Court which ranne out to heare his answer. At length when he came neare unto Antigonus, holding out his right hand unto him, he cried out aloud: God save thee, O King Antigonus: we have overcome King Ptolemy in battell by sea, and have won the Realme of Cyprus, with sixteen thousand and eight hundred prisoners. Then answered Antigonus: And God save thee too. Truly Aristodemus thou hast kept us in a trance a good while, but to punish thee for the paine thou hast put us to, thou shalt the later receive the reward of thy good newes. Then was the first time that the people with a loud voice called Antigonus and Demetrius Kings. Now for Antigonus, his friends and familiars did at that instant put on the royal band or Diademe upon his head: but for Demetrius, his father sent it unto him, and by his letters called him King. They also that were in Egypt with Ptolemy, understanding that, did call and salute him by the name of King: because it should not seem that for one overthrow received, their hearts were dead. Thus this ambition by jealousie and emulation went from man to man to all Alexanders successors. For Lysimachus then also began to weare the Diademe, and likewise Seleucus, as often as he spake with the Grecians: for before that time, he dealt in matters with the barbarous people as a King. But Cassander, though others wrote themselves Kings, he onely subscribed after his wonted manner. Now this was not onely an increase of a new name, or changing of apparel, but it was such an honour, as it lift up their hearts, and made them stand upon themselves: and besides, it so framed their manner of life and conversation with them, that they grew more proud and lately then ever they were before: like unto common Players of Tragedies, who apparelling themselves to play their parts upon the Stage, do change their gate, their countenance, their voice, their manner of sitting at the table, and their talke also. So that afterwards they grew more cruel in commanding their subjects, when they had once taken away the vizor and dissimulation of their absolute power, which before made them farre more lowly and gentle in many matters unto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought such a wonderful change in the world. Antigonus therefore puffed up with the glory of the victory of his sonne Demetrius, for the conquest of Cyprus, he determined forthwith to set upon Ptolemy. Himselfe led the Army by land, having his son Demetrius still rowing by the shore side with a great Fleete of ships. But one of his familiars called Medius, being asleep, had a vision one night that told him, what should be the end and successe of this journey. He thought he saw Antigonus runne with all his Army, who should have the upper hand; and that at the first he ranne with great force and swiftnesse, but that afterwards his strength and breath failed him so much, that when he should return, he had scant any pulse or breath, and with much ado retired againe. And even so it chanced unto him. For Antigonus by land was easiesoones in great danger: and Demetrius also by sea was often in hazard to leave the coast, and by storme and weather to be cast into places where was neither haven, creekes, nor harborough for ships. And at length having lost a great number of his ships, he was driven to return without any attempt given. Now Antigonus was at that time little lesse then fourescore yeares old, but yet his fat and corpulent body was more comberfome to him then his yeares: therefore being grown unmeet for wars, he used his sonne in his place. Who for that he was fortunate, as also skilful through the experience he had gotten, did wisely govern the weightiest matters. His father besides did not passe for his youthful parts, lavish expences and common drunkennesse he gave himself unto. For in time of peace, he was given over to all these vices: but in time of warre, he was as sober and continent as any man so borne by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamia being manifestly known to be mistresse over him, one day when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kisse his father: and that Antigonus smiling upon him, said: What, how now son, dost thou think thou art kissing of Lamia? Another time Demetrius was many dayes together drinking and ryoting, and saw not his father: and then to excuse himself unto him, he told him he had gotten a Rheume that made him keep his chamber, that he could not come to him. So I heard, said Antigonus: but was it of Thasos or Chios that Rheume? He spake of, because that in either of those two Islands, there were excellent good wines. Another time Demetrius sent his father word, that he was not well: thereupon Antigonus went to see him, and coming thither, he met a faire young boy at his door. So he went up to his chamber, and sitting down by his beds side, he took him by the hand to feel his pulse. Demetrius told him that his Feaver had left him but a little before. I know it well (said Antigonus) for I met the young boy even at the door as I came in. So Antigonus did gently bear with his sons faults, in respect of the many many other vertues he had. The voice goeth, that the Scythians, when they are disposed to drinke drunke together, do divers times twang the strings of their bowes, as though that would serve to keep the strength of their courage and hardinesse, which otherwise the pleasantnesse of the wine would take from them. But Demetrius gave himself to one thing onely at one selfe time: sometime to take his pleasure, sometime to deal in matters of weight; and in all extremity he ever used but one of them, and would never mingle the one with the other: and yet this notwithstanding, he was no lesse politicke and circumspect to prepare all manner of munition for wars. For as he was a wife Capitaine to lead an Army, so was he also very careful to provide all things meet for their furniture, and would rather have too much then too little. But above all, he exceeded in sumptuous building of ships, and framing of all sorts of engines of battery, and especially for the delight he tooke to invent and devise them. For he had an excellent natural wit to devise such works as are made by wit and hand, and did not bestow his wit and invention in handy-crafts, in trifling toys and bables: as many other Kings that have given themselves to play on Flutes, others to paint and draw, and others also to Turners craft. As Eriopis King of Macedonia, who delighted to make fine tables and pretty lamps. And as Hellebore, Lingwort, or Bears-foot, Hofsynamum, Henbane, Cicuta, Hemlocke, Aconitum, Libardaine or Wolfe-baine, and Dorycnium: for the which we have no English word: all these would he set himself with his own hands in the Gardens of his owne Pallace, and also gather them in time of the yeare, to know the vertue and power of them. Or as Asaces the Kings of PARTHIA, that boasted they could themselves make their Arrowes heads, and sharpen them. But the Artificers workes which Demetrius practised, shewed that they came from a King. For his manner of workmanship had a certaine greatnesse in it, the which even with the subtilty and finenesse of his workes, shewed the trimme handling of the workman: so that they appeared not onely worthy the understanding and riches of a King, but also the forging and making by the hands of a great King. For his friends did not onely wonder at their greatnesse, but his very enemies also were delighted with the beauty of them. And this is more true then meete to be spoken: the enemies could not but marvel when they saw his Galleys rowing along the coast, with fiftene or sixtene bankes of Oares: and his Engines of battery which they called Elepolis (as much to say, Engines to take Cities) were a spectacle of great admiration unto those whom he besieged, as the events following did thoroughly witnesse. For Lysimachus, who of all other Kings did malice Demetrius most, coming to raise the siege from the City of SOLI in CILICIA, the which Demetrius besieged, he sent unto him to pray him to let him see his Engines of battery, and his Galleys rowing upon the sea. Demetrius granting him, Lysimachus returning with wonderful admiration. The RHODIANS also having long time defended his siege, at the last made peace with him, and prayed him to leave some one of his Engines with them, for a perpetuall testimony and remembrance both of his power, and also of their courage and valiantnesse. The cause why Demetrius made warre with the RHODIANS, was, because they were confederates with King Ptolemy: he brought against their walls the greatest Engine he had, the foote whereof was like a tile, more long then abroad, and at the base on either side it was eight and forty cubits long, and threescore and six high, rising still narrow even to the very top: so that the upper parts were narrower then the nether, and within it were many pretty roomes and places conveyed for souldiers; The forepart of it was open towards the enemy, and every room or partition had windowes, out of which they bestowed all kind of shot, because they were full of armed men fighting with all sorts of weapons. But now, because it was so well framed and counterpoised, that it gave no way, nor reeled on either side, which way soever they removed it, but that it stood fast and upright upon her foundation, making a terrible noise and found, that made the worke as wonderful to behold, as it was a marvellous pleasure for men to see it. In this warre were brought unto Demetrius two notable armors weighing forty pounds a peece, and made by one Zoilus an armorer, who to shew the hardnesse and goodnesse of the temper, suffered them to be proved and shot at, at sixscore paces, with the Engines of their battery: and albeit the armors were shot at and hit, yet were they never pierced, and but only a little race or scratch seen, as it were of a bodkin or penknife, and had no more hurt. Demetrius always wore one of them in these warres, and Alcimus ALBANIAN the other, the strongest and valiantest man he had in all his host, and that onely carried a compleat armour weighing sixscore pounds, where all other souldiers wore none above threescore. This Alcimus was slaine at RHODES, valiantly fighting by the Theater. In this siege the RHODIANS did valiantly defend themselves, that Demetrius could do no act worthy memory. This notwithstanding, although he saw he could not prevail, but lose his time, yet was he the more obstinately bent against them, to be even with them, because they had taken a ship of his, in the which his wife Phila had sent unto him certain hangings of Tapestry, Linnen, Apparell, and Letters, and because they had sent them all unto Ptolemy as soone as they had taken them. But therein they did not follow the honest courtesie of the ATHENIANS, who having intercepted certain curreurs of King Philips that made war against them, they opened all the letters they carried, and read them, saving onely his wife Olympias letters she sent him, the which they sent unto King Philips sealed, as they were when they received them. Now though this part did much grieve him and offend him, yet he could not finde in his heart to serve them in that fort, when he might have done it not long after. For by chance at that time Protogenes an excellent Painter, borne in CAUNUS, did paint the draught of the City of IALYSUS. Demetrius found this table in a house in the suburbs of the City, being almost ended. The RHODIANS thereupon sending an Herald unto him, to beseech him to spare the defacing of so goodly a worke, he returned them answer, that he would rather suffer his fathers images to be burnt, then so excellent and passing a worke as that to be lost and brought to nothing. For it is reported, that Protagenes was seven yeares drawing of the same: and it is said also that Apelles himself when he saw it, did so wonder at it, that his speech failed him, and he stood mute a long time, and at last said: Surely this a wonderfull peece of work, and of great labour, yet doth it want those graces and ornaments whereby those that I paint do reach unto heaven. This table afterwards being brought to Rome, and hanged up with others, was in the end burnt by fire. Now as the Rhodians were desirous to be rid of this warre, and that Demetrius also was willing to take an honest occasion to do it, the Ambassadors of the Athenians came happily to serve both their desires, who made peace between them with these conditions: that the Rhodians should be confederates with Antigonus and Demetrius against all men, but Ptolomy onely. The Athenians sent for Demetrius, upon Cassanders coming to lay siege to their City: whereupon Demetrius immediately hoisted saile towards Athens, with three hundred and thirty Gallies, and a great number of men of warre besides: so that he did not onely drive Cassander out of the Province of Attica, but followed him even to the straight of Thermopyles, and there overthrew him in fer battel, and received the City of Heraclea, which willingly yeelded unto him, and fixe thousand Macedonians came unto him to take his part. So in his return back, he set all the Grecians at liberty on this side the straight: he made a league with the Borotians, and took the City of Cenchrees, and the Castles of Phyle and Panactos, in the frontiers and confines of Attica, in the which Cassander had left Garrisons to keep the Country in subjection: and after he had driven them out of the Country, he rendered the forts again unto the Athenians. Therefore though it seemed the Athenians had before bestowed to their uttermost power all kinds of honours that could be offered him, every man striving for life to prefer the same, yet they found out new devices to flatter and please him. For they ordained that the place behind the temple of Minerva called Parthenon (as who would say the temple of the Virgin) should be prepared for his house to live in: and they said, that the goddesse Minerva did lodge him with her. But to say truly, he was too unchast a guest, to think that a maiden goddesse would be content he should lye with her. And yet his father Antigonus perceiving that they had lodged his son Philip in a time in a house, where there were three young women, he said nothing to Philip himself, but before he sent for the Harbinger, and said unto him: wilt thou not remove my son out of this straight lodging, and provide him of a better? And Demetrius, that should have revered the goddesse Minerva, though for no other respect but because he called her his eldest sister (for so he would the should be called) he defiled all the Cattle where was the temple of these holy virgins, with horrible and abominable insolencies, both towards young boyes of honest houses, as also unto young women of the City. So that this place seemed to be most pure and holy, at such times as he lay with his common Curtifins, Chrysis, Lamia, Demio, and Anticyra. It shall not be greatly for the honour of the City of Athens, to tell particularly all the abominable parts he committed there. But Democles vertue and honesty deserved worthy and condigne remembrance. This Democles was a young boy that had no hair on his face, of whose beauty Demetrius being informed by the surname he had, as commonly called through the City, Democles the faire, he sought diverse wayes to entice him, both by faire meanes, large promises and gifts, and also with threats besides. But when he saw no man could bring him to the bent of his bow, and that the young boy in the end seeing him so importunate upon him, came no more to the common places of exercise, where other children used to recreate themselves, and that to avoid the common stoves, he went to wash himself in another secret stowe: Demetrius watching his time and houre of going thither, followed him, and got into him being alone. The boy seeing himself alone, and that he could not resist Demetrius, tooke off the cover of the Kettle or Cauldron where the water was boiling and leaping into it drowned himself. Truly he was unworthy of so lamentable an end, but yet shewed a noble heart, worthy of his Beauty and Country. But he did not as another called Cleomenes, the sonne of Cleomenes, who brought letters from Demetrius, directed to the people, whereby through Demetrius intercession and request, his fathers fine of fifty talents in the which he was condemned (and for non-payment remained prisoner) was clearly remitted and forgiven. But by this act, he not onely shamed and dishonoured himself, but also troubled all the City. For the people thereupon released Cleomenes of his fine, but therewith they made a decree that no Citizen should thenceforth bring any more letters from Demetrius. But afterwards understanding that Demetrius was marvellously offended with this decree, they did not onely revoke their first decree, but they did also put some of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others also they banished. And further they made a law, that the people of Athens should account all religious to the gods, and just unto all men, whatsoever it pleased Demetrius to order and appoint. At that time there was one of the chiefeest men of the City, that said Stratocles was a mad man to prefer such matters. Indeed quoth Demochares surnamed Laconian, he were a mad man if he were otherwise: and he spake it because this Stratocles had many great pleasures at Demetrius hands for this flattery. Howbeit, Demochares being accused and condemned upon these words, he was banished Athens. See the Athenians how they used themselves, who seemed to be delivered from the Garrison they had before, and to be restored unto their former liberty and freedom. From thence Demetrius went into Peloponnesus, and never an enemy of his durst tarry his coming, but all fled before before him, and left him their Castles and Towns. Thus Demetrius wan unto himself all the Country called Acte, and all Archadia, saving the City of Mantineia: and for the summe of an hundred talents given amongst them, he delivered the Cities of Argos, Sicyone, and of Corinth, from the Garrisons that lay amongst them. About that time fell out the great feast of Juno in Argos, called Herea. Therefore Demetrius, to honour this feast with the Grecians, married Deidamia (the daughter of Eacides, King of the Molossians, and sister of Pyrrius) and persuaded the Sicyonians, to leave their City, and to come and build in another goodly place neare unto it, where they now do dwell: and so with the place and situation, he changed also the name of the City. For in stead of Sicyon, he made it to be called Demetriade. Then at a general assembly of the states of Greece, which was kept in the straight of Peloponnesus, called Isthmos, Demetrius was chosen Lieutenant General of all the Grecians, as Philip and Alexander (both Kings of Macedon) had been before him, unto whom he did not onely compare himself, but thought himself greater then they, because fortune smiled on him, and for that he had so good successe in all his affairs. Whereas Alexander did never take away the title and name of King from any other Kings, neither did ever call himself King of Kings, although he had given unto diverse of them the name and power of a King: and in contrary manner also, Demetrius laughed them to scorne which called any other Princes Kings but his father and himselfe. Moreover he tooke great pleasure to heare his flatterers, who being at banquets called for wine to drinke to King Demetrius, and then to Seleucus master of the Elephants, to Ptolmy Admiral, to Lysimachus keeper of the treasure, and to Agathocles Silician, governour of the Isles. All the Kings, but Lysimachus, laughed at these toys when they were reported to him: but Lysimachus was very angry, and thought great scorne that Demetrius should reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old custome commonly to give an Eunuch the charge of keeping the treasure. So Lysimachus of all other Princes did bear him most malice; and because he would finely taunt him for that he ever kept Lamia his Curtisan with him: Untill this present time, said he, I never saw harlot play in a Tragedy before. Demetrius answered him againe, that his harlot was chaster then Penelope his wife. So Demetrius departing for that time out of Peloponnesus, took his journey towards Athens, and wrote before to the Athenians, that when he came thither he would be received into the fraternity of the holy mysteries, and that he meant they should shew him at one selfe time, all that was to be seen, even from the least to the highest secrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptices, because they made the brethren of the fraternity see them long time after that they had been first received into the lesser ceremonies: the which was not lawful then, neither was ever heard of before. For these smaller mysteries, in old time were celebrated in the moneth of November, and the greater in the moneth of August: and besides it was not lawful to celebrate or use these ceremonies within the space of a yeare one of the other. When these letters were openly read, no man durst speak against them, but Pythodorus the Priest, who carried the torch lighted when they shewed these mysteries. Howbeit his words prevailed not, for by the device of Stratocles it was enacted at an assembly of the City, that the moneth of March in the which they were at that time, should be called and reputed November. And so as they could best helpe it, by their ordinances of the City they did receive Demetrius into the fraternity of the mysteries: and afterwards againe, this selfe moneth of March which they had translated into November, became suddenly August: and in the selfe same year was celebrated the other ceremony of these great mysteries, whereby Demetrius was admitted to see the most straight and secret ceremonies. Therefore Philippides the Poet inveighing against the sacriledge and impiety of Religion prophaned by Stratocles, made these verses of him:

Unto one moneth his coming hither,
Hath thrust up all the yeare together.

And afterwards because Stratocles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the Temple of Minerva within the Castle:

Of Chast Minervaes holy Church he makes a filthy stewes,
And in that Virgins very fight his harlots doth abuse.

But yet of all the insolent parts done at that time in Athens (although many were committed) none of all the rest grieved the Athenians more, then this did: that Demetrius commanded them they should presently furnish him with two hundred and fifty talents. The taxation of this payment was very hard unto them; both for the shortnesse of the time appointed them, as also for the impossibility of abating any part of it. When he had seen all this masse of money laide on a heap before him, he commanded it should be given to Lamia, and among his other Curtifins, to buy them hope. The shame the Athenians received by this gift, grieved them more then the losse of their money: and the words he spake to the great contempt of them and their City, did more trouble them then the payment they made. Some say notwithstanding, that Demetrius did not alone use the Athenians thus shamefully, but the Thessalians also in the same manner. But passing this over, Lamia of her self and through her own countenance did get a great sum of money together of diverse persons for one supper she made unto Demetrius, the preparation whereof was of such exceeding charge, that Lycus borne in the Isle of Samos, did set down the order thereof in writing. And therefore a certaine Poet no lesse pleasant, then truly, called this Lamia Elepolis: to wit, an engine to take Cities. And Demochares also borne in the City of Soli, called Demetrius a fable, because he had Lamia ever with him: as in the fables which old women tell little children, there is ever lightly a Lamia, as much to say, as a witch, or forcereffe. So that the great credit and authority this good fortune offered him beyond all hope, presently took his daughter with him, and sailed with all his ships directly towards SYRIA. In the which voyage he was constrained of necessity to land sometimes, and specially in CILICIA, the which Plistarchus the brother of Cassander kept at that time, being given him by the other Kings for his part and portion of the spoils of Antigonus, after he was overthrown. This Plistarchus thinking that Demetrius landed not to refresh himselfe, but for forage and spoils, because he would complaine of Seleucus for the alliance he made with their common enemy, without the consent and privy of all the other Kings and Princes confederates, he went privately unto his brother Cassander. Demetrius having intelligence thereof, he suddenly invaded the land, and spoiled as farre as the City of CYNDUS, and carried away (which he had leaved) twelve hundred talents, which he found yet left of his fathers treasure: and then with all the speed he could possible he returned to his ships, and hoisted saile. Shortly after, his wife Phila also came unto him. So Seleucus received them all near unto the City of OROSUS, and there their meeting was princely, without sorrow or suspicion one of the other. First of all Seleucus did feast Demetrius in his Tent, in the middle of his Campe: and afterwards Demetrius feasted him againe in his Gallies, with thirteen bankes of Oares. Thus they passed many dayes together, feasting and rejoycing each with other: being unarmed, and having no souldiers to waite upon them: untill at length Seleucus with his wife Stratonice departed, and took his way with great pompe towards the City of ANTIOCH. Now for Demetrius he kept the Province of CILICIA, and sent his wife Phila unto her brother Cassander, to answer the complaints and accusations of Plistarchus against him. In the mean time Deidamia his wife departed out of GREECE to come unto him: who after she had remained with him a few dayes, died of a sickness. Afterwards Demetrius coming againe in favour with Prology, by Seleucus his son in lawes meane; he married his daughter Prolemaide. Hitherto Seleucus used Demetrius very courteously, but afterwards he prayed him to deliver him CILICIA againe, for a sum of money that he offered him: but Demetrius plainly denied him. Then did Seleucus shew a cruell and tyrannical covetousnesse: for in anger, and with fierce threats and countenance he asked him the Cities of TYRE, and SIDON. But therein he thinks he lacked honesty and civility: as though he that had under his obedience and subjection all that which lay betwixt the INDIES, and the sea of LYREA, was in such need and poverty, that for two Cities onely, he should drive his father in law from him, who had sustained so hard and bitter change. But thereby he rightly confirmed Plato saying: that he that will be rich indeed, must indeavour himself not to increase his riches, but rather to diminish his covetousnesse. For he shall never be but a begger and needy, whose covetous desire hath no end. This notwithstanding, Demetrius yielded not for fear, but provided to replenish the Cities with good Garrisons to keep them against him: saying, that though he had been overcome ten thousand times more in battell, yet it should never sink into his head that he should be contented, and thinke himself happy to buy Seleucus alliance so deare. On the other side, being advertised that one Lachares having spied opportunity when the ATHENIANS were in civil wars one against the other, and that he had overcome them, and did tyrannically usurpe the government, he then perswaded himself that he might easily win it againe, if he came thither upon the suddain. Thereupon he crossed the seas with a great flecte of ships, without any danger: but he had such a great storme and tempest upon the coast of ATTICA, that he lost the most part of his ships, and a great number of his men besides. But for himself he escaped; and began to make a little war with the ATHENIANS. Yet perceiving that he did no good there, but lost his time, he sent some of his men to gather a number of his ships againe together, and he himself in the mean time went into PELOPONNESUS, to lay siege to the City of MESSINA, where his person was in great danger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had such a blow with a dart, that it hit him full in the mouth, and ran through his cheek. Notwithstanding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his subjection againe certaine Townes that had rebelled against him. After that he returned againe into ATTICA, and took the Cities of ELEUSIN, and of RHAMNUS: and then spoiled all the Country, and took a ship fraught with corne, and hung up the Merchant, that ought it, and the master of the ship that brought it: thereby to terrifie all other Merchants, that they should be afraid to bring any more corne thither, and so to famish the City, by keeping them from all things necessary for their sustenance, and so it happened. For a bushell of salt was sold at ATHENS for fourty silver Drachmaes, and a bushell of wheat for three hundred Drachmas. In this extreme necessity, the ATHENIANS had but a short joy for the hundred and fifty Gallies they saw neer unto EGINA, the which Prology sent to aide them: for when the souldiers that were in them saw that they brought unto Demetrius a great number of ships out of PELOPONNESUS, out of CYPRUS, and diverse other parts, which amounted in the whole to the number of three hundred saile, they weighed their Anchors, and fled presently. Then Lachares forsok the City, and secretly saved himself. Now the ATHENIANS, who before had commanded upon paine of death, that no man should make any motion to the counsell, to treat of any peace with Demetrius, they did then upon Lachares flying, presently open the Gates next unto Demetrius Campe, and sent Ambassadors unto him, not looking for any grace or peace, but because necessity drave them to it. During this so hard and straight siege, there fell out many wonderful and strange things; but among others, this one is of speciall note. It is reported that the father and son sitting in their house, void of all hope of life, there fell a dead Rat before them from the top of the house, and that the father and the son sought who should have it to eat. Moreover, that at the selfe same siege the Philosopher Epicurus maintained himself and his Scholars, by giving them a portion of Beanes every day, by the which they lived. Thus the City of ATHENS being brought brought unto this extremity, Demetrius made his entry into it, and gave commandment to all the Citizens, that they should assemble every man within the Theatre: where he made them to be compassed in with armed souldiers, and then placed all his guard armed about the stage. Afterwards he came down himself into the Theatre through high Galleries and entries by the which the common players used to come to play their parts in Tragedies, in such sort as the ATHENIANS were then worse afraid then before: howbeit Demetrius presently pacified their fear, as soon as he began to speak unto them. For he did not fashion his Oration with a hasty angry voice, neither did he use any bitter words: but only after he had courteously told them their faults and discourtesies towards him, he said he forgave them, and that he would be their friend again: and furthermore, he caused millions of bushells of wheat to be given unto them, and established such governments, that the people misliked not of. Then Demetrius the Orator, seeing that the people gave out great shouts of joy in the praise of Demetrius, and that the Orators daily contented in the pulpit for Orations, who should exceed other in preferring new honours for Demetrius, he caused an order to be made, that the haven of PIRAEUS and MOUNTICHA should be put out into Demetrius hands, to use at his pleasure. This being established by voices of the people, Demetrius of his own private authority did place a great Garrison within the fort called MUSEUM, because the people should rebell no more against him, nor divert him from his other enterprises. Thus when he had taken ATHENS, he went to set upon the LACEDEMONIANS. But Archidamus King of LACEDEMON, came against him with a puissant Army, whom he discomfited in battell, and put to flight, by the City of MANTINEA. After that he invaded LACONIA with all his Army, and made an invade to the City of SPARTA, where he once againe overthrew the LACEDEMONIANS in set battell, took five hundred of them prisoners, and slew two hundred: in so much as every man thought he might even then go to SPARTA without any danger to take it, which had never yet been taken afore by any. But there was ever King that had so often and suddain changes of fortune as Demetrius, nor that in other affairs was never so often little, and then great: so suddenly down, and up again: so weak, and straight so strong. And therefore it is reported, that in his great adversities when fortune turned so contrary against him, he was wont to cry out upon fortune, that which Aeschylus speaketh in a place:

Thy force in lifting of me up, me downe againe to throw.*

Now againe when his affaires prospered so well, and that he was likely to recover a good force and Kingdome, news were brought him, first that Lysimachus had taken all his Towns from him, which he held in ASIA: and on the other side, that Prology had won from him all the Realme of CYPRUS, the City of SALAMINA onely excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very straightly besieged. This notwithstanding, fortune played with him; as the wicked woman Archilochus speaketh of, who

*Did in the one hand water show,
And in the other first bestow.*

For taking him away, and (as it were) the City of SPARTA also out of his hands by these dreadful news, even when he was certain to have won it, he presently offered him hopes of other great and new things, by this occasion following. After the death of Cassander, Philip who was the eldest of all his other sons, and left his heir and successor in the Kingdome of MACEDON, reigned no long time over the MACEDONIANS; but deceased soone after his father was dead. The two other brethren also fell at great variance, and wars together: so that the one called Antipater, slew his own mother Thesalonica: and the other named Alexander, called in to aide him Demetrius and Pyrrius, the one out of the Realm of EPIRUS, and the other out of PELOPONNESUS. Pyrrius came first before Demetrius, and kept a great part of MACEDON for recompence of his paines, coming to aide him at his desire: so that he became a dreadful neighbour unto Alexander himself, that had sent for him into his Country. Furthermore, when he was advertised that Demetrius did presently upon the receipt of his letters, set forward with all his Army to come to aide him, the young Prince Alexander was twice as much more amazed and afraid, for the great estate and estimation of Demetrius. So he went to him notwithstanding, and received him at a place called DERION, and their imbraced and welcomed him. But immediately after, he told them that his affaires were now in so good estate, that praised be the gods he should not now need his presence to aide him. After these words the one began to mistrust the other, so it chanced one day, that as Demetrius went to Alexander lodging, where the feast was prepared, there came one to him to tell him of an ambush that was laid for him, and how they had determined to kill him when he should thinke to be merry at the Banquet. But Demetrius was nothing abashed at the newes, and onely went a little fustier, for making such halt as he did before, and in the meane time sent to command his Captaine to arme their men, and to have them in readinesse: and willed his gentlemen and all the rest of his officers that were about him (which were a greater number by many then those of Alexander side) every man of them to go in with them into the hall, and to tarry there till he arose from the table. By this meane the men whom Alexander had appointed to assault him durst not, being afraid of the great traine he had brought with him. Furthermore, Demetrius saying that he was not well at ease at that time to make merry, he went immediately out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him believe that he had certaine newes brought him of great importance: and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no longer keep him company, for that he was driven of necessity to depart from him; and that another time they would meet together, with better leisure and liberty. Alexander was very glad to see that Demetrius went his way out of MACEDON not offended, but of his own good will: whereupon he brought him into THESSALIA, and when they were come to the City of LARISSA, they began againe to feast one another, to intrap each other: the which offered Demetrius occasion to have Alexander in his hand as he would with himself. For Alexander of purpose would not have his guard about him, fearing lest thereby he should teach Demetrius also to stand upon his guard. Thus Alexander turned his practise for another, upon himselfe: and he was determined not to suffer Demetrius to scape his hands, if he once againe came within danger. So Alexander being bidden to supper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius rising from the board in the midst of supper, Alexander rose also, being afraid of that strange manner, and followed him foote by foote to the very doore. Then Demetrius said but to his Warders at the gate, Kill him that followeth me. With those words he went out of the doores, and Alexander that followed him was slaine in the place, and certaine of his gentlemen with him which came to rescue him: of the which, one of them as they killed him said, that Demetrius had prevented them but one day. All that night (as it is no other likely) was full of uproare and tumult. Howbeit, the next morning the MACEDONIANS being marvellously troubled and afraid of Demetrius great power, when they saw that no man came to assaile them, but that Demetrius in contrary manner sent unto them to tell them that he would speak with them, and deliver them reason for that he had done: then they all began to be bold againe, and willingly gave him audience. Now Demetrius needed not to use many words, nor to make any long Orations, to win them unto him: for, because they hated Antipater, as a horrible manqueller and murderer of his mother, and because they had no better man to preferre, they easily chose Demetrius King of MACEDON, and thereupon brought him backe into MACEDON, to take possession of the Kingdome. This change was not disliked of the other MACEDONIANS that remained at home in their Country, for that they yet remembered the traitorous and wicked fact of Cassander against Alexander the Great: for which cause they utterly hated and detested all his issue and posterity. And furthermore, if there were any sparke of remembrance in their hearts, of the bounty and goodnesse of their grandfather Antipater, Demetrius received the fruit and benefit, for his wife Philae sake; by whom he had a son that should succeed him in the Kingdome, and was a proper youth, in Campe with his father. Demetrius having this great good hap and fortune come unto him, he received newes also that Prodomy had not onely raised his siege from the City of SALAMINA where he kept his mother and children straightly besieged: but further, that he had done them great honour, and bestowed great gifts upon them. On the other side also he was advertised, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before been married unto Selenus, was now married againe unto Antiochus, the sonne of the said Selenus, and how that she was crowned Queen of all the barbarous Nations inhabiting in the high Provinces of ASIA: and that it came to passe in this manner. It chanced that this young Prince Antiochus (as love overcometh all men) became in love with his mother in law Stratonice, who already had a sonne by Selenus his father. She being young and passing faire, he was so ravished with her, that though he proved all the wayes possible to master his fury and passion that way, yet he was still the weaker. So that in the end, condemning himselfe to death because he found his desire abominable, his passion incurable, and his reason utterly overcome, he resolved to kill himselfe by little and little, with abstinence from meate and drinke; and made no other reckoning to remedy his griefe, faining to have some secret inward discaise in his body. Yet could he not so finely cloake it, but that Erasistratus the Physician easily found his griefe, that love, not sickenesse, was his infirmite: howbeit it was hard for him to imagine with whom he was in love. Erasistratus being earnestly bent to find out the party he loved, he sat by this young Prince all day long in his chamber, and when any faire young boy or wife came to see him, he earnestly looked Antiochus in the face, and carefully observed all the parts of the body, and outward movings, which do commonly betray the secret passions and affections of the mind. So having marked him divers times, that when others came to see him, whatsoever they were, he still remained in one selfe state, and that when Stratonice his mother in law came alone or in company of her husband Selenus to visite him, he commonly perceived those signes in him, which Sappho writeth to be in lovers (to wit, that his words and speech did faile him, his colour became red, his eyes still rolled to and fro, and then a suddain sweat would take him, his pulse would beat fast and rife high; and in the end, that after the force and power of his heart had failed him, and shewed all these signes, he became like a man in an extasie and trance, and white as a kercher) he then gathering a true conjecture by these so manifest signes and declarations, that it was onely Stratonice whom this young Prince fancied and the which he forced himselfe to keepe secret to the death, thought that to bewray it to the King it would offend him much, but yet trusting to his great affection and fatherly love he bare to his son, he ventured one day to tell him, that his sonnes sicknesse was no other but love, and withall, that his love was impossible to be enjoyed, and therefore that he must of necessity die, for it was incurable. Selenus was cold at the heart to hear these newes: so he asked him, What, is he incurable? Yea, Sir, answered the Physician, because he is in love with my wife. Then replied Selenus againe: Alas Erasistratus, I have alwayes loved thee as one of my dearest friends, and wouldst thou not now do me this pleasure, to let my sonne marry thy wife, sith thou knowest it well that I have no more sonnes but he; and that I see he is but cast away, if thou helpe me not? But your grace would not do it your self, said Erasistratus, if he were in love with Stratonice. O, said Selenus to him again, that it were the will of the gods some god or man could turne his love that way: for mine own part, I would not onely leave him the thing he loved, but I would give my King-

Kingdome also to save his life. Then Erasistratus seeing that the King spake the word from his heart, and with abundance of teares, he took him by the right hand, and told him plainly, your grace needeth not Erasistratus helpe in this. For being father, husband, and King, your selfe also may onely be the Physician, to cure your sons discaise. When Selenus heard that, he called an assembly of the people, and declared before them all, that he was determined to Crowne his son Antiochus King of the high Provinces of ASIA, and Stratonice Queene, to marry them together: and that he was persuaded, that his son (who had alwayes shewed himselfe obedient to his fathers will) would not disobey him in this marriage. And as for Stratonice, if she disliked this marriage, and would not consent unto it because it was no common matter, then he prayed that his friends would persuade her, she should think all good and comely that should please the King: and withall that concerned the general benefit of the Realme and Common-wealth. Hereupon Antiochus and Stratonice were married together. But now to returne againe to the history of Demetrius. Demetrius came by the Kingdome of MACEDON and THESSALY by this meanes as you have heard, and did moreover possesse the best part of PELOPONNESUS, and on this side the streight, the Cities of MEGARA and ATHENS. Furthermore he led his Army against the BOEOTIANS, who were at the first willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus King of SPARTA was come into the City of THEBS with his Army, the BOEOTIANS encouraged by the faire words and allurements of one Pisistratus, borne in the City of THESPIS (who at that time bare all the sway and chiefe authority amongst them) they gave up their treaty of peace they had begun with Demetrius, and determined to make warre. Thereupon Demetrius went to besiege the City of THEBS, and laid his engines of battery unto it: in so much as Cleonymus for feare, stole secretly out of the City. Thereupon the THEBANS being also afraid, yeelded themselves unto Demetrius mercy: who putting great Garrisons into the Cities, and having leaved a great summe of money of the Province, left them Hieronymus the Historiographer, his Lieutenant and governour there. So it appeared that he used them very courteously, and did them many pleasures, and specially unto Pisistratus. For when he had taken him prisoner, he did him no hurt, but received him very courteously, and used him well: and furthermore, he made him Polemarchus (to wit, Campe-master) in the City of THESPIS. Shortly after these things were thus brought to passe, King Lyfimachus by chance was taken by another barbarous Prince, called Dromichetes. Thereupon Demetrius, to take such a noble occasion offered him, went with a great Army to invade the Country of THRACIA, supposing he should finde no man to withstand him, but that he might conquer it at his pleasure. Howbeit, so soone as Demetrius backe was turned, the BOEOTIANS revolted againe from him, and therewithall newes was brought him, that Lyfimachus was delivered out of prison. Then he returned backe with all speed, marvellously offended with the BOEOTIANS, whom he found already discomfited in battell by his son Antigonus, and went againe to lay siege to the City of THEBS, being the chiefe City of all that Province of BOEOTIA. But at that present time, Pyrrhus came and foraged all THESSALY, and entered even to the straight of THERMOPILES. Therefore Demetrius was constrained to leave his son to continue the siege at THEBS, whilst he himselfe went against Pyrrhus, who suddainly returned againe into his Realme. So Demetrius left ten thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen in THESSALY to defend the Country, and returned with the rest of his Army to win THEBS. Thereupon he brought his great Engine of battery called Elepolis, against the wall, as you have heard before, the which was thrust forward by little and little, with great labour, by reason of the weight and heaviness of it: so that it could scant be driven forward two furlongs in two moneths. But the BOEOTIANS and the THEBANS did valiantly defend themselves: and Demetrius of a malicious mind and desire of revenge (more oftener then needful, or to any purpose) compelled his men to go to the assault, and to hazard themselves: so that there were daily a great number of them slain. Antigonus his son perceiving it: Alas, said he, why do we thus suffer our men to be slaine and cast away to no purpose? Wherefore Demetrius angrily answered him againe: What needest thou to care? Is there any * Come to be distributed to those that are dead? But notwithstanding, because men should not thinke he still meant to put others in danger, and durst not venture himselfe, he fought with them, till at length he was shot through the necke with a sharpe Arrow-head, that was shot at him from the well. Wherewithall he fell very sicke, but yet raised not his siege, nor removed his Campe, but took the City of THEBS againe by assault: the which being not long before againe replenished with people, was in ten yeares space twice won and taken. Now he put the THEBANS in a marvellous feare, by his cruel threats he gave them at his coming into THEBS: so that they looked to have received the extremest punishment the vanquished could have, through the just wrath and anger of the conquerour. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirteen of them to death, and banished some, he pardoned all the rest. About that time fell out the celebration of the feast called Pyschia: in the honour of Apollon: and because the ETOLIANS kept all the high-ways to bring them unto the City of DELPHE, in the which of old time they did use to celebrate those sports aforesaid, he caused them to be kept and solemnized at ATHENS, as in a place where this god in reason should be best honoured and revered, because he was patron of the City, and for that the ATHENIANS maintained that he was their progenitor. From thence he returned into MACEDON, and knowing that it was against his nature to live idly, and in peace, and seeing on the other side also that the MACEDONIANS did him more service, and were more obedient to him in wars, and that in time of peace they grew fedicious, full of vanity and quarrells, he went to make war with the ETOLIANS: and after he had spoiled and destroyed their Country, he left Pantarchus his Lieutenant there, with a great part of his Army. Demetrius himselfe went went in the mean time with the rest of his Army against Pyrrhus, and Pyrrhus also against him; but they missed of meeting each with other. Whereupon Demetrius passed further unto the Realm of Epirus, the which he spoiled and foraged. Pyrrhus on the other side went on so far that he met with Pantarchus, Demetrius Lieutenant, with whom he fought a battel, and came to the sword with him: so that he did both hurt him, and was also hurt by him. But in the end Pyrrhus had the upper hand, put Pantarchus to flight, and slew a great number of his men, and took five thousand prisoners: the which was the chief overthrow of Demetrius. For Pyrrhus was not the MACEDONIANS ill will so much for the mischiefes and hurts he had done unto them, as he got himself great fame and renown with them, because himself alone had with his own hands done all the noble exploits of war in that journey: for the which he was afterwards had in great estimation among the MACEDONIANS. Now many of them began to say, that he was the onely King of all others, in whom the lively image of the hardnesse and valiantnesse of Alexander the Great was to be seen: and that all the rest (but specially Demetrius) did but counterfeit his gravity and Princely countenance like players upon a Stage, that would counterfeit his countenance and gesture. And to say truly, there was much finenesse and curiosity about Demetrius, to make him a playing stocke in common plays. For some say, that he did not onely wear a great hat with his Diademe upon his head, and was apparelled in purple Gowns imbroidered with gold: but also that he did use to wear certain woollen shoes on his feet died in purple colour, not woven, but fashioned together like a felt, and guilt upon it. And furthermore, he had long before caused a cloak to be made of a marvellous rich and sumptuous peece of work. For upon it was drawn the figure of the world, with stars and circles of heaven, the which was not thoroughly finished, by the change of his fortune. But there was never King of MACEDON after him that durst wear it: albeit there were many proud and arrogant Kings that succeeded him. Now the MACEDONIANS were not onely sorry, and offended to see such things as they were not wont to be acquainted withal: but they much more misliked his curious manner of life, and specially because he was ill to come to, and worse to be spoken with. For he gave no audience, or if he did, he was very rough, and would sharply take them up that had to do with him. As, he kept the Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS two years, and would give them no answer: and yet made as though he loved them better than any other people of GREECE. Another time also he was offended, because the LACEDÆMONIANS had sent but one man onely Ambassadors unto him, taking it that they had done it in despite of him. And so did the Ambassador of the LACEDÆMONIANS answer him very gallantly, after the LACONIAN manner. For when Demetrius asked him, how chanceth it that the LACEDÆMONIANS do send but one man unto me? No more but one, said he, O King, unto one. On a time he came abroad more plainly and popular like, then he was wont to do: whereby he put the people in good hope that they might the easilier speak with him, and that he would more courteously hear their complaints. Thereupon many came, and put up their humble supplications and bills of petition unto him. He received them, and put them up in the lap of his cloake. The poor suiters were glad of that, and waited upon him at his heels, hoping they should quickly be dispatched: but when he was upon the bridge of the River of Axius, he opened his cloake, and cast them all into the River. This went to the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, who then thought, they were no more governed by a King, but oppressed by a tyrant: and it grieved them so much the more, because they did yet remember (either for that they had seen themselves, or otherwise heard their forefathers say) how courteous King Philip was in all such matters, and how that one day as he passed through the street, a poor old woman plucked him by the Gowne, and besought him humbly to hear her, but he answered her he was not then at leisure. Whereupon the poor woman plainly cried out to him, Leave then to be King. This word so nettled him, and he tooke such a conceit of it, that he returned presently to his palace, and setting all other matters apart, did nothing else many dayes but gave himself to hear all suits, and began with this poor old woman. For truly nothing becometh a Prince better, then to minister justice: for Mars (as Timotheus saith) signifyeth force, and is a tyrant: but justice and law, according to Pindarus, is Queen of all the world. Moreover, the wife Poet Homer saith not that Princes and Kings have received the custody of Engines, and of munition, neither also strong and mighty ships of Jupiter, to keep them to destroy Townes withall: but with them to maintaine law and justice. And therefore he calleth not the cruel and bloody King, but the just and merciful Prince, Jupiter friend and Scholar. And Demetrius boasted that he had a name and title contrary to Jupiter, whom they called Poliotes, or Tolionchus, signifying Protector and preserver of Cities: and that he was called Polioretes, a Fort-gainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, and vice preferred for vertue: because he could not discern the truth from falshood, which turned his injustice to glory, and iniquity to honour. But now to returne where we left: Demetrius fell into a great and dangerous sickness in the City of PELLA, during which time he almost left all MACEDON, by a suddain invasion Pyrrhus made, who in manner rode it all over, and came as far as the City of EDUSSA. Howbeit so soon as he recovered health again, he easily drave him out, and afterwards made peace with him, because he would not fighting with him (whom he should have daily at his doores still skirmishing sometime here, sometime there) lose the opportunity and weaken himself to bring that to passe which he had determined. For he had no small matters in his head, but thought to recover all the Realmes his father had: and besides, the preparation he made was no lesse sufficient then the purpose of such an imagination required. For he had leaved and assembled an Army of fourescore and eighteen thousand footmen: and unto them he had also well neare twelve thousand horsemen, and had besides gotten above five hundred ships together, which were built part in the haven of PIRÆUS, part at CORINTH, part in the City of CHALCIS, and part about PELLA. He himself in person went through their work-houses, and shewed the Artificers how they should make them, and did help to devise them: so that every man wondered not onely at his infinite preparation, but at the greatnesse and sumptuousnesse of his works. For at that time there was no man living that ever saw a Galley of fifteen or sixteen banks of Oares. But this is true, that afterwards Ptolomy, surnamed Philopater, built a Galley of forty banks of Oares, the which was two hundred and eighty cubits long, and from the Keel in height to the toppe of the Poop, forty eight cubits: and to look to the tackle and guide her, did require four hundred Mariners, and four thousand water-men to row her; and besides all that, she could yet carry above the hatches, well near three thousand fighting men. Howbeit this Galley never served to other purpose but for shew, and was like to a house that never stirred: and it was never removed out of the place where it was built but with marvellous ado, and great danger, more to make men wonder at then for any service or commodity it could be employed unto. But now the beauty of Demetrius ships did nothing hinder their swiftnesse and goodnesse for fight, neither did the hugeness of their building take away the use of them; but their swiftnesse and nimblenesse deserved more commendation, then their sumptuousnesse and statelinenesse. Thus as this great power and preparation was in hand, being such as never King before (since the time of Alexander the Great) had assembled a greater to invade ASIA, these three Kings, Ptolomy, Seleucus, and Lysimachus, did all joyn together against him. And afterwards also, they sent Ambassadors unto Pyrrhus in the name of them all, to draw him to their side, alluring him to come into MACEDON, perswading him not to repose any trust in the peace Demetrius had made with him, to make account of it as a good and sure peace: for, they said that Demetrius did not give him pledge that he would never make war with him, but rather first took opportunity himself to make war with whom he thought good. Pyrrhus considering so much, and finding their words true, there rose a sharpe and cruel war on every side against Demetrius, who tract ed him, and stayed yet to begin. For at one self time, Ptolomy with a great Fleet of ships came down into GREECE, and made all GREECE revolt from him: and Lysimachus also on THRACIAES side, and Pyrrhus upon the borders of EPIRUS, confining with the Realm of MACEDON, they entred with a great Army, and spoiled and sacked all as they went. Thereupon Demetrius leaving his son Antigonus in GREECE, he returned with all possible speed into MACEDON, to go first against Lysimachus. But as he was preparing to go against him, news were brought him that Pyrrhus had already taken the City of BERROEÆ. This news being blown abroad amongst the MACEDONIANS, all Demetrius doings were turned topsie turvy. For all his Campe was straight full of tears and complaints, and his men began openly to shew their anger against him, speaking all the ill they could of him, so that they would tarry no longer, but every one prayed leave to depart, pretending to looke to their businesse at home, but in truth to go and yeeld themselves unto Lysimachus. Wherefore Demetrius thought it best for him to get him as far from Lysimachus as he could, and to bend all his Army against Pyrrhus: because the other was their Countryman, and familiarly known among the most of them, for that they had served together under Alexander the Great, and that as he thought, the MACEDONIANS would not preferre Pyrrhus a stranger, before him. But there his judgement failed him: for as soon as Pyrrhus had pitched his Campe have by him, the MACEDONIANS that had ever loved valiantnesse, and had of ancient time esteemed him worthier to be King that was the best souldier and valiantest in the field; and furthermore had heard the report of his great clemency and courtesie he had shewed to the prisoners he had taken: they having had goodwill of long time, fought but good occasion to forsake Demetrius, and to yeeld themselves unto Pyrrhus, or to any other Prince whatsoever he were. Then they secretly began to steale away one after another, by small companies at the first: but afterwards there rose such a general tumult against him throughout all the Campe, that some of them were so desperate to go into his tent to bid him flie, and save himself, because the MACEDONIANS were too weary with fighting for his cariosity. And yet Demetrius found these words more gentle and modest, in respect of the vile and cruel words which others gave him. So he went into his tent, and cast a blacke cloak about his face, in stead of his rich and stately cloake he was wont to wear, not like unto a King, but like a common player when the play is done; and then secretly stole away. When this was known in the Campe, many of his souldiers ran to his tent to rife it, and every man took such hold of it to have his part, that they tare it in peeces, and drew their swords to fight for it. But Pyrrhus coming in the midst of the tumult, pacified this stirre, and presently without blow given, wan all Demetrius Campe: and afterwards he divided the Realme of MACEDON with Lysimachus, in the which Demetrius had quietly reigned the space of seven years. Now Demetrius being thus miserably overthrowen, and turned out of his Realm, he fled unto the City of CASSANDRIA. There he found his wife Phila, who took it marvellous heavily, and could not abide to see him againe a private man, driven out of his Kingdome, and the most miserable King that ever was of all other. Wherefore intending no more to follow vaine hope, and detesting the fortune of her husband, she being more constant in calamity then in prosperity, killed her self with poyson. The wracks: and there assembled all his Captains and friends that he had. So it seemeth to me, the comparison Menelaus maketh of his fortune, in one of the Tragedies of Sophocles, in these verses:

Whose double dealing diverse times enfor's I am to feel:

This comparison might (I say) much better be applied unto Demetrius fortune, to his rising and falling, and to his overthrow and relief again. For when every man thought his force and power utterly overthrown, then began he to rise again by repaire of souldiers, which by little and little came unto him, and straight revived him with good hope. This was the first time that he was ever seen meanly appalled, like a private man up and down the Country, without some shew or tokens of a King. And there was one that seeing him in this estate at THE BES, pleasantly applied these verses of Euripides unto him:

Of God immortal, now become a mortal wight:

Iimenus bankes and Dirces streames he hauntheth in our sight.

Demetrius misery from Princely happines.

Crates the Philosopher delivereth Athens from Demetrius siege.

Demetrius married Ptolemaide

Demetrius troubles in Asia.

Plague, by ill meat.

Demetrius famine.

Now when he began to have some hope againe, and was (as it were) entred into the great high way of Kings, and had gotten souldiers about him, which made a body and shew of royal power, he restored the THEBANS their liberty and government againe. But the ATHENIANS once more revolted from him, and did revoke the dignity and Priesthood of Diphilus, who had been that yeare created Priest of the favours, instead of the Governour, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we have told you before: and made a law, that from thenceforth the ancient and common Governours of their City should be restored againe to their ancient manner: and they sent also into MACEDON unto King Pyrrhus, rather to terrifie Demetrius (whom they saw begin to rise againe) then for any hope they had he would come and helpe them. Howbeit Demetrius came against them with great fury, and did straightly besiege the City of ATHENS. Then the ATHENIANS sent Crates the Philosopher to him (a man of great estimation and authority) who so handled him, partly by intreaty, and partly also through his wise persuasions and counsell he gave him for his profit, that Demetrius presently raised his siege. Wherefore, after he had gathered together so many ships as were left him, and had imbarcked twelve thousand footmen, and a small number of horsemen, he presently took sea, and failed towards ASIA, meaning to take the Provinces of CARIA and LYDIA from Lyfimachus, and to make them to rebell against him. There Euridice, sister to Phila, received him by the City of MILETUM, having with her one of Ptolemies daughters and hers, called Ptolemaide; the which had been afore affianced to him by Seleucus means. So he married Ptolemaide there, with the good will and content of her mother Euridice. After his marriage he presently went into the field againe, and did set forwards to winne some Cities, whereof many willingly received him, and others he took by force. Amongst them he took the City of SARDIS, whither came diverse Captaines unto him of King Lyfimachus, who yielded themselves, and brought him a great number of men and much money besides. But Demetrius receiving advertisement that Agathocles, Lyfimachus son, followed him with a great Army, he went thence into PHRYGIA, making account, and also hoping, that if he could win ARMENIA, he might easily make MEDIA rebel; and then that he would see if he could conquer the high Provinces of ASIA, where he might have many places of refuge, if fortune turned against him. Agathocles followed him very neare, and yet skirmishing diverse times with him, Demetrius alway had the better: howbeit Agathocles did cut off his victuals from him every way, and kept him at such a strait, that his men durst no more stray from the Campe to forrage: wherefore they sustained great want of victuals, and then began his men to be afraid, and to mistrust that he would make them follow him into ARMENIA and MEDIA. The famine daily increased more and more in his Army, and it chanced besides, that missing his way, and failing to gage the foord well as he passed over the River of Lycus, the fury and force of the River carried his men down the streame, and drowned a great number of them: and yet notwithstanding these great troubles, they mocked him besides. For one wrote at the entry and coming in to his tent, the first verse of the Tragedy of Oedipus COLONIAN, written by Sophocles, changing onely some word:

Thou impe of old and blind Antigonus,

To what a point hast thou now carried us?

But in the end, the plague began also in the midst of this famine (a common thing, and almost a matter of necessity it should be so) because that men being driven to need and necessity, do frame themselves to eat all that comes to hand: whereupon he was driven to bring backe those few men that remained, having lost of all sorts (good and bad) not so few as eight thousand fully told. When he came into the Province of TARsus, he commanded his men in no case to meddle with any thing, because the Country was subject unto King Seleucus, whom he would in no wise displease. But when he saw it was impossible to stay his men being now brought to such extremity and need, and that Agathocles had bard up the streights and passages of mount Taurus against him, he wrote a letter unto Seleucus, first declaring his miserable state and hard fortune: and then presenting his humble petition and request unto him, prayed him to take pity upon his friend, whom spitefull fortune had throwne into such misery and calamity, that could not but move his greatest enemies to

to have compassion of him. These Letters somewhat softened Seleucus heart, inso much that he wrote to his Governours and Lieutenants of those parts, to furnish Demetrius person with all things needfull for a Princes house and Victuals sufficient to maintain his men. But one Paracles, a grave wise man counted, and Seleucus faithful friend also, came to tell him, that the charge to entertain Demetrius Souldiers, was not the greatest fault he made therein, and most to be accounted of: but that he did not wisely looke into his Affaires, to suffer Demetrius to remaine in his Countrey, considering that he had alway been a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to enterprise any matters of great importance; and now he was brought to such despaire and extremity, that he had framed his men which were but ranke cowards, (contrary to their nature) to be most desperate and hardy in greatest dangers. Seleucus being moved with these persuasions, presently tooke his journey into CILICIA with a great Army. Demetrius being astonied with this suddain change, and dreading so great an Army, got him to the strongest places of Mount Taurus. Then he sent unto Seleucus, first of all to pray him to suffer him to conquer certaine barbarous People thereabouts, who lived according to their own Lawes, and never had King: to the end that he might yet there with safety end the rest of his life and exile, staying at length in some place where he might be safe. Secondly, if that liked him not, then that it would yet please him to Victual his men for the Winter time onely, in the same place where they were, and not to be so hard-hearted unto him as to drive him thence, lacking all needfull things, and so to put him into the mouth of his most cruell and mortall Enemies. But Seleucus mistrusting his demand, sent unto him that he should Winter if he thought good, two Moneths, but no more, in the Countrey of CATAONIA, so he gave him the chieft of his friends for Hostages: howbeit in the meane time he stopped up all the waies and passages going from thence into SYRIA. Demetrius now seeing himselfe kept in of all sides, like a Beast to be taken in the toyle, he was driven to trust to his owne strength. Thereupon he overranne the Countrey thereabouts, and so often as it was his chance to have any Skirmish or Conflict with Seleucus, he had ever the better of him: and sometime also when they drave the armed Carts with Siches against him, he overcame them, and put the rest to flight. Then he drave them away that kept the top of the Mountaines, and had barred the passages to keepe him that he should not go into SYRIA, and so kept them himselfe. In fine, finding his mens hearts lift up againe, and pretily encouraged, his heart also grew to bigge, that he determined to fight a Battell with Seleucus, and to set all at six and seven. So that Seleucus was at a straight with himselfe, and wist not what to do. For he had returned back the aide which Lyfimachus sent unto him, because he was afraid of him, and mistrusted him. On the other side also he durst not fight with Demetrius alone, being afraid to venture himself with a desperate man: and also mistrusting much his unconstant fortune, the which having brought him to great extremity, raised him up againe to great prosperity. But in the meane space Demetrius fell into a great sicknesse, the which brought his body very weake and low, and had almost utterly overthrown his Affaires. For his Souldiers, some of them yeelded themselves to his Enemies, and others stole away without leave, and went where they listed. Afterwards when he had hardly recovered his health, and within forty daies space was pretily grown to strength againe, with those few Souldiers that remained with him, he seemed to his Enemies, that he would go and invade CILICIA: but then suddainly in the night without sounding any Trumpet, he removed his Campe, and went another way; and having passed over Mount Amanus, he spoiled the Countrey under it, as farre as the Region of CYRESTACA. But Seleucus followed him, and camped hard by him. Thereupon Demetrius suddainly armed his men, and went out by night to assault Seleucus; and to take him sleeping when he mistrusted nothing. So that Seleucus knew nothing of his stealing on him, but late enough, untill that certaine Traitors of Demetrius Campe that fled before, went quickly to advertise him, finding him asleepe, and brought him newes of the danger he was in. Then Seleucus in a maze and feare withall got up, and sounded the Alarme: and as he was putting on his hose and making him ready, he cried out (speaking to his friends and familiars about him): We have now a cruell and dangerous beast to deale with. Demetrius on the other side perceiving by the great stir and noise he heard in the Enemies Campe, that his enterprise was discovered, he retired againe with speed, and the next morning by breake of day, Seleucus went and offered him Battell. Demetrius prepared himselfe to joyne with him, and having given one of his faithful friends the leading of one of the Wings of his Army, himselfe led the other; and overthrow some of his Enemies on his side. But Seleucus in the midst of the Battell lighted from his Horse, and taking his Helmet from his head, he tooke a Target on his arme, and went to the first Ranks of his Army, to make himselfe known unto Demetrius men: perswading them to yeeld themselves unto him, and to acknowledge in the end that he had so long time deferred to give them Battell, rather to save them than to spare Demetrius. Demetrius Souldiers hearing him say so, they did him humble reverences, and acknowledging him for their King, they all yeelded unto him. Demetrius having sundry times before proved to many changes and overthrowes of fortune, thinking yet to escape this last also, and to passe it over, he fled unto the Gates Amanides, which are certain Straights of the Mount Amanus. There he found certain little thick Groves, where he determined to stay all night with certaine Gentlemen of his house, and a few other of his household Servants and Officers which had followed him: meaning, if he could possiblie, to take his way towards the City of CAUNUS, to go to that Sea Coast, hoping to heare of his Ships there. But when it was told him, he had no Victuals nor Provision left but onely to serve him that day, he began then to devise some other way. At length one of his familiar friends Sosigenes came unto him, that had foure hundred pieces of Gold about him in his Girdle.

Amanus Mount.

Demetrius Army forsooke him, and yeelded themselves to Seleucus. Demetrius flyeth from Seleucus.

So hoping that with the same Money he might flee to the Sea, they took their way by night directly to the top of the Mountaine. But when they perceived that the Enemies kept Watch there, and that there were great store of fires hard by them, they then despaired to passe any further; left they should be seen. So they turned to the selfe same place from whence they came, not all of them, for some of them fled: neither had they that remained also any life in them, as before. So one amongst the rest tooke upon him to say, that there was no other way to escape, but to put Demetrius into Seleucus hands. Demetrius therewithall drew out his Sword, and would have slaine himselfe: but his friends about him would not suffer him, but perswaded him to yeeld himselfe unto Seleucus. Thereupon he sent unto Seleucus, to tell him that he yeelded himselfe unto him. Seleucus was so joyfull of the newes, that he said, it was not Demetrius good fortune that saved him, but his own: who besides many other happy good turnes he had done him, gave him yet so honourable occasion and good hap, as to make the world to know his clemency and courtesie. Thereupon immediately he called for his Officers of household, and commanded them to set up his richest Pavillion, and to prepare all things meet to receive him honourably. There was one Apollonides a Gentleman in Seleucus Court, who sometime had been very familiar with Demetrius: him Seleucus sent immediately unto Demetrius, to will him to be of good cheere, and not to be afraid to come unto the Kings Master, for he should finde him his very good friend. So soone as the Kings pleasure was known, a few of his Courtiers went at the first to meet him: but afterwards, every man strived who should go meet him first, because they were all in hope that he should presently be much made of, and grow in credit with Seleucus. But here by they turned Seleucus pittie into envie, and gave occasion also to Demetrius Enemies and spitefull men, to turne the Kings bountifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and dangers, saying, that certainly so soone as the Souldiers saw him there would grow great stirre and change in their Campe. And therefore shortly after that Apollonides was come unto Demetrius, being glad to bring him these good newes, and as others also followed him one after another, bringing him some good newes from Seleucus; and that Demetrius himselfe after so great an overthrow (although that before he thought it a shamefull part of him to have yeelded his body into his Enemies hands), changed his minde at that time, and began then to grow bold, and to have good hope to recover his state againe: behold there came one of Seleucus Captaines called Parfanias, accompanied with a thousand Footmen and Horsemen in all, who compassed in Demetrius with them, and made the rest depart that were come unto him before; having charge given him to bring him to the Court, but to convey him into Cherronesus of Syria, whether he was brought, and ever after had a stronge Garrison about him to keepe him. But otherwise, Seleucus sent him Officers, Money, and all things else meet for a Princes house: and his ordinary Fare was so delicate, that he could wish for no more then he had. And furthermore, he had places of liberty and pleasure appointed him, both to ride his Horse in, and also pleasant Walkes, and goodly Arbours to walke or sit in, and fine Parkes full of Beasts where he might hunt: moreover, the King suffered his own household Servants that followed him when he fled, to remaine with him if they would. And furthermore, there daily came some one or other unto him from Seleucus, to comfort him, and to put him in hope, that so soone as Antiochus and Stratonice were come, they would make some good agreement and peace between them. Demetrius remaining in this state, wrote unto his Son Antigonus, and to his friends and Lieutenants which he had at CORINTH and ATHENS, that they should give no credit to any Letters written in his Name, though his Seale were to them: but that they should keep the Townes they had in charge for his. So Antigonus, and all the rest of his Forces, as if he himselfe were dead. When Antigonus heard the pittifull captivity of his Father he marvellous grievously tooke his hard fortune, wearing blackes for sorrow, and wrote unto all the other Kings, but unto Seleucus specially, beseeching him to take him as a pledge for his Father, and that he was ready to yeeld up all that he kept, to have his Fathers liberty. The like request did many Cities make unto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lyfimachus, who promised Seleucus a great summe of Money to put Demetrius to death. But Seleucus, who of long time had no great fancy to Lyfimachus, but rather utterly despised him, did then thinke him the more cruell and barbarous, for this vile and wicked request he made unto him. Wherefore he still delayed time, because he would have Demetrius delivered by his sonne Antiochus and Stratonice: meane while, for that Demetrius should be bound to them for his delivery, and for ever should acknowledge it to them. Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning patiently tooke his hard fortune, so did he daily more and more forget the misery he was in. For first of all, he gave himselfe to riding and hunting, as farre as the place gave him liberty. Then by little and little he grew to be very grosse, and to give over such pastimes, and therewithall he fell unto drunkennesse and dicing: so that in that sort he passed away the most part of his time (as it should seeme) either to avoide the grievous thoughts of his hard fortune, which came into his minde when he was sober; or else under colour of drunkennesse and eating, shadow the thoughts he had: or else finding in himselfe that it was that manner of life he had long desired, and that through his vaine ambition and folly till that time he could never attaine unto; greatly turmoiling and troubling himselfe and others, supposing to finde in Warres, by Sea and Land, the felicity and delight which he had found in ease and idleness, when he neither thought of it, nor looked for it. For what better end can evill and unadvised Kings and Princes looke for, of all their troubles, dangers, and Warres? who indeed deceive themselves greatly, not onely for that they follow their pleasure and delights as their chiefest felicity, instead of vertue and honest life: but also, because that in truth they cannot be merry and take their pleasure as they would. So Demetrius after after he had been shut up in Cherronesus three yeares together, by ease, grossnesse, and drunkennesse, fell sick of a disease whereof he died; when he was foure and fifty yeares old. Therefore was Seleucus greatly blamed, and he himselfe also did much repent him that he so suspected him as he did, and that he followed not Dromichetes courtesie, a barbarous man borne in Thracia, who had so royally and courteously intreated Lyfimachus, whom he had taken prisoner in the Wars. But yet there was some Tragical Pompe in the order of his Funerall. For his Son Antigonus understanding that they brought him the ashes of his Body, he tooke Sea with all his Ships, and went to meet them, to receive them in the Isles: and when he had received them, he set up the Funerall Pot of Gold (in the which were his embers) upon the poope of his Admirall Galley. So all the Cities and Townes whereby they passed or harboured, some of them did put Garlands of Flowers about the Pot, others also sent a number of men thither in mourning Apparell, to accompany and honour the convoy, to the very Solempny of his Funerals. In this sort sailed all the whole Fleet towards the City of CORINTH, the Pot being plainly scene far off, standing on the top of the Admirall Galley: all the place about it being hanged with Purple; and over it, the Diademe or Royall Band; and about it, also were goodly young men armed, which were as Pensioners to Demetrius. Furthermore, Xenophantus the famous Musician in that time, being set hard by it, played a sweet and lamentable Song on the flute, wherewith all the Oares keeping stroke and measure, the sound did meet with a gallant grace, as in a convoy where the Mourner do knock their breasts at the foot of every Verse. But that which most made the People of CORINTH to weep and lament, which ran to the Peere, and all alongst the shore side to see it, was Antigonus, whom they saw all beblubbered with teares, apparelled as a Mourner in Blacks. Now after they had brought a wonderfull number of Garlands and Nofegayes, and cast them upon the Funerall Pot, and had solemnized all the honours possible for the Funerals at CORINTH, Antigonus carried away the Pot to bury it in the City of DEMETRIADE, the which bare the Name of Demetrius that was dead, and was a new City, that had been replenished with People, and built of little Townes which are about IOLCOS. Demetrius left two Children by his first Wife Phila, to wit, Antigonus and Stratonice: and two other Sonnes, both of them named Demetrius, the one surnamed the leane, of a Woman of ILLYRIA, and the other, King of the CYRENIA, of his Wife Ptolemaide: and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who lived in EGYPT. And it is reported also, that he had another Sonne called Corrbabus, by his Wife Euridice, and that his Posterity reigned by Succession from the Father to the Sonne, untill the time of Persus: who was the last King of MACEDON, whom the ROMANES overcame by Paulus Emilius, and wane all the Realme of MACEDON unto the Empire of ROME.

ANTONIUS Grandfather was that famous Oratour whom Marium slew because he tooke Syllas part. His Father was another Antonius surnamed * CRETAN, who was not so famous, nor bare any great sway in the Common-wealth: howbeit otherwise he was an honest man, and of a very good nature, and specially very liberal in giving, as appeareth by an Act he did. He was not very wealthy, and therefore his Wife would not let him use his liberality and franke nature. One day a friend of his coming to him to pray him to helpe him to some Money, having great need, Antonius by chance had no Money to give him, but he commanded one of his men to bring him some water in a Silver Bason; and then after he had brought it him, he washed his beard as though he meant to have shaven it, and then found an errand for his man to send him out, and gave his friend the Silver Bason, and bade him get him Money with that. Shortly after, there was a great stirre in the house among the Servants, seeking out of this Silver Bason. Inasmuch as Antonius seeing his Wife marvellously offended for it, and that she would examine all her Servants, one after another about it, to know what was become of it, at length he confessed he had given it away, and prayed her to be contented. His Wife was Julia, of the noble house and Family of Julius Caesar: who for her vertue and chastity, was to be compared with the noblest Lady of her time. Marcus Antonius was brought up under her, being married after her first Husbands death, unto Cornelius Lentulus, whom Cicero put to death with Cethegus and others, for that he was of Caecilias conspiracy against the Common-wealth. And this seemeth to be the Originall cause and beginning of the cruell and mortall hate Antonius bare unto Cicero. For Antonius selfe saith, that he would never give him the Body of his Father-in-law to bury him, before his Mother went first to intreate Ciceros Wife: the which undoubtedly was a flat lie. For Cicero denied buriall to none of them whom he executed by law. Now Antonius being a faire young man, and in the prime of his youth, he fell acquainted with Curio, whose friendship and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague unto him. For he was a dissolute man, given over to all lust and insolency, who to have Antonius the better at his commandement, trained him on into great follies, and vaine expences upon Women, in rioting and banqueting: so that in short time, he brought Antonius into a marvellous great debt, and too great for, one of his yeares, to wit, of two hundred and fifty Talents, for all which summe Curio was his Surety. His Father hearing of it, did put his Sonne from him, and forbad him his house. Then he fell in with Clodius, one of the desperatest and most wicked Tribunes at that time in

ROME. Him he followed for a time in his desperate attempts, who bred great stirre and mischief in ROME: but at length he forsooke him, being weary of his rashnesse and folly, or else for that he was afraid of them that were bent against Clodius. Thereupon he left ITALY, and went into GREECE, and there bestowed the most part of his time, sometime in Warres, and other while in the study of Eloquence. He used a manner of phrase in his speech, called Asiaticke, which carried the best grace and estimation at that time, and was much like to his manners and life: for it was full of ostentation, foolish bravery, and vaine ambition. After he had remained there some time; Gabinus Pro-Consull going into SYRIA, perswaded him to go with him; Antonius told him he would not go as a private man: wherefore Gabinus gave him charge of his Horsemen, and so tooke him with him. So, first of all he sent him against Aristobulus, who had made the JAVVES to rebell, and was the first man himselfe that got up to the Wall of a Cattle of his, and so drove Aristobulus out of all his holds: and with those few men he had with him, he overcame all the JAVVES in set Battell, which were many against one, and put all of them almost to the Sword; and furthermore, tooke Aristobulus himselfe prisoner with his Son. Afterwards Ptolomy King of EGYPT, that had been driven out of his Countrey, went unto Gabinus to entreate him to go with his Army with him into EGYPT, to put him againe into his Kingdom: and promised him if he would go with him, ten thousand Talents. The most part of the Captaines thought it not best to go thither, and Gabinus himselfe made it dainty to enter into this War, although the covetousnesse of these ten thousand Talents stuck sorely with him. But Antonius that fought but for opportunity and good occasion to attempt great enterprises, and that desired also to gratifie Ptolomies request, he went about to perswade Gabinus to go this Voyage. Now they were more afraid of the way they should go, to come to the City of PAULUSIUM, then they feared any danger of the War besides: because they were to passe through deepe sands and desert places, where was no fresh water to be had all the Marishes through, which are called the Marishes Serbonides, which the EGYPTIANS call the Exhalations or Fume, by the which the Giant Typhon breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the overflowing of the red Sea, which breaketh out under the ground in that place where it is divided in the narrowest place from the Sea on this side. So Antonius was sent before into EGYPT with his Horsemen, who did not onely win that passage, but also took the City of PAULUSIUM (which is a great City) with all the Souldiers in it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it safe for all the rest of the Army, and the hope of the Victory also certaine for his Captaine. Now did the Enemies themselves feeble the fruites of Antonius courtesie, and the desire he had to winne honour: for when Ptolomy (after he had entered into the City of PAULUSIUM) for the malice he bare unto the City, would have put all the EGYPTIANS in it to the Sword, Antonius withstood him, and by no means would suffer him to do it. And in all other great Battels and skirmishes which they fought, being many in number, Antonius did many noble Acts of a valiant and wise Captaine: but specially in one Battell, where he compassed in the Enemies behinde, giving them the Victory that fought in front, whereby he afterwards had such honourable reward, as his valiantnesse deserved. So was his great courtesie also much commended of all, the which he shewed unto Archelaus: for having been his very friend, he made Warre with him against his will while he lived, but after his death he fought for his Body, and gave it honourable buriall. For these respects he wan himselfe great fame of them of ALEXANDRIA, and he was also thought a worthy man of all the Souldiers in the ROMANES Campe. But besides all this, he had a noble presence, and shewed a countenance of one of a noble house: he had a goodly thick beard, a broad forehead, crooked nosed, and there appeared such a manly looke in his countenance, as is commonly seen in Hercules Pictures, stamped or graven in Mettall. Now it had been a speech of old time, that the Family of the Antonij were descended from one Anton the Son of Hercules, whereof the Family tooke Name. This Opinion did Antonius seeke to confirme in all his doings: not onely resembling him in the likenesse of his Body, as we have said before, but also in the wearing of his Garments. For when he would openly shew himselfe abroad before many People, he would alwaies weare his Casstocke girt down low upon his hippes, with a great Sword hanging by his side, and upon that, some ill-favoured Cloake. Furthermore, things that seeme intolerable in other men, as to boast commonly, to jest with one or other, to drinke like a good fellow with every body, to sit with the Souldiers when they dine, and to eate and drinke with them souldier-like, it is incredible what wonderfull love it wanne him amongst them. And furthermore, being given to love, that made him the more desired, and by that meanes he brought many to love him. For he would further every mans love, and also would not be angry that men should merrily tell him of those he loved. But besides all this, that which most procured his rising and advancement, was his liberality, who gave all to the Souldiers, and kept nothing for himselfe: and when he was grown to great credit, then was his Authority and Power also very great, the which notwithstanding himselfe did overthrow by a thousand other faults he had. In this place I will shew you one example onely of his wonderfull liberality. He commanded one day his Cofferer that kept his Money, to give a friend of his five and twenty Myriades, which the ROMANES call in their Tongue, Decies. His Cofferer marvelling at it, and being angry withall in his minde, brought him all this Money in a heape together, to shew him what a marvellous Masse of Money it was. Antonius seeing it as he went by, asked what it was: the Cofferer answered him, It was the Money he willed him to give unto his friend. Then Antonius perceiving the spite of his man, I thought (said he) that Decies had been a greater Summe of Money then it is, for this is but a trifle: and therefore he gave his friend as much more another time, but that was afterwards.

Alexander, Cyrus, and Caesar, all contended to reigne. Caesars ambition on the onely cause of the civill Warre.

Caesar gave the charge of Italy unto Antonius. Antonius Vices.

Now the ROMANES maintaining two factions at ROME at that time, one against the other, of the which, they that tooke part with the Senate did joyne with Pompey being then in ROME: and the contrary side taking part with the People, sent for Caesar to aide them, who made Warres in GAULE: then Curio, Antonius friend, that had changed his Garments, and at that time tooke part with Caesar, whose Enemy he had been before, he wanne Antonius; and so handled the matter, partly through the great credit and sway he bare amongst the People, by reason of his Eloquent Tongue, and partly also by his exceeding expence of Money he made which Caesar gave him: that Antonius was chosen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this was a great helpe and furtherance to Caesars practises. For so soone as Antonius became Tribune, he did oppose himselfe against those things which the Confull Marcellus preferred (who ordained that certaine Legions which had been already leaved and billed, should be given unto Cneus Pompey, with further Commission and authority to leave others unto them) and set down an Order, that the Souldiers which were already leaved and assembled, should be sent into SYRIA for a new supply unto Marcus Bibulus, who made Warre at that time against the PARTHIANS. And further, gave a prohibition that Pompey should leavy no more men, and also that the Souldiers should not obey him. Secondly, where Pompeys friends and followers would not suffer Caesars Letters to be received, and openly read in the Senate, Antonius having power and warrant by his Person, through the holinesse of his Tribuneship, did read them openly, and made divers men change their mindes: for it appeared to them that Caesar by his Letters required no unreasonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of consideration unto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey or Caesar should leave their Army, there were few of the Senators that thought it meet Pompey should leave his Army, but they all in manner commanded Caesar to do it. Then Antonius rising up, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Caesar both, should leave their Armies. Thereupon all the Senators joyntly together gave their whole consent, and with a great cry commending Antonius, they prayed him to referre it to the judgement of the Senate. But the Consuls would not allow of that. Therefore Caesars friends preferred other reasonable demands and requests againe, but Cato spake against them: and Lentulus, one of the Consuls drave Antonius by force out of the Senate, who at his going out made grievous curses against him. After that, he tooke a Slaves Gowne, and speedily fled to Caesar, with Quintus Cassius, in a hired Coach. When they came to Caesar, they cried out with open mouth, that all went hand over head at ROME: for the Tribunes of the People might not speake their mindes; and were driven away in great danger of their lives, as many as stood with Law and Justice. Hereupon Caesar went incontinently into ITALY with his Army, which made Cicero say in his Philippides: That as Hellen was cause of the Warre of TROY, so was Antonius the Author of the civill Warres; which indeed was a starke lie. For Caesar was not so fickle headed, nor so easily carried away with anger, that he would so suddainly have gone and made Warre with his Countrey, upon the sight onely of Antonius and Cassius, being fled to him in miserable Apparell, and in a hired Coach, had he not long before determined it with himselfe. But fith indeed Caesar looked of long time but for some colour, this came as he wished, and gave him just occasion of Warre. But to say truly, nothing else moved him to make Warre with all the World as he did, but one selfe cause, which first procured Alexander and Cyrus also before him, to wit, an insatiable desire to reigne, with a senselesse covetousnesse to be the best man in the World; the which he could not come unto, before he had put down Pompey, and utterly overthrowne him. Now after that Caesar had gotten ROME at his commandement, and had driven Pompey out of ITALY, he purposed first to go into SPAIN against the Legions Pompey had there: and in the meane time to make provision for Ships and marine preparation, to follow Pompey. In his absence, he left Lepidus that was Prætor Governour of ROME: and Antonius that was Tribune, he gave him charge of all the Souldiers, and of ITALY. Then was Antonius straight marvellously commended and beloved of the Souldiers, because he commonly exercised himselfe among them, and would oftentimes eate and drinke with them, and also be liberall unto them, according to his ability. But then in contrary manner, he purchased divers other mens evil wils, because that through negligence he would not doe them justice that were injured, and dealt very churlishly with them that had any suite unto him: and besides all this, he had an ill name to entice mens Wives. To conclude, Caesars friends that governed under him, were cause why they hated Caesars Government (which indeed in respect of himselfe was no lesse then a tyranny) by reason of the great insolencies and outrageous parts that were committed: amongst whom Antonius that was of greatest power, and that also committed greatest faults, deserved most blame. But Caesar notwithstanding, when he returned from the Warres of SPAIN, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put up against him: but contrarily, because he found him a hardy man, and a valiant Captaine, he employed him in his chiefeft affaires, and was no whit deceived in his opinion of him. So he passed over the IONIAN Sea unto BRUNDISIUM, being but slenderly accompanied, and sent unto Antonius and Gabinus, that they should imbarke their men as soone as they could, and passe them over into MACEDON. Gabinus was afraid to take the Sea, because it was very rough, and in the Winter-time: and therefore fetched a great compasse about by Land. But Antonius fearing some danger might come unto Caesar, because he was compassed in with a great number of Enemies, first of all he drave away Liba, who rode at Anchor with a great Army before the Haven of BRUNDISIUM. For he manned out such a number of Pinnaes, Barkes, and other small Boates about every one of his Gallies, that he drave him thence. After that, he imbarke into Ships twenty thousand Footmen, and eight hundred hundred Horsemen, and with this Army he hoisted saile. When the Enemies saw him, they made out to follow him: but the Sea rose so high, that the billowes put backe their Gallies that they could not come near him, and so he escaped that danger. But withall he fell upon the Rocks with his whole Fleet, where the Sea wrought very high, so that he was out of all hope to save himselfe. Yet by good fortune, suddainly the Winde turned South-west, and blew from the gulf, driving the waves of the River into the maine Sea. Thus Antonius loosing from the Land, and sailing with safety at his pleasure, soone after he saw all the Coasts full of Shipwrackes. For the force and boisterousnesse of the winde did cast away the Gallies that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and splited, and divers also cast away: and Antonius tooke a great number of them Prisoners, with a great summe of Money also. Besides all these, he tooke the City of LYSSUS, and brought Caesar a great supply of men, and made him courageous, coming at a pinch with so great a power to him. Now there were divers hot Skirmishes and Encounters, in the which Antonius fought so valiantly, that he carried the praise from them all: but specially at two severall times, when Caesars men turned their backs, and fled for life. For he stepped before them, and compelled them to returne againe to fight: so that the Victory fell on Caesars side. For this cause he had the second place in the Campe among the Souldiers, and they spake of no other man unto Caesar, but of him: who shewed plainly what opinion he had of him, when at the last Battell of PHARSALIA (which indeed was the last triall of all, to give the Conquerour the whole Empire of the World) he himselfe did lead the right Wing of his Army, and gave Antonius the leading of the left Wing, as the valiantest man and skilfullest Souldier of all those he had about him. After Caesar had wonne the Victory, and that he was created Dictator, he followed Pompey step by step: howbeit, before he named Antonius Generall of the Horsemen, and sent him to ROME. The Generall of the Horsemen is the second Office of Dignity, when the Dictator is in the City: but when he is abroad, he is the chiefeft man, and almost the onely man that remaineth, and all the other Offices and Magistrates are put down, after there is a Dictator chosen. Notwithstanding, Dolabella being at that time Tribune, and a young man desirous of change and innovation, he preferred a Law which the ROMANES call Novæ tabulæ (as much to say, as a cutting off and cancelling of all Obligations and Specialties; and were called New tables, because they were driven then to make Bookes of daily receipt and expence,) and perswaded Antonius his friend (who also gaped for a good occasion to please and gratifie the common People) to aide him to passe this Law. But Trebellius and Asinius dissuaded from it all they could possible. So by good hap it chanced that Antonius mistrusted Dolabella for keeping of his Wife, and tooke such a conceit of it, that he thrust his Wife out of his house, being his Cousin Germane, and the Daughter of C. Annonius who was Confull with Cicero; and joyning with Asinius, he resisted Dolabella, and fought with him, Dolabella hat gotten the Market-place, where the People do assemble in Councell, and had filled it full of armed men, intending to have this Law of the New tables to passe by force. Antonius by commandement of the Senate, who had given him authority to leave men, and to use force against Dolabella, went against him, and fought so valiantly, that men were slaine on both sides. But by this meane he got the ill will of the common People; and on the other side, the Noble men (as Cicero saith) did not onely mislike him, but also hate him for his naughty life: for they did abhor his banquets and drunken Feasts he made at unreasonable times, and his extreame wastfull expences upon vaine light huswives; and then in the day time he would sleep or walke out his drunkennesse, thinking to weare away the fume of the abundance of Wine which he had taken over-night. In his house they did nothing but feast, dance, and maske: and himselfe passed away the time in hearing of foolish Playes, and marrying these Players, Tumblers, Jesters, and such sort of People. As for prooffe hereof it is reported, that at Hippias marriage, one of his Jesters, he dranke Wine so lustily all night, that the next morning when he came to pleade before the People assembled in Councell, who had sent for him, he being queasie stomacked with his Surfet he had taken, was compelled to lay up all before them, and one of his friends held him his Gown instead of a Basen. He had another pleasant Player called Sergius, that was one of the chiefeft men about him, and a Woman also called Cytheride, of the same profession, whom he loved dearly: he carried her up and down in a Litter unto all the Townes he went, and had as many men waiting upon her Litter (she being but a Player) as were attending upon his own Mother. It grieved honest men also very much, to see that when he went into the Countrey he carried with him a great number of Cup boards full of Silver and Gold Plate openly in the face of the World, as it had been the pompe or shew of some Triumph: and that estoones in the midst of his journey he would set up his Hals and Tents hard by some greene Grove or pleasant River, and there his Cooks should prepare him a sumptuous Dinner. And furthermore, Lions were harnessed in Traces to draw his Carts: and besides also, in honest mens houses in the Cities where he came, he would have common Harlots, Curtizans, and these tumbling gillots lodged. Now it grieved men much, to see that Caesar should be out of ITALY following of his Enemies, to end it is great Warre with such great perill and danger, and that others in the meane time abusing his name and authority, should commit such insolent and outrageous parts upon their Citi zens. This me thinks was the cause that made the conspiracy against Caesar increase more and more, and laid the reines of the bridle upon the Souldiers neckes, whereby they durst more boldly commit many extortions, cruelties and robberies. And therefore Caesar after his returne pardoned Dolabella, and being treated Confull the third time, he tooke not Antonius, but choose Lepidus his Colleague and fellow Confull. Afterwards when Pompeys house was put to open sale, Antonius bought it: but when they asked him Money for it, he

he made it very strange, and was offended with them; and wrote himselfe that he would not go with Cesar into the Warres of Africke, because he was not well recompensed for the service he had done him before. Yet Cesar did somewhat bridle his madnesse and infoleney, not suffering him to passe his faults so lightly away, making as though he saw them not. And therefore he left his dissolute manner of life, and married Fulvia that was Clodius Widow, a Woman not so basely minded to spend her time in spinning and hufwivry; and was not contented to master her Husband at home, but would also rule him in his Office abroad, and commanded him that commanded Legions and great Armies: so that Cleopatra was to give Fulvia thanks for that she had taught Antonius this obedience to Women, that learned so well to be at their commandement. Now, because Fulvia was somewhat fowre and crooked of condition, Antonius devised to make her pleasanter, and somewhat better disposed: and therefore he would play her many pretty youthfull parts to make her merry. As he did once, when Cesar returned the last time of all Conquerour out of SPAIN, every man went out to meet him, and so did Antonius with the rest. But on the suddain there ranne a rumour through ITALIE, that Cesar was dead, and that his Enemies came againe with a great Army. Thereupon he returned with speed to ROME, and tooke one of his mens Gownes, and so apparelled came home to his house in a darke night, saying, that he had brought Fulvia Letters from Antonius. So he was let in, and brought to her muffled as he was, for being known: but the taking the matter heavily, asked him if Antonius were well. Antonius gave her the Letters, and said never a word. So when she had opened the Letters, and began to reade them, Antonius ramped on her necke, and killed her. We have told you this tale for examples sake onely, and so could we also tell you of many such like as these. Now when Cesar was returned from his last Warre in SPAIN, all the chiefeft Nobility of the City rode many daies journey from ROME to meet him, where Cesar made marvellous much of Antonius above all the men that came unto him. For he alwaies tooke him into his Coach with him throughout all ITALY, and behinde him Brutus Albinus and Octavius the Son of his Neece, who afterwards was called Cesar and became Emperor of ROME long time after. So Cesar being afterwards chosen Consull the fift time, he immediately chose Antonius his Colleague and Companion: and desired by depositing himselfe of his Consulship, to make Delabella Consul in his roome, and had already moved it to the Senate. But Antonius did stoutly withstand it, and openly reviled Delabella in the Senate, and Delabella also spared him as little. Thereupon Cesar being affamed of the matter, he let it alone. Another time also when Cesar attempted againe to substitute Delabella Consul in his place, Antonius cried out, that the signes of the Birds were against it: so that at length Cesar was compelled to give him place, and to let Delabella alone, who was marvellously offended with him. Now in truth, Cesar made no great reckoning of either of them both. For it is reported that Cesar answered one that did accuse Antonius and Delabella unto him for some matter of conspiracy: Tush said he, they be not those fat fellowes and fine combed men that I feare, but I mistrust rather these pale and leane men, meaning by Brutus and Cassius, who afterwards conspired his death and slew him. Antonius murtherers afterwards gave Cesar Enemies just occasion and colour to do as they did: as you shall hear. The ROMANS by chance celebrated the Feast called Lupercalia, and Cesar being apparelled in his triumphing Robe, was set in the Tribune where they use to make their Orations to the People, and from thence did behold the sport of the Runners. The manner of this running was thus: On that day there are many young men of noble house, and those specially that be chiefe Officers for that yeare, who running naked up and down the City, anointed with the Oyle of Olive, for pleasure to strike them they meet in their way, with white Leather Thongs they have in their hands. Antonius being one among the rest that was to run, leaving the ancient Ceremonies and old Customes of that Solemnity, he ran to the Tribune where Cesar was set, and carried a Lawrell Crown in his hand, having a Royall Band or Diademe wreathed about it, which in old time was the ancient marke and token of a King. When he was come to Cesar, he made his fellow Runners with him lift him up, and so he did put his Lawrell Crown upon his head, signifying thereby that he had deserved to be King. But Cesar making as though he refused it, turned away his head. The People were so rejoiced at it, that they all clapped their hands for joy. Antonius againe did put it on his head: Cesar againe refused it; and thus they were striving off and on a great while together. As oft as Antonius did put this Lawrell Crown unto him, a few of his followers rejoiced at it: and as oft also as Cesar refused it, all the People together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderful thing, that they suffered all things, subjects should do by commandement of their Kings: and yet they could not abide the Name of a King, detesting it as the utter destruction of their Liberty. Cesar in a rage arose out of his Seate, and plucking down the choller of his Gown from his necke, he shewed it naked, bidding any man strike off his head that would. This Lawrell Crown was afterwards put upon the head of one of Cesar Statues or Images, the which one of the Tribunes pluckt off. The People liked his doing therein so well, that they waited on him home to his house, with great clapping of hands. Howbeit Cesar did turne them out of their Offices for it. This was a good encouragement for Brutus and Cassius to conspire his death, who fell into a consort with their trustiest friends, to execute their enterprife, but yet stood doubtful whether they should make Antonius privy to it or not. All the rest liked of it, saving Trebonius onely. He told them, that when they rode to meet Cesar at his returne out of SPAIN, Antonius and he alwaies keeping company, and lying together by the way, he felt his minde afar off: but Antonius finding his meaning, would hearken no more unto it, and yet notwithstanding never made Cesar acquainted with this talke, but had faithfully kept it to himselfe. After that that they consulted whether they should kill Antonius with Cesar. But Brutus would in his wife consent to it, saying, that venturing on such an enterprife as this, for the maintenance of Law and justice, it ought to be cleare from all villany. Yet they fearing Antonius power, and the Authority of his Office, appointed certaine of the conspiracy, that when Antonius were gone into the Senate, and while others should execute their enterprife, they should keep Antonius in a talke out of the Senate-house. Even as they had devised these matters, so were they executed: and Cesar was slain in the midst of the Senate. Antonius being put in a feare withall, cast a Slaves Gown upon him, and hid himselfe. But afterwards when it was told him that the Murderers slew no man else; and that they went onely into the Capitoll, he sent his Son unto them for a pledge, and bad them boldly come down upon his word. The selfe same day he bid Cassius to suppe; and Lepidus also bid Brutus. The next morning the Senate was assembled, and Antonius himselfe preferred a Law; that all things past should be forgotten, and that they should appoint Provinces unto Cassius and Brutus: the which the Senate confirmed, and further ordained, that they should cancel one of Cesar Lawes. Thus went Antonius out of the Senate more praised and better esteemed then ever man was, because it seemed to every man that he had cut off all occasion of civill Warres, and that he had shewed himselfe a marvellous wife Governour of the Common-wealth: for the appealing of these matters of so great weight and importance. But now, the opinion he conceived of himselfe after he had a little felt the good will of the People towards him, hoping thereby to make himselfe the chiefeft man if he might overcome Brutus, did easily make him alter his first minde. And therefore when Cesar body was brought to the place where it should be buried, he made a Funerall Oration in commendation of Cesar, according to the ancient custome of praying noble men at their Funerals. When he saw that the People were very glad and desirous also to hear Cesar spoken of, and his praises uttered, he mingled his Oration with lamentable words; and by amplifying of matters did greatly move their hearts and affections unto pity and compassion. In fine to conclude his Oration, he unfolded before the whole Assembly the bloody Garments of the dead, thrust through in many places with their Swords, and called the Malefactors, cruell and cursed Murderers. With these words he put the people into such a fury, that they presently tooke Cesar Body, and burnt it in the Market-place, with such Tables and Formes as they could get together. Then when the fire was kindled, they tooke fire-brands, and ran to the Murderers houses to set them on fire, and to make them come out to fight. Brutus therefore and his accomplices, for safety of their persons were driven to flee the City. Then came all Cesar friends unto Antonius, and specially his Wife Calpurnia putting her trust in him, she brought the most part of her Money into his house, which amounted to the Summe of foure thousand Talents; and furthermore brought him all Cesar Books and Writings, in the which were his Memorials of all that he had done and ordained. Antonius did daily mingle with them such as he thought good, and by that meanes he created new Officers, made new Senators, called home some that were banished, and delivered those that were Prisoners: and then he said, that all those things were so appointed and ordained by Cesar. Therefore the ROMANS mocking them that were so moved, they called them CHARONITES, because that when they were overcome, they had no other helpe but to say, that thus they were found in Cesar Memorials, who had failed in Charon Boate, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled absolutely also in all other matters, because he was consull, and Caius one of his Brethren Prator, and Lucius the other Tribune. Now things remaining in this state at ROME, Octavius Cesar the younger came to ROME, who was the Son of Julius Cesar Neece, as you have heard before, and was left his lawful Heire by Will, remaining at the time of the death of his great Uncle that was slain, in the City of APOLLONIA. This young man at his first arrivall went to salute Antonius, as one of his late dead Father Cesar friends, who by his last Will and Testament had made him his Heire: and withall, he was presently in hand with him for Money and other things which were left of trust in his hands; because Cesar had by Will bequeathed unto the People of ROME threefoore and fiftene Silver Drachmes to be given to every man, the which he as Heire stood charged withall. Antonius at the first made no reckoning of him, because he was very young, and said, he lacked wit, and good friends to advise him, if he looked to take such a charge in hand, as to undertake to be Cesar Heire. But when Antonius saw that he could not shake him off with those words, and that he was still in hand with him for his Fathers Goods, but specially for the ready Money, then he spake and did what he could against him. And first of all, it was he that did keep him from being Tribune of the People: and also when Octavius began to meddle with the dedicating of the Chaire of Gold, which was prepared by the Senate to honour Cesar with, he threatened to send him to Prison, and moreover desired not to put the People in an uproare. This young Cesar seeing his doings, went unto Cicero and others, which were Antonius Enemies, and by them crept into favour with the Senate: and he himselfe sought the Peoples good will every manner of way, gathering together the old Souldiers of the late deceased Cesar, which were dispersed in divers Cities and Colonies. Antonius being afraid of it, talked with Octavius in the Capitoll, and became his friend. But the very same night Antonius had a strange Dreame, who thought that lightning fell upon him, and burnt his right hand. Shortly after word was brought him, that Cesar lay in waite to kill him. Cesar cleared himselfe unto him and told him there was no such matter: but he could not make Antonius beleve the contrary. Whereupon they became further Enemies then ever they were: infomuch that both of them made friends of either side to gather together all the old Souldiers through ITALY, that were dispersed in divers Townes: and made them large promises, and sought also to winne the Legions on their their side, which were already in armes. Cicero on the other side being at that time the chiefeft man of authority and estimation in the City, he stirred up all men against Antonius: so that in the end he made the Senate pronounce him an Enemy to his Country, and appointed young Caesar Sergeants to carry Axes before him, and such other signes as were incident to the Dignity of a Consul or Prætor: and moreover, sent Hircius and Panfa, then Consuls, to drive Antonius out of ITALIE. These two Consuls together with Caesar, who also had an Army, went against Antonius that besieged the City of MODENA, and there overthrew him in Battell: but both the Consuls were slaine there. Antonius flying upon this overthrow, fell into great misery all at once: but the chiefeft want of all other, and that pinched him most, was famine. Howbeit he was of such a strong nature, that by patience he would overcome any adversity, and the heavier fortune lay upon him, the more constant shewed he himselfe. Every man that seeth want or adversity, knoweth by Vertue and discretion what he should do: when indeed they are overlaid, with extremity, and be sore oppressed, few have the hearts to follow that which they praise and commend, and much lesse to avoid that they reprove and dislike: but rather to the contrary, they yeeld to their accustomed ease life, and through faint-heart, and lacke of courage, do change their first minde and purpose. And therefore it was a wonderfull example to the Souldiers, to see Antonius that was brought up in all finesse and superfluity, so easily to drink puddle water, and to eat wild Fruits and Roots: and moreover it is reported, that even as they passed the Alpes, they did eat the barks of Trees, and such Beasts as never man tasted of their flesh before. Now their intent was to joyne with the Legions that were on the other side of the Mountaines, under Lepidus charge: whom Antonius tooke to be his friend, because he had holpen him to many things at Caesars hand, through his meanes. When he was come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him: and when he saw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venture himselfe, and to go unto Lepidus. Since the overthrow he had at MODENA, he suffered his beard to grow at length and never clip it, that it was marvellous long, and the Hire of his head also without combing: and besides all this, he went in a mourning Gown, and after this sort came hard to the Trenches of Lepidus Camp. Then he began to speake unto the Souldiers, and many of them their hearts yearned for pity to see him so poorly arrayed, and some also through his words began to pity him: insomuch that Lepidus began to be afraid, and therefore commanded all the Trumpets to sound together to stop the Souldiers eares, that they should not hearken to Antonius. This notwithstanding, the Souldiers tooke the more pity of him, and spake secretly with him by Clodius and Lucius meanes, whom they sent unto him disguised in Womens apparell, and gave him counsell that he should not be afraid to enter into their Campe, for there were a great number of Souldiers that would receive him, and kill Lepidus, if he would say the word. Antonius would not suffer them to hurt him, but the next morning he went with his Army to wade a foord, at a little River that ran between them: and himselfe was the foremost man that tooke the River to get over, seeing a number of Lepidus Campe that gave him their hands, plucked up the stakes, and layed flat the bancke of their Trench to let him into their Campe. When he was come into their Campe, and that he had all the Army at his commandement, he used Lepidus very courteously, embraced him, and called him Father: and though indeed Antonius did all, and ruled the whole Army, yet he alway gave Lepidus the Name and Honour of the Capitaine. Munacius Plancus, lying also in Campe hard by with an Army, understanding the report of Antonius courtesie, he also came and joyined with him. Thus Antonius being a foot againe, and grown of great power, repassed over the Alpes, leading into ITALIE with him severene Legions, and ten thousand Horsemen, besides six Legions he left in Garrison among the GAULES, under the charge of one Varus, a Companion of his that would drinke lustily with him, and therefore in mockery was surnamed Cotta, to wit, a bibber. So Octavius Caesar would not leane to Cicero, when he saw that his whole travell and endeavour was onely to restore the Common-wealth to her former liberty. Therefore he sent certaine of his friends to Antonius, to make them friends againe: and thereupon all three met together (to wit, Caesar Antonius and Lepidus) in an Island environed round about with a little River, and there remained three daies together. Now as touching all other matters, they were easily agreed, and did divide all the Empire of Rome between them, as if it had been their owne Inheritance. But yet they could hardly agree whom they would put to death: for every one of them would kill their Enemies, and save their Kinsmen and friends. Yet at length, giving place to their greedy desire to be revenged of their Enemies, they spruod all reverence of Blood, and holiness of friendship at their feet. For Caesar left Cicero to Antonius will, Antonius also forooke Lucius Caesar, who was his Uncle by his Mother: and both of them together suffered Lepidus to kill his own Brother Paulus. Yet some Writers affirme, that Caesar and Antonius requested Paulus might be slaine, and that Lepidus was contented with it. In my Opinion there was never a more horrible, unnatural, and crueller change then this was. For thus changing murder for murder, they did aswell kill those whom they did forsake and leave unto others, as those also which others left unto them to kill: but so much more was their wickednesse and cruelty great unto their friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, and having no cause to hate them. After their plot was agreed upon between them, the Souldiers that were thereabouts, would have his friendship and league betwixt them confirmed by marriage, and that Caesar should marry Clodia, the Daughter of Fulvia Antonius Wife. This marriage also being agreed upon, they condemned three hundred of the chiefeft Citizens of Rome, to be put to death by proscription. And Antonius also commanded them to whom he had given Commission to kill Cicero, that they should strike off his head head and right hand, with the which he had written the invective Orations (called Philippides) against Antonius. So when the Murderers brought him Ciceros head and hand cut off, he beheld them a long time with great joy, and laughed heartily, and that oftentimes for the great joy he felt. Then when he had taken his pleasure of the sight of them, he caused them to be let up in an open place, over the Pulpit for Orations (where when he was alive, he had often spoken to the People,) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not blemished his owne fortune, shewing himselfe (to his great shame and infamy) a cruell man, and unworthy the Office and authority he bare. His Uncle Lucius Caesar also, as they fought for him to kill him, and followed him hard, fled unto his Sister. The Murderers coming thither, forcing to breake into her Chamber, she stood at her Chamber door with her armes abroad, crying out still: You shall not kill Lucius Caesar, before you first kill me, that bare your Capitaine in my Wombe. By this meanes she saved her Brothers life. Now the Government of these Triumviri grew odious and hatefull to the ROMANS, for divers respects: but they most blamed Antonius, because he being elder then Caesar, and of more power and force then Lepidus, gave himselfe againe to his former riot and excessse, when he left to deale in the Affaires of the Common-wealth. But setting aside the ill Name he had for his infolency, he was yet much more hated in respect of the house he dwelt in, the which was the house of Pompey the Great: a man as famous for his temperance, modesty, and civill life, as for his three Triumphs. For it grieved them to see the gates commonly shut against the Captaines, Magistrates of the City, and also Ambassadors of strange Nations which were sometimes thrust from the gate with violence: and that the house within was full of Tumblers, anticke Dancers, Juglers, Players, Jestlers, and Drunkards, quaffing and guzzling; and that on them he bestowed the most part of his Money he got by all kinde of possible extortions, bribery and policy. For they did not onely sell by the Cryer the goods of those whom they had out-lawed and appointed to murder, slanderously deceived the poor Widowes and young Orphanes, and also raised all kinds of Imposts, Subsidies and Taxes: but notwithstanding also that the holy Vestall Nunnes had certaine goods and money put in their custody to keep, both of mens in the City, and those also that were abroad, they went thither, and tooke them away by force. Octavius Caesar perceiving that no Money would serve Antonius turne, he prayed that they might divide the Money between them, and so did they also divide the Army, for them both to go into MACEDON to make Warre against Brutus and Cassius: and in the meane time they left the Government of the City of Rome unto Lepidus. When they had passed over the Seas, and that they began to make Warre, they being both camped by their Enemies, to wit, Antonius against Cassius and Caesar against Brutus, Caesar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the upper hand, and did all. For at the first Battell Caesar was overthrowne by Brutus, and lost his Campe, and very hardly saved himselfe by flying from them that followed him. Howbeit he writeth himselfe in his Commentaries, that he fled before the charge was given, because of a Dreame one of his friends had. Antonius on the other side overthrew Cassius in Battell, though some write that he was not there himselfe at the Battell, but that he came after the overthrow, whilst his men had the Enemies in chase. So Cassius at his earnest request was slaine by a faithfull servant of his own called Pindarus, whom he had enfranchised: because he knew not in time that Brutus had overcome Caesar. Shortly after they fought another Battell againe, in the which Brutus was overthrowne, who afterwards also slew himselfe. Thus Antonius had the chiefeft glory of this Victory, specially because Caesar was sicke at that time. Antonius having found Brutus body after this Battell, blaming him much for the murder of his Brother Caius, whom he had put to death in MACEDON for revenge of Ciceros cruell death, and yet laying the fault more in Hortensius then in him, he made Hortensius to be slaine on his Brothers Tombe. Furthermore he cast his Coate-armour (which was wonderfull rich and sumptuous) upon Brutus Body, and gave commandement to one of his Slaves enfranchised, to defray the charge of his buriall. But afterwards Antonius hearing that his enfranchised bondmen had not burnt his Coate-armour with his body, because it was very rich, and worth a great summe of Money, and that he had also kept backe much of the ready Money appointed for his Funerall and Tombe, he also put him to death. After that, Caesar was conveyed to Rome, and it was thought he would not live long, nor escape the sicknesse he had. Antonius on the other side went towards the East Provinces and Regions to leave money: and first of all he went into GREECE, and carried an infinite number of Souldiers with him. Now, because every Souldier was promised five thousand Silver Drachmes, he was driven of necessity to impose extreame Tallages and Taxations. At his first coming into GREECE, he was not hard nor bitter unto the GRECIANS, but gave himselfe onely to hear wise men dispute, to see Playes, and also to note the Ceremonies and sacrifices of GREECE, ministring justice to every man: and it pleased him marvellously to hear them call him Philhellens, (as much to say, A lover of the GRECIANS) and specially the ATHENIANS, to whom he did many great pleasures. Wherefore the MEGARIANS, to exceed the ATHENIANS, thinking to shew Antonius a goodly sight, they prayed him to come and see their Senate-house, and Councell-hall. Antonius went thither to see it. So when he had seene it at his pleasure, they asked him: My Lord, how like you our Hall? Me thinkes (quoth he) it is little, old, and ready to fall down. Furthermore he tooke measure of the Temple of Apollo Pythias, and promised the Senate to finish it. But when he was once come into ASIA, having left Lucius Cornelius Gouvernour in GREECE, and that he had felt the riches and pleasures of the East parts, and that Princes, great Lords, and Kings, came to waite at his gate for his coming out: and that Queenes and Princesses to excell one another, gave him very rich Presents, and came to see him, curiously setting forth themselves, themselves, and using all Art that might be to shew their beauty, to winne his favour the more: (Cesar in the meane space turmoyleing his wits and body in civill Warres at home, Antonius living merrily and quietly abroad) he easily fell againe to his old licentious life. For straight, one Anaxenor a Player of the Citherne, Xonius a Player of the Flute, Metrodorus a Tumbler, and such a rabble of Minstrels and fit Ministers for the pleasures of Asia, (who in fineness and flattery passed all the other plagues he brought with him out of ITALY) all these flocked in his Court, and bare the whole sway: and after that, all went awry. For every one gave themselves to riot and excessse, when they saw he delighted in it: and all Asia was like to the City Sophocles speaketh of in one of his Tragedies:

to Cleopatra

For in the City of EPHEsus, Women attired as they go in the Feasts and Sacrifice of Bacchus, came out to meet him with such Solemnities and Ceremonies, as are then used: with men and Children disguised like Faunes and Satyres. Moreover, the City was full of Ivy, and Darts wreathed about with Ivy, Psalterions, Flutes and Howboyes; and in their Songs they called him Bacchus Father of mirth, courteous and gentle: and so was he unto some, but to the most part of men, cruell and extreame. For he robbed Noblemen and Gentlemen of their goods, to give it unto vile flatterers: who oftentimes begged living mens goods, as though they had been dead, and would enter their houses by force. As he gave a Citizens house of MAGNESIA unto a Cooke, because (as it is reported) he dressed him a fine Supper. In the end he doubled the Taxation, and imposed a Second upon Asia. But then Hybraus the Oratour sent from the Estates of Asia to tell him the state of their Country, boldly said unto him: If thou wilt have power to lay two Tribunes in one year upon us, thou shouldest also have power to give us two Summers, two Autumnes, and two Harvests. This was gallantly and pleasantly spoken unto Antonius by the Oratour, and it pleased him well to hear it: but afterwards amplifying his speech, he spake more boldly, and to better purpose: Asia hath payed thee two hundred thousand Talents. If all this Money be not come to thy Coffers, then aske account of them that leaved it: but if thou have received it, and nothing be left of it, then are we utterly undone. Hybraus words nettled Antonius roundly. For he understood not of the thefts and robberies his Officers committed by his Authority, in his Treasure and Affaires: not so much because he was careless, as for that he over-simply trusted his men in all things. For he was a plaine man, without subtilty, and therefore over-late found out the foule faults they committed against him: but when he heard of them, he was much offended, and would plainly confesse it unto them whom his Officers had done injury unto by countenance of his authority. He had a noble minde, as well to punish offenders, as to reward well doers: and yet he did exceed more in giving, then in punishing. Now for his outrageous manner of railing he commonly used, mocking and flouting of every man, that was remedied by it selfe: for a man might as boldly exchange a mocke with him, and he was well contented to be mocked, as to mocke others: but yet it oftentimes marred all. For he thought that those which told him so plainly and truly in mirth, would never flatter him in good earnest in any matters of weight. But thus he was easily abused by the praises they gave him, not finding how these flatterers mingled their flattery under this familiar and plaine manner of speech unto him, as a fine device to make difference of Meats with sharpe and tart Sauce; and also to keepe him by this frantick jekling and boarding with him at the Table, that their common flattery should not be troublesome unto him, as men do easily mislike to have too much of one thing: and that they handled him finely thereby, when they would give him place in any matter of weight, and follow his counsell, that it might not appeare to him they did it so much to please him, but because they were ignorant, and understood not so much as he did. Antonius being thus inclined, the last and extreamest mischief of all other (to wit, the love of Cleopatra) lighted on him, who did waken and stirre up many Vices yet hidden in him, and were never seen to any and if any sparke of goodnesse or hope of rising were left him, Cleopatra quenched it straight, and made it worse then before. The manner how he fell in love with her was this. Antonius going to make Warre with the PARTHIANS, sent to command Cleopatra to appeare personally before him when he came into CILICIA, to answer unto such Accusations as were laid against her, being this: that she had aided Cassius and Brutus in their Warre against him. The Messenger sent unto Cleopatra to make this summons unto her, was called Dellius; who when he had thoroughly considered her Beauty, the excellent grace and sweetnesse of her Tongue, he nothing mistrusted that Antonius would do any hurt to so noble a Lady, but rather assured himselfe, that within few daies she should be in great favour with him. Thereupon he did her great honour, and persuaded her to come into CILICIA, as honourably furnished as she could possibly; and had her not to be afraid at all of Antonius, for he was a more courteous Lord, then any that she had ever seen. Cleopatra on the other side beleiving Dellius words, and guessing by the former access and credit she had with Julius Caesar, and C. Pompey. (The Son of Pompey the Great) onely for her beauty, she began to have good hope that she might more easily win Antonius. For Cesar and Pompey knew her when she was but a young thing, and knew not then what the World meant: but now she went to Antonius at the age when a Womans Beauty is at the prime, and she also of best judgement. So she furnished her selfe with a world of Gifts, store of Gold and Silver, and of Riches and other sumptuous Ornaments, as is credible enough she might bring from so great a house, and from so wealthy and rich a Realme as EGYPT was. But yet she carried nothing with her wherein she trusted trusted more then in her selfe, and in the charmes and enchantment of her passing beauty and grace. Therefore when she was sent unto by divers Letters, both from Antonius himselfe, and also from his friends, she made so light of it, and mocked Antonius so much, that she diddine to set forward otherwise, but to take her Barge in the River of Cydnus; the Poop whereof was of Gold, the Sailes of Purple, and the Oares of Silver, which kept stroke in rowing after the found of the Musick of Flutes, Howboyes, Cithernes, Viols, and such other Instruments as they played upon in the Barge. And now for the person of her selfe, she was layed under a Pavillion of Cloth of Gold of Tissue, apparelled and attired like the goddesse Venus, commonly drawne in Picture: and hard by her, on either hand of her, pretty faire Boyes apparelled as Painters do set forth god Cupid, with little Fans in their hands, with the which they fanned winde upon her. Her Ladies and Gentlewomen also, the fairest of them were apparelled like the Nymphs Nereides (which are the Myrmaids of the Waters) and like the Graces; some steering the Helme, others tending the Tackle and Ropes of the Barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull passing sweete savour of Perfumes, that perfumed the Wharfe side, pestered with innumerable multitudes of People. Some of them followed the Barge all along the River side: others also ran out of the City to see her coming in. So that in the end, there ranne such multitudes of People one after another to see her, that Antonius was left post alone in the Market-place, in his Imperiall Seate to give audience: and there went a rumour in the Peoples mouths, that the goddesse Venus was come to play with the god Bacchus for the generall good of all Asia. When Cleopatra landed, Antonius sent to invite her to supper to him: But she sent him word againe, he should do better rather to come and sup with her, Antonius therefore to shew himselfe courteous unto her at her arrivall, was contented to obey her, and went to supper to her: where he found such passing sumptuous fare, that no tongue can expresse it. But amongst all other things, he most wondered at the infinite number of lights and torches hanged on the top of the house, giving light in every place, so artificially set and ordered by devices, some round, some square: that it was the rarest thing to behold that eye could discern, or that ever Bookes could mention. The next night, Antonius feeling her, contented to passe her in magnificence and fineness: but she overcame him in both. So that he himselfe began to scorne the grosse service of his House, in respect of Cleopatra's sumptuousnesse and fineness. And when Cleopatra found Antonius jests and flents to be but grosse, and Souldier-like, in plaine manner, she gave it him finely, and without feare taunted him thoroughly. Now her beauty (as it is reported) was not so passing, as unmatchable of other women, nor yet such, as upon present view did enamour men with her: but so sweete was her company and conversation, that a man could not possibly but be taken. And besides her beauty, the good grace she had to talke and discourse, her courteous nature that tempered her words and deedes, was a spur to the quicke. Furthermore, besides all these, her voice and words were marvellous pleasant: for her tongue was an Instrument of Musicke to divers Sports and Pastimes, the which she easily turned into any Language that pleased her. She spake unto few barbarous People by Interpreter, but made them answer her selfe, or at the least the most part of them: as the ETHIOPIANS, the ARABIANS, the TROGLODYTES, the HEBREWES, the SYRIANS, the MEDES, and the PARTHIANS, and to many others also, whose Languages she had learned. Whereas divers of her Progenitors, the Kings of EGYPT, could scarce learne the EGYPTIAN Tongue onely, and many of them forgot to speake the MACEDONIAN. Now Antonius was so ravished with the love of Cleopatra, that though his Wife Fulvia had great Wars, and much ado with Cesar for his affaires, and that the Army of the PARTHIANS (the which the King Lieutenants had given to the onely leading of Labiennus) was now assembled in MESOPOTAMIA, ready to invade SYRIA, yet (as though all this had nothing touched him) he yielded himselfe to go with Cleopatra unto ALEXANDRIA, where he spent and lost in childish sports (as a man might say) and idle Pastimes, the most precious thing a man can spend (as Antiphon saith) and that is, Time. For they made an Order betwene them, which they called Amimetobion (as much to say, No life up by Antonius and Cleopatra, Antonius and Cleopatra in Egypt. An Order set up by Antonius and Cleopatra, Antonius and Cleopatra in Egypt. But owne Sonne. This noble exploit as famous as ever any was, was a full revenge to the ROMANES of the shame and losse they had received before by the death of Marcus Crassus: and he made the PARTHIANS flee, and glad to keepe themselves within the Confinnes and Territories of MESOPOTAMIA and MEDIA, after they had thrice together beene overcome in severall Battels. Howbeit Ventidius durst not undertake to follow them any farther, fearing lest he should have gotten Antonius displeasure by it. Notwithstanding, he led his Army against them that had rebelled, and conquered them againe: amongst whom he besieged Antiochus King of COMMAGENA, who offered him to give a thousand Talents to be pardoned his rebellion, and promised ever after to be at Antonius commandement. But Ventidius made him answer, that he should send unto Antonius; who was not far off, and would not suffer Ventidius to make peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this little exploit should passe in his name, and that they should not thinke he did any thing but by his Lieutenant Ventidius. The Siege grew very long, because they that were in the Towne, seeing they could not be received upon no reasonable composition, determined valiantly to defend themselves to the last man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet received great shame, repenting him much that he tooke not their first offer. And yet at the last he was glad to make Truce with Antiochus, and to take three hundred Talents for composition. Thus after he had set order for the State and Affaires of SYRIA, he returned againe to ATHENS: and having given Ventidius such honours as he deserved, he sent him to ROME, to triumph for the PARTHIANS. Ventidius was the onely man that ever triumphed of the PARTHIANS until this present day, a meane man borne, and of no noble House or Family: who onely came to that he attained unto, through Antonius friendship, the which delivered him happy occasion to attchieve great matters; and yet to say truly, he did so well quit himself in all his Enterprises, that he confirmed that which was spoken of Antonius and Cesar, to wit, that they were alway more fortunate when they made Warre by their Lieutenants, then by themselves. For Sossius one of Antonius Lieutenants in SYRIA, did notable good service: and Candidus whom he had also left his Lieutenant in the borders of ARMENIA, did conquer it all. So did he also overcome the Kings of the IBERIANS and ALBANIANS, and went on with his Conquests unto Mount Caucasus. By these Conquests, the fame of Antonius Power increased more and more, and grew dreadfull unto all the barbarous Nations. But Antonius notwithstanding, grew to be marvellously offended with Cesar, upon certaine reports that had beene brought unto him: and so tooke Sea to goe towards ITALY with three hundred Saile. And because those of BRUNDISIUM would not receive his Army into their Haven, he went farther unto TARENTUM. There his Wife Octavia came out of GREECE with him, besought him to send her unto her Brother, the which he did. Octavia at that time was great with childe, and moreover had a second Daughter by him, and yet she put her selfe in journey, and met with her Brother Octavius Caesar by the way, who brought his two chiefe friends, Maecenas and Agrippa with him. She tooke them aside, and with all the instance she could possible, intreated them they would not suffer her that was the happiest Woman of the World, to become now the most wretched and unfortunatest creature of all other. For now, said she, every mans eyes do gaze on me, that am the Sister of one of the Emperours, and Wife of the other. And if the worst counsell take place (which the gods forbid) and that they grow to Warres: for your selves, it is uncertaine to which of them two the gods have assigned the victory or overthrow. But for me, on which side soever the victory fall, my state can be but most miserable still. These words of Octavia so softened Cesar's heart, that he went quickly unto TARENTUM. But it was a noble sight for them that were present, to see so great an Army by Land not to stir; and so many Ships afloat in the Roade, quietly and safe: and furthermore, the meeting and kindeaffe of friends, lovingly embracing one another. First, Antonius feasted Cesar, which he granted unto for his Sisters sake. Afterwards they agreed together, that Cesar should give Antonius two Legions to go against the PARTHIANS: and that Antonius should let Cesar have an hundred Gallies armed with brazen Spurs at the Prowes. Besides all this, Octavia obtained of her Husband twenty Brigantines for her Brother: and of her Brother for her Husband, a thousand armed men. After they had taken leave of each other, Cesar went immediately to make Warre with Sextus Pompeius, to get SICILIA into his hands. Antonius also leaving his Wife Octavia and little Children begotten of her, with Cesar, and his other Children which he had by Fulvia, went directly into ASIA. Then began this pestilent plague and mischief of Cleopatra's love (which had slept a long time, and seemed to have beene utterly forgotten, and that Antonius had given place to better counsell) againe to kindle, and beene utterly forgotten, and that Antonius came neare unto SYRIA. And in the end, the horse of the minde, to be in force, so soone as Antonius came neare unto SYRIA. And in the end, the horse of the minde, as Plato tearmeth it, that is so hard of reine (I meane the unreined lust of concupiscence) did put out of Antonius head all honest and commendable thoughts: for he sent Fonteus Capito to bring Cleopatra unto SYRIA: unto whom, to welcome her, he gave no trifling things; but unto that she had already, he added the Provinces of PHENICIA, thre of the nethermost SYRIA, the Isle of CYPRUS, and a great part of CILICIA, and that Countrey of JURY where the true Balme is, and that part of ARABIA where the NABATHEIANS do dwell, which stretcheth out toward the Ocean. These great gifts much misliked the ROMANES. But now, though Antonius did easily give away great Seignories, Realmes, and mighty Nations unto some private men, and that also he tooke from other Kings their lawfull Realmes (as from Antigonus King of the JEWES, whom he openly beheaded, where never King before had suffered like death: yet all this did not so much offend the ROMANES, as the unmeasurable honours which he did unto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggravate their malice and ill will towards him, because that Cleopatra having brought his two Twinnes, a Sonne

a Sonne and a Daughter, he named his Sonne Alexander, and his Daughter Cleopatra; and gave them to their surnames, the Sonne to the one, and the Moone to the other. This notwithstanding, he that could finely cloake his shamefull deeds with fine words, said, that the greatnesse and magnificence of the Empire of ROME appeared most, not where the ROMANES tooke; but where they gave much: and Nobility was multiplied amongst men by the Posterity of Kings, when they left of their seede in divers places: and that by this means his first Ancestor was begotten of Hercules, who had not left the hope and continuance of his Line and Posterity in the wombe of one onely woman, fearing Solons Lawes, or regarding the Ordinances of men touching the procreation of children: but that he gave it unto nature, and established the foundation of many noble Races and Families in divers places. Now when Phraortes had slaine his Father Orodes, and possessed the Kingdome, many Gentlemen of PARTHIA forsooke him, and fled from him. Amongst them was Monses a Nobleman; and of great Authority amongst his Countrey men, who came unto Antonius that received him, and compared his fortune unto Themistocles, and his owne riches and magnificence unto the Kings of PERSIA. For he gave Monses three Cities, LARISSA, ARETHUSA, and HIERAPOLIS, which was called before BOMBICE. Howbeit the King of PARTHIA shortly after called him home againe, upon his faith and word: Antonius was glad to let him go, hoping thereby to steale upon Phraortes unprovided. For he sent unto him, and told him that they would remaine good friends, and have peace together, so he would but onely redeliver the Standards and Ensignes of the ROMANES (which the PARTHIANS had won in the Battell where M. Crassus was slaine) and the men also that remained yet Prisoners of this overthrow. In the meane time he sent Cleopatra backe into EGYPT; and tooke his way towards ARABIA and ARMENIA, and there tooke a generall muster of all his Army he had together, and of the Kings his Confederates that were come by his commandement to aide him, being a marvellous number: of the which, the chiefeest was Artabazus King of ARMENIA, who did furnish him with six thousand Horsemen, and seven thousand Footmen. There were also of the ROMANES about threecore thousand Footmen, and of Horsemen (SPANIARDS and GABLES reckoned for ROMANES) to the number of ten thousand; and of other Nations thirty thousand men; reckoning together the Horsemen and light armed Footmen. This so great and puissant Army (which made the INDIANS quake for feare, dwelling about the Countrey of the BACTRIANS; and all ASIA also to tremble) served him to no purpose, and all for the love he bare to Cleopatra. For the earnest great desire he had to lie all Winter with her, made him begin this Warre out of due time, and for haste to put all in hazard: being so ravished and enchanted with the sweete poison of her love, that he had no other thought but of her, and how he might quickly returne againe, more then how he might overcome his enemies. For first of all, where he should have wintered in ARMENIA to refresh his men, wearied with the long journey they had made, having come 8000 furlongs, and then at the beginning of the Spring to go and invade MEDIA before the PARTHIANS should stir out of their houses and garisons: he could tarry no longer, but led them forthwith unto the Province of ATROPATENE, leaving ARMENIA on the left hand, and foraged all the Countrey. Furthermore, making all the haste he could, he left behinde him Engines of battery which were carried with him in 300 Carts (amongst the which also there was a Ram fourescore foote long) being things most necessary for him; and the which he could not get againe for money, if they were once lost or marred. For the high Provinces of ASIA have no trees growing of such height and length, neither strong nor straight enough to make such like Engines of battery. This notwithstanding, he left them all behinde him, as an hinderance to bring his matters and intent speedily to passe: and left a certaine number of men to keepe them, and gave them in charge unto one Tatianus. Then he went to besiege the City of PHARATA; being the chiefeest and greatest City the King of MEDIA had, where his wife and children were. Then he straight found out his owne fault, and the want of his Artillery he left behinde him, by the worke he had in hand: for he was faine for lacke of a breach (where his men might come to the Sword with their Enemies that defended the wall) to force a mount of earth hard to the walls of the City, the which by little and little with great labour, rose to some height. In the meane time King Phraortes came downe with a great Army, who understanding that Antonius had left his Engines of battery behinde him, he sent a great number of Horsemen before, which environed Tatianus with all his carriage; and slew him, and ten thousand men he had with him. After this the barbarous People tooke these Engines of battery and burnt them, and got many Prisoners; amongst whom they tooke also King Polemon. This discomfiture marvellously troubled all Antonius Army, to receive so great an overthrow (beyond their expectation) at the beginning of their Journey: inso much that Artabazus King of the ARMENIANS, despairing of the good successe of the ROMANES, departed with his men; notwithstanding that he was himselfe the first procurer of this Warre and Journey. On the other side, the PARTHIANS came courageously unto Antonius Campe; who lay at the Siege of their chiefeest City; and cruelly reviled and threatened him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay still and did nothing, his mens hearts would faile them, he tooke ten Legions, with three Cohorts or Ensignes of the Prators which are Companies appointed for the guard of the Generall) and all his Horsemen; and carried them out to forrage, hoping thereby he should easily allure the PARTHIANS to fight a Battell. But when he had marched about a daies journey from his Campe, he saw the PARTHIANS wheeling round about him to give him the onser, and to skirmish with him, when he would thinke to march his way. Therefore he set out his signall of Battell, and yet caused his Tents and Fardels to be trussed up, as though he meant not to fight, but onely to leade his men backe againe. Then he marched before the Army of the barbarous People, the which was martialled like a Cressant or halfe Moone:

and commanded his Horsemen, that as soone as they thought the Legions were neare enough unto their Enemies to set upon the Voward, they should set spurs to their Horses, and begin the Charge. The PARTHIANS stood in Battell-ray, and beholding the countenance of the ROMANES as they marched, tooke them for Souldiers indeed, for that they marched in as good array as was possible. For in their march they kept their ranks a little space one from another, not fraging out of order, and shaking their Pikes, speaking never a word. But so soone as the Alarm was given, the Horsemen suddenly turned head upon the PARTHIANS, and with great cries gave Charge on them: who at the first received their Charge courageously, for they were joynt nearer then within an Arrows shoote. But when the Legions also came to joyne with them, shouting out aloud, and rating of their Armour, the PARTHIANS Horses and themselves were so afraid and amazed withall, that they all turned taile and fled, before the ROMANES could come to the Sword with them. Then Antonius followed them hard in chase, being in great hope by this conflict to have brought to end all or the most part of this Warre. But after that his Footmen had chased them fifty furlongs off, and the Horsemen also thrice as far, they found in all but thirty persons taken, and about fourscore men onely flaine: which did much discourage them, when they considered with themselves, that obtaining the victory, they had flaine so few of their Enemies: and when they were overcome, they lost so many of their men, as they had done at the overthrow when their carriage was taken. The next morning Antonius Army trusted up their carriage, and marched backe towards their Campe: and by the way in their returne they met at the first a few of the PARTHIANS; then going on further, they met a few more. So at length when they all came together, they reviled them, and troubled them on every side, as freshly and courageously as if they had not bene overthrowne: so that the ROMANES very hardly got to their Campe with safety. The MARDIANS on the other side, that were besieged in their chiefe City of PHRAATA, made a salley out upon them that kept the Mount which they had forced and cast against the Wall of the City, and drave them for feare from the Mount they kept. Antonius was so offended withall, that he executed the Decimation. For he divided his men by ten Legions, and then of them he put the tenth Legion to death, on whom the lot fell: and for the other nine, he caused them to have Barley given them in stead of Wheate. Thus this Warre fell out troublesome unto both parties, and the end thereof much more fearfull: for Antonius could looke for no other of his side but famine, because he could forage no more, nor fetch in any Victuals, without great losse of his men: and on the other side, Phraortes knew well enough that the PARTHIANS would do any thing rather then lie in Campe abroad in the Winter. Therefore he was afraid, that if the ROMANES continued their Siege all Winter long, and made Warre with him still, that his men would forsake him, and specially because the time of the yeare went away apace, and the aire waxed cloudy and cold in the Equinoctiall Autumne. Thereupon he called to minde this device: He gave the chiefe of his Gentlemen of the PARTHIANS charge, that when they met the ROMANES out of their Campe, going to forage, or to water their Horses, or for some other Provision, that they should not distresse them too much, but should suffer them to carry somewhat away, and greatly commend their valiantnesse and hardinesse, for which their King did esteeme them the more, and not without cause. After these first allurements, they began by little and little to come nearer unto them, and to talke with them on Horseback, greatly blessing Antonius selfe-will, that did not give their King Phraortes occasion to make a good Peace, who desired nothing more then to save the lives of so goodly a company of valiant men: but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the greatest and most dreadfull Enemies he could have, to wit, Winter and Famine, the which they could hardly away withall, though the PARTHIANS did the best they could to aide and accompany them. These words being oftentimes brought to Antonius, they made him a little pliant, for the good hope he had of his returne: but yet he would not send unto the King of PARTHIA before they had first asked these barbarous People that spake so courteously unto his men, whether they spake of themselves, or that they were their Masters words. When they told them, the King himselfe said so, and did perswade them further not to feare or mistrust them, then Antonius sent some of his friends unto the King, to make demand for the delivery of the Ensignes and Prisoners he had of the ROMANES since the overthrow of Crassus, to the end it should not appeare, that if he asked nothing, they should thinke he were glad that he might onely escape with safety out of the danger he was in. The King of PARTHIA answered him, that for the Ensignes and Prisoners he demanded, he should not breake his head about it, but if he would depart presently and without delay, he might do it peaceably, and without danger. Wherefore Antonius after he had given his men some time to trust up their carriage, he raised his Campe, and tooke his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very proper to entertaine his Souldiers and men of Warre, and that he could passingly well do it, as well or better then any Capitaine in his time: yet for shame he would not speake unto them at his removing, but gave the charge thereof to Domitius Aenobarbus. Many of them tooke this in very ill part, and thought that he did it in disdain of them: but the most part of them presently understood the truth of it, and were also ashamed. Therefore they thought it their duties to carry the like respect unto their Capitaine that their Capitaine did unto them: and so they became the more obedient unto him. So Antonius was minded to returne the same way he came, being a plaine barren Countrey without Woodes. But there came a Souldier to him, borne in the Countrey of the MARDIANS, who having bene long familiar with the PARTHIANS, knew their fashions very well, and had also shewed himselfe very true and faithfull to the ROMANES in the Battell where Antonius engines of battery and carriage were taken taken away. This man came unto Antonius, to counsell him to beware how he went that way, and to make his Army a prey (being heavily armed) unto so great a number of Horsemen, all Archers in the open field, where they should have nothing to lett them to compass him round about: and that this was Phraortes fetch, to offer him so friendly conditions and courteous words, to make him raise his siege, that he might afterwards meete him as he would in the Plaines: howbeit, if he thought good he would guide him another way on the right hand, through woods and mountaines, a far nearer way, and where he should finde great plenty of all things needfull for his Army. Antonius hearing what he said, called his Council together to consult upon it. For after he had made peace with the PARTHIANS, he was loth to give them cause to thinke he mistrusted them: and on the other side also, he would gladly shorten his way, and passe by places well inhabited, where he might be provided of all things necessary: therefore he asked the MARDIAN what pledge he would put in, to performe that he promised. The MARDIAN gave himselfe to be bound hand and foote, till he had brought his Army into the Countrey of ARMENIA. So he guided his Army thus bound, two daies together, without any trouble or sight of enemy. But the third day Antonius thinking the PARTHIANS would no more follow him, and trusting thereto, suffered his Souldiers to march in disorder as every man listed. The MARDIAN perceiving that the dams of a River were newly broken up, which they should have passed over, and that the River had overflowne the bankes, and drowned all the way they should have gone, he guessed straight that the PARTHIANS had done it, and had thus broken it open, to stay the ROMANES for getting too far before them. Therefore he bade Antonius looke to himselfe, and told him that his Enemies were not far off. Antonius having set his men in order, as he was placing of his Archers and Slingmen to resist the Enemies, and to drive them backe, they descried the PARTHIANS that wheeled round about the Army, to compass them in on every side, and to breake their ranks, and their light armed men gave charge upon them. So after they had hurt many of the ROMANES with their Arrows, and that they themselves were also hurt by them with their Darts and Plummets of Lead, they retired a little, and then came againe and gave charge, untill that the Horsemen of the GAULES turned their Horses, and fiercely galloped towards them, that they dispersed them to, as all that day they gathered no more together. Hereby Antonius knew what to do, and did not onely strengthen the Rereward of his Army, but both the Flankes also with Darts and Sling-men, and made his Army march in a square Battell: commanding the Horsemen, that when the Enemies should come to assaile them, they should drive them backe, but not follow them to far. Thus the PARTHIANS foure daies after, seeing they did no more hurt to the ROMANES, then they also received of them, they were not so hot upon them as they were accustomed, but excusing themselves by the Winter that troubled them, they determined to returne backe againe. The fifth day Flavius Gallus, a valiant man of his hands, that had charge in the Army, came unto Antonius to pray him to let him have some moe of his light armed men then were already in the Rereward, and some of the Horsemen that were in the Voward, hoping thereby to do some notable exploit. Antonius granting them unto him, when the Enemies came according to their manner to set upon the taile of the Army, and to skirmish with them, Flavius courageously made them retire, but not as they were wont to do before, to retire and joyne presently with their Army; for he over- rashly thrust in among them: to fight it out at the Sword. The Captaines that had the leading of the Rereward, seeing Flavius stray too far from the Army, sent unto him to will him to retire, but he would not hearken to it. And it is reported also, that Titius himselfe the Treasurer, tooke the Ensignes, and did what he could to make the Ensigne-bearers returne backe, reviving Flavius Gallus, because through his folly and desperatenesse he caused many honest and valiant men to be both hurt and flaine to no purpose. Gallus also fell out with him, and commanded his men to slay. Wherefore Titius returned againe into the Army, and Gallus still overthrowing and driving the Enemies backe whom he met in the Voward, he was not ware that he was compassed in: and seeing himselfe environed on all sides, he sent unto the Army, that they should come and aide him, where the Captaines that led the Legions (among the which Canidius, a man of great estimation about Antonius made one), committed many faults. For where they should have made head with the whole Army upon the PARTHIANS, they sent him aide by small companies: and when they were flaine, they sent him others also. So that by their beastliness and lacke of consideration, they had like to have made all the Army flie, if Antonius himselfe had not come from the Front of the Battell with the third Legion, the which came through the midst of them that fled, untill they came to affront the Enemies, and stayed them from chasing any farther. Howbeit at this last conflict there were flaine no lesse then three thousand men and five thousand besides brought force hurt into the Campe, and amongst them also Flavius Gallus, whose body was shot through in foure places, whereof he died. Antonius went to the Tents to visit and comfort the sicke and wounded, and for pities sake he could not reffraine from weeping: and they also shewing him the best countenance they could, tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to go and be dressed, and not to trouble himselfe for them, most reverently calling him their Emperour and Capitaine: and that for themselves, they were whole and safe, so that he had his health. For indeed to say truly, there was not at that time any Emperour or Capitaine that had so great and puissant an Army as his together, both for lusty youths and courage of Souldiers, as also for their patience to away with so great paines and trouble. Furthermore, the obedience and reverence they shewed unto their Capitaine, with a marvellous earnest love and good will, was so great, and all were indifferently (as well great as small, the Noblemen, as meane men, the Captaines as Souldiers) so earnestly bent to esteeme Antonius good will and favour, above their owne life and safety, that in this point of Martiall Discipline, the ancient ROMANES could not have done any more. But divers things were cause thereof, as we have told you before: Antonius Nobility and ancient Houfe, his eloquence, his plaine nature, his liberality and magnificence, and familiarity to sport and be merry in company: but specially the care he tooke at that time to helpe, visite, and lament those that were sicke and wounded, seeing every man to have that which was meete for him, was of such force and effect, as it made them that were sicke and wounded to love him better, and were more desirous to do him service then those that were whole and sound. This Victory lo encouraged the Enemies (who otherwise were weary to follow Antonius any farther) that all night they kept the Fields, and hovered about the ROMANES Campe, thinking that they would presently flie, and that then they should take the spoile of their Campe. So the next morning by breake of day, there were gathered together a far greater number of the PARTHIANS then they were before. For the rumour was, that there were not much fewer then forty thousand Horse, because their King sent thither even the very Guard about his Person, as unto a most certaine and assured Victory, that they might be partners of the spoile and booty they hoped to have had: for as touching the King himselfe, he was never in any Conflict or Battell. Then Antonius desirous to speake to his Souldiers, called for a blacke Gowne to appeare the more pitifull to them: but his friends did dissuade him from it. Therefore he put on his Coat-armour, and being so apparelled, made an Oration to his Army: in the which he highly commended them that had overcome and driven backe their Enemies, and greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backs. So that those which had overcome, prayed him to be of good cheare: the other also to cleare themselves, willingly offered to take the lot of Decimation if he thought good, or otherwise to receive what kinde of punishment should please him to lay upon them, so that he would forget any more to mislike, or to be offended with them. Antonius seeing that, did lift up his hands to heaven, and made his Prayer to the gods, that if in exchange of his former Victories, they would now send him some bitter adversity, then that all might light on himselfe alone, and that they would give the Victory to the rest of his Army. The next morning, they gave better order on every side of the Army, and so marched forward: so that when the PARTHIANS thought to returne againe to assaile them, they came far short of the reckoning. For where they thought to come, not to fight, but to spoile and make havock of all, when they came neare them, they were fore hurt with their Slings and Darts, and such other Javelins as the ROMANES darted at them, and the PARTHIANS found them as rough and desperate in fight, as if they had beene fresh men they had dealt withall. Whereupon their hearts began againe to faile them. But yet when the ROMANES came to go downe any steepe Hills or Mountaines, they would set on them with their Arrowes, because the ROMANES could go downe but faire and softly. But then againe, the Souldiers of the Legion that carried great Shields, returned backe, and inclosed them that were naked or light armed, in the midst among them, and did kneele on one knee on the ground, and so set downe their Shields before them: and they of the second ranke also covered them of the first ranke, and the third also covered the second, and so from ranke to ranke all were covered. Infomuch that this manner of covering and shading themselves with Shields, was devised after the fashion of laying tiles upon Houses, and to fight was like the degrees of a Theater, and is a most strong defence and Bulwarke against all Arrowes and Shot that falleth upon it. When the PARTHIANS saw this countenance of the ROMANES Souldiers of the Legion which kneeled on the ground in that sort upon one knee, supposing that they had beene wearied with travell, they layed downe their Bowes, and tooke their Speares and Launces, and came to fight with them man for man. Then the ROMANES suddenly rose upon their feete, and with the Darts that they threw from them, they slew the foremost, and put the rest to flight, and so did they the next daies that followed. But by means of these dangers and letts, Antonius Army could win no way in a day, by reason whereof they suffered great famine: for they could have but little Corne, and yet were they driven daily to fight for it; and besides that, they had no instruments to grinde it, to make Bread of it. For the most part of them had beene left behinde, because the Beasts that carried them were either dead, or else employed to carry them that were sore and wounded. For the Famine was so extreame great, that the eighth part of a bushell of Wheate was sold for fifty Drachmaes, and they sold Barley-bread by the weight of Silver. In the end they were compelled to live of Herbes and Rootes, but they found few of them that men do commonly eat of, and were enforced to taste of them that were never eaten before: among the which, there was one that killed them, and made them out of their wits. For he that had once eaten of it, his memory went from him, and he knew no manner of thing, but onely busied himselfe in digging and hurling of stones from one place to another, as though it had beene a matter of great weight, and to be done with all possible speede. All the Campe over, men were busily stooping to the ground, digging and carrying of stones from one place to another: but at the last, they cast up a great deale of choler, and died suddenly, because they lacked Wine, which was the onely Sovereigne remedy to cure that disease. It is reported that Antonius seeing such a number of his men die daily, and that the PARTHIANS left them not, neither would suffer them to be at rest, he oftentimes cried out sighing, and said: O ten thousand! He had the valiantnesse of ten thousand GRECIANS in such admiration, whom Xenophon brought away after the overthrow of Cyrus: because they had come a farther Journey from BABYLON, and had also fought against much more Enemies many times told, then themselves, and yet came home with safety. The PARTHIANS therefore seeing that they could not breake the good order of the Army of the ROMANES, and contrarily, that they themselves were oftentimes put to flight, and wellfavouredly beate, they fell againe to their old crafty subtilties. For when they found any of the ROMANES

ROMANES scattered from the Army to go forrage, to seeke some Corne, or other Victuals, they would come to them as if they had beene their friends; and shew them their Bowes unbent, saying, that themselves also did returne home to their Countrey as they did, and that they would follow them no farther: howbeit that they should yet have certaine MEDES that would follow them a daies journey or two, to keepe them that they should do no hurt to the Villages from the high-waies; and so holding them with this talke, they gently tooke their leave of them, and bade them farewell, so that the ROMANES began againe to thinke themselves safe. Antonius also understanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plaine Countrey, because also they should finde no water in the Mountaines, as it was reported unto him. So as he was determined to take his course, there came into his Host one Mithridates, a Gentleman from the Enemies Campe, who was Cousin unto Monefes that fled unto Antonius, and unto whom he had given three Cities. When he came to Antonius Campe, he prayed them to bring him one that could speake the PARTHIAN or SYRIAN Tongue. So one Alexander ANTIOCHIAN, a familiar of Antonius, was brought unto him. Then the Gentleman told him what he was, and said that Monefes had sent him to Antonius, to requite the honour and courtesie he had shewed unto him. After he had used this ceremonious speech, he asked Alexander if he saw those high Mountaines afar off, which he pointed unto with his finger. Alexander answered he did. The PARTHIANS (said he) do lie in ambush at the foote of those Mountaines, under the which lieth a goodly plaine champion Countrey: and they thinke that you being deceived with their crafty subtill words, will leave the way of the Mountaines, and turne into the Plaine. For the other way, it is very hard and painfull, and you shall abide great thirst, the which you are well acquainted withall: but if Antonius take the lower way, let him assure himselfe to run the same fortune that Marcus Crassus did. So Mithridates having said, he departed. Antonius was marvellously troubled in his minde when he heard thus much, and therefore called for his friends, to heare what they would say to it. The MARDIAN also that was their guide, being asked his opinion, answered, that he thought as much as the Gentleman Mithridates had said. For, said he, admit that there were no Ambush of Enemies in the Valley, yet it is a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the Mountain way, though it be stony and painfull, yet there is no other danger, but a whole daies travelling without any water. So Antonius changing his first minde and determination, removed that night, and tooke the Mountain way, commanding every man to provide himselfe of water. But the most part of them lacking Vessels to carry water in, some were driven to fill their Sallets and Murrins with water, and others also filled Goates skins to carry water in. Now they marching forward, word was brought unto the PARTHIANS that they were removed: whereupon, contrary to their manner, they presently followed them the self-same night, so that by breake of day they overtook the Rereward of the ROMANES, who were so lame and wearied with going, and lacke of sleepe, that they were even dead. For beyond expectation, they had gone that night, two hundred and forty furlongs, and further, to see their Enemies so suddenly at their backs, that made them utterly despaire: but most of all, the fighting with them increased their thirst, because they were forced to fight as they marched, to drive their Enemies bakke, yet creeping on still. The Voward of the Army by chance met with a River that was very cleare and cold water; but it was salt and venomous to drinke: for straight it did gnaw the guts of those that had drunke it, and made them marvellous dry, and put them into a terrible ache and pricking. And notwithstanding that the MARDIAN had told them of it before, yet they would not be ruled, but violently thrust them backe that would have kept them from drinking, and so dranke. But Antonius going up and downe amongst them, prayed them to take a little patience for a while, for hard by there was another River that the water was excellent good to drinke, and that from thenceforth the way was stony and ill for Horsemen, that the Enemies could follow them no further. So he caused the Retreat to be sounded to call them backe that fought, and commanded the Tents to be set up, that the Souldiers might yet have shadow to refresh them with. So when the Tents were set up, and the PARTHIANS also retired according to their manner, the Gentleman Mithridates before named, returned againe as before, and Alexander in like manner againe was brought unto him for Interpreter. Then Mithridates advised him, that after the Army had reposed a little, the ROMANES should remove forthwith, and with all speede possible get to the River: because the PARTHIANS would go no further, but yet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander carried the report thereof unto Antonius, who gave him a great deale of Gold Plate to bestow upon Mithridates. Mithridates tooke as much of him as he could well carry away in his Gowne, and so departed with speede. So Antonius raised his Campe being yet day light, and caused all his Army to march, and the PARTHIANS never troubled any of them by the way: but amongst themselves it was as ill and dreadfull a night as ever they had. For there were villaines of their owne company, who cut their fellows throats for the Money they had; and besides that, robbed the Sumpters and Carriage of such Money as they carried, and at length they set upon Antonius Slaves that drave his owne Sumpters and Carriage, they brake goodly Tables and rich Plate in pieces, and divided it among themselves. Thereupon all the Campe was straight in tumult and uprore: for the residue of them were afraid it had beene the PARTHIANS that had given them this Alarum, and had put all the Army out of order. Infomuch that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his Slaves enfranchised that was of his Guard, and made him give him his faith that he would thrust his Sword through him when he would bid him, and cut off his head, because he might not be taken alive of his Enemies, nor knowne when he were dead. This grieved his friends to the heart; that they burst out a weeping for sorrow. Then withall he brought out Alexander in a long Gowne after the fashion of the Medes, with a high cockatke Hat on his head, narrow in the top, as the Kings of the Medes and Armenians do use to wear them: and Proton apparelled in a Cloake after the Macedonian manner, with Slippers on his feet, and a broad Hat, with a Royall Band of Diadem. Such was the Apparell and old Attire of the ancient Kings and Successors of Alexander the Great. So after his Sons had done their humble duties, and kissed their Father and Mother, presently a company of Armenian Souldiers, set there of purpose, compassed the one about, and a like company of *Macedonian*s the other. Now for Cleopatra, she did not onely weare at that time (but at all other times) else when she came abroad) the Apparell of the goddesse Isis, and so gave audience unto all her Subjects, as a new Isis. Octavius Caesar reporting all these things unto the Senate, and oftentimes accusing him to the whole People and Assembly in Rome, he thereby stirred up all the Romans against him. Antonius on the other side sent to Rome likewise to accuse him, and the chiefeft points of his accusations he charged him with, were these. First, that having spoiled Sextus Pompeius in Sicily, he did not give him his part of the Isle. Secondly, that he did detain in his hands the Ships he lent him to make that Warre. Thirdly, That having put Lepidus their companion and Triumverate out of his part of the Empire, and having deprived him of all honours, he retained for himself the Lands and Revenues thereof, which had been alligned unto him for his part. And last of all, That he had in manner divided all Italy amongst his owne Souldiers, and had left no part of it for his Souldiers. Octavius Caesar answered him againe: That for Lepidus, he had indeede depofed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, because he did over-cruelly use his Authority. And secondly, For the Conquests he had made by force of Armes, he was contented Antonius should have his part of them, so that he would likewise let him have his part of Armenia. And thirdly, That for his Souldiers, they should seeke for nothing in Italy, because they possessed Media and Parthia, the which Provinces they had added to the Empire of Rome, valiantly fighting with their Emperour and Captaine. Antonius hearing these newes, being yet in Armenia, commanded Canidius to go presently to the Sea side with his sixteene Legions he had: and he himselfe with Cleopatra, went unto the City of Ephesus, and there gathered together his Gallies and Shippes out of all parts, which came to the number of eight hundred, reckoning the great Shippes of burthen: and of those Cleopatra furnished him with two hundred and twenty thousand Talents besides, and Provision of Victuals also to maintaine all the whole Army in this Warre. So Antonius, through the perswasion of Domitius, commanded Cleopatra to returne againe into Egypt, and there to understand the successe of this Warre. But Cleopatra fearing lest Antonius should againe be made friends with Octavius Caesar, by the meanes of his Wife Octavia, she so plied Canidius with Money, and filled his purse, that he became her spokeman unto Antonius, and told him, there was no reason to send her from this Warre, who defrayed so great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, because thereby the Egyptians would then be utterly discouraged, which were the chiefeft strength of the Army by Sea: considering that he could see no King of all the Kings their Confederates, that Cleopatra was inferior unto, either for wisdom or judgement, seeing that long before she had wisely governed so great a Realme as Egypt; and besides that, she had bene so long acquainted with him, by whom she had learned to manage great Affaires. These faire perswasions wanne him: for it was predestinated that the Government of all the World should fall into *Octavius Caesar*s hands. Thus, all their Forces being joyned together, they hoisted Saile towards the Isle of Samos, and there gave themselves to Feasts and solace. For as all the Kings, Princes, and Commonalties, People, and Cities from Syria, unto the Marishes Mæotides, and from the Armenians to the Illyrians were sent unto, to send and bring all Munition and warlike preparation they could: even so all Players, Minstrels, Tumblers, Fooles, and Jestlers, were commanded to assemble in the Isle of Samos. So that, wherein manner all the World in every place was full of lamentations, sighs and teares, onely in this Isle of Samos there was nothing for many daies space but singing and piping, and all the Theater full of these common Players, Minstrels, and Singing-men. Besides all this, every City sent an Oxe thither to sacrifice, and Kings did strive one with another who should make the noblest Feasts, and give the richest Gifts. So that every man said, What can they do more for joy of Victory, if they winne the Battell, when they make already such sumptuous Feasts at the beginning of the Warre? When this was done, he gave the whole rabble of these Minstrels, and such kinde of People, the City of Priene to keepe them withall, during this Warre. Then he went unto the City of Athens, and there gave himselfe againe to see Playes and Pastimes, and to keepe the Theaters. Cleopatra on the other side, being jealous of the Honours which Octavia had received in this City, where indeede she was marvellously honoured and beloved of the Athenians: to winne the Peoples good will also at Athens, she gave them great Gifts: and they likewise gave her many great Honours, and appointed certaine Ambassadors to carry the Decree to her House, among the which Antonius was one, who (as a Citizen of Athens) reported the matter unto her, and made an Oration in the behalfe of the City. Afterwards he sent to Rome to put his Wife Octavia out of his House, who (as it is reported) went out of his House with all Antonius Children, saying the eldest of them he had by Fulvia, who was with his Father: bewailing and lamenting her cursed hap, that had brought her to this: that she was accounted one of the chiefeft causes of this Civill Warre. The Romans did pity her, but much more Antonius, and those specially that had seene Cleopatra: who neither excelled Octavia in beauty, nor yet in young years. Octavius Caesar understanding the sudden and wonderfull great preparation of Antonius, he was not a little astonied at it (fearing he should be driven to fight that Summer) because he wanted many things, and the great and grievous exactions of Money did sore oppress the People. For all manner of men else were driven to pay the fourth part of their Goods and Revenue, but the Libertines (to wit, those whose Fathers or other Predecessors had sometime been Bond-men) were fessed to pay the eighth part of all their Goods at one payment. Hereupon there arose a wonderfull exclamation and great uprore all Italy over, so that amongst the greatest faults that ever Antonius committed, they blamed him most for that he delayed to give Cesar Battell. For he gave Cesar leisure to make his preparations, and also to appease the complaints of the People. When such a great summe of Money was demanded of them, they grudget at it, and grew to mutiny upon it: but when they had once payed it, they remembered it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Planchus (two of Antonius chiefeft friends, and that had bene both of them Consul) for the great injuries Cleopatra did them, because they hindered all they could that she should not come to this War, they went and yeilded themselves unto Cesar, and told him where the Testament was that Antonius had made, knowing perfectly what was in it. The Will was in the custody of the Vestall Nunnes: of whom Cesar demanded it. They answered him, that they would not give it him: but if he would go and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereupon Cesar went thither, and having read it first to himselfe, he noted certaine places worthy of reproach: so assembling all the Senate, he read it before them all. Whereupon divers were marvellously offended, and thought it a strange matter, that he being alive, should be punished for that he had appointed by his Will to be done after his death. Cesar chiefly tooke hold of this, that he ordained touching his buriall: for he willed that his body, though he died at Rome, should be brought in Funerall pompe through the midst of the Market-place, and that it should be sent into Alexandria unto Cleopatra. Furthermore, among divers other faults wherewith Antonius was to be charged for *Cleopatra*s sake, Calpurnius one of *Cesar*s friends reproved him, because he had frankly given Cleopatra all the Libraries of the Royall City of Pergamum, in the which she had above two hundred thousand severall Bookes. Againe also, that being on a time set at the Table, he suddenly rose from the Board and trod upon *Cleopatra*s foote, which was a signe given betweene them, that they were agreed of. That he had also suffered the Ephesians in his presence to call Cleopatra their Sovereigne Lady. That divers times sitting in his Tribunal and Chaire of State, giving audience to all Kings and Princes, he had received Love-Letters from Cleopatra, written in Tables of Onyx or Chrystal; and that he had read them, sitting in his Imperiall Seate. That one day when Furnius a man of great account, and the eloquentest man of all the Romans, pleaded a matter before him, Cleopatra by chance coming through the Market-place in her Litter where Furnius was a pleading, Antonius straight rose out of his Seate, and left his Audience to follow her Litter. This notwithstanding, it was thought Calpurnius devised the most part of all these Accusations of his owne head. Nevertheless they that loved Antonius, were intercessors to the People for him, and amongst them they sent one Geminus unto Antonius, to pray him he would take heed that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from him, and that he should be counted an enemy to the People of Rome. This Geminus being arrived in Greece, made Cleopatra jealous straight of his coming, because she surmised that he came not but to speake for Octavia. Therefore she spared not to taunt him all supper time; and moreover to spight him the more, she made him to be set lowest of all at the Board: the which he tooke patiently, expecting occasion to speake with Antonius. Now Antonius commanding him at the Table to tell him what winde brought him thither, he answered, That it was no Table-talk, and that he would tell him to morrow morning sitting: but drunke or fasting, howsoever it were, he was sure of one thing, that all would not go well on his side, unlesse Cleopatra were sent backe into Egypt. Antonius tooke these words in very ill part. Cleopatra on the other side answered him, Thou dost well Geminus, said she, to tell the truth before thou be compelled by torments: but within few daies after, Geminus stole away, and fled to Rome. The Flatterers also to please Cleopatra, did make her drive many other of Antonius faithfull servants and friends from him, who could not abide the injuries done unto them: among the which these two were chiefe, Marcius Silius, and Dellius the Historiographer, who wrote that he fled because her Physician Glaukus told him, that Cleopatra had set some secretly to kill him. Furthermore, he had *Cleopatra*s displeasure, because he said one night at Supper, that they made them drinke fowre Wine, where Sarmentus at Rome dranke good Wine of Falerne. This Sarmentus was a pleasant young Boy, such as the Lords at Rome are wont to have about them to make them pastime, which they call their joyes, and he was *Octavius Caesar*s Boy. Now after that Cesar had made sufficient preparation, he proclaimed open Warre against Cleopatra, and made the People to abolish the Power and Empire of Antonius, because he had before given it up unto a Woman. And Cesar said furthermore, that Antonius was not Master of himselfe, but that Cleopatra had brought him beside himselfe by her charmes and amorous poysons: and that they that should make Warre with them, should be Mardian the Eunuch, Photinus, and Iras (a Woman of *Cleopatra*s Bed-chamber, that frizeled her haire, and dressed her head) and Charmion, the which were those that ruled all the Affaires of Antonius Empire. Before this Warre, as it is reported, many signes and wonders fell out. First of all, the City of Pisaurum which was made a Colony to Rome, and replenished with People by Antonius, standing upon the Shore side of the Sea Adriatick, was by a terrible Earth-quake sunke into the ground. One of the Images of Stone which was set up in the honour of Antonius in the City of Alba, did sweate many daies together: and though some wiped it away, yet it left not sweating still. In the City of Patras whilst Antonius was there, the Temple of Hercules was burnt with lightning. And at the City of ATHENS also, in a place where the War of the Giants against the gods is set out in Imagery, the Statue of Bacchus with a terrible winde was throwne downe in the Theater. It was said, that Antonius came of the race of Hercules (as you have heard before) and in the manner of his life he followed Bacchus, and therefore was called the new Bacchus. Furthermore, the same blustering Storme of winde overthrew the great monstrous Images at ATHENS, that were made in the honour of Enmenes and Attalus, the which men had named and intitled, The Antonians: and yet did they hurt none of the other Images, which were many besides. The Admirall Galley of Cleopatra was called Antoniade, in the which there chanced a marvellous ill signe: Swallows had bred under the Poop of her Ship, and there came others after them that drave away the first, and plucked downe their nests. Now when all things were ready, and that they drew neare to fight, it was found, that Antonius had no lesse then five hundred good Ships of War, among which there were many Gallies that had eight and ten banks of Oars, the which were sumptuously furnished, not so meete for Fight, as for Triumph: an hundred thousand Footmen, and twelve thousand Horsemen; and had with him to aide him these Kings and Subjects following: Bocchus King of LYBIA, Tarcondemus King of high CILICIA, Archelus King of CAPPADOCIA, Philadelphus King of PAPHLAGONIA, Mitridates King of COMAGENA, and Adallus King of THRACIA. All which were there every man in person. The residue that were absent, sent their Armies: as Polemon King of PONT, Alanchus King of ARABIA, Herodes King of JURY; and furthermore, Amyntas King of LYCAONIA and of the GALATIANS: and besides all these, he had all the aide the King of MEDES sent unto him. Now for Caesar, he had two hundred and fifty Ships of War, eighty thousand Footmen, and well neare as many Horsemen as his Enemy Antonius. Antonius for his part, had all under his dominion from ARABIA and the River of Euphrates, unto the Sea IONIAM and ILLYRIUM. Octavius Caesar had also for his part, all that which was in our Hemisphere or halfe part of the World, from ILLYRIA unto the Ocean Sea upon the West: then all from the Ocean unto Mare Siculum: and from AFRICKE, all that which is against ITALY, as GAULE and SPAIN. Furthermore, all from the Province of CYRENIA to ETHIOPIA, was subject unto Antonius. Now Antonius was made so subject to a womans will, that though he was a great deale the stronger by Land, yet for Cleopatra's sake he would needs have this Battell tried by Sea: though he saw before his eyes, that for lacke of water-men, his Captaines did prest by force all forts of men out of GREECE that they could take up in the Field, as travellers, muletters, reapers, harvest-men, and young boyes; and yet could not sufficiently furnish his Gallies: so that the most part of them were empty, and could scant row, because they lacked water-men enough. But on the contrary side, Caesar's Ships were not built for pompe, high and great, onely for a fight and bravery, but they were light of yarge, armed and furnished with water-men as many as they needed, and had them all in readinesse in the Havens of TARENTUM and BRUNDISIUM. So Octavius Caesar sent unto Antonius, to will him to delay no more time, but to come on with his Army into ITALY: and that for his owne part he would give him safe harbour to land without any trouble; and that he would withdraw his Army from the Sea, as far as one Horse could run, until he had put his Army ashore, and had lodged his men. Antonius on the other side bravely sent him word againe, and challenged the combat of him, man for man, though he were the elder: and that if he refused him so, he would then fight a Battell with him in the Fields of PHARSALIA, as Julius Caesar and Pompey had done before. Now whilest Antonius rode at Anker, lying idly in Harbour in the head of ACTIUM, in the place where the City of NICOPOLIS standeth at this present, Caesar had quickly passed the Sea IONIAM, and taken a place called TORYNE, before Antonius understood that he had taken Ship. Then began his men to be afraid, because his Army by Land was left behinde. But Cleopatra making light of it; And what danger I pray you, said she, if Caesar keepe at *TORYNE? The next morning by breake of day, his Enemies coming with full force of oares in Battell against him, Antonius was afraid, that if they came to joyne, they would take and carry away his Ships that had no men of Warre in them. So he armed all his water-men, and set them in order of Battell upon the fore-Castle of their Ships, and then lift up all his ranks of oares towards the Element, as well on the one side as on the other, with the Prows against the Enemies, at the entry and mouth of the gulfe, which beginneth at the point of ACTIUM: and so kept them in order of Battell, as if they had bene armed and furnished with water-men and Souldiers. Thus Octavius Caesar being finely deceived by this Stratagem, retired presently, and therewithall Antonius very wisely and suddenly did cut him off from fresh water. For understanding that the places where Octavius Caesar landed had very little store of water, and yet very bad, he shut them in with strong ditches and trenches he cast, to keepe them from failing out at their pleasure, and so to goe seeke water farther off. Furthermore, he dealt very friendly and courteously with Domitius, and against Cleopatra's minde. For he being sicke of an ague when he went and tooke a little boate to go unto Caesar's Campe, Antonius was very sorry for it, but yet he sent after him all his carriage, traine and men: and the same Domitius, as though he gave him to understand that he repented his open trea-son, died immediately after. There were certaine Kings also that forsooke him, and turned on Caesar's side, as Amyntas and Deiotarus. Furthermore, his Fleete and Navie that was unfortunate in all things, and unready for service, compelled him to change his minde, and to hazard Battell by Land. And Canidius also, who had charge of his Army by Land, when time came to follow Antonius determination, he turned him cleane contrary, and counselled him to send Cleopatra backe againe, and himselfe to retire into MACEDON, to fight there on the maine Land. And furthermore told him, that Discorus King of the GETES promised to aide him with a great Power: and that it should be no shame shame nor dishonour to him to let Caesar have the Sea, because himselfe and his men both had bene well practised and exercised in Battels by Sea, in the Warre of SICILIA against Sextus Pompeius: but rather that he should go against all reason (he having so great skill and experience of Battels by Land as he had) if he should not imploy the force and valiantnesse of so many lusty armed Footmen as he had ready, but would weaken his Army by dividing them into Ships. But now, notwithstanding all these good perswasions, Cleopatra forced him to put all to the hazard of Battell by Sea: considering with her selfe how the might sic and provide for her safety, not to helpe him to winne the Victory, but to sic more easily after the Battell lost. Betwixt Antonius Campe and his Fleete of Ships, there was a great high point of firme Land that ran a good way into the Sea, the which Antonius used often for a walke, without mistrust of feare or danger. One of Caesar's men perceived it, and told his Master that he would laugh if they could take up Antonius in the midst of his walke. Thereupon Caesar sent some of his men to lie in ambush for him, and they missed not much of taking him (for they tooke him that came before him) because they discovered too soone, and so Antonius escaped very hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by Sea, he set all the other Ships on fire, but threecore Ships of EGYPT, and reserved onely the best and greatest Gallies, from three bankes unto ten bankes of oares. Into them he put two and twenty thousand fighting men, with two thousand darters and slingers. Now as he was setting his men in order of battell, there was a Capitaine, a valiant man, that had served Antonius in many Battels and Conflicts, and had all his body hacked and cut: who, as Antonius passed by him, cried out unto him, and said: O noble Emperour, how cometh it to passe that you trust to these vile brittle Ships? What, do you mistrust these wounds of mine, and this Sword? let the EGYPTIANS and PHOENICIANS fight by Sea, and set us on the maine Land, where we use to conquer, or to be slaine on our feete. Antonius passed by him and said never a word, but onely beckened to him with his hand and head, as though he willed him to be of good courage, although indeed he had no great courage himselfe. For when the Masters of the Gallies and Pilots would have let their Sailes alone, he made them clap them on; saying to colour the matter withall, that not one of his Enemies should scape. All that day and the three daies following, the Sea rose so high, and was so boisterous, that the Battell was put off. The fifth day the storme ceased, and the Sea calmed againe, and then they rowed with force of oares in Battell one against the other: Antonius leading the right Wing with Publicola, and Calius the left, and Marcus Octavius, and Marcus Iulius the midst. Octavius Caesar on the other side had placed Agrippa in the left Wing of his Army, and had kept the right wing for himselfe. For the Armies by Land, Canidius was Generall of Antonius side, and Taurus of Caesar's side: who kept their men in Battell-ray, the one before the other, upon the Sea side, without stirring one against the other. Further, touching both the Chieftaines: Antonius being in a swift Pinnace, was carried up and downe by force of Oares through his Army, and spake to his People to encourage them to fight valiantly, as if they were on maine Land, because of the steadinesse and heavinesse of their Ships: and commanded the Pilots and Masters of the Gallies, that they should not stir, none otherwise then if they were at Anker, and so to receive the first Charge of their Enemies, and that they should not go out of the Streight of the Gulfe. Caesar betimes in the morning going out of his Tent, to see his Ships throughout, met a man by chance that drave an Ass before him: Caesar asked the man what his name was. The poore man told him his name was Eutychus, to say Fortunate: and his Asses name Nicon, to say Conquerour. Therefore Caesar, after he had wonne the Battell, setting out the Market-place with the Spurres of the Gallies he had taken, for a signe of his Victory, he caused also the man and his Ass to be set up in brasse. When he had visited the order of his Army throughout, he tooke a little Pinnace, and went to the right Wing, and wondered when he saw his Enemies lie still in the Streight, and stirred not. For discerning them as far off, men would have thought they had bene Ships riding at Anker: and a good while he was so perswaded. So, he kept his Gallies eight furlongs from his Enemies. About noone there arose a little gale of winde from the Sea, and then Antonius men waxing angry with tarrying so long, and trusting to the greatnesse and height of their Ships, as if they had bene invincible, they began to march forward with their left Wing. Caesar seeing that, was a glad man, and began a little to give backe from the right Wing, to allure them to come farther out of the Streight and Gulfe, to the end that he might with his light Ships well manned with Water-men, turne and environ the Gallies of the Enemies, the which were heave of yarge, both for their bignesse, as also for lacke of Water-men to row them. When the Skirmish began, and that they came to joyne, there was no great hurt at the first meeting, neither did the Ships vehemently hit one against the other, as they do commonly in fight by Sea. For on the other side, Antonius Ships for their heavinesse could not have the strength and swiftnesse to make their blowes of any force: and Caesar's Ships on the other side tooke great heede not to rush and shooke with the fore-Castles of Antonius Ships, whose Prowes were armed with great brazen Spurrs. Furthermore, they durst not flanke them, because their points were easily broken, which way soever they came to set upon their Ships, that were made of great maine square-pieces of Timber, bound together with great iron pins: so that the Battell was much like unto a Battell by Land, or to speake more properly, to the assault of a City. For there were alwaies three or foure of Caesar's Ships about one of Antonius Ships, and the Souldiers fought with their Pikes, Halberds and Darts, and threw Halbarde and Darts with fire. Antonius Ships on the other side bestowed among them, with their Crosbowes and Engines of battery, great store of shot from their high Towers of wood that were set upon their Ships. Now Publicola seeing Agrippa put forth his left Wing of Cæsars Army, to compasse in Antonius Ships that fought, he was driven also to loofe off to have more roome, and to go a little at one side, to put those farther off that were afraid, and in the midst of the Battell: for they were fore distressed by Arruntius. Howbeit the Battell was yet of even hand, and the Victory doubtfull, being indifferent to both: when suddenly they saw the threefore Cleopatra flie. Ships of Cleopatra busily about their Yard-masts, and hoisting Saile to flie. So they fled through the midst of them that were in fight, for they had bene placed behinde the great Ships, and did marvelously disorder the other Ships. For the Enemies themselves wondered much to see them faile in that fort, with full saile towards PELOPONNESUS. There Antonius shewed plainly, that he had not onely lost the courage and heart of an Emperour, but also of a valiant man; and that he was not his owne man (proving that true which an old man spake in mirth, That the soule of a lover lived in another body, and not in his owne) he was so carried away with the vaine love of this woman, as if he had bene glued unto her, and that she could not have removed without moving of him also. For when he saw Cleopatra's Ship under Saile, he forgot, forooke, and betrayed them that fought for him, and imbarqued upon a Galley with five bankes of oares, to follow her that had already begun to overthrow him, and would in the end be his destruction. When she knew his Galley afar off, she lift up a signe in the Poope of her Ship; and so Antonius coming to it, was plucked up where Cleopatra was: howbeit he saw her not at his first coming, nor she him, but went and fate downe alone in the Prow of his Ship, and said never a word, clapping his head betweene both his hands. In the meane time came certaine light Brigantines of Cæsars, that followed him hard. So Antonius straight turned the Prow of his Ship, and presently put the rest to flight, saving one Eurycles a LACEDÆMONIAN, that followed him neare, and pressed upon him with great courage, shaking a Dart in his hand over the Prow, as though he would have throwne it unto Antonius. Antonius seeing him, came to the fore-Castle of his Ship, and asked him what he was that durst follow Antonius so neare? I am, answered he, Eurycles the Sonne of Lachares, who through Cæsars good fortune seeketh to revenge the death of my Father. This Lachares was condemned of felony, and beheaded by Antonius. But yet Eurycles durst not venture upon Antonius Ship, but set upon the other Admirall-Galley (for there were two) and fell upon him with such a blow of his brazen Spurre that was so heave and big, that he turned her round, and tooke her, with another that was loaden with very rich stufte and carriage. After Eurycles had left Antonius, he turned againe to his place, and fate downe, speaking never a word, as he did before: and so lived three daies alone, without speaking to any man. But when he arrived at the head of Tænarus, there Cleopatra's women first brought Antonius and Cleopatra to speake together, and afterwards to sup and lie together. Then began there againe a great number of Merchants Ships to gather about them, and some of their friends that had escaped from this overthrow, who brought newes, that his Army by Sea was overthrowne, but that they thought the Army by Land was yet whole. Then Antonius sent unto Canidius, to returne with his Army into ASIA by MACEDON. Now for himselfe, he determined to crosse over into AFRICK, and tooke one of his Carecks or Hulkes loaden with Gold and Silver, and other rich carriage, and gave it unto his friends, commanding them to depart, and seeke to save themselves. They answered him weeping, that they would neither do it, nor yet forsake him. Then Antonius very courteously and lovingly did comfort them, and prayed them to depart; and wrote unto Theophilus Governour of CORINTH, that he would see them safe, and helpe to hide them in some secret place, untill they had made their way and peace with Cæsar. This Theophilus was the Father of Hiparchus, who was had in great estimation about Antonius. He was the first of all his enfranchised Bondmen that revolted from him, and yielded unto Cæsar, and afterwards went and dwelt at CORINTH. And thus it stood with Antonius. Now for his Army by Sea, that fought before the head or foreland of ACTIUM, they held out a long time, and nothing troubled them more then a great boisterous winde that rose full in the Prowes of their Ships; and yet with much ado his Navie was at length overthrowne, five houres within night. There were not slaine above five thousand men: but yet there were three hundred Ships taken, as Octavius Cæsar writeth himselfe in his Commentaries. Many plainly saw Antonius flie, and yet could very hardly believe it, that he that had nineteene Legions whole by Land, and twelve thousand Horsemen upon the Sea side, would so have forsaken them, and have fled so cowardly, as if he had not oftentimes proved both the one and the other fortune, and that he had not bene thoroughly acquainted with the divers changes and fortunes of Battels. And yet his Souldiers still wished for him, and ever hoped that he would come by some meanes or other unto them. Furthermore, they shewed themselves so valiant and faithfull unto him, that after they certainly knew he was fled, they kept themselves whole together seven daies. In the end Canidius, Antonius Lieutenant, flying by night, and forsaking his Campe, when they saw themselves thus destitute of their Heads and Leaders, they yielded themselves unto the stronger. This done, Cæsar sailed towards ATHENS, and there made peace with the GRECIANS, and divided the rest of the Corne that was taken up for Antonius Army, unto the Townes and Cities of GREECE, the which had bene brought to extreme misery and poverty, cleane without Money, Slaves, Horse, and other Beasts of carriage. So that my Grandfather Nicarchus told, that all the Citizens of our City of CHERONEA (not one excepted) were driven themselves to carry a certaine measure of Corne on their shoulders to the Sea side, that lieth directly over against the Isle of ANTICYRA, and yet were they driven thither with whips. They carried it thus: but once: for the second time that they were charged againe to make the like carriage, all the Corne being ready to be carried, newes came that Antonius had lost the Battell, and so escaped our poore City. and Deputies fled immediately, and the Citizens divided the Corne amongst them. Antonius being arrived in LYBIA, he sent Cleopatra before into EGYPT from the City of PARÆTONUM; and he himselfe remained very solitary, having onely two of his friends with him, with whom he wandered up and downe, both of them Orators, the one Aristocrates a GRECIAN, and the other Lucilius a ROMANE: of whom we have written in another place, that at the Battell where Brutus was overthrowne, by the City of *PHILIPPE*s, he came and willingly put himselfe into the hands of those that followed Brutus, saying that it was he: because Brutus in the meane time might have liberty to save himselfe. And afterwards, because Antonius saved his life, he still remained with him, and was very faithfull and friendly unto him till his death. But when Antonius heard, that he whom he had truted with the Government of LYBIA, and unto whom he had given the charge of his Army there, had yielded unto Cæsar, he was so mad withall, that he would have slaine himselfe for anger, had not his friends about him withstood him, and kept him from it. So he went unto ALEXANDRIA, and there found Cleopatra about a wonderfull enterprize, and of great attempt. Betwixt the red Sea, and the Sea betweene the Lands that point upon the Coast of EGYPT, there is a little piece of Land that divideth both the Seas, and separateth AFRICK from ASIA: the which Straight is so narrow at the end where the two Seas are narrowest, that it is not above three hundred furlongs over. Cleopatra went about to lift her Ships out of the one Sea, and to hale them over the banke into the other Sea: that when her Ships were come into the Gulfe of ARABIA, she might then carry all her Gold and Silver away, and so with a great company of men go and dwell in some place about the Ocean Sea, far from the Sea Mediterræneum, to scape the danger and bondage of this Warre. But now, because the ARABIANS dwelling about the City of PETRA, did burne the first Ships that were brought to Land, and that Antonius thought, that his Army by Land which he left at ACTIUM was yet whole, he left off her enterprize, and determined to keep all the ports and passages of her Realme. Antonius, he forooke the City and company of his friends, and built him a house in the Sea, by the Isle of PHAROS, upon certaine forced mounts which he caused to be cast into the Sea, and dwelt there, as a man that banished himselfe from all mens company: saying that he would leave Timon's life, because he had the like wrong offered him, that was before offered unto Timon: and that for the unthankfulness of those he had done good unto, and whom he tooke to be his friends, he was angry with all men, and would trust no man. This Timon was a Citizen of ATHENS, that lived about the Warre of PELOPONNESUS, as appeareth by Plato and Aristophanes Comedies: in the which they mocked him, calling him a viper and malicious man unto mankind, to shun all other mens companies, but the company of young Alcibiades, a bold and insolent youth, whom he would greatly feast and make much of, and kissed him very gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked him the cause what he meant to make so much of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Timon answered him, I do it, said he, because I know that one day he shall do great mischief unto the ATHENIANS. This Timon sometimes would have Apemantus in his company, because he was much like of his nature and conditions, and also followed him in manner of life. On a time when they solemnly celebrated the Feast called Choræ at ATHENS (to wit, the Feasts of the dead where they make Sprinklings and Sacrifices for the dead) and that they two then feasted together by themselves, Apemantus said unto the other: O here is a trim Banquet Timon. Timon answered againe: Yea, said he, so thou wert not here. It is reported of him also, that this Timon on a time (the People being assembled in the Market-place about dispatch of some affaires) got up into the Pulpit for Orations, where the Orators commonly use to speake unto the People: and silence being made, every man listening to heare what he would say, because it was a wonder to see him in that place, at length he began to speake in this manner: My Lords of ATHENS, I have a little yard at my house where there groweth a Fig-tree, on the which many Citizens have hanged themselves: and because I meane to make some building on the place, I thought good to let you all understand it, that before the Fig-tree be cut downe, if any of you be desperate, you may there in time go hang your selves. He died in the City of HALES, and was buried upon the Sea side. Now it chanced so, that the Sea getting in, it compassed his Tombe round about, that no man could come to it: and upon the same was written this Epitaph:

Seeke not my name: a plague consume you wicked Wretches left.

It is reported that Timon himselfe, when he lived, made this Epitaph: for that which is commonly rehearsed, was not this, but made by the Poet Callimachus:

Here lie I Timon, who alive all living men did hate:
Pass by and curse thy fill: but passe, and stay not here thy gate.

Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this little shall suffice at this present. But now to returne to Antonius againe. Canidius himselfe came to bring him newes, that he had lost all his Army by Land at ACTIUM: on the other side he was advertised also, that Herodes King of JUDIA, who had also certaine Legions and Bands with him, was revolted unto Cæsar, and all the other Kings in like manner: so that saving those that were about him, he had none left him. All this notwithstanding did nothing trouble him: and it seemed that he was contented to forgo all his hope, and so to be rid of all his cares and troubles. Thereupon he left his solitary house he had built by the Sea which he called Timoneon, and Cleopatra received him into her Royall Palace. He was no sooner come thither, but he straight set all the City on rioting and banquetting againe, and himselfe to liberality and Gifts. He caused the Sonne of Julius Cæsar and Cleopatra, to be enrolled (according her, that she would seeke to save her life, if she could possible, without reproach and dishonour: and that chiefly she should trust Proculeius above any man else about Cesar. And as for himselfe, that she should not lament nor sorrow for the miserable change of his fortune at the end of his daies: but rather that she should thinke him the more fortunate, for the former Triumphs and Honours he had received; considering that while he lived, he was the noblest and greatest Prince of the World; and that now he was overcome, not cowardly, but valiantly, a ROMANE by another ROMANE. As Antonius gave the last gaspe, Proculeius came that was sent from Cesar. For after Antonius had thrust his Sword in himselfe, as they carried him into the Tombs and Monuments of Cleopatra, one of his guard (called Derictus) tooke his Sword with the which he had stricken himselfe, and hid it: then he secretly stole away, and brought Octavius Caesar the first newes of his death, and shewed him his Sword that was bloudied. Cesar hearing this newes, straight withdrew himselfe into a secret place of his Tent, and there burst out with teares, lamenting his hard and miserable fortune, that had been his friend and Brother-in-law, his equall in the Empire, and companion with him in sundry great Exploits and Battels. Then he called for all his friends, and shewed them the Letters Antonius had written to him, and his Answers also sent him againe, during their quarrell and strife: and how fiercely and proudly the other answered him, to all just and reasonable matters he wrote unto him. After this, he sent Proculeius, and commanded him to do what he could possible to get Cleopatra alive, fearing lest otherwise all the Treasure would be lost: and furthermore, he thought that if he could take Cleopatra, and bring her alive to ROME, she would marvellously beautifie and set out his Triumph. But Cleopatra would never put her selfe into Proculeius hands, although they spake together. For Proculeius came to the Gates that were thick and strong, and surely barred, but yet there were some cranes, through the which her voice might be heard, and so they without understood, that Cleopatra demanded the Kingdome of EGYPT for her Sonnes: and that Proculeius answered her: That she should be of good cheare, and not be afraid to refer all unto Cesar. After he had viewed the place very well, he came and reported her answer unto Cesar: who immediately sent Gallus to speake once againe with her, and bade him purposely hold her in talke, whilest Proculeius did set up a Ladder against the high window by the which Antonius was trised up, and came downe into the Monument with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleopatra stood to heare what Gallus said unto her. One of her women which was shut up in her Monuments with her, saw Proculeius by chance as he came downe, and skreeked out: O poore Cleopatra, thou art taken. Then when she saw Proculeius behinde her, as she came from the gate, she thought to have stabbed her selfe in with a short dagger the wore of purpose by her side. But Proculeius came suddenly upon her, and taking her by both the hands, said unto her: Cleopatra, first, thou shalt do thy selfe great wrong; and secondly, unto Cesar, to deprive him of the occasion and opportunity, openly to shew his bounty and mercy, and to give his Enemies cause to accuse the most courteous and noble Prince that ever was, and to appeach him, as though he were a cruell and mercilesse man, that were not to be trusted. So even as he spake the word, he tooke her dagger from her, and shooke her clothes for feare of any poyson hidden about her. Afterwards, Cesar sent one of his infranchised men called Epaphroditus, whom he straightly charged to looke well unto her, and to beware in any case that she made not her selfe away: and for the rest, to use her with all the courtesie possible. And for himselfe, he in the meane time entred the City of ALEXANDRIA, and (as he went) talked with the Philosopher Arrius, and held him by the hand, to the end that his Countreymen should reverence him the more, because they saw Cesar so highly esteeme and honour him. Then he went into the Shew-place of Exercises, and so up to his Chaire of State which was prepared for him of a great height: and there according to his commandement, all the People of ALEXANDRIA were assembled, who quaking for feare, fell downe on their knees before him, and craved mercy. Cesar bade them all stand up, and told them openly that he forgave the People, and pardoned the felonies and offences they had committed against him in this War. First, for the Founders sake of the same City, which was Alexander the Great: secondly, for the beauty of the City, which he much esteemed and wondred at: thirdly, for the love he bare unto his very friend Arrius. Thus did Cesar honour Arrius, who craved pardon for himselfe and many others, and specially for Philostatus, the eloquentest man of all the Sophisters and Orators of his time, for present and sudden speech: howbeit, he falsly named himselfe an Academick Philosopher. Therefore Cesar that hated his nature and conditions, would not heare his suite. Thereupon he let his gray beard grow long, and followed Arrius step by step in a long morning gowne, still buzzing in his eares this Greeke Verse:

May by a wise man have the better speed.*

Cesar understanding this, not for the desire he had to deliver Philostatus of his feare, but to rid Arrius of malice and envie that might have fallen out against him, he pardoned him. Now touching Antonius Sonnes, Antyllus, his eldest Sonne by Fulvia was slaine, because his Schoolmaster Theodorus did betray him unto the Souldiers, who strake off his head. And the Villaine tooke a precious Stone of great value from his neck, the which he did sowe in his girdle, and afterwards denied that he had it: but it was found about him, and so Cesar trusted him up for it. For Cleopatra's Children, they were very honourably kept, with their Governours and Traine that waited on them. But for Cesarion, who was said to be Julius Cæsars Sonne, his Mother Cleopatra had sent him unto the INDIANS through ETHIOPIA, with a great summe of Money. But one of his Governours also called Rhodon, even such another as Theodorus, perswaded him to returne into his Countrey, and told him that Cesar sent for him to give him his Mothers Kingdome. So, as Cesar was determining with himselfe what he should do, Arrius said unto him:

Too

*Too many Cæsars is not good.
Alluding unto a certaine Verse of Homer, that saith:
Too many Lords do not well.*

Therefore Cesar did put Cesarion to death, after the death of his Mother Cleopatra. Many Princes, great Kings and Captaines did crave Antonius body of Octavius Caesar, to give him honourable buriall: but Cesar would never take it from Cleopatra, who did sumptuously and royally bury him with her owne hands, whom Cesar suffered to take as much as she would to bestow upon his Funerals. Now was she altogether overcome with sorrow and passion of minde, for she had knocked her breast so pitifully, that she had martyred it, and in divers places had raised ulcers and inflammations, so that she fell into a feaver withall: whereof she was very glad, hoping thereby to have good colour to abtaine from meate, and that so she might have died easily without any trouble. She had a Physician called Olympus, whom she made privie to her intent, to the end he should helpe to rid her out of her life: as Olympus writeth himselfe, who wrote a Booke of all these things. But Cesar mistrusted the matter, by many conjectures he had, and therefore did put her in feare, and threatened her to put her children to shamefull death. With these threats, Cleopatra for feare yielded straight, as she would have yielded unto strokes: and afterwards suffered her selfe to be cured and dieted as they listed. Shortly after, Cesar came himselfe in person to see her, and to comfort her. Cleopatra being layed upon a little low bed in poore estate (when she saw Cesar come into her Chamber) suddenly rose up, naked in her smock, and fell downe at his feete marvellously disfigured: both for that she had plucked her haire from her head, as also for that she had martyred all her face with her nailes; and besides, her voice was small and trembling, her eyes sunke into her head with continuall blubbering; and moreover, they might see the most part of her stomach torne in sunder. To be short, her body was not much better then her minde: yet her good grace and comelinesse, and the force of her beauty was not altogether defaced. But notwithstanding this ugly and pitifull state of hers, yet she shewed her selfe within, by her outward lookes and countenance. When Cesar had made her lye downe againe, and sat by her beds side: Cleopatra began to cleare and excuse her selfe for that she had done, laying all to the feare she had of Antonius. Cesar in contrary manner, reprovew her in every point. Then she suddenly altered her speech, and prayed him to pardon her, as though she were afraid to die, and desirous to live. At length, she gave him a brieft and memoriall of all the ready money and treasure she had. But by chance there stood one Selenus by, one of her Treasurers, who to seeke a good Servant, came straight to Cesar to disprove Cleopatra, that she had not set in all, but kept many things backe of purpose. Cleopatra was in such a rage with him, that she flew upon him, and tooke him by the haire of the head, and boxed him well-favouredly. Cesar fell a laughing and parted the fray. Alas, said she, O Cesar: is not this a great shame and reproach, that thou having vouchsafed to take the paines to come unto me, and done me this honour, poore wretch, and cattife creature, brought into this pitifull and miserable state: and that mine owne Servants should come now to accuse me? though it may be I have reserved some Jewels and trifles meete for women, but not for me (poore soule) to set out my selfe withall, but meaning to give some pretty Presents and Gifts unto Octavius and Livia, that they making meanes and intercession for me to thee, thou mightest yet extend thy favour and mercy upon me. Cesar was glad to heare her say so, perswading himselfe thereby that she had yet a desire to save her life. So he made her answer, that he did not onely give her that to dispose of at her pleasure, which she had kept backe, but further promised to use her more honourably and bountifully, then she would thinke for: and so he tooke his leave of her, supposing he had deceived her, but indeed he was deceived himselfe. There was a young Gentleman, Cornelius Dolabella, that was one of Cæsars very great familiars, and besides did beare no ill will unto Cleopatra. He sent her word secretly (as she had requested him) that Cesar determined to take his journey through SYRIA, and that within three daies he would send her away before with her Children. When this was told Cleopatra, she requested Cesar that it would please him to suffer her to offer the last Oblations of the dead, unto the soule of Antonius. This being granted her, she was carried to the place where his Tombe was, and there falling downe on her knees, embracing the Tombe with her women, the teares running downe her cheekes, she began to speake in this sort: "O my deare Lord Antonius, it is not long sithence I buried thee here, being a free woman: and now I offer unthankfull to thee the funerall sprinklings and oblations, being a captive and prisoner: and yet I am forbidden and kept from tearing and murdering this captive body of mine with blowes, which they carefully guard and keepe, onely to triumph of thee: looke therefore henceforth for no other honours, offerings, nor sacrifices from me: for these are the last which Cleopatra can give thee, sith now they carry her away. Whilest we lived together, nothing could sever our companies; but now at our death, I feare me they will make as change our Countreys. For as thou being a ROMANE, hast been buried in EGYPT: even so wretched creature I an EGYPTIAN, shall be buried in ITALY, which shall be all the good that I have received by thy Countrey. If therefore the gods where thou art now have any power and authority, sith our gods here have forsaken us, suffer not thy true friend and lover to be carried away alive, that in me they triumph of thee: but receive me with thee, and let me be buried in one selfe Tombe. For though my griefes and miseries be infinite, yet none hath grieved me more, nor that I could lesse beare withall, then this small time that I have been driven to live alone without thee. Then having ended these dolefull plaints, and crowned the Tombe with Garlandes and sundry Nolegays, and marvellous lovingly embraced the same, she commanded they should prepare her Bath; and when she had bathed and washed her selfe, she fell to her meate, and was

was sumptuously served. Now whilst she was at dinner, there came a Countreyman and brought her a basket. The Souldiers that warded at the gates, asked him straight what he had in his Basket. He opened his basket, and tooke out the leaves that covered the figs, and shewed them that they were figs he brought. They all of them marvelled to see so goodly figs. The Countreyman laughed to heare them, and bade them take some if they would. They believed he told them truly, and so bade him carry them in. After Cleopatra had dined, she sent a certaine Table written and sealed unto Caesar, and commanded them all to go out of the Tombes where she was, but the two women; then she shut the doores to her. Caesar when he received this Table, and began to reade her lamentation and petition, requesting him that he would let her be buried with Antonius, found straight what she meant, and thought to have gone thither himselfe: howbeit, he sent one before in all haste that might be, to see what it was. Her death was very sudden: for those whom Caesar sent unto her, ran thither in all haste possible, and found the Souldiers standing at the gate, mistrusting nothing, nor understanding of her death. But when they had opened the doores, they found Cleopatra starke dead, laid upon a bed of Gold, attired and arrayed in her Royall Robes, and one of her two women, which was called Iras, dead at her feete: and her other woman (called Charmion) halfe dead, and trembling, trimming the Diademe which Cleopatra wore upon her head. One of the Souldiers seeing her, angrily said unto her: Is that well done Charmion? Very well, said she, and meete for a Princesse descended from the race of so many noble Kings: she said no more, but fell downe dead hard by the bed. Some report, that this Aspick was brought unto her in the basket with figs, and that she had commanded them to hide it under the fig-leaves, that when she should thinke to take out the figs, the Aspick should bite her before she should see her: howbeit, that when she would have taken away the leaves for the figs, she perceived it, and said, Art thou here then? And so her arme being naked, she put it to the Aspick to be bitten. Other say againe, she kept it in a boxe, and that she did prick and thrust it with a spindle of gold, so that the Aspick being angered withall, leapt out with great fury, and bit her in the arme. Howbeit few can tell the troth. For they report also, that she had hidden poyson in a hollow razor which she carried in the haire of her head: and yet was there no marke seene on her body, or any signe discerned that she was poysoned, neither also did they finde this Serpent in her Tombe: but it was reported onely, that there was seene certaine fresh steps or tracks where it had gone, on the Tombe side toward the Sea, and specially by the doore side. Some say also, that they found two little pretty bitings in her arme, scant to be discerned: the which it seemeth Caesar himselfe gave credit unto, because in his Triumph he carried Cleopatra's Image, with an Aspick biting of her arme. And thus goeth the report of her death. Now Caesar, though he was marvellous sorry for the death of Cleopatra, yet he wondered at her noble minde and courage, and therefore commanded the should be nobly buried, and laid by Antonius: and willed also that her two women should have honourable buriall. Cleopatra died being eight and thirty yeares old, after she had reigned two and twenty yeares, and governed about fourteene of them with Antonius. And for Antonius, some say that he lived three and fifty yeares: and others say, six and fifty. All his Statues, Images, and Mettals, were plucked downe and overthrowne, saving those of Cleopatra, which stood still in their places, by meanes of Archibius one of her friends, who gave Caesar a thousand Talents that they should not be handled as those of Antonius were. Antonius left seven children by three wives, of the which, Caesar did put Antyllus (the eldest Son he had by Fulvia) to death. Octavia his wife tooke all the rest, and brought them up with hers, and married Cleopatra, Antonius Daughter, unto King Iuba, a marvellous courteous and goodly Prince. And Antonius (the Sonne of Fulvia) came to be so great, that next unto Agrippa, who was in greatest estimation about Caesar, and next unto the children of Livia, which were the second in estimation: he had the third place. Furthermore, Octavia having had two Daughters by her first husband Marcellus, and a Sonne also called Marcellus, Caesar married his Daughter unto that Marcellus, and so did adopt him for his Son. And Octavia also married one of her Daughters unto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was dead, after he had been married a while, Octavia perceiving that her Brother Caesar was very busie to choose some one among his friends, whom he trusted best, to make his Sonne-in-law, she perswaded him, that Agrippa should marry his Daughter (Marcellus widow) and leave her owne Daughter. Caesar first was contented withall, and then Agrippa: and so the afterwards tooke away her Daughter and married her unto Antonius; and Agrippa married Julia, Caesars Daughter. Now there remained two Daughters more of Octavia and Antonius: Domitius Enobarbus married the one; and the other, which was Antonia, so faire and vertuous a young Lady, was married unto Drusus the Sonne of Livia, and Sonne-in-law of Caesar. Of this marriage came Germanicus and Clodius: of the which, Clodius afterwards came to be Emperour. And of the Sonnes of Germanicus, the one whose name was Caius, came also to be Emperour: who after he had licentiously reigned a time, was slaine, with his Wife and Daughter. Agrippina also (having a Son by her first Husband Enobarbus, called Lucius Domitius) was afterwards married unto Clodius, who adopted her Sonne, and called him Nero Germanicus. This Nero was Emperour in our time, who slew his owne Mother, and had almost destroyed the Empire of Rome, through his madnesse and wicked life, being the fifth Emperour of Rome after Antonius.

THE COMPARISON OF DEMETRIUS with ANTONIVS.

Now, sihence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of them much like to the other, having fortune alike diverse and variable unto them; let us therefore come to consider their Power and Authority, and how they came to be so great. First of all, it is certaine that Demetrius Power and Greatnesse fell unto him by inheritance from his Father Antigonus: who became the greatest and mightiest Prince of all the Successors of Alexander, and had won the most part of Asia, before Demetrius came of full age. Antonius in contrary manner, borne of an honest man, who otherwise was no man of Warre, and had not left him any meanes to arise to such greatnesse, durst take upon him to contend for the Empire with Caesar, that had no right unto it by inheritance, but yet made himselfe Successor of the Power, the which the other by great paine and travell had obtained, and by his owne industry became so great, without the helpe of any other, that the Empire of the whole World being divided into two parts, he had the one halfe, and tooke that of the greatest countenance and power. Antonius being absent, oftentimes overcame the PARTIANS in Battell by his Lieutenants, and chased away the barbarous People dwelling about Mount Caucasus, unto the Sea Hyrcanium, inso much as the thing they most reprove him for, did most witness his greatnesse. For Demetrius Father made him gladly marry Phila, Antipaters Daughter, although she was too old for him: because she was of a nobler House then himselfe. Antonius on the other side was blamed for marrying of Cleopatra, a Queene that for her Power and Nobility of Blood, excelled all other Kings in her time, but Asfaxes: and moreover, made himselfe so great, that others thought him worthy of greater things, then he himselfe required. Now for the desire that moved the one and the other to conquer Realmes, the desire of Demetrius was unblameable and just, desiring to reigne over People which had beene governed at all times, and desired to be governed by Kings. But Antonius desire was altogether wicked and tyrannicall, who sought to keepe the People of Rome in bondage and subjection; but lately before rid of Caesars reigne and government. For the greatest and most famous Exploit Antonius ever did in Warres (to wit, the Warre in the which he overthrowne Cassius and Brutus) was begun to no other end, but to deprive his Countrey men of their Liberty and Freedome. Demetrius in contrary manner, before Fortune had overthrowne him, never left to set Greece at liberty, and to drive the Garisons away, which kept the Cities in bondage; and not like Antonius, that boasted he had slaine them that had set Rome at liberty. The chieftest thing they commended in Antonius was his liberality and bounty, in the which Demetrius excelled him so far, that he gave more to his Enemies, then Antonius did to his friends: although he was marvellously well thought of, for the honourable and sumptuous Funerall he gave unto Brutus body. Howbeit Demetrius caused all his Enemies to be buried that were slaine in Battell, and returned unto Ptolemy the Prisoners he had taken, with great Gifts and Presents he gave them. They were both in their prosperity, very riotously and licentiously given: but yet no man can ever say, that Demetrius did at any time ever let slip any opportunity or occasion to follow great matters, but onely gave himselfe indeed to pleasure, when he had nothing else to do. And further, to say truly, he tooke pleasure of Lamia, as a man would have a delight to heare one tell tales, when he had nothing else to do, or is desirous to sleepe: but indeed when he was to make any preparation for Warre, he had not then Ivie at his Darts end, nor had his Helmet perfumed, nor came out of the Ladies Closets picked and prynced to go to Battell: but he let all dancing and sporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides saith:

But to conclude, he never had overthrow or misfortune through negligence, not by delaying time to follow his owne pleasure; as we see in painted Tables, where Omphale secretly stealeth away Hercules Club, and tooke his Lions skin from him: even so Cleopatra oftentimes unarmed Antonius, and enticed him to her, making him lose matters of great importance, and very needfull Journeys, to come and be dandled with her, about the Rivers of Canobus, and Taphosiris. In the end, as Parrus fled from the Battell, and went to hide himselfe in Helens armes: even so did he in Cleopatra's armes; or to speake more properly, Paris hid himselfe in Helens Closet, but Antonius (to follow Cleopatra) fled and lost the Victory. Furthermore, Demetrius had many Wives that he had married, and all at one time: the which was not disallowable or not forbidden by the Kings of MACEDON, but had beene used from Philip and Alexander's time; as also King Lyfimachus and Proton had; and did honour all them that he married. But Antonius first of all married two Wives together, the which never ROMAN durst do before, but himselfe. Secondly, he put away his first ROMAN Wife, which he had lawfully married, for the love of a strange woman, he fondly fell in fancy withall, and contrary to the Lawes and Ordinances of ROME. And therefore Demetrius Marriages never hurt him, for any wrong he had done to his Wives: but Antonius contrarily, was undone by his Wives. Of all the lascivious parts Antonius played, none were so abominable, as this onely fact of Demetrius. For the Historiographers write, that they would not suffer dogs to come into the Castle of ATHENS, because of all Beasts he is too busie with bitchery: and Demetrius, in Minerva's Temple it selfe lay with Curtizans, and there defiled many Citizens Wives. And besides all this, the horrible vice of cruelty, which a man would thinke were least mingled with these wanton delights, is joyned with Demetrius contumelience: who suffered (or more properly, compelled) the goodliest young Boy of ATHENS, to die a most pitifull death, to save himselfe from violence, being taken. And to conclude, Antonius by his incontinency, did no hurt but to himselfe, and Demetrius did hurt unto all others. Demetrius never hurt any of his friends: but Antonius suffered his Uncle by his Mothers side to be slaine, that he might have his will of Cicero to kill him: a thing so damnable, wicked, and cruell of it selfe, that he hardly deserved to have beene pardoned, though he had killed Cicero, to have saved his Uncles life. Now where they falsified and brake their oaths, the one making Artabazus prisoner, and the other killing of Alexander, Antonius out of doubt had best cause, and justest colour: for Artabazus had betrayed him, and forsaken him in MEDIA. But Demetrius (as divers do report) devised a false matter to accuse Alexander, to cloake the murder he had committed: and some thinke he did accuse him, to whom he himselfe had done injury unto: and was not revenged of him, that would do him injury. Furthermore, Demetrius himselfe did noble feats of Warre, as we have recited of him before: and contrarily, Antonius when he was not there in person, wan many famous and great Victories by his Lieutenants: and were both overthrowne being personally in Battell, but yet not both after one sort. For the one was forsaken of his men, being MACEDONIANS, and the other contrarily forooke his that were ROMANS: for he fled, and left them that ventured their lives for his honour. So that the fault the one did, was, that he made them his Enemies that fought for him: and the fault in the other, that he so beastly left them that loved him best, and were most faithfull to him. And for their deaths, a man cannot praise the one or the other, but yet Demetrius death was the more reproachfull: for he suffered himselfe to be taken Prisoner, and when he was sent away to be kept in a strange place, he had the heart to live yet three yeares longer, to serve his mouth and belly, as brute Beasts do. Antonius on the other side, slew himselfe (to confesse a troth) cowardly, and miserably, to his great paine and griefe: and yet was it before his body came into his Enemies hands.

THE LIFE OF ARTAXERXES.

Artaxerxes, the first of this Name of all the Kings of PERSIA, a Noble and courteous Prince as any of all his House, was firnamed Long-hand, because his right hand was longer then his left; and he was the Sonne of King Xerxes. But the second, whose Life we presently intend to Write, was firnamed Mnemon, as much to say, Great memory: and he was the Son of the Daughter of the first Artaxerxes. For King Darius, and his Wife Parysatis, had four Sons, of the which, the eldest was this Artaxerxes, the second Cyrus, and two other younger, Ostanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning bare the Name of the former Ancient Cyrus, which in the PERSIAN Tongue signifieth the Sun. But Artaxerxes was called before Arscus, although Dion writeth, that he was called Oarses. Howbeit it is unlikely, that Ctesias (although his Bookes otherwise be full of Fables, and as untrue as they are fond) should forget the Name of the Prince with whom he dwelt, whom he served, and continually followed, both him, his Wife and Children. Cyrus from his cradle was of a hot stirring minde, and Artaxerxes in contrary manner, more milde and gentle in all his actions and doings. He was married to a very faire Lady, by his Father and Mothers commandement: and afterwards kept her against their wils, being forbidden by them. For King Darius his Father, having put his Sons Wives Brother to death, he would also have put her to death: but her Husband with teares made such humble suite to his Mother for her, that with much ado, he did not onely get pardon for her life, but grant also that she should not be put from him. This notwithstanding, his Mother alwaies loved Cyrus better then him, and prayed that he might be King after his Fathers death. Wherefore Cyrus being in his Provinces of ASIA by the Sea side, when he was sent for to come to the Court, at what time his Father lay sick of the Disease he died: he went thither in good hope his Mother had prevailed with his Father, that in his Will he would make him his Heire of the Realme of PERSIA. For his Mother Parysatis alledged a matter very probable, and the which in old time did help King Xerxes in the like case, through Demaratus counsell. She said that Arscus was borne before her Husband Darius was King, and Cyrus after he was crowned King. All this could not prevail: for her eldest Son Arscus, firnamed Artaxerxes, was assigned King of PERSIA, and Cyrus Governour of LYDIA, and the Kings Lieutenant-Generall of all the low Countries of ASIA toward the Sea side. Shortly after King Darius death, the new King Artaxerxes went unto Pasargades, there to be consecrated and anointed King by the Priests of the Countrey of PERSIA. The place of this Pasargades, is a Temple dedicated unto Minerva the goddesse of Battels, as I take it, where the new King must be consecrated; and when he cometh himself into great danger. Clearchus selfe also committed as a great fault (if it were not worse,) when he would not set his men in order directly against the Battell of the Enemies, where the Kings Person stood, but went and penn'd them up by the Rivers side, being afraid lest they should have been compass'd in behinde. For if he would have looked so straightly to himselfe, and have provided every way for his safety, that no man might come to hurt him, he should have kept himselfe at home, and not have stirred one foot out of the doores. But sith he had come so farre, as from the low Countries of ASIA, unto the place where the Field was fought, and uncompell'd, only to put Cyrus in his Fathers Seat and Imperiall Crown; to go chuse a place in the Battell, not where he might do his Lord best service that had hired him, but rather where he might fight more at his ease, and at lesse danger, it was even as much, as if through cowardinesse his wits had been taken from him when he should have fought, or that through treason he had forsaken his Enterprise. For, to prove that the Troopes which were about the Kings person, had never been able to have received the charge of the GRECIANS, and that those being overthrowne, the King had been slaine in the Field, or else forced to flie, and that Cyrus had wonne the Field, and by this Victory had been King, the successe of this Battell doth plainly shew it. And therefore Clearchus over-curious respect, deserved more blame for the losse of this Battell, then Cyrus over hardinesse. For if King Artaxerxes would have chosen or wished a place where the GRECIANS might have done him lesse hurt, he could not have devised a fitter place that was so farre from him, and from whence the GRECIANS could neither see nor heare what was done where he was, as it fell out in sequelle. For Cyrus was slaine before he could prevail by Clearchus Victory, he was so farre from him: and furthermore, Cyrus therein knew before what was meetest to be done. For he commanded Clearchus to place himselfe with his company in the midst of the Battell: who answered him, he should take no thought for any thing, for he would see all things well ordered. And when he had said so, he marred all afterwards: for where the GRECIANS were, they overthrow the barbarous People that made head against them, and had them in chafe while they were weary of following them. Cyrus being mounted upon a hot stirring Horse, that had a hard head, and was very fierce and dogged, called Pasacas, as Ctesias writeth, Artagerfes, the Governour of the Province of the CADUSIANS, spied him a farre off, and when he had found him, clapped spurres to his Horse, and came with full carriere unto him, and cryed out: O Traytour, and most unfaithfull and desperate man, thou now dishonourest the name of Cyrus (which is the goodliest and most honourable name of all the PERSIANS,) for that thou hast brought so valiant GRECIANS hither to so wicked an enterprise, to spoile the PERSIANS goods, in hope to destroy thy soveraigne Lord and onely Brother, who hath an infinite number of slaves and Servants farre honeste men then thou wilt be while thou livest; and that thou shalt presently know by proof, for thou shalt die before thou see the King thy Brothers face: and therewithall he threw his Dart at him with all the force he had. But Cyrus Armour was so good, that it pierced him not: yet the blow came with such good will, that it made him stagger on his Horse backe. When Artagerfes had given him that blow, he presently turned his Horse. But Cyrus therewithall threw a Dart at him so happily, that he slew him right in the place above the bone that joyneth the two shoulders together: so that the head of his Dart, ran quite through his neck. Now, that Cyrus slew Artagerfes with his own hands in the Field, all the Historiographers do agree upon it: but for the death of Cyrus, because Xenophon toucheth it but a little by the way, for that he was not present in the very place where he was slaine, it shall not be hurtfull particularly to set down the manner thereof, both according to the report of Dion, and also of Ctesias. First, Dion writeth, that after Cyrus had slaine Artagerfes, he went with great fury, and flew in amongst the Troope of them which were nearest unto the Kings Person, and that he came so neare the King, that he slew his Horse flatke dead under him, and the King fell to the ground withall. But Tiribazus that was hard by him, straight mounted the King againe upon another Horse, and said unto him: Your Grace will remember this Battell another day, for it is not to be forgotten. And Cyrus clapping spurres againe to his Horse, threw another Dart at Artaxerxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the King told them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather die then suffer it: so therewithall he spurring his Horse to charge Cyrus (who came fiercely and desperately, having an infinite number of blowes with Darts thrown at him on every side) threw his Dart at him also. So did all those that were about his Person: and so was Cyrus slaine in this Conflict. Some say, that he was slaine with the wound his Brother the King gave him. Others say, that it was a man at armes of the Countrey of CARIA, unto whom the King gave reward of his good service, gave the honour in all Battels to carry before the first Ranke, a Cock of Gold on the top of a Speare: for the PERSIANS do call the CARIANS Cockes, because in the Warres they use to wear crests in the top of their Head-pieces. And this is *Dion*s report. But Ctesias, to couch in few words that which Dion reporteth at large, saith: that Cyrus after he had slaine Artagerfes, galloped on the spurre against the King himselfe, and the King against him, and not a word between them both. Artanus one of Cyrus flatterers, threw the first Dart at the King, but killed him not: and the King with all his force againe threw his Dart, thinking to have hit Cyrus but he missed him, and slew Tisaphernes, one of the valiantest and stoutest men Cyrus had about him, who fell down dead. Then Cyrus hit Artaxerxes so fore a blow on his Breast, that he pierced his Armour, and entred into his flesh two fingers deepe. The King with this blow fell downe to the ground: therewithall the most part of his men about him were so afraid, that they forooke him and fled. Howbeit he got up againe, with the helpe of others that were about him, amongst amongst whom Ctesias said he was one, and so recovered a little Hill as farre off, to take a little breath. In the meane time, Cyrus Horse that was hot in the mouth, and hard headed, as we have told you, carried his Master in spite of his heart farre from his men, among his Enemies, and no man knew him, because it was night, and his men were very buisie in seeking for him. But Cyrus hoping he had won the Victory, being of a hot stirring nature, and valiant, he went up and down in the thickest of his Enemies, crying out in the PERSIAN Tongue: Save your selves poor men, save your selves. When they heard him say so, some made a lane for him to passe by them, and did him reverence: but by evil fortune his Tiara (which is the high Royall Hat after the PERSIAN manner) fell off from his head. Then a young PERSIAN called Mithridates, passing by him, hit him a blow with his Dart upon one of his Temples, hard by his Eye, not knowing what he was. His wound straight fell on a marvellous bleeding. Whereupon, Cyrus staggering at it, fell on the ground in a wound, and his Horse ran away from him: but the Caparillon he had upon him fell to the ground all bloudied, and his Page that had hurt him, tooke it up. Shortly after Cyrus being come to himselfe againe, some of his Eunuches (which were men gelt, and Groomes of his Chamber) that were about him, did lift him up, thinking to set him upon another Horse, and to get him out of the presse: but he was not able to sit on his Horse. Thereupon he proved if he could better go on foot, and the Eunuches held him up by the armes, and led him amazed as he was, not able to stand on his feete; although he thought he had won the Battell, because he heard his Enemies flying about him cry, The gods save King Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receive them to mercy. But in the meane time, there came certain poor men of the City of CAUNUS, who followed the Kings Campe, getting their living as drudges and slaves, to do most vile Service. They joyned with the Troope where Cyrus was, supposing they had been the Kings men: but when they perceived in the end, by the red Coates they wore upon their Armours, that they were Enemies, for that the Kings men wore white Coates, there was one among the rest that valiantly strake at Cyrus behind with his Partizan, not knowing indeed that it was Cyrus. The blow lighted full on the ham of his Legge, and cut his sinewes so, that Cyrus fell withall; and falling, by misfortune fell upon a great stone with his brow, where he had been hurt before, that he died forthwith. Thus doth Ctesias report it, where me thinketh he cutteth his Throate with a dull edged Knife, he hath such ado to bring Cyrus to his end. Now after Cyrus was dead, Artasyras, one of King Artaxerxes Eunuches (whom they called the Kings Eye in the Court) passing by on horse-back, knew Cyrus Eunuches that mourned very pitifully, lamenting the death of their Master. So he asked the Eunuch whom Cyrus loved best: Who is that that is dead. O Parisacas, that thou weepest so bitterly? Parisacas answered him againe, Seest thou not Artasyras that it is Cyrus but newly dead? Artasyras wondered much when he saw him. So he comforted the Eunuch, and willed him in no case to go from the body, and in the meane time he galloped apace to the King, who thought he had lost all, and was very ill besides, both for the great thirst he suffered, as also for the wound he had on his breast. Now when the Eunuch came unto the King, and told him with a smiling countenance the newes, how he had seene Cyrus dead: the King was so joyfull at the newes, that he was desirous himselfe forthwith to go unto the place where he lay to see him, and commanded Artasyras to bring him thither. But after he had considered better of it, he was counselled not to go thither himselfe for feare of the GRECIANS, who they said wonne all, and were yet chafing and killing them in the Field, that fled: but rather that he should send a good company of men thither, to bring him just report, whether the newes were true of his death, or not. Upon this advice he stayed, and sent thither thirty men, every man with Torches in their hands. In the meane time, one of the Eunuches called Strabazanes, ranne up and down to see if he could get any water for the King, that was almost dead for thirst: for there was no water near unto him where he was, and besides, his Campe was farre from him. His Eunuch having runne up and down a great way to seeke it, met by chance with these poore Slaves and Porters the CAUNIANS, among the which one of them carried in an old ragged Goates Skinne, about eight glasse full of naughty stinking water. So he presently carried the same to the King, who dranke it up every whit. When the King had dranke it, The Eunuch asked him, if that naughty water did him no hurt. The King sware by the gods unto him, that he never dranke better Wine, nor sweeter water then that was, nor that pleased him better then that did: and therefore, said he, I beseech the gods, if it be not my hap to finde him that gave thee this water to reward him, yet that it will please them to send him good fortune. As the King was talking thus with the Eunuch, the thirty men with their Torches returned unto him, who altogether with joyfull countenance, confirmed the good newes he looked for: and then there were come together againe a greater number of Souldiers about him, and still came more one after another, that he began againe to be courageous. Then he came down into the Plainte, with a world of Lights and Torches about him, and went straight to the place where his Brother Cyrus Body lay. There following the ancient manner of the PERSIANS against Traytours to the King, he caused his head and right hand to be stricken off, and then made his head be brought unto him, the which he tooke by the haire of his head (for Cyrus wore them long and thicke) and did himselfe shew it unto them that fled still and were afraid, to encourage them againe. They wondering to see it, did him humble reverence, and so gathered by companies about the King, that in a small time there were gathered together about him, threescore and ten thousand fighting men, with the which he tooke his way againe towards the Campe. Indeed Ctesias saith, that he had but foure hundred thousand fighting men in all: but Dion and Xenophon say more. And for the number of them that were slaine, Ctesias saith, that word was brought to the King, that there were not above nine thousand slaine, howbeit that to fight they seemed to be no lesse then twenty thousand: but for that point, he might be talked withall, in either of both. And furthermore, where he saith that the King did send him with Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN unto the GRECIANS, and others with him, that is a flat lie. For Xenophon knew right well, that this Ctesias waited upon the King, because he speaketh of him in divers places of his History: if he had been appointed by the King to carry report unto the GRECIANS of so weighty a matter, it is like enough Xenophon would not have concealed it, when he nameth Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN. But Ctesias (as it appeareth by his Writings) was a very ambitious man, and partiall unto the LACEDÆMONIANS, but specially unto Charchum: and is glad when he can get any occasion to speake of himselfe for his glory, of LACEDÆMON, and of Clearchus. Now after this Battell, King Artaxerxes sent goodly rich Gifts unto Artageris Son, whose Father Cyrus had slaine with his own hands: and (as it is reported) did also greatly honour Ctesias, and many others: and did not forget also to cause the poore CAUNIAN slave to be sought out, that had given him the water to be carried to him, which saved his life: and when he had found him out, of a poor wretch unknown before, he made him a rich Nobleman. He severely punished those also that had offended the Martiall Law, as amongst others Arbaces, one of the MEDES: who (when the Battell was joyned) fled first to Cyrus side, and then, when he understood he was slaine, he returned againe to the Kings side. For, supposing that it was rather timorousnesse and cowardly nature, then for treason or ill will he bare him, he compelled him to carry a Whore on his backe stark naked, all day long about the Market-place. And to another (who besides he had yielded himself to his Enemies, falsely boasting that he had slaine two) he made his Tongue to be boared through in three severall places with a Cordwainers Awle. Now the King being of opinion that it was himselfe that had slaine his Brother Cyrus with his own hand, and being desirous that every man should so thinke and say, he sent Presents unto Mithridates, that had hurt him first in the forehead, and commanded him that carried the Gifts unto him, to tell him from the King: The King doth send thee these Presents, because thou finding first the Caparison of Cyrus Horse, diddest bring it unto the King. The CARIAN also, that had cut the ham of his Legge wherewith Cyrus fell down, asked his Gift likewise: which the King gave him, and had the Messenger tell him, The King doth give thee this, because thou wast the second person that brought him the good newes: for Artasyras was the first, and thou the second, that brought him newes of the death of Cyrus. Now Mithridates, albeit he was not well pleased in his minde with these words, he went his way, and said nothing then, nor made any thing ado: but the unfortunate CARIAN fondly fell into a foolish veine, common unto men. For, the suddain joy he felt (as it seemeth) to see such a goodly rich Present before him, as the King sent him, made him so forget himselfe, that he began to aspire, and to pretend greater things then became his Estate and Calling. And therefore he would not take the Kings Gift, as in respect that he had brought him word of Cyrus death: but began to storme, and to rage, calling the gods to witnesse, that it was he onely, and none other, that slew Cyrus; and that they did him great wrong, to take this honour from him. The King being told of it, took it so angrily, that he presently commanded them to strike off his head. But Parysatis (the Queene Mother) being present when the King gave this commandement, she prayed him not to put him to death in this sort: for the villaine (said she) let me alone, I will chastise him well enough for his presumption and rash speech. The King was contented she should have him. Thereupon she sent the Sergeant to take this cursed CARIAN, and made him be hanged upon a Gibbet ten daies together, and at the ten daies end caused his eyes to be pulled out of his head: and last of all, poured molten Meer tall into his eares, and so killed the Villaine with this kinde of torment. Mithridates also shortly after, died miserably by a like folly: He was bidden to supper at a Feast, whither came also the King and Queene Mothers Eunuches: and when they came, Mithridates sat down at the Board in the Kings golden Gown he gave him. When they had supped, and that they began to drinke one to another, one of Parysatis Eunuches said unto Mithridates: The King hath indeed given thee a goodly rich Gown Mithridates, and goodly Chaires and Cartanets of Gold, and so is the sword very rich and good he gave thee, so that when thou hast that by thy side, there is no man (I warrant thee) but will thinke thee a happy man: Mithridates then, the Wine fuming into his braine, answered straight: What meanest thou by that? Sparamixes: I deserved better then this when the Battell was fought. Then Sparamixes laughing on him, answered, I do not speake it for any hurt or evill will I bare thee, Mithridates: but to speake frankly among our selves, because the GRECIANS have a common Proverb, that Wine telleth true, I pray thee tell me, what valiant Act was it to take up a Caparison of a Horse that fell on the ground, and to carry it to the King: which the Eunuch spitefully put forth unto him, not that he was ignorant who did it, but to provoke him to speake, and to put him in a rage, knowing that he was a hasty man of nature, and could not keepe his tongue: and least of all when he had drunke so well as he had done, and so it fell out indeed. For Mithridates could not bite it in, but replied straight: You may talke as long as you list of the Caparison of a Horse, and such trash, but I tell you plainly, that Cyrus was slaine with mine own hands, and with no mans else. For I hit him not in vaine as Artageris did, but full in the forehead hard by the eyes, and strake him through and through his head againe, and so overthrew him, of which blow he died: He had no sooner spoken these words, but the rest that were at the Board, cast down their eyes, foreseeing the death of this poor and unfortunate Mithridates. But then the Master of the Feast began to speake, and said unto him: Friend Mithridates, I pray thee let us drinke and be merry, and reverence verence and thanke the good fortune of our King; and for the rest, let this talke go, it is too high for us. When the Eunuch went from thence, he told Parysatis (the Queene Mother) what Mithridates had said before them all: and she went and told the King of it. Who was marvellously offended withall to be so belied, and to lose the thing that was most honourable, and best pleased him in his Victory. For it was his minde, that all the World (both GRECIANS and barbarous People) should certainly believe, that in the Battell betwixt him and his Brother he was hurt, but yet that he slew Cyrus with his own hand. So the King commanded that Mithridates should suffer the paines of death in Boates, the which is after this manner. They take two Boates made of purpose to even, that the one is neither broader nor longer then the other, and then lay the offender in one of them upon his backe, and to cover him with the other, and do so both Boates together: so that the teete, hands, and head do come out at holes made of purpose for him, the rest of his body is all hidden within. Now they give him Meate as much as he will eate, and if he will not eate, they force him to it, by thrusting Awles in his eyes: then when he hath earen, they give him Honey to drinke mingled with Milke, and they do not onely poure it into his mouth, but also all his face over, turning him full unto the Sun, so that his face is all covered with Flies: and furthermore, being driven to do his needs in that Trough, of his Excrements there ingender Worms that eate his body to the very Privities. Then, when they see the man is dead, they take off the uppermost Boate, and finde all his flesh devoured with Vermine ingendred of him, even to his very entrails. So, when Mithridates had miserably languished in this manner, seventeen daies together, at length he died in extreame torments. Now Parysatis (the Queene Mother) lacked no more to accomplish her wicked desire, but Mesabates, one of the Kings Eunuches that had cut off Cyrus head and hand: and seeing that he was very wary and circumspect in his behaviour, that he could not take him at any advantage, in the end she devised a fine way to intrap him. She had a marvellous wit, and among other things could play pallingly well at all Games at Dice, and did many times play with the King her Son before the Warres: and after the Warres also, when he had made peace, she did play at Dice with him as she had done before, in such a way as she knew all his secret love, and suffered him to enjoy it. To be short, she would never be out of his sight but as little as she could, and would let his Wife Statira have as little time with him as might be, that she might governe and rule him as she would: both because she hated her of all creatures living, and also for that she would beare the greatest way and credit about him. When she saw the King one day at leisure, not knowing how to passe the time away, she induced him to play a thousand Dareckes at Dice, and was contented to lose them willingly, and played the thousand Dareckes down, seeming notwithstanding to be angry with her losse. He prayed him also to play one of his Eunuches with her: and the King was well contented with it. But before they would play, the agreed between them that they should both name and except five of the truest and chieftest Eunuches they had: and then, which of them lost, should presently deliver unto the Winner his choice of all the other Eunuches he would demand. Thus they fell to play, and she employing all the cunning she had, and playing as warily as she could possible, besides that the Dice ran on her side her lucke served her so, that she wan: and then she required Mesabates for her Winnings, because none of those the King had excepted. When she had him delivered her, she gave him to the Hangman, and willed him to flea him alive, and then that they should crucifie him, and naile him to a Crosse, and hang his Skin upon another piece of Timber by him: the which was done accordingly. The King was marvellous angry withall when he knew it, and grievously offended with his Mother. Howbeit she sported it out, and laughing, told him: Indeed it becomes thee well to be angry for losing an old gelded Villaine, where I lost a thousand Dareckes quietly, and did never a word. So there came no other thing of it, saying that the King was a little angry, and repented him that he had played so fondly, and was so finely mocked. But Queene Statira on the other side (besides that she was against her in all other things) spared not to tell the Queene Mother plainly, that it was wickedly done of her, to put the Kings good and faithfull Servant so cruelly to death, for Cyrus sake. But now, after that Tisaphernes (King Artaxerxes Lieutenant) had deceived Clearchus, and other Captaines of GREECE, deceitfully falsifying his word he had given them, and that he had sent them bound unto the King, Ctesias saith, that Clearchus prayed him to helpe him to a Gombe, and that having had one by his means, and so combed his head, it pleased him so well, that to requite his good will, he gave him his Seale of Armes from his finger wherewith he Sealed his Letters, for a witnesse of the great friendship that was between them two. He saith also, that in the stone of this Ring there was graven the Dance of the CARYATIDES. And furthermore, that the other Souldiers which were prisoners with Clearchus, did take away the most part of the Victuals that were sent to him, and left him little or nothing; and that he did remedy all this procuring a greater quantity to be sent unto them, and that they should put Clearchus Portion apart, and all the others Souldiers parts by themselves. This he did, as he saith, by Parysatis consent and commandement, who knowing that amongst other Victuals they daily sent Clearchus a gammon of Bacon, she told him one day he should do well to hide a little Knife in this gammon of Bacon, and to send it him, to the end that the life of so noble and valiant a man as he was, should not fall to the cruelty of the King. Howbeit, that he was afraid to meddle withall, and durst not do it: and that the King sware, and promised his Mother (who was an earnest suiter to him for Clearchus) that he would not put him to death. This notwithstanding, the King being afterwards procured, and perswaded to the contrary, by Queene Statira his Wife, he put them all to death, but Menon. Therefore Parysatis (Queene Mother) after that time (saith Ctesias) devised all the waies she could to poyson Queene

Statira, and to make her out of the way. But me thinketh this smelleth like a lie, that Parysatis should intend so wicked and dangerous an Act, as to put the Kings lawfull Wife to death, by whom he had Sonnes that were to inherit the Crown, onely for the love and respect of Clearchus: and it is too plaine that he coynd that to honour and magnifie Clearchus memory the more. But to prove it, a man may easily finde it by the lies he addeth afterward unto it: saying, that after the Captaines were slaine, all the bodies of the reit were torne in pieces by Dogs and Fowles: and also that there came a boisterous winde, and covered all Clearchus body with a great Hill of dust; and that out of this Hill of dust, shortly after there sprung up many Palme Trees, which made a pretty thick Grove, that it shadowed all that place. Insomuch that the King himself did afterwards marvellously repent him for putting him to death, for that he was an honest man, and beloved of the gods. This was not for Clearchus sake, but for an old cankered malice Parysatis had long borne in her heart against Queene Statira: because she saw well enough, that the credit and authority her selfe had with the King, was in respect of a Sonnes duty and obedience to his Mother; and in contrary manner, Statiraes credit and authority had a better ground and foundation, because it came of the love and good-will the King did beare her. And this is the onely cause that made her to practise the death of Queen Statira, having determined that her selfe, or Daughter-in-law, must needs die. Now the Queene-Mother had one of the Women of her Chamber called Giga, that was of great credit about her, and whom she onely trusted. Dinon writeth, that this Giga did helpe Parysatis to make the poyson: but Ctesius writeth contrarily, and saith, that she onely knew it, but otherwise that it was against her will: and that he that made the Poyson, was one Belitaras, but Dinon called him Melantus. Now, though in outward semblance and shew Queene-Mother and Statira seemed to have forgotten all malice between them, and that they began againe one of them to keepe company with the other, and did eate and drinke together: yet one of them mistrusted the other, and tooke great heed to themselves, both of them eating one selfe Meate, and in one dish together, and were both served with one selfe Officers and men. In Persia there is a little Bird, of the which all the Parts are excellent good to eate, and are full of fat within; so that it is thought it liveth by Ayre and Dew, and in the Persian Tongue they call it Ryntaces. Parysatis, as Ctesius saith, tooke one of these Birds, and cut it in the midst with a little Knife, the which was poysoned onely on one of the sides, and gave that halfe which was poysoned unto Statira. Yet Dinon writeth, that it was not Parysatis her selfe that gave it her, but her Carver Melantus that carved her Meate, and still gave Queen Statira of that Meate which the side of his poysoned Knife had touched. So Queene Statira presently fell sicke of the Disease whereof she died, with grievous pangs and gripings in her bowels, and found plainly that she was poysoned by Parysatis meanes: whereupon she told the King as much; who was of the same opinion, and thought it was his Mother, because he knew her cruell revenging minde, that never pardoned any, against whom she conceived any grudge. The King therefore to know the truth, when his Wife Statira was dead, apprehended all his Mothers household Servants and Officers, and did put them to torments, to make them confesse the truth, saving Giga whom the Queene-Mother kept close in her Chamber a long time, and would never suffer the King to have her: who earnestly requested her to deliver her unto him. Notwithstanding, Giga her selfe at length prayed the Queene-Mother to give her leave one night to go home to her house. The King understanding it, laid waite for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when she was taken, he condemned her to suffer the paines of death ordained for Poysoners, the which in Persia is executed in this manner. They make them put their head upon a great plaine stone, and with another stone they presse and strike it so long, till they have dashed the braines of the Malefactours out of their heads. After this sort was Giga put to death. Now for Parysatis his Mother, the King did her no other hurt, nor said any more unto her, but confined her to BABYLON according to her desire; and sware, that whilest she lived, he would never see BABYLON. In this state stood the Affaires of the King. But now, Artaxerxes having done the utmost he could to have overcome the GRECIANS which came to make Warre with him in the heart of his Realme, and would have been as glad of that, as he was to have overcome Cyrus, and to keepe his Crown and Realme: he could never prevaile against them. For, though they had lost Cyrus that gave them entertainment, and all their private Captaines that led them, they saved themselves notwithstanding, being in the heart of his Realme, and shewed the PERSIANS by experience, that their doings was nothing but Gold and Silver, curiosity, and faire Women, or otherwise, nothing but pompe and vanity. Hereupon all the GRECIANS became couragious, and despised the barbarous People: insomuch that the LACEDÆMONIANS thought it a great shame and dishonour unto them, if they did not deliver the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, from the slavery and bondage of the PERSIANS, and keep them from the open violence and cruelty of the barbarous People. For they having at other times attempted to do it by their Captaine Timbron, and afterwards also by Dercilidas, whom they sent thither with an Army, and having done nothing worthy memory, at length they determined to send their King Agelanus thither in person, who passing through ASIA with his Ships, began presently to make hot Warre against the PERSIANS as soone as ever he had landed his Army. For, at the first Conflict he overthrew Tisaphernes (the King of PERSIAs Lieutenant) in Battell, and made the most part of the Cities of GREECE that are in ASIA, to rebell against him. Artaxerxes looking into this Warre, and wisely considering what way and meanes he was to take, to make Warre with the GRECIANS, he sent into GREECE one Hermocrates a RHODIAN (of great credit about him) with a marvellous summe of Gold and Silver, bountifully fully to bestow in Gifts among the Nobility and chiefe Kulers of the Cities of GREECE, to make all the other GRECIANS to rise against the LACEDÆMONIANS. Hermocrates wisely executed his Commission, for he made the chiefe Cities of GREECE to rebell against LACEDÆMON: so that all PELOPONNESUS being up in armes, and in great garboile, the Ephori at LACEDÆMON were enforced to send for Agelanus home againe. Agelanus being forry to depart out of ASIA, said unto his friends, that the King of PERSIA had driven him out of his Realme with thirty thousand Archers: because that the PERSIAN Coyne is stamped with an Archer, having a Bow in his hand. Artaxerxes also drave the LACEDÆMONIANS out of all their jurisdiction by Sea, by the meanes of Conon Generall of the ATHENIANS, whom Pharnabazus (one of his Lieutenants) had wont to take his part: For Conon, after he was overthrowne in Battell at a place called the Goates River, kept ever after in the Isle of CYPRUS, not so much for the safety of his Person, as also for that it was a meet place to stay in, untill the Warres of GREECE were appeased. He, knowing that the device he had in his head, lacked power to put in execution; and on the contrary side, that the power of the King lacked a man of deepe judgement to be employed: wrote Letters unto him of his advice what he thought to do, straightly charging him whom he delivered his Letters unto that if he could possibly, he should cause the same to be delivered unto the King by Xenon the CRETAN, one of the Kings Dancers, or by one Polycritus his Physician, borne in the City of MENDE: and in both their absences, then to give it unto Ctesias, to deliver it unto the King. It chanced so, that this Letter came to the hands of Ctesias who (as it is reported) added moreover unto the contents of the Letter, that the King should send him to Conon, because he was a necessary man to be employed in his service, but specially by Sea. Ctesias saith not so: but writeth that the King of his owne voluntary motion gave him this charge. Now, after Artaxerxes had through the leading of Conon and Pharnabazus, won the Battell by Sea neare to the Isle of GNIDUS, and that thereby he had driven all the LACEDÆMONIANS from their jurisdiction by Sea, all GREECE had him in marvellous great estimation: so that he gave unto the GRECIANS with such conditions as he would, that so famous Peace, called Antalcidas Peace. This Antalcidas was a Citizen of SPARTA, the Son of one Leon, who favouring King Artaxerxes Affaires, procured by the treaty of this Peace, that the LACEDÆMONIANS left unto Artaxerxes all the Cities of GREECE in ASIA and all the Isles contained in the same, to enjoy quietly, making them pay Tribute at his pleasure. This Peace being concluded with the GRECIANS (if so shamefull a treason, reproach and common infamy to all GREECE may be called Peace, as never Warre fell out more dishonourable and infamous for the vanquished) King Artaxerxes, that otherwise hated the LACEDÆMONIANS to the death, and that esteemed them (as Dinon writeth) the impudentest men living, did notwithstanding love Antalcidas passing well, and entertained him very honourably when he came into PERSIA unto him. It is reported, that the King one day took a Garland of Flowers, and did wet it with the most precious and sweetest Oyle of Perfume that was prepared for the Feast, and sent the same unto Antalcidas: insomuch as every man marvelled to see the King set so much by him. Indeed he was a meet man to follow the vanity and curiosity of the PERSIANS, and had well deserved such a Garland to be sent him: who was so bold to dance a Dance before the PERSIANS, mocking and counterfeiting Leonidas and Callicratidas, two of the valiantest men that ever were in GREECE. Therefore one said at that time in the presence of King Agelanus: O how unhappy is poore GREECE at this day, when the LACEDÆMONIANS come to follow the PERSIANS? But Agelanus presently answered him againe, Not so, said he: but rather the PERSIANS follow the LACEDÆMONIANS. Notwithstanding, this wise answer Agelanus made, did not take away the shame of the Fact: and shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS lost the Battell of LEUCTRES, and therewith also the signority and Principality they had kept of long time over all GREECE, although they had lost their estimation before, for consenting to so shamefull and dishonourable peace. When SPARTA flourished most, and was chiefe of all the other Cities of GREECE, so long did Artaxerxes continue still to make much of Antalcidas, and called him, his friend. But after that the LACEDÆMONIANS had lost the Battell of LEUCTRES, having received so great an overthrow, and wanting Money, they sent Agelanus into EGYPT, and Antalcidas into PERSIA unto King Artaxerxes, to pray him to aide and helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS. Howbeit, the King made so small account of him, and disdained him so much, denying him and his requests, that he returned backe to SPARTA, as a man knocked on the head, without any thing done with the King. And there also seeing that his Enemies mocked him; and fearing that the Ephori would commit him to Prison, he killed himselfe with famine. About that time also, the TABBANS after they had won the Battell of LEUCTRES, sent Ismenias and Pelopidas into PERSIA, unto King Artaxerxes, where Pelopidas did nothing unworthy of himselfe. Howbeit, Ismenias being commanded to kneele to the King, he let fall his Ring at his feet, and stooped to take it up, whereby he was thought of some, that he did it to kneele to the King. Another time Artaxerxes liking a secret advertisement very well sent him from Timagoras the ATHENIAN, he gave him ten thousand Dariackes by his Secretary called Belluris. And because he had a sickly body, and was driven to drinke Cowes Milke to restore him, the King therefore sent foure score milch Kine with him, to give Milke to the Paile, to have fresh Milke every day. Furthermore, he sent him a Bed thoroughly furnished with all things necessary, and Groomes of the Chamber to make his bed, saying, that the GRECIANS could not tell how to make it: and did also let him have men to carry him upon their armes to the Sea side, because he was sicke; and whilest he was at the Court, he entertained him very honourably and bountifully. So Ofsanes the Kings Brother, said one Timagrus was put to death for taking bribes and Gifts of the King of Persia. King Artaxerxes killed Tisaphernes. Artaxerxes fell in againe with his Mother Parysatis, and sent for her to come to the Court.

Artaxerxes married his eldest Daughter Atossa.

Great famine in Artaxerxes Army.

Tiribazus stratageme saved Artaxerxes and all his Army.

Note, that soft Apparell and Riches, make not a man cowardly and effeminate, but a vile base minde, that followeth evil advice and counsell.

one day unto him: Timagrus, remember how honourably thou art served at thy Board, for it is for no small matter thou art thus made of. This word was rather to cut him for his Treason, then for any remembrance of the benefit received. So the ATHENIANS afterwards condemned the same Timagrus to die, because he had taken bribes and money of the King of PERSIA. But Artaxerxes in recompence of so many other things that he had done to despite the GRECIANS with, did one thing that pleased them marvellously, when he did put Tisaphernes to death, who was the dreadfulllest Enemy the GRECIANS had. Parysatis the Queen Mother did help to bring this to passe, aggravating the accusations brought in against him: for the King kept not his anger long against his Mother, but fell in againe with her, and sent for her, knowing that she had an excellent wit and noble courage to governe a great Kingdome: and besides, that there was nothing now to let them to come together as much as they would, to give any occasion of jealousie or malice to any person. So ever after, his Mother Parysatis endeavoured her selfe to feed the King her Sonnes humour every manner of way, seeming to mislike nothing that he did: whereby she grew in so great credit with him, that he denied her nothing whatsoever she asked him. So she perceived that the King was extremely in love with one of his own Daughters, that was called Atossa: howbeit that he dissembled his love the best he could, and kept it secret, chiefly for feare of her, although some write, that indeed he had already had her Maiden-head. Now Parysatis having found his love, she began to make more of his Daughter then she did before, and talking with her Father, sometime she praised her beauty, another time her grace and good countenance, saying that she was like a Queen and noble Princeesse: so that at length by little and little she perswaded him to marry her openly, not passing for the Laws and Opinions of the GRECIANS, considering that God had given him unto the PERSIANS, to stablish Lawes unto them, to decide right from wrong, and the good from the bad. Some Historiographers do write, and amongst them Heracles of CUMES, that Artaxerxes did not onely marry the eldest of his Daughters, but the second also called Amestris, of whom we will speake hereafter. Now when he had married the eldest, Atossa, he loved her so entirely well, that though she fell sick of the disease commonly called Vitiligo, that ran over all her body, he loved her not the worse for it, but prayed continually for her unto the goddesse Juno, honouring no other goddesse but her openly, and fell down on his knees before her Image, and sent by his friends and Lieutenants so many offerings, that all the way from his Court Gates unto the Temple of Juno (which was sixteen Furlongs off) was full of Gold, Silver, Rich Purple, Silkes, and Horfe that were sent thither. He began to make Warre also with the EGYPTIANS, and made Pharnabazus and Sphicrates ATHENIAN, his Lieutenants, who did no good, because they fell at variance the one with the other. But afterwards, Artaxerxes himself went in person to conquer the CADUSIANS with three hundred thousand Footmen, and ten thousand Horfemen. So he invaded their Country, which was a very rude Country, alway darke and cloudy: the earth bringeth forth nothing that man soweth, but doth onely feed the Inhabitants with Peares, Apples, and such like Fruit, and yet the men be very strong and valiant notwithstanding. So when he was entred farre into the Country before he was ware, he fell into great want of Victuals, and was also in great danger. For his Souldiers found nothing in all the Country that was good to eate; and worst of all, no Victuals could come unto them from any place, because of the hardnesse and naughty waies of the Country: so that his Campe lived onely with the Fleish of their Beasts of Carriage, and yet they sold it dearely; for an Asses head was sold for threefore Silver Drachmaes. To conclude, the famine was so great, that provision failed for the Kings owne mouth, and there were but few Horfes left, for all the rest were eaten. Then Tiribazus, that had oftentimes been chiefe about the King, because he was a valiant man, and that through his folly was many times also out of favour, as at that present time, when he had no authority nor estimation, he devised a Stratageme, whereby he saved the King and all his Campe. In this Country of the CADUSIANS, there were two Kings in the Field with their Armies, both of them camped asunder, one from the other. Tiribazus, after he had spoken with King Artaxerxes, and had told him what he meant to do, he went unto one of the Kings, and at the selfe same time also secretly sent his Sonne unto the other King, and told either of them, that the other King had sent Ambassadors unto Artaxerxes to make peace with him, unwitting to his Companion; and therefore he counseled them, if they were wise, one of them to seeke to prevent another with all the possible speed he could; and promised them both, one after another, to helpe them they best he could. Both the one and the other of the Kings gave credit to his words, either of them both mistrusting one another: so that the one speedily sent his Ambassadors unto King Artaxerxes, with Tiribazus; and the other also his Ambassadors with his Sonne. But Tiribazus tarrying long in his journey, King Artaxerxes began somewhat to suspect him: his Enemies also did accuse him in his absence, and the King grew very cholericke, and repented him that he had trusted him so farre, and was willing to heare every man that spake against him. Howbeit, Tiribazus at length returned, and his Sonne also, and either of them brought with them the Ambassadors of the CADUSIANS, and so Peace was taken with them both. Then was Tiribazus aloft againe, and in greater credit then ever he was, and so departed with the King. The King then shewed plainly, that cowardlinesse proceedeth not of Pompe and curiosity, as some take it, beleeving that it doth effeminate mens hearts; but rather of a vile base minde, that commonly followeth evil, and the worst counsell: for neither the Jewels of Gold, the Kingly Robe, nor other sumptuous Ornaments which the King ever wore about him, worth twelve thousand Talents (as it is reported) did not hinder him at that time to travell, and to take as much paines as any man in all his Army. For he himselfe marched on foot the foremost man, carrying his owne trusse in a Scarfe upon his shoulders, and his Target on his arme, and travelled through high stony Mountaines. So that, his Souldiers seeing the courage and paine the King himselfe tooke, they marched so nimbly, that it seemed they had Wings: for he daily marched about two hundred Furlongs. Now the King at length by sore travell came to one of his own Houses where there were goodly Arbors and Parks, with goodly Trees passingly set forth: but all the Country besides was naked and barren, so that there was not a Tree a great way from thence, and it was marvellous cold. The King suffered his Souldiers to hew down the goodly Pines and Cypress Trees in his Parkes: and because they durst not presume to touch them, he himselfe as he was, tooke an Ax in his hand, and began to hew down the goodliest Tree there. The Souldiers seeing that, fell every man of them also to hewing: so that in a very short time they had provided themselves well with Wood, and made them great Fires in every place, and so past over the night quietly by the Fires side. This notwithstanding, he lost a great number of valiant men in this Voyage, and almost all his Horfes. Therefore, thinking his men would mocke him because he did faile of his purpose, he began to grow mistrustfull, and to suspect the chiefeest Noblemen he had about him, so that in a rage he put many of them to death; but many more of them remained whom he mistrusted. For there is nothing more cruell, nor a greater bloud-sucker, then a cowardly Tyrant: as in contrary manner, nothing is more courtous, and lesse suspicious then a valiant and hardy man. And therefore brute Beasts, that be never made tame nor mastered, are commonly cowardly and timorous: and the other on the contrary, that are Noble and courageous, are bold, and do come straight to know a man, because they have no feare, neither do they flie from their clapping and making much of them as they doe. Afterwards, King Artaxerxes being grown very old, heard that there was great stirre and contention between his Sonnes, which of them should be Heire after his death, and that this contention fell out also among his friends and men of great Calling. The wisest of them wished, that as he himselfe came unto the Crown, as his Fathers eldest Sonne: so, that he likewise should after his death leave it unto his eldest Sonne called Darius. But the younger, which was called Ochus, being a valiant man, and of a hot stirring nature, had some in the Court also thatooke his part, and hoped to attaine to his purpose, by the meanes of his Sister Atossa, whom he loved and honoured, promising to marry her, and to make her Queen, if he might come to be King after his Fathers decease. And besides, there went a report abroad, that in their Fathers life time he secretly kept her: howbeit Artaxerxes never understood it. Now, because he would beimes put his Sonne Ochus out of all hope to succeed him in his Kingdome, left this expectation might make him goe about to practise that which Cyrus did, and that by this meanes his Realme should grow into faction and civill Warres: he proclaimed his eldest Son Darius (being fifty yeares old) King after his death; and furthermore, gave him leave from thenceforth to wear the point of his Hat right up. In PERSIA the custome is, that when any cometh to be proclaimed Successour and Heire apparent to the Crown, he should require a Gift of him that proclaimeth him Successour. The which the other doth grant him, whatsoever it be that he asketh, so it be not impossible. Darius then asked his Father a Concubine called Aspasia, who was first with Cyrus, and in greatest favour with him above all the rest, but then was for the Kings own Body. She was borne in the Country of IONIA, of free Parents: and being vertuously brought up, she was brought one night unto Cyrus as he was at supper, with other Women, who fate them down without too curious bidding hard by him, and were very glad when Cyrus offered to play and be merry with them, giving every one of them some pleasant word, and they made it not coy. But Aspasia stood on her feet by the Table, and said never a word: and notwithstanding that Cyrus called her, she would not come at him. Moreover, when one of the Grooms of his Chamber would have taken her to have brought her to him: The first, saith she, that layeth hands on me shall repent it. Thereupon all those that were present, said she was a foolish thing, and simply brought up, and could not tell what was comely for her. Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it, passed it over with laughing, and told him that had brought her unto him: Dost thou not see, that of all these thou hast brought me, there is not an honest Woman but she? After that, Cyrus began to make much of her, and loved her better continually then all the rest, and called her Aspasia the wife. This Aspasia was taken among the spoiles of Cyrus Campe after he was overthrowne; and Darius as we have told you, did begge her of his Father, who was very angry with it in his minde. For the barbarous People of all other things are marvellous jealous of their Women, so that not onely he should be put to death, that durst but speake to, or touch any Concubine of the Kings but in sport: but also whosoever came neare them, or neare their Coaches as they travelled. The Kings Daughter Atossa, whom he had married against all Law, was yet living, and besides her he had also three hundred and threefore passing faire Concubines: and yet when his Sonne Darius asked Aspasia of him, the King answered, she was a free Woman borne, and therefore if she would, he was content he should have her: but if she were unwilling to go to him, then he would not have him force her by any meanes. So Aspasia was sent for, and she was asked with whom she had rather be. She answered, With Darius: contrary to King Artaxerxes expectation, who both by the Custome, and also the Law, was compelled to let him have her. But shortly after he tooke her from him againe, saying that he would place her in a Nunrney of DIANA, in the Country of ECBATANA, where they call her Anitis, there to serve the goddesse, and to live chaist all the daies of her life: supposing by this meanes to punish his Sonne, not rigorously, but moderately, with grieve mixt with sport and earnest. Howbeit his Sonne tooke it not so patiently, either because he was deeply in love with Aspasia, or else for that he saw his Father mocked him in that point. Tiribazus finding this, and perceiving that Darius took it very grievously: he aggravated his anger against his Father, knowing the passion of love in Darius, by his own upon the like occasion. King Artaxerxes had many Daughters, and had promised Pharnabazus one of them, called Apama: unto Orentes, Rodogune: and to Tiribazus, Amestris. The King performed the other two marriages, and did put Tiribazus by his Wife. For the King himselfe married his own Daughter Amestris; and for her, he promised Tiribazus the younger, Stossa: with whom also he himselfe fell in love, and married her. Tiribazus hereupon was in such a rage with the King, that he hated him to the death: not because he was any Traytour or feditious man in nature, but a mad hare-brain'd fellow. For sometime he was aloft, and in as good credit and authority as the best: suddainly againe he would play some mad part to anger the King, and then he was in as much disgrace, and out of countenance: and could away with neither fortune. For when he was in authority, he made every man hate him for his pride: and being in disgrace, he could not humble himselfe, but lookt bigger then before. Now there was Fire and Brimstone met, when Tiribazus took part with Darius. For he daily blew into his ears, that it was to no purpose for him to wear his Hat right up, if his affaires also went not rightly forward: and that he deceived himselfe much, if he did not know that his Brother (by meanes of the Women he kept) secretly aspired to the Crown: and that his Father being so unconstant as he was, he must not truit in any fort to succeed his Father in the Kingdome, what Proclamation soever he hath made in his behalf to the contrary. For, said he, he that for a Grecian Woman hath broken and violated the holy Law that was in Persia: thou must not look that he will performe that he hath promised thee. And furthermore, he perswaded him, that it was not a like repulse unto Ochus, to be denied that which he looked for: as it was for him to be turned out of all that ever he had gotten. For said he, If it please Ochus to live like a private man, he may safely do it, and no man will trouble him, but for himselfe that was already proclaimed King, he must of necessity make himselfe King, or else he must not live. So, the Poet Sophocles his saying most commonly proveth true:

All counsell easily takes place.

For the way is large and plaine for a man to beleieve as he list, and men commonly are given rather to beleieve the evil then the good, because most men know not what goodnesse meaneth. But now beside these perswasions, the greatnesse of the Kingdome, and the feare Darius stood in of his Brother Ochus, took great force and effect with him: and it may be also, that Venus her selfe did somewhat in the matter, for the malice and spire that Aspasia was taken from him. But whatsoever the cause was, thus was it handled: that Darius flatly conspired against his Father Artaxerxes, together with Tiribazus. Now, they having gotten many Conspiratours to joyne with them, one of the Kings Eunuchs perceiving it, ran and told the King of it, and how they had suddainly determined to assaile him, knowing certainly that it was agreed among themselves, that they should kill him in his bed in the night. Artaxerxes receiving this advertisement, thought it was not good to be carelesse of a matter of so great importance, as his life: and also that it were too great lightnesse in him so suddainly to beleieve his Eunuch, without better proof or knowledge. So he took this way with himselfe. He commanded the Eunuch that had given him this information, to keep company still with the Conspiratours, and to follow them wheresoever they went, to see their doings: and in the meane time he beate down his wall behinde his bed, and made a door through, and set up a hanging of Tapestry before it. When the time was come, as the Eunuch had advertised the King, that the Traytours meant to do their feat: Artaxerxes being layed on his bed, rose not up, till he had seen every Traytour of them in the face that came to kill him. Then, when he saw them coming towards him with their Swords drawn, he suddainly lift up the hanging, and got into his inner Chamber, and shut the door after him, making an out-cry, Murder, murder. So, the Traytours being plainly seene and known by the King, fled the same way they came, and failed of their purpose, and bad Tiribazus save himselfe, because he was known. So they dispersed themselves, and scaped by flying. But Tiribazus was taken tardy, although he had slaine divers of the Kings guard, valiantly defending himselfe: yet they tooke him not, till he was stricken with a Dart a good way off, which slew him. Darius was also taken and apprehended, and brought prisoner with his Sons: and the King referred him to be judged by his Peers. For the King himselfe would not be present to give judgment of him, but deputed others in his place to accuse him: howbeit he commanded his Secretaries to set down in writing, the opinion and sentence of every one of the Judges, and to bring it to him. In fine, they all cast him, and condemned him to die. Then the Officers laid hold on him, and brought him into a Chamber of the Prison, where the Hang-man came with a Razor in his hand, with the which he used to cut mens Throates so condemned to die. So the Hang-man coming into the Chamber, when he saw it was Darius, he was afraid, and came out of the Chamber againe, his heart failing him, and durst not lay hands upon the person of the King. But the Judges that stood without the Chamber, bad him go and do it, unlesse he would have his own Throate cut. So the Hang man then came in, and tooke Darius by the haire of the head, and made him hold down his head, and so cut his necke with his Razor he had in his other hand. Others do write, that this sentence was given in the presence of King Artaxerxes selfe, and that Darius seeing himselfe convicted by manifest proofes brought in against him, he fell down at his Fathers feete, and besought him to pardon him: and then that his Father being angry, rose up, and drew out his Curtlex and wounded him in so many places withall, that at length he slew him. Then returning into his Court, he worshipped the Sunne, and turning him to his Lords that were about him, he said unto them: My Lords, God be with you, and be merry at

at home in your houses, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oromazes hath taken revenge of them, that practised treason against me. This was the end of Darius treason. Now Darius being dead, Ochus his brother stood in good hope to be next heir to the Crown, and the rather through the meanes and friendship of his sister Stossa: but yet of this legitimate brethren, he feared Ariaspes, who was onely left of all the rest that were legitimate: and of his bastard brethren, Artaxerxes was not because Ariaspes was elder then he, but for that (he being of a soft and plaine nature) the Persians therefore desired he might be their King. On the other side, Artaxerxes was wise, and valiant: and Ochus saw that his father loved him dearly. So he determined to intrap them both. Now Ochus being a subtle and malicious natured man, he first shewed his cruelty upon Artaxerxes, and his malice upon Ariaspes his legitimate brother. For, because he knew he was but simple and plaine, he sent daily some of the Kings Eunuches unto him, who brought him threatning words and meslages, as from the King: telling him, that he had determined to put him to a shameful and cruel death. So, forging these newes continually as things very secret, they did so terrifie poore Ariaspes, telling him, that the King was fully bent to put some of his threatnes in execution out of hand; and that he was put in such fear and despaire of his life, that he prepared himselfe a poison, and dranke it, to rid himselfe of his life. King Artaxerxes understanding of his death took it very heavily, and began to mistrust the cause that made him to make himselfe away: howbeit, he could not seek the proof of it, for his extreme age. But this chance made him love Artaxerxes better then before shewing plainly that he trusted him better then Ochus, and did make him privy to all things.

Ochus could no longer abide to deferre his intent, and therefore inticed Harpaces, Tiribazus son, to kill his bastard Ariaspes; the which he did. Now Artaxerxes was so extreme old, that he was as good as done with age: but after he heard his son Artaxerxes was murdered, he could bear it no longer, but took it so to heart for sorrow, that when he had lived fourscore and fourteen years, and reigned threescore and two, he died. When he was dead they then found that he had been a gracious and courteous Prince, and one that loved his people and subjects, when they saw the proof of his successor Ochus, that passed all men living, in cruelty and severity.

Dion and Brutus both Platonians. Plato de virtute. How mens acts should be famous in the Commonwealth.

A wicked spirit appeared unto Dion and Brutus.

Like as Simonides (O Sossius Senecio) saith, that the City of ILLIUM was not offended with the CORINTHIANS. for that they came to make war with them with other GRECIANS because Glaucus (whose first ancestors came from CORINTH) had taken armes, and lovingly fought for the same: even so methinkes, that neither the GRECIANS, nor ROMANS have cause to complaine of the Academy, sith they be both alike praised of the fame in this present book, in the which are contained the lives of Dion and Brutus. Of the which, the one of them having been very familiar with Plato himselfe, and the other from his childhood brought up in Platoes doctrine: they both (as it were) came out of one selfe Schoole houle to attempt the greatest enterprises amongst men. And it is no marvel if they two were much alike in many of their doings, proving that true, which their Schoole-maister Plato wrote of vertue: that to do any noble act in the Government of a Commonwealth, which should be famous and of credite, authority, and good fortune, must both meet in one selfe person, joynd with justice and wisdom. For as a certain Fencer (called Hippomachus) said, that he knew his scholars far off, if he did but see them coming from the Market with meat in their hands: so it must needs follow, that men having been vertuously brought up, must needs be wise in all their doings; and beside that it bringeth them to civility and honesty, even so it frameth their conditions muchlike one to another: furthermore, their fortunes having also fallen out both alike, more by chance then by any reason, do make their lives very like each other; for they were both of them slain, before they could bring their enterprises to passe which they determined. But the greatest wonder of all is this: that their deaths were foreshewed unto them both, by a wicked spirit that visibly appeared unto either of them: albeit there be some that cannot abide those opinions, and do maintaine, that these sights and evil spirits do never appear to any man that hath his right wits, but that they are fancies of little children, or old women, or of some men whose wits are weakened by sickness, and so have a certain imagination of such strange sights, being of this superstitious mind, that they have a wicked spirit, and an evil angel in them. But if Dion and Brutus, both of them grave and learned Philosophers, and very constant men, not overcome by any suddaine passion or imagination of wind, have been moved by such sights and spirits, and have also told it unto their friends: I cannot tell whether we shall be enforced, to grant the most strange and old opinion of this, which saith: That there be evil spirits which envying the vertue of good men to withdraw them from their godly minds, to make them afraid with these fearful sights, enticing them to forsake their godlinesse, left that persisting therein, they should be rewarded with better life in the world to come, then theirs is. But let us refer this disputation to some other booke: and now in this twelfth couple of these famous mens lives compared, let us first begin to write the life of him that is the elder of these two men we speak of.

Diony-

Dionysius the elder, after he had the Government of SICILIA in his hands, he married the Daughter of Hermocrates, a Citizen of SYRACUSA. But yet not being thoroughly settled in his Tyranny, the SYRACUSANS did Rebell against him, and did so cruelly and abominably handle the Body of his Wife, that she willingly poisoned her selfe. So, after he had established himselfe in his Government with more surety then before, he married againe two other Wives together, the one a stranger of the City of LOCRES, called Doride: and the other of the Country it selfe, called Aristomache, the Daughter of Hipparchus the chiefeest man of all SYRACUSA, and that had been companion with Dionysius, the first time he was chosen Generall. It was said that Dionysius married them both in one day, and that they could never tell which of them he knew first: but otherwise, that he made as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly sate together with him at his table, and did either of them lie with him by turnes; though the SYRACUSANS would have their owne Countriwoman preferred before the stranger. Howbeit, the strange woman had this good happe, to bring forth Dionysius his eldest Sonne, which was a good countenance to defend her being a Forrainer. Aristomache in contrary manner, continued a long time with Dionysius without Fruit of her Wombe, although he was very desirous to have children by her: so that he put the LOCRIAN womans mother to death, accusing her that she had with Sorceries and Witchcraft, kept Aristomache from being with childe. Dion being the Brother of Aristomache, was had in great estimation at the first, for his Sisters sake; but afterwards the Tyrant finding him to be a wife man, he loved him then for his owne sake. Infomuch, that among many sundrie things and pleasures he did for him; he commanded his Treasurers to let him have what money he asked of them, so they made him acquainted withall the selfe same day they gave him any. Now, though Dion had ever before a noble minde in him by Nature, yet much more did that magnanimity increafe, when Plato (by good fortune) arrived in SICILE. For his coming thither surely was no mans device (as I take it) but the providence of some god: who (bringing farre off the first beginning and foundation of the Liberty of the SYRACUSANS, and to overthrow the tyrannicall state) sent Plato out of ITALIE unto the City of SYRACUSA, and brought him acquainted with Dion, who was but a young man at that time, but yet had an apter wit to learne, and readier good will to follow vertue, then any young man else that followed Plato; as Plato himselfe writeth, and his owne doings also do witnesse. For Dion having from a childe been brought up with humble conditions under a Tyrant, and acquainted with a servile timorous Life, with a proud and insolent raigne, with all vanity and curiosity, as placing chiefe felicity in covetousnesse: neverthelesse, after he had felt the sweete Reasons of Philosophy, reaching the broad way to vertue, his heart was enflamed straight with an earnest desire to follow the same. And because he found that he was so easily perswaded to love Vertue and Honesty, he simply thinking (being of an honest plaine nature) that the selfe same perswasions would move a like affection in Dionysius, obtained of Dionysius, that being at leisure, he was contented to see Plato, and to speake with him. When Plato came to Dionysius, all their talke in manner was of Vertue, and they chiefly reasoned, what was Fortitude: where Plato proved that Tyrants were no Valiant men. From thence passing farther unto Justice, he told him, that the Life of Just men was happy; and contrarily, the Life of unjust men, unfortunate. Thus the Tyrant Dionysius perceiving he was overcome, durst no more abide him, and was angry to see the standers by make such estimation of Plato, and that they had such delight to heare him speake. At length he angrily asked him, What businesse he had to do there? Plato answered him, he came to seeke a good man, Dionysius then replied againe; What, in Gods name, by thy speech then it seemeth thou hast found none yet. Now Dion thought that Dionysius anger would proceed no further, and therefore at Platoes earnest request, he sent him away in the Galley with three bankes of Oares, the which Pollis a LACDEMONIAN Captaine carried backe againe into GRECE. Howbeit, Dionysius secretly requested Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as ever he would do him pleasure: if not, yet that he would sell him for a slave, howsoever he did: for, said he, he shall be nothing the worse for that; because, if he be a just man, he shall be as happy to be a slave, as a freeman. Thus (as it is reported) this Pollis carried Plato into the Isle of EGINA, and there sold him. For the EGINETES having made warre at that time with the ATHENIANS, made a decree, that all the ATHENIANS that were taken in their Isle, should be sold. This notwithstanding, Dionysius refused not to honour and trust Dion, as much as ever he did before, and did also send him Ambassadour in matters of great weight: as when he sent him unto the CARTHAGINIANS, where he behaved himselfe so well, that he wanne great reputation by his journey: and the Tyrant could well away with his plaine speech. For no man but he, durst say their mindes so boldly unto him, to speake what he thought good: as on a time he reproved him for Gelon. One day when they mocked *Gelon*s Government before the Tyrants face, and that Dionysius himself said Tyrans (finely decanting on his name, which signifieth laughter) that he was even the very laughing stocke it selfe of SICILE, the Courtiers made as though they liked this encounter and interpretation of laughter passing well: but Dion not being well pleased withall, said unto him: For his sake men trusted thee, whereby thou comest to be Tyrant: but for thine owne sake they they will never trust any man: for (to say truly) Gelon shewed by his Government, that it was as goodly a thing as could be, to see a City governed by an absolute Prince: but Dionysius by his Government on the other side, made it appear as detestable a thing. This Dionysius had by his LOCRIAN wife, three children: and by Arifomache, four: of the which, two were daughters, the one called Sophrosyne, and the other Arete. Of them, Dionysius eldest son married Sophrosyne, and Arete was married unto his brother Thearides: after whose death Dion married her, being his Niece. Now when Dionysius her father fell sick, not likely to escape, Dion would have spoken with him for his children he had by his sister Arifomache. Howbeit the Physicians about him, to curry favour with the next heir and successor of the tyranny, would never let him have any time or opportunity to speak with him. For (as Timaeus writeth) they gave Dionysius the elder (as he had commanded them) a strong Opiat-drinke to cast him in a sleep, and so thereby they took from him all his senses, and joynd death with his sleep. Notwithstanding in the first counsel and assembly holden by his friends, to consult about the state and affairs of the younger Dionysius, Dion moved matter for necessary and profitable for that present time, that by his wisdom he shewed they were all but children, and by his bold and franke speech made them know, that they were but slaves of the tyranny: because they beastly and cowardly gave such counsel and advice, as might best please and feed the young tyrants humour. But, he made them most to wonder at him, when they fearing above all other things, the danger Dionysius state was in, by reason of CARTHAGE, he did promise them, that if Dionysius would have peace, he would then go forthwith into AFRICK, and finde the meanes honourably to quench the warres: or, if otherwise he better liked of warre, that he would furnish him at his owne proper costs and charges, fifty Gallies ready to rowe. Dionysius wondred greatly at the noble minde of Dion, and thanked him much for the good will he bare unto him, touching his estate. But all men else taking Dion's noble offer to be a reproach of their avarice; and his credit and authority, an impeire unto theirs: they presently upon this liberal offer tooke occasion to accuse him, not sparing any reprochful words against him, to move Dionysius to be offended with him. For they complained of him, and said, that he cunningly practised to possesse the tyranny, making himselfe stronge by Sea, going about by his Gallies to make the tyranny fall into the hands of the children of Arifomache his Sister. But the chiefest cause of all why they did malice and hate him, was his strange manner of life, that he neither would keep company with them, nor live after their manner. For they that from the beginning were crept in favor and friendship with this young ill-brought-up Tyrant, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vaine pleasures, studied for no other thing, but to entertaine him in love matters, and other vaine exercises, as to riot and banquet, to keep light women company, and all such other vile vicious pastimes and recreations: by the which the tyranny became like iron softned by fire; and seemed to be very pleasant unto the subjects, because the over great Majesty and severity thereof was somewhat milder, not so much by the bounty and goodness, as by the folly and retchlesnesse of the Lord. Thus, this little care and regard increasing more and more, still winning way with the young Tyrant, did at length melt and breake asunder those strong Diamond Chaines, with the which Dionysius the elder made his boast that he left his Monarchy and tyranny chained to his son. For sometime he would be three dayes together without intermission, still banqueting and being drunke: and all that time his Court Gates were kept shut unto grave and wise men, and for all honest matters; and was then full of drunkards, of common playes, dancing, masks, and mummeries, and full of all such trumpery and dissolute pastimes. And therefore Dion undoubtedly was much envied of them, because he gave himselfe to no sport and pleasure: whereupon they accused him, and misnamed his virtues, vices, being somewhat to be resembled unto them; as in calling his gravity, pride; his plainenesse and boldnesse in his oration, obstinacy; if he did perswade them, that he accused them; and because he would not make one in their fond pastimes, that therefore he despised them. For, to say truly, his manners by nature had a certain haughtinesse of mind and severity, and he was a fowre man to be acquainted with: whereby his company was not onely troublesome, but also unpleasant to this younger Dionysius, whose eares were so fine, that they could not away to hear any other thing but flattery. And furthermore, divers of his very friends and familiars (that did like and commend his plaine manner of speech and noble mind) did yet reprove his sternenesse, and austere conversation with men: for it seemed unto them, that he spake too roughly, and dealt over hardly with them that had to do with him, and more then became a civill or courteous man. And for prooffe hereof, Plato himselfe sometime wrote unto him (as if he had prophesied what should happen) that he should beware of obstinacy, the companion of solitariness, that bringeth a man in the end to be forsaken of every one. This notwithstanding, they did more reverence him at that time, then any man else, because of the state and Government, and for that they thought him the only man that could best provide for the safety and quietnesse of the Tyranny, the which stood then in tickle state. Now Dion knew well enough, that he was not so well taken and esteemed through the good will of the Tyrant, as against his will, and for the necessity of the state and time. So Dion supposing the ignorance, and want of knowledge in Dionysius was the cause, he devised to put him into some honest trade or exercise, and to teach him the liberal Sciences, to frame him to a civil life, that thenceforth he should no more be afraid of vertue, and should also take pleasure and delight in honest things. For Dionysius of his owne nature, was none of

of the worst sort of tyrants, but his father fearing that if he came once to have a feeling and conceit of himselfe, or that he companied with wife and learned men, he would go neare to enter into practice, and put him out of his seat; he ever kept him locked up in a Chamber, and would suffer no man to speak with him. Then the younger Dionysius, having nothing else to do, gave himselfe to make little Chariots, Candlesticks, Chaires, Stooles, and Tables of wood: for his father Dionysius was so fearful and mistrustful of every body, that he would suffer no man with a paire of Barbers Cizers to pole the haire of his head, but caused an image-maker of earth to come unto him, and with a hot burning cole to burne his goodly bush of haire round about. No man came into his Chamber where he was with a Gowne on his backe, nor not his owne brother nor son, but he was driven (before he he could come in) to put off his Gowne, and the Guard of his Chamber to strip him naked, whatsoever he was: and then they gave him another Gown to cast upon him, but not his owne. One day his brother Leptines going about to describe unto him the situation of some place, he took a Halbard from one of the Guard, and with the point thereof began to draw out a plot of the same upon the ground. Dionysius was terribly offended with him, and did put the souldier to death: gave him his Halbard. He said, he was afraid of his friends, yea and of the wisest of them; because he knew that they desired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to command, then to obey. He flew one of his Captaines called Marfius (whom he had preferred and had given him charge of men) because he dreamed, that he killed him: saying, that he dreamed at this in the night, because that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Dionysius that was so timorous, and whose mind through fearfulness was still miserably occupied, was notwithstanding marvellously offended with Plato, because he did not judge him to be the noblest and valiantest man alive. Dion therefore seeing (as we have said) the younger Dionysius clean marred, and in manner cast away for lacke of good education, perswaded him the best he could to give himselfe unto study, and by the greatest intreaty he could possibly make, to pray the Prince of all Philosophers to come into SICILE. And then, when through his intreaty he were come, that he would refer himselfe wholly unto him, to the end that reforming his life by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby (the best example that can be possible, and by whom the whole world is ruled and governed, which otherwise were out of all order and confused) he should first obtain great happinesse to himselfe, and consequently unto all his Citizens; who ever after through the temperance and justice of a father, would with good will do these things, which they then unwillingly did for the fear of a Lord. And in doing this; from a tyrant he should come to be a King: for, the chaines of a Diamond to keep a Realme in safety, were not force and fear, as his father Dionysius held opinion: neither the great multitude of young souldiers, nor the guard of ten thousand barbarous people: but in contrary manner, that they were the love and good will of their subjects) which the Prince obtaineth through vertue and justice: the which chaines though they be slacke then the other that are so hard and stiffe, yet are they stronger, and will last longer time, to keep a Realm and Kingdom in safety. And furthermore, the Prince (saith he) is not desirous of honor, neither is a man that deserveth greatly to be praised and commended, but that onely studieth to wear sumptuous apparel, and that glorieth to see his Court richly furnished; and himselfe curiously served: and in the mean time doth not frame himselfe to speak better, to be wiser, and to carry a greater Majesty then any other mean or common person; not esteeming to adorne and beautifie the Princely Pallace of his mind, as becometh the Royal Majesty of a King. Dion oftentimes rehearsing these exhortations unto Dionysius, and otherwhile enterlacing between, some reasons he had learned of Plato, he graffed in him a wonderful and (as it were) a vehement desire to have Plato in his company, and to learn of him. So, sundry letters came from Dionysius unto ATHENS, divers requests from Dion, and great intreaty made by certain Pythagorean Philosophers, that prayed and perswaded Plato to come into SICILE, to bridle the light disposition of this young man, by his grave and wise instructions: who without regard of reason, led a dissolute and licentious life. Therefore Plato (as himselfe reporteth) blushing to himselfe, and fearing lest he should give men cause to think; that it was but the opinion men had of him, and that of himselfe he was unwilling to do any worthy act: and further, hoping that doing good but unto one man alone; who was the onely guide of all the rest, he should (as it were) recover all SICILE from her corruption and ficklenesse; he performed their requests, that sent unto him. But Dion's enemies fearing the change and alteration of Dionysius, they perswaded him to call Phisistus the Historiographer home againe from banishment, who was a learned man, and had been brought up and acquainted with the tyrants faction: to the end he should serve as a counterpoise, to withstand Plato and his Philosophy: for this Phisistus, from the first time that the tyranny began to be established, did shew himselfe very willing and conformable to the establishment thereof, and had of long time kept the Castle: and the voice went, that he kept the mother of Dionysius the elder, and as it was supposed, not altogether without the tyrants knowledge. But afterwards, Leptines having had two daughters by one woman, whom he enticed to folly; being another mans wife, he married one of these his daughters unto Phisistus, and made not Dionysius privy to it before. The tyrant therewith was so offended, that he put Leptines woman in prison, fast locked up; and drive Phisistus out of SICILE. He being banished thus, repaired unto some of his friends that dwelt about the Adriaticke Sea, where it seemeth, he wrote the most part of all his History: being then at good leisure. For he was not called home againe during the life of Dionysius the elder: but after his death, the malice the Courtiers bare unto Dion, caused them to procure Phisistus calling home againe (as we have told you) as the man they thought would stickle stoutly in defence of the tyranny. So, Phisistus no sooner returned, but he stoutly began to defend the tyranny: and others in contrary manner, devised accusations to the Tyrant against Dion, accusing him that he had practised with Theodorus and Heraclides, to overthrow the tyranny of Dionysius. For Dion (in my opinion) hoped by Plato coming to bridle and lessen a little the over-licentious and imperious tyranny of Dionysius, and thereby to frame Dionysius a wife and righteous governour. But on the other side, if he saw he would not follow his counsell, & that he yeelded not to his wife instructions, he then determined to put him down, and to bring the Government of the Commonwealth into the hands of the SYRACUSANS: not that he allowed of Democrata (to wit, where the people govern) but yet certainly thinking that Democrata was much better then the tyranny, when they could not come unto Aristocrata (to wit, the Government of a few of the Nobility.) Now things being in this state, Plato arrived in SICILE, where he was marvellously received and honoured by Dionysius. For when he landed on the shore, leaving his Galley that brought him, there was ready for him one of the Kings rich and sumptuous Chariots, to convey him to the Castle: and the tyrant made sacrifice to give the gods thanks for his coming, as for some wonderful great good hap chanced unto his feignory. Furthermore, the wonderful modesty and temperance that was begun to be observed in feasts and banquets, the Court cleane changed, and the great goodnaes and clemency of the tyrant in all things, in ministering justice to every man; did put the SYRACUSANS in great good hope of change, and every man in the Court was very desirous to give himself to learning and Philosophy: so that (as men reported) the tyrants pallace was full of sand and dust, with the number of students that drew platets and figures of Geometry. Shortly after Plato was arrived, by chance the time was come about to do solemn sacrifice within the Castle, at which sacrifice the Herauld (as the manner was) proclaimed aloud the solemn prayer accustomed to be done: That it would please the gods, long to preserve the state of the tyranny. Whereat, Dionysius being hard by him, said unto him. What, wilt thou not leave to curse me? This word grieved Philistus and his companions to the heart, thinking that with time, by little and little, Plato would win such estimation and great authority with Dionysius, that afterwards they should not be able to resist him: considering that in so short a time as he had been with Dionysius, he had so altered his minde and courage. And therefore they now began, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mouth together to accuse Dion: and said, that it was eafie to be seen, how he charmed and enchanted Dionysius through *Plato*es eloquence, to make him willing to resigne his government, because he would transfer it to the hands of the children of his sister Aristomache. Others seemed to be offended, for that the ATHENIANS having come before into SICILE with a great Army, both by sea and land, they were all loft and cast away, and could not win the City of SYRACUSA: and that now by one onely Sophister, they utterly destroyed and overthrew the Empire of Dionysius, perswading him to discharge the ten thousand souldiers he had about him for his guard; to forsake the foure hundred Gallies, the ten thousand horsemen, and as many mo footmen, to go to the Academy to seek an unknown happinesse never heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometry, resigning his present happinesse and felicity (to be a great Lord, to have money at will, and to live pleasantly) unto Dion and his Nephew. By such like accusations and wicked tongues, Dionysius began first to mistrust Dion, and afterwards to be openly offended with him, and to frowne upon him. In the mean time they brought letters that Dion wrote secretly unto the Governours of the City of CARTHAGE, wishing them, that when they would make peace with Dionysius, they should not talke with him unlesse he stood by: assuring them that he would helpe them to fet things in quietnesse, and that all should be well again. When Dionysius had read these letters with Philistus, and had taken his advice and counsell what he should do, as Timanus said; he deceived Dion under pretence of reconciliation, making as though he meant him no hurt, and saying that he would become friends againe with him. So he brought Dion one day to the sea side under his Castle, and shewed him those letters, burdening him to have practised with the CARTHAGINIANS against him. And as, Dion went about to make him answer to cleare himself, Dionysius would not hear him, but caused him to be taken up as he was, and put into a Pinnace, and commanded the Mariners to fet him a land upon the coast of ITALY. After this was done, and that it was knowne abroad in the City, every man thought it a cruel part of Dionysius, in somuch that the tyrants pallace was in a marvellous pecke of troubles, for the great sorrow the women made for the departure of Dion. Moreover, the City self of SYRACUSA began to looke about them, looking for some suddain great change and innovation, for the tumult and uproare that would happen by means of Dion's banishment: and for the mistrust also that all men would have of Dionysius. Dionysius considering this, and being afraid of some misfortune, he gave his friends and the women of his pallace comfortable words, telling them that he had not banished him, but was contented that he should absent himselfe for a time: being afraid, that in his suddain angry mood he might peradventure be compelled to do him some worse turne if he remained; because of his obstinacy and selfe-will. Furthermore, he gave unto Dion's friends two ships, to carry as much goods, money, and as many of Dion's servants as they would, and to convey them unto him into PELOPONNESUS. Dion was a marvellous rich man, and for the pompe of his service, and sumptuous moveables of his house, they were like unto the person of a tyrant. All these riches Dion's friends brought aboard upon those ships, and carried them unto him; besides many other riches which the women and his friends sent unto him: so that by means of his great riches, Dion was marvellously esteemed among the GRECIANS: who by the riches of a banished Citizen, conjectured what the power of a tyranny might be. But now concerning Plato. When Dion was exiled, Dionysius caused him to be lodged in his Castle, and by this meanes craftily placed (under cloake of friendship) an honourable guard about him, because he should not returne into into GREECE to seek Dion, to tell him of the injury he had done unto him. Howbeit, Dionysius often frequenting his company (as a wild beast is made tame by company of man) he liked his talke so well, that he became in love with him, but it was a tyrannical love: for he would have Plato to love none but him, and that he should esteeme him above all men living, being ready to put the whole Realme into his hands, and all his forces, so that he would think better of him then of Dion. Thus was this passionate affection of Dionysius grievous unto Plato: for he was to drowned with the love of him, as men extremely jealous of the women they love, that in a moment he would suddainly fall out with him, and fraight againe become friends, and pray him to pardon him. And to say truly, he had a marvellous desire to hear *Plato*es Philosophy: but on the other side, he revered them that did disswade him from it, and told him, that he would spoile himself, if he entred over-deeply into it. In the mean time fell out warre, and thereupon he sent Plato againe away, promising him, that the next Spring he would send for Dion home. But he brake promise therein, and yet sent him his revenues: and prayed Plato to pardon him, though he had not kept promise at his time appointed. For he alleadged the warre was the cause; and that so soon as he had ended his war, he would send for Dion; whom in the mean time he prayed to have patience, and not to attempt any stir or alteration against him, nor to speak evil of him among the GRECIANS. This Plato sought to bring to passe, and brought Dion to study Philosophy, and kept him in the Academy at ATHENS. Dion lay in the City of ATHENS with one Calippus, whom he had known of long time; howbeit, he bought him a house in the Country, to lie there sometime for his pleasure; the which he gave afterwards (at his return into SICILE) unto Speusippus that kept him company, and was continually with him more then with any other friend he had in ATHENS, through *Plato*es counsell: who to soften and recreate Dion's manners, gave him the company of some pleasant conceited man, knowing that this Speusippus could modestly observe time and place to be pleasant and merry; for which respect, Timon in his satyrycal jests, calleth Speusippus, A good jester. Now Plato himself having undertaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dancing of young children, Dion took the paines to teach and exercise them; and moreover, himself was at the whole charge of these playes, Plato suffering him to bestow that liberality and courtesie upon the ATHENIANS: the which wan for Dion a great deal more good will, then Plato honour. Dion kept not still at ATHENS, but went also to see the other good Cities of GREECE, passing his time away. He being at common feasts and assemblies with the chiefest men, and best learned in matters of state and government, and never shewing any light parts, nor signe of any tyrannical pride in this manner of life, nor of a man that had been brought up with all pompe and pleasure, but like a grave vertuous man, and well studied in Philosophy, whereby he grew to be generally beloved and esteemed of all men: the City granted him publike honours, and sent him decrees of his glory, made in their counsels and assemblies. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS made him a SPARTAN and Burgesse of the City, not passing for Dionysius displeasure, though at that time he had given them great aide, in the war they made against the THEBANS. Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Pseudorus MEGARIAN, to come and see him at his house, and Dion went thither. This Pseudorus was a marvellous great rich man, and therefore Dion seeing a great number of people standing at his gates, and that it was a hard thing to come and speake with him, he had such great businesse: he turned unto his friends that did accompany him, who were angry they made him tarry so long at the gate, and said unto them: What cause have we to think evil of him, sith we did the like when we were at SYRACUSA? But Dionysius being incensed with envy against him, and fearing the goodwill the GRECIANS bare him, he kept backe his revenue, and would no more send it him; and seized all the goods, the which he gave to his receivers to keep. Furthermore, because he would cleare himself of the infamy he had gotten amongst the Philosophers for *Plato*es sake, he sent for divers wise and learned men, and vainly coveting to excell them all in wisdom, he was driven improperly, and out of time, to alledge many wife sayings, he had learned of Plato. Thereupon he began againe to wish for him, and to condemne himselfe, for that he had no wit to use him well when he had him at his commandment, and that he had not heard him so much as he should have done: and like a tyrant as he was, madly carried away with light desires, and easily changing mind from time to time, a suddaine vehement desire tooke him in the head, to have Plato again. So he sought all the means and wayes he could devise, to pray Archytas the Pythagorean Philosopher, to tell him that he might boldly come; and to be his surety unto him for that he would promise him: for first of all, they were acquainted together by his means. Therefore Archytas sent thither Archidamus the Philosopher. Dionysius also sent certain Gallies, and some of his friends thither, to pray Plato to come to him, and he himself wrote specially and plainly, that it should not go well with Dion if Plato came not into SICILE: but if he would be perswaded to come, that then he would do what he would have him. Many letters and requests came unto Dion from his wife and sister, in somuch as Dion so used the matter, that Plato obeyed Dionysius without making any excuse at all. So Plato writeth himselfe, that he was driven to come againe the third time into the streight of SICILE;

Now Plato being arrived in SICILE, he made Dionysius a great joyful man, and filled all SICILE, againe with great good hope: for they were all very desirous, and did what they could, to make Plato overcome Philistus and the tyranny with his Philosophy. entertaine Plato the best he could : above all, Dionysius seemed to have a marvellous trust and affiance in him, and more then in any other of all his friends. For he suffered Plato to come to him without searching of him, and oftentimes offered to give him a great sum of money : but Plato would take none of it. Therefore Aristippus CYRENIAN being at that time in the tyrants Court in SICILE, said, that Dionysius bestowed his liberality surely : for, to us that ask much, he giveth little, and much unto Plato, that requireth nothing. After Dionysius had given Plato his welcome, he began to move him again of Dion. Dionysius on the other side, at the first did use him with fine delays, but afterwards he shewed himself angry indeed, and at length fell out with Plato, but yet so covertly that others saw it not : for Dionysius dissembled that ; but otherwise in all other things he did him as much honour as he could devise, practising thereby to make him to forsake Dions friendship. Now Plato found him at the first, that there was no trust to be given to his words, and that all were but lies and devices he either said or did : howbeit, he kept it to himselfe, and ever patiently bare all things, hoping for the best, and made as though he believed him. They two thus finely dissembling with each other, thinking to deceive all men, and that none should understand their secrets : Helycon CYZICENIAN, one of Platos friends, did Prognosticate the Eclipse of the Sunne. The same falling out as he had Prognosticated, the tyrant esteemed marvellously of him, and gave him a silver talent for his labour. Then Aristippus sporting with other Philosophers, said, he could tell them of a stranger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was : I do prognosticate (said he) that Plato and Dionysius will be enemies ere it be long. In the end it came to passe, that Dionysius made port-sale of all Dions goods, and kept the money to himselfe, and lodged Plato (that before lay in the next Court to his Pallace) among the souldiers of his guard, whom he knew maliced him of long time, and sought to kill him, because he did perswade Dionysius to leave his tyranny, and to live without his Guard, Plato being in this instant danger, Archytas sent Ambassadors forthwith unto Dionysius, in a Galley of thirty Oares, to demand Plato againe : declaring that Plato came againe to SYRACUSA upon his word and caution. Dionysius to excuse himselfe, and to shew that he was not angry with him, at his departure from him, he made him all the great cheare and feasts he could, and so sent him home with great shewes of good will. One day among the rest, he said unto Plato : I am afraid Plato (said he) that thou wilt speake evill of me when thou art among thy friends and companions in the Academy. Then Plato smiling, answered him againe : The gods forbid, that they should have such scarcity of matter in the Academy, as that they must needs talke of thee. Thus was Platos returne (as it is reported) although that which he himselfe writeth, agreeth not much with this report. These things went to Dions heart, so that shortly after he shewed himself an open enemy unto Dionysius, but specially when he heard how he had handled his wife. Plato under covert words sent Dionysius word of it by his letters : and thus it was. After Dion was exiled, Dionysius returning Plato backe againe, he willed him secretly to feele Dions mind, whether he would not be angry that his wife should be married to another man ; because there ranne a rumour abroad (whether it were true, or invented by Dions enemies) that he liked not his marriage, and could not live quietly with his wife. Therefore when Plato was at ATHENS, and had told Dion of all things, he wrote a letter unto Dionysius the tyrant, and did set all other things downe so plainly, that every man might understand him ; but this one thing onely so darkely, that he alone and none other could understand him, but he to whom he had written : declaring unto him, that he had spoken with Dion about the matter he woted of, and that he did let him understand he would be marvellous angry if Dionysius did it. So at that time, because there was great hope of reconciliation between them, the tyrant did nothing lately touching his sister, but suffered her still to remaine with Dions sonne. But when they were so farre out, that there was no more hope to returne into favour againe, and that he had also sent home Plato in disgrace and displeasure, then he married his sister Aretè (Dions wife) against her will, unto one of his friends called Timocrates, not following therein his fathers justice and lenity. For Polyxenus that had married his fathers sister Thebes, being also become his enemy, fled out of SICILE. Dionysius the elder sent for his sister Thebes, andooke her up very sharply, for that the knowing her husband would flie, did not come and tell him of it. Thebes nobly answered him againe, and never was afraid nor abashed : Why, Dionysius, dost thou thinke me a woman so faint-hearted and beastly, that if I had knowne my husband would have gone his way and left me, I would not have taken sea with him, and both have runne one fortune together ? Truly, I knew not of his departure till he was gone : for it had been more for mine honour, to have been called the wife of the banished Polyxenus, then the sister of thee a tyrant. Dionysius marvelled to heare his sister speak thus boldly, and the SYRACUSANS wondred at her noble courage : insomuch, that when the tyranny was utterly destroyed, they did not refuse to do her all the honour they could devise, as unto a Queene. And when she was dead also, all the Citizens of SYRACUSA by a common decree, did accompany her body at her burial. This little digression from our History, is not altogether unprofitable. But now again to our matter. Dion from thenceforth disposed himself altogether unto war, against Platos counsel and advice : who did his best endeavour to perswade him from it, both for the respect of Dionysius good entertainment he had given him, as also for that Dion was of great years. Howbeit, on the other side, Spensippus and his other friends did provoke him unto it, and perswaded him to deliver SICILE from the slavery and bondage of the tyrant, the which held up her hands unto him, and would receive him with great love and goodwill. For whilst Plato lay at SYRACUSA, Spensippus keeping the Citizens company more then Plato did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the first, they were were afraid to open themselves unto him, and frankly to speak what they thought, mistrusting he was a spie unto the tyrant, sent amongst them to feel their minds : but within short time they began to trust him, and were all of one mind ; for they prayed and perswaded Dion to come, and not to care otherwise for bringing of ships, souldiers, nor horses with him, but onely to hire a ship, and to lend the SICILIANS his body and name against Dionysius. Spensippus reporting these newes unto Dion, did put him in good heart again : whereupon he began secretly to leavy men by other mens meanes to hide his purpose and intent. The Philosophers do set forward Dions wars ; many Citizens dealing in the affaires of the Common-wealth, did aide him, and divers of them also that onely gave their minds to the study of Philosophy : and among them, Eudemus CYPRIAN (on whose death Aristotle wrote his Dialogue of the soul) and Timonides LEUCADIAN went with him. Furthermore, there joynd also with him Miltas THESSALIAN, a Soothsayer, and that had been his companion in study in the Academy. Now, of all them whom the tyrant had banished (which were no lesse then a thousand persons) there were but onely five and twenty that durst accompany him in this war : for all the other were such dastards, that they forooke him, and durst not go with him. The place where they appointed to meet, was the Isle of ZACINTH, where they leaved all their souldiers, that were not above eight hundred in all ; but all of them brave souldiers and valiant men, and excellently well trained in wars : and to conclude, such lusty men, as would encourage all the Army Dion hoped of at his arrival in SICILE, to fight like valiant men with them. These hired souldiers, the first time that they understood it was to go into SICILE, to make war with Dionysius, they were amazed at the first, and misliked the journey, because it was undertaken rather of malice and spite than Dion had to be revenged, then otherwise of any good cause or quarrel ; who having no better hope, took upon him desperate and impossible enterprises. Therefore the souldiers were offended with their Captains that had pressed them, because they had not told them of this warre before. But, after that Dion by a notable Oration had told them, how tyrannies have evil foundations, and are subject unto ruin, and that he led them not into SICILE so much for souldiers, as he did to make them Captaines of the SYRACUSANS and the other SICILIANS, who of long time desired nothing more then occasion to rise : and, when after him also Alcimenes (a companion with him in this warre, and the chiefe man of all the ACHAIIANS, both for nobility and estimation) did speak unto them in like manner ; then they were all contented to go whither they would lead them. It was then in the heate of Summer, and the wind blew, called the GRECIAN wind, the Moone being at the full ; and Dion having prepared to make a sumptuous sacrifice unto the god Apollo, he led all his men armed with white corselets in procession into the temple : and after the sacrifice done, he made them a feast in the Parke or shew-place of the ZACINTHIANS. There the Tables were laid, and the souldiers wondered to see the great state and magnificence of the great number of pots of gold and silver, and such other furniture and preparation, as passed a private mans wealth : then they thought with themselves, that a man being so old, and Lord of so great a good, would not attempt things of such danger, without good ground, and great assurance of his friends aid and help. But after his oblations of wine, and common prayers made to the gods at feasts, suddenly the Moone Eclipse. Dion thought it not strange to see an Eclipse, considering the revolutions of the Eclipses, and knowing very well it is a shadow that falleth upon the body of the Moon, because of the direct interposition of the earth betwixt her and the Sun. But because the souldiers that were afraid and astonished withall, stood in need of some comfort and encouragement, Miltas the Soothsayer standing up in the midst among them, said unto them : My fellow souldiers, be of good chear, and assure your selves that we shall prosper : for God doth foreshew us by this sight we see, that some one of the chiefe things now in highest place and dignity shall be Eclipse. And at this present time, what thing carrieth greater glory and fame, then the tyranny of Dionysius ? Therefore you must think, that so soon as you arrive in SICILE, your selves shall put out his light and glory. This interpretation of the Eclipse of the Moon, did Miltas the Soothsayer make, before all the whole company. But touching the swarm of Bees that lighted on the poope of Dions ship, he told him and his friends privately : That he was afraid his acts (which should fall out famous and glorious) should be but a while, and flourishing a few dayes, would straight consume away. It is reported also, that Dionysius in like manner had many strange signes and wonderful tokens from above. Among others, there came an Eagle, that snatched a Partisan out of a souldiers hand, and carried it quite away with her, and then let it fall into the sea. The sea also bearing against the walls of the Castle, was as sweet to drink a whole day together, as any conduit or running water : as those that tasted of it, found it true. Furthermore, a Sow farrowed Pigges that lacked no part of their body but onely their ears. This the Soothsayers said, did signifie rebellion and disobedience of his subjects : and that the Citizens would no more hear him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they told also, that the sweetnesse of the salt water prognosticated to the SYRACUSANS change of cruell and evil time, unto good and civil government : and that the Eagle, Jupiters Minister, and the Partisan, the marke and token of the Kingdom and Empire, did beroken, that Jupiter (the chiefe of all the gods) had determined to destroy and put downe the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So, Dions souldiers were embarked into two great ships of burden, and another third ship that was not very great, and two Pinnaces with thirty Oares, followed them. For their armour and weapon, beside those the souldiers had, he carried two thousand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of darts, of pikes, and plenty of victuals : that they should lacke nothing all the time they were upon the sea, considering that their journey stood altogether at the courtesie of the winds and sea ; and for that they were afraid to land, understanding that Philistus rode at Anchor in the coast of APULIA, with with a Fleet of ships that lay in waite for their coming. So having a pleasant gale of wind, they sailed the space of twelve dayes together, and the thirteenth day they came to the foreland of Syracusa called Pachynus. There the Pilot thought it best they should land presently: for if they willingly looffed into the sea, and lost that point, they were sure they should lose also many nights and dayes in vain in the midde of the sea, being then Summer time, and the wind at the South. But Dion being afraid to land so near his enemies, he was desirous to go farther, and so past by the foreland of Pachynus. Then the North wind rose so bigge and great, that with great violence it drave backe their ships from the coasts of Syracusa. Furthermore, lightning and thunder mingled withal (because it was at that time when the Star Arcturus begetteth to shew) it made so terrible a tempest, and poured down such a sore shower of rain upon them, that all the Mariners were amazed withall, and knew not whether the wind would drive them, till that suddenly they saw the storm had cast them upon the Iffe of Cercina (which is on the coast of Lybia) and specially where it is most dangerous to arrive for the Rocks; for their ships were like to have runne upon them, and to have made shipwracke. But with much ado they bare off the ships with their great long poles, and wanded up and down the sea, not knowing whither they went untill the storme ceased. Then they met a ship, whereby they knew that they were in the flat, which the Mariners call, The heads of the great Syrt. Thus they wandering up and down, being marvellous angry that the sea was calme, there rose a little South wind from the land, although they least looked for any such wind at that time, and little thinking it would so have changed: but seeing the wind rife bigger and bigger, they packed on all the sailes they had, and making their prayers unto the gods, they crossed the sea, and sailed from the coast of Lybia, directly unto Syracusa, and had the wind so lucky, that at the fifth day they were neare unto a little village of Syracusa, called Mino, the which was subject to the Carthaginians. Synalus Carthaginian, being at that time Capitaine and Governour of the Town of Mino, and Dion friend, was there by chance at this present, who being ignorant of his enterprife and coming, did what he could to keep Dion souldiers from landing. But they notwithstanding suddenly leapt on land armed, but slew no man: for Dion had commanded them the contrary, for the friendship he bare the Captain: and they following the Townsmen hard that fled before them, entered the Town hand over head amongst them, and so wan the Market-place. When both the Captains met, and that they had spoken together, Dion delivered the Town unto Synalus hands again, without any hurt or violence offered him. Synalus on the other side, did endeavour himself all he could to make much of the souldiers, and holpe Dion to provide him of all things necessary. But this did most of all encourage the souldiers, because Dionysius at their arrival, was not then in Syracusa: for it chanced so, that not many daies before he went into Italy with foure score saile. Therefore when Dion willed them to remaine there a few dayes to refresh themselves, because they had been so sore sea-beaten a long time together, they themselves would not, they were so glad to imbrace the occasion offered them, and prayed Dion to lead them forthwith to Syracusa. Dion leaving all his superfluous armour and provision in the hands of Synalus, and praying him to fend them to him when time served, he took his way towards Syracusa. So by the way, two hundred horsemen of the Argentines, which dwell in that part called Ecnomus, came first to joyn with him, and after them, the Geloians. The rumor of their coming ran straight to Syracusa: thereupon Timocrates that had married Aretie, Dion wife, and Dionysius the fathers sifter, and to whom Dionysius the younger had left the charge and government of all his men and friends in the City: he presently dispatched a post with letters, to advertise Dionysius of Dion coming. He himself also in the mean time had taken such order, that there rose no tumult nor mutiny in the City, though they all of them lacked no goodwill to rebel: but because they were uncertain whether this rumor were true or false (being afraid) every man was quiet. Now there chanced a strange misfortune unto the messenger, which carried the letters unto Dionysius. For after he had passed the straights, and that he was arrived in the City of Rhegio of Italy side, making hast to come to the City of Caunonia, where Dionysius was, he met by the way one of his acquaintance that carried a Mutton but newly sacrificed. This good fellow gave him a peece of it, and the messenger spurred away withall the speed he could possibly: but when he had ridden the most part of the night, he was so weary and drowfie for lacke of sleep, that he was driven to lye down: so he lay downe upon the ground in a wood hard by the high way. The favour of this flesh brought a Wolfe to him that carried away the flesh and the Portmanteau it was wrapt in, and in the which also were his letters of advertisement, which he carried unto Dionysius. When he awoke out of his sleepe, and saw that his Portmanteau was gone, he enquired for it, and went wandering up and downe a long time to seeke it: howbeit, all in vaine, for he could never finde it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to go to the Tyrant without his letters, but rather to sleight into some unknowne place, where no body knew him. Thus overlate received Dionysius advertisement by others of this war, which Dion made in Syracusa. In the meane time, the Camarianians came and joyned with Dion Army, in the high-way towards Syracusa: and still there came unto him also a number of the Syracusans that were up in Armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other side, certaine Campanians and Leontines, which were gotten into the Castle of Epiripolis with Timocrates, of purpose to keep it; upon a false rumor Dion gave out (and which came unto them) that he would first go against their Towns: they forsooke Timocrates, and went to take order to defend their owne goods. Dion understanding that, being lodged with his Army in a place called Matre, he presently removed his Campe, being darke night, and marched forward till he came unto the River of Anapus, which is not from the City above ten furlongs off: and there staying a while, he sacrificed unto the River, and made his prayer and worshipped the rising of the Sun. At the selfe same instant also, the Soothsayers came and told him, that the gods did promise him assured victory. And the souldiers also seeing Dion weare a Garland of flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremony of the sacrifice, all of them with one selfe goodwill took every man one of them (being no lesse then five thousand men that were gathered together by the way, and but slenderly armed with such things as came first to hand; howbeit, supplying with goodwill their want of better furniture and armor:) and when Dion commanded them to march, for joy they ranne, and encouraged one another with great cries, to shew themselves valiant for recovery of their liberty. Now for them that were within the City selfe of Syracusa, the Noblemen and chiefe Citizens went to receive them at the Gates, in their best Gownes. The common people on the other side, ranne and set upon them that took part with the Tyrant, and spoiled them that were called the Protagogides (as much to say, The common Promoters of men) the detestablest villains, hateful to the gods and men: for they like Sycophants and busie tale-bearers, would jet up and downe the City, and mingle among the Citizens, having an oare in every mans matter, being full of prittle prattle, and busie headed, to know what every man said and did, and then to go carry it to the tyrant. These men were they that had their payment first of all, for they killed them with dry blowes, beating them to death with flaves. When Timocrates could not enter into the Castle with them that kept it, he tooke his horse backe, and fled out of the City; and flying, made all men afraid and amazed where he came, enlarging Dion power by his report, because it should not seem, that for fear of a trifle, he had forsaken the City. In the meane time, Dion came on towards the City with his men, and was come so neare, that they might see him plainly from the City, marching foremost of all, armed with a faire bright white corselet, having his brother Megacles on the right hand of him, and Calippus Athenian on the left hand crowned with Garlands of flowers: and after him also there followed an hundred souldiers that were strangers, chosen for his guard about him, and the rest came marching after it in good order of battell, being led by their Captaines. The Syracusans saw him coming, and went out and received him as a holy and blessed procession, that brought them their liberty and popular state againe, the which they had lost the space of eight and fourty years. When Dion was come into the City, by the gate called Menitide, he caused his trumpeter to sound, to appease the rumor and tumult of the people. Then he commanded an Herald to proclaim aloud: That Dion and Megacles, who were come to put down the tyranny, did set all the Syracusans at liberty, and all the other Syracusanians also from the bondage and subjection of the tyrant. And because Dion himselfe was desirous to speake unto the people, he went to the upper part of the Town, called Arcaadian. The Syracusans, all the streets through as he passed by, had on either hand of him prepared sacrifices, and set up tables and cuppes upon them: and as he passed by their houses, they cast flowers and fruits on him, and made prayers unto him, as if he had been a god. Now, under the Castle there was a place called Pentapyla (a clocke, to know by the Sunne how the day went) the which Dionysius had caused to be made, and it was of a good pretty height. Dion got up upon it, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perswading his Countriemen to do their endeavour to recover their liberty againe, and to maintaine it. They being in a marvellous joy withall, and desirous to please Dion, did choose him and his brother Megacles their Lieutenants General, with absolute power and authority. Afterwards also, by the consent of Dion himselfe and his brother, and at their requests in like mannner, they chose twenty other Captaines, of the which the most part of them had been banished by the tyrant, and were returned againe with Dion. The Soothsayers and Prognosticators liked it well, and said it was a good signe for Dion, that he trode their sumptuous building and workmanship of the tyrant under his feet, when he made his Oration: but because the hand of the Diall did shew the course of the Sunne, which never leaveth going, upon the which he got up when he was chosen Lieutenant General with absolute power and authority, they were afraid againe, that it was a signe Dion affairs should have a suddain change of fortune. After this, Dion having taken the castle of Epiripolis, he set all the Citizens at liberty, which were kept there as prisoners in captiuitie by the tyrant, and environed the Castle round about with a wall. Within seven dayes after, Dionysius returned by sea to the Castle of Syracusa, and therewithall also came the Carts loaden with armour and weapons to Syracusa, which Dion had left with Synalus: the which Dion caused to be distributed among the Citizens of Syracusa that had none. Others did furnish themselves as well as they could, and shewed that they had courage and goodwill to fight for the maintenance and defence of their liberty. In the meane time, Dionysius sent Ambassadors, first unto Dion privately, to see if he would yeeld to any composition. But Dion would not heare them, but bade them tell the Syracusans openly what they had to say: being men that were free, and enjoyed liberty. Then the Ambassadors spake in the behalfe of the tyrant, unto the people of Syracusa, promising them with mild and gentle words, that they should pay no subsidies and taxes, but very little, and should be no more troubled with warres, other then such as they themselves should like of. The Syracusans made a mockery at those offers, and Dion also answered the Ambassadors, and willed Dionysius to send no more to the Syracusans, before he had dispossessed himself of his tyranny: and, so that he would leave it, he would be his mean to obtaine all things just and reasonable of the people. Dionysius liked very well of his good offer: and therefore sent his Ambassadors again to pray the Syracusans, that they would appoint some amongst them to come to the Castle, to talke with him for the benefit and com-

commodity of the Common-wealth; that he might hear what they would alledge, and they also what answer he would make. Dion chose certaine whom he sent unto him. Now there ranne a rumour in the City among the SYRACUSANS, which came from the Castle, that Dionysius would willingly of himselfe, rather then by reason of Dions coming, depose himself of the tyranny. But this was but a false alarme, and crafty fetch of Dionysius, to intrap the SYRACUSANS by. For those that were sent him from the City, he kept them prisoners every man of them, and one morning having made his souldiers drinke wine lustily, which he kept in pay to guard his person, he sent them with great fury to assault the wall the SYRACUSANS had built against the Castle. Now, because the SYRACUSANS looked for nothing lesse, then for the suddaine assault, and for that these barbarous people with a wonderful courage and great tumult overthrew the wall, and others of them also did set upon the SYRACUSANS, there was not a man of them that durst make head to fight with them, saving the souldiers that were strangers, whom Dion had brought with him. Who, when they heard the noise, ran straight to repulse them, and yet they themselves could not well tell what they should do upon that suddaine. For they could hear nothing for the great noise and hurly burly of the SYRACUSANS, which fled with great disorder, and came and mingled themselves amongst them. Till at length, Dion perceiving he could not be heard; to shew them by deed what they should do, he went first himself against these barbarous people, and about him there was a cruel and bloody fight: for his enemies knew him as well as his own men, and they all ranne upon him with great cries. Now for Dion himselfe, indeed because of his age, he was heavier then was requisite for one that should away with the pains of such battels: but he had such a valiant courage in him, that he went through with all lustily, and slew them that did assaile him. Yet he had his hand also thrust through with a pike, and very hardly did his curaces hold out the blowes of the darts and thrusts by hand which he received on them, they were so mangled and hacked with such a number of darts and pikes passed through his shield and broken on him, that in the end he was beaten downe: howbeit his souldiers refused him straight. Then he made Timonides their Captaine, and he himself took his horsebacke, and went up and down the City, staying and quieting the flying of the SYRACUSANS. Then he sent for his souldiers the strangers, which he had put in Garrison in that part of the City called the ACRA-DINE to keep it; and brought them being fresh, against the barbarous people of the Castle that were wearied, and almost all of them discouraged to attempt any further enterprise. For they had made this fallly out, in hope to have taken all the City at the first onset, onely running up and down: but when contrary to their expectation, they met these valiant souldiers, and fresh supply, they then began to retire againe into the Castle. And the GRECIAN souldiers on the other side, perceiving they gave backe, they came the faster upon them, so that they were compelled to turne their backs, and were driven within the walls, after they had slaine threescore and fourteen of Dions men, and lost a great number of their own. This was a noble victory, and therefore the SYRACUSANS gave the souldiers that were strangers, an hundred silver Minaes, in reward for their good service: and they gave Dion their General, a crown of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a Trumpet from the Castle, written from the women of his house: and among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed, To my father, the which Hipparinus wrote unto him. For that was Dions sonnes name, though Timonides writeth he was called Areteus, after his mothers name Arete. But in such matters, he thinks Timonides is better to be credited, because he was his friend and companion in armes. All the other letters that were sent, were openly read before the assembly of the SYRACUSANS, and did onely concerne requests of these women unto Dion. The SYRACUSANS would not have the supposed letter of his sonne to be openly read: but Dion against their minds opened it, and found that it was Dionysius letter; who by words, made the direction of it unto Dion, but in effect, he spake unto the SYRACUSANS. For in sight, it seemed a manner of request and justification of him; but in truth, it was written of purpose to accuse Dion. First of all, he remembered him of the things he had done before, for the establishing and preservation of the tyranny: and afterwards, of cruel threats against those whom he should love best, as his wife, his son, and sister: and last of all, full of most humble requests and intreaties, with sorrow and lamentation. But that which most moved Dion of all other, was, that he required him not to destroy the tyranny, but rather to take it for himselfe, and not to set them at liberty that hated him, and would alwayes remember the mischief he had done unto them: and that he would himselfe take upon him to be Lord, saving by that means the lives of their parents and friends. When these letters had been read before the whole assembly of the people, the SYRACUSANS thought not how to reverence (as they ought) with admiration, the inflexible clemency and magnanimity of Dion, that stood firme and fast for justice and vertue, against such vehement intreaty and perswasion of his kinsfolke and friends: but they contrarily began to be afraid, and to mistrust him, as he that of necessity should be forced to pardon the tyrant, for the great pledges and hostages he had of him. Wherefore, they began to chuse them new governors, and the rather, because they heard that Heraclides was coming unto them, whom they loved singularly well. This Heraclides was one of them that had been banished, a good souldier and Captaine, and well esteemed of for the charge and office he bare under the tyrants: howbeit, a very unconstant man in every thing, and would not continue long in a mind, and least constant in warres where he had great charge of honour in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in PELOPONNESUS; wherefore he determined to come with a power by himself, and with his own Fleet against the tyrant. So he arrived at length in SYRACUSA, with seven Gallies, and three other ships: where he found Dionysius againe shut up into his Castle with a wall, and the SYRACUSANS also to have the better hand.

hand of him. Then he began to curry favour with the common people all the wayes he could possibly devise, having by nature a certaine pleasing manner to win the common people, which seeke nothing else but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the easier for him to win them, because the people did already mislike Dions severity, as a man too severe and cruel to governe a Commonwealth. For they had now their will so much, and were grown so strong headed, because they saw themselves the stronger, that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free Cities, where they only be Lords, and do rule) before they were fully set at liberty. Therefore first of all, not being called together by the authority of the Governours, they ran in a fury, of their own light heads, unto the place of common assemblies, and there chose Heraclides Admiral. Then Dion understanding this, came, so complaine of the injury they had done him, declaring unto them, that to give this power now unto Heraclides, was to take that away which they had first given unto him: because he should no more be General, if they chose any other Admiral by sea then himself. The SYRACUSANS then, as it were against their wills did revoke the power they had given unto Heraclides: but afterwards Dion sent for Heraclides, to pray him to come home to him. When he came, he rebuked him a little, and told him, it was not honestly, nor profitably done of him, to sue to the people, and to contend for honour against him in so dangerous a time, when the least occasion in the world was enough to have marred all. Afterwards, Dion himself called an assembly againe of the City, and established Heraclides Admiral: and perswaded the Citizens to give him souldiers, as he had indeed. Heraclides outwardly seemed to honour Dion, and confessed openly that he was greatly bound unto him, and was at his heels very lowly, being ready at his commandement: but in the mean time; secretly he inticed the common people to rebell, and to stirre up those whom he knew meet men to like of change. Whereby he procured Dion such trouble, and brought him into such perplexity, that he knew not well which way to take. For, if he gave them advice to let Dionysius quietly come out of the Castle, then they accused, and said, he did it to save his life: if on the contrary side, because he would not trouble them, he continued siege still, and established nothing; then they thought he did it of purpose to draw out the wars in length, because he might the longer time remaine their Chieftain general, and so to keep the Citizens longer in fear. At that time there was one Sofis in SYRACUSA, a man of no name, but noted among the SYRACUSANS for his villany and wickednesse, esteeming that full and ample liberty, when he might unchecked licenciously speake what he would, as indeed he did. For he seeking to do Dion a displeasure, first of all one day at a common council he stood up on his feet, and called the SYRACUSANS beasts (amongst many other vile words he gave them) if they did not perceive, that being come from a fond and drunken tyranny, they had now received a sober master, and a wise Tyrant. So when he had thus openly shewed himself an enemy unto Dion, he came that day day no more into the Market-place: but the next morning he was seen running up and down the City naked, his head and face all of a gore blood, as if he had been followed of men to have slaine him. Thus Sofis, coming in this manner into the midst of the Market-place, cried out that Dions strangers had lain in wait for him, and had handled him in this sort, shewing his wound on his head. Many of the people tooke this matter very grievously, and cried out upon Dion, and said it was vilely and tyrannically done of him, by fear of murther and danger, to take away the liberty from the Citizens to speake. Now, though the whole assembly hereupon fell into an uproare withall; Dion notwithstanding came thither to cleare himselfe of these accusations, and made them presently see, that this Sofis was brother to one of Dionysius guard: who had put into his head, in this sort to put the City of SYRACUSA in an uproare, because Dionysius had no other hope nor meane to escape, but by stirring up faction and sedition among them, to make one of them fall out with another. The Surgeons were sent for forthwith to search the wound of this Sofis: who found, that it was rather a little scratch, then any violent wound given him. For the wounds or cuts of a sword, are ever deepest in the midst: and Sofis cut was but very little, and not deepe, having had many beginnings, and given him (as it seemed) at sundry times, but for very paine, the party that cut him, was driven to leave off, and came to cut him at divers times. Furthermore, there came certain of his friends in the meane time, that brought a razor before the assembly, and reported that as they came, they met Sofis by the way all bloodied: who said that he fled from Dions souldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereupon they presently followed them, but found no man; and onely they saw a razor, which some body had cast upon a hollow stone thereabouts, where they first saw him coming unto them. Thus, Sofis device had but evill successe. For besides all these proofes and tokens, Dions household servants came to be witness against him, that very early in the morning he went abroad alone with a razor in his hand. Then they that before did burden and accuse Dion, knew not what to say to the matter, but shrunke away: whereupon the people condemning Sofis to death, they were quiet againe with Dion. Yet were they alwayes afraid of these souldiers that were strangers, specially when they saw the greatest conflicts they had with the Tyrant, was by sea, after that Philistus was come from the coast of APU-LIA with a great number of Gallies to aide the Tyrant. For then they thought, that these souldiers (the strangers) being armed at all parts to fight by land, they would do him no more service by sea: because the Citizens themselves were they that kept them in safety, for that they were men practised to fight by sea, and were also the stronger by means of their ships. But beside all this the onely thing that made them to be courageous againe, was the good fortune they had at the battel by sea, in the which when they had overcome Philistus, they cruelly and barbarously used him. Truly Ephorus saith, that Philistus slew himselfe, when he law his Galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was alway with Dion from the first beginning of this warre) writing unto Speusippus the Philosopher, saith: that Philistus was taken alive, because his Galley ran aland: and that the SYRACUSANS first tooke of his: Curaces; and stripped him naked, and after they had done him all the villany and spite they could, they cut off his head, and gave his body unto boyes, commanding them to drage it into that part of the City called ACRA DINE, and then to cast it into the common privy. Timaeus also to spite him the more, saith that the boyes tied the dead body by his lame legge, and so dragged him up and down the City, where all the SYRACUSANS did what villany to it they could, being glad to see him dragged by the legge, that had said: Dionysius should not flie from the tyranny upon a light horse, but that they should pull him out by the legge against his will. Now Philistus reporteth this matter thus: not as spoken to Dionysius by himself, but by some other. But Timaeus taking a just occasion and colour: to speak evil of the good will, fidelity, and care that Philistus had alway seemed to shew in the confirmation and defence of the tyranny, doth liberally bestow injurious words on him in this place. Now for them, whom he had indeed offended, if they of malice and spite to be revenged, did offer him cruelty, peradventure they were not much to be blamed: but for them that since his death have written the guests, who were never offended by him in his life time, and who ought to shew themselves discreet in their writing, methinks that if they had regarded their own credite and estimation, they should not so fondly and outrageously have reproved the adversities and misfortunes, which by fortune may as well chance to the honestest man, as unto him. Thus fondly did Ephorus praise Philistus, who although he have an excellent fine wit to counterfeit goodly excuses, and cunningly to hide wicked and dishonest parts, and eloquently to devise by honest words to defend an evil cause: yet cannot he with all the fine wit he hath, excuse himselfe, that he hath not been the onely man of the world that hath most favoured tyrants, and that hath ever loved, and specially desired power, wealth, and alliance with tyrants. But he (in my opinion) taketh the right course of an Historiographer, that neither doth commend Philistus doings, nor yet casteth his adversities in his teeth to his reproach. After Philistus death, Dionysius sent unto Dion, to make him an offer to deliver him the Castle, armour, munition, and souldiers that were in it, with money also to pay them for five moneths space. For himselfe, he prayed that he might be suffered to go safely into ITALY, and to lie there, to take the pleasure of the fruits of the Country called GYARTA, which was within the territory of SYRACUSA, and lieth out from the sea towards the main land. Dion refused this offer, and answered the Ambassadors, that they must move the SYRACUSANS in it. They supposing they should easily take Dionysius alive, would not hear the Ambassadors speak, but turned them away. Dionysius seeing no other remedy, left the Castle in the hands of his eldest sonne Apollocrates, and having a lusty gale of wind, he secretly embarked certain of his men he loved best, with the richest things he had, and so hoisted saile, unawares to Heraclides, the Admiral of SYRACUSA. The people were marvellously offended with Heraclides for it, and began to mutine against him. But Heraclides, to pacifie this tumult of the people, suborned one Hippus an Orator, who preferred the law Agraria unto the people, for the division of all the Island amongst them: and that the beginning of liberty was equality and of bondage poverty, unto them that had no lands. Heraclides giving his consent to this decree, and stirring the common people to sedition against Dion, that withstood it: perswaded the SYRACUSANS, not onely to confirme the law Hippus had propounded, but also to discharge the hired strangers, to chuse other Captaines and Governors, and rid themselves of Dions severe Government. But they supposing straight to have been rid from the tyranny, as from a long and grievous sicknesse, over rashly taking upon them, like people that of long time had been at liberty, they utterly undid themselves, and overthrew Dions purpose: who like a good Physician was carefull to see the City well ordered and governed. So when they were assembled to chuse new Officers in the midst of Summer, there fell such horrible thunders, and other terrible stormes, and unfortunate signes in the Element, that for the space of fifteen dayes together, the people were still scattered and dispersed when they were assembled: infomuch, that being afraid of these signes above, they durst not at that time create any new Captaines. Certaine dayes after, as the Orators had chosen a faire time to proceed to the election of Officers, an Oxe drawing in a Cart (being daily acquainted with every fight and noise) suddenly without any occasion offered, fell into a madnesse against the Carter that drave him, and breaking his yoke asunder, ranne straight to the Theater, and there made the people runne into every corner, to flie and save themselves: and then singing, and bearing all downe before him that stood in his way, he ranne through as much of the City, as the enemies afterwards wanne of them. This notwithstanding, the SYRACUSANS making light account of all these signes, they chose five and twenty Captaines, of the which Heraclides was one: and secretly they sent to feele the hired souldiers, to see if they could entice them from Dion, to cause them to take their part, and made them large promises to make them free men (as themselves) of SYRACUSA. The souldiers would not be enticed from him; but faithfully and lovingly tooke Dion amongst them with their armour and weapons: and putting him in the midst of them, led him in this manner out of the City, and did no man hurt, but reproved their unthankfulness and villany unto all those they met by the way. Then the SYRACUSANS despising them for their small number; and because they did not first set upon them, but trusting on the other side to themselves, for that they were the greater number, they came to assaile them, supposing they should easily overcome them in the City, and kill every man of them. Dion being thus in a straight, that of necessity he must fight against his owne Countrymen, or else be slaine himself with his souldiers, he held held up his hands to the SYRACUSANS, and very earnestly prayed them to be contented, pointing them with his finger to the Castle that was full of their enemies, which shewed themselves upon the walls, and saw what they did. In the end, when he saw that he could not pacifie their fury and tumult, and that all the City was in an uproare with the prittle prattle of these seditious people, who were carried like the sea with the winde, he did yet forbid his souldiers to give any charge upon them; who notwithstanding made a countenance with great cries, and railing of their harnesse, as if they had meant to have runne on them. Then the SYRACUSANS durst not abide by it, but ran away like sheep through the streets no man chasing them. So Dion called backe againe his men, and led them directly into the Country of the LEONTINES. Then the new officers and governors of SYRACUSA, perceiving the women laughed them to scorne: because they would recover the fame they had lost, they armed their men anew, and marched after Dion to fight with him; whom they overtook at a River, as he was ready to passe over. Then began their horsemen a little to skirmish with Dions company: but when they saw he did no more bear with their faults for Countries sake but frowned indeed upon them, and set his men in battel ray against them: they turned their backs againe, with more shame and reproach then before, and so fled unto the City of SYRACUSA, and had not many of their men slain. The LEONTINES received Dion very honorably, took the strangers his souldiers, gave them pay, and made them free Citizens with them: and sent Ambassadors also unto the SYRACUSANS, to will them to let the strangers have their pay. The SYRACUSANS on their side also, sent Ambassadors unto the LEONTINES to accuse Dion. So all their confederates were assembled in the City of the LEONTINES; and in that assembly, after both parties had been heard, to hear what they would say, it was judged: that the SYRACUSANS were to blame. Howbeit, they would not stand to the judgement of their confederates, for they were now grown proud and carelesse, because they were governed by no man, but had Capitaines that studied to please them, and were afraid also to displease them. After that, there arrived certain Gallies of Dionysius at SYRACUSA, of the which Nysius Neapolitan was Capitaine: which brought victuals and mony, to help them that were besiged within the Castle. These Gallies were fought with, and the SYRACUSANS obtained victory, and took four of the Tyrants Gallies with three banks of Oars a peece: howbeit they fondly abused their victory. For they having no body to command or rule them, employed all their joy in rioting and banqueting, and in fond and dissolute meetings, taking so little care and regard to their businesse, that now when they thought the Castle was sure their owne, they almost lost their City. For Nysius perceiving that every part of the City was out of order, and that the common people did nothing all day long unto darke night, but bib and drinke drunke, dancing after their Pipes and Howboyes; and that the Governors themselves were very glad also to see such feasting, or else for that they dissembled it, and durst not command and compell them that were drunke: he wisely took the occasion offered him, and scaled the wall which had shut up the Castle, and wanne it, and overthrew it. Then he sent the barbarous souldiers into the City, and commanded them to do with them they met, what they would or could. The SYRACUSANS then too late found their fault, and hardly gave present remedy, they were so amazed and suddainly set on: for indeed they made a right lacke of the City. Here men were killed, there they overthrew the wall; in another place they carried away women and little children prisoners into the Castle, weeping and crying out: and lastly, they made the Capitaines at their wits end, who could give no present order, nor have their men to serve them against their enemies, that came hand over head on every side amongst them. The City being thus miserably in garboile, and the ACRA DINE also in great hazard of taking, in the which they put all their hope and confidence to rise againe: every man thought then with himselfe, that Dion must be sent for, but yet no man moved it notwithstanding, being ashamed of their unthankfulness and over great folly they had committed, in driving him away. Yet necessity enforcing them unto it, there were certaine of the horsemen and of their confederates that cried, that they must send for Dion and the PELOPONNESIANS his souldiers, which were with him in the territory of the LEONTINES. As soon as the word was heard, and that one had the heart to tell it to the people, all the SYRACUSANS cried out. There was the point: and they were so glad of it, that the water stood in their eyes for joy, and besought the gods it would please them to bring him unto them, they were so desirous to have him againe. For they called to mind how valiant and resolute he was in danger, and how that he was never afraid, but did encourage them with his manhood, in such sort, that being led by him, they were not afraid to set upon their enemies. So the confederates of them, sent presently Archeboides and Telestes unto him: and the noblemen that served on horsebacke, they sent him also five amongst them, beside Hellanicus. Who tooke their hofes, and poasted for life, so that they came unto the City of the LEONTINES about Sunne-set: and lightning off from their hofes, they went first of all and kneeled downe at Dions feet, and weeping, told him the miserable state of the SYRACUSANS. Straight there came diverse of the LEONTINES, and many of the PELOPONNESIAN souldiers unto Dion (mistrusting then that were some news in hand) to see the earnest and humble suite the Ambassadors of SYRACUSA made unto him. Wherefore Dion tooke them presently with him, and brought them himselfe into the Theater, where the common counsels and assemblies of the City were holden: thither ranne every man to hear what the matter was. Then Archeboides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, told openly before the whole assembly, the greatnesse of their misery, and requested the hired souldiers to come and aide the SYRACUSANS, forgetting the injury they had received: considering, that they had more dearly payed for their folly, then they themselves (whom they had so injured) would have made them to have suffered. near unto the City of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTINES, Dion did bring the Army of the SYRACUSANS into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him till another time. But through Heracles, and the sea mens crying out, that said, he would not try this war by battle, but would draw it out in length, because he would be still General, he was forced to give battle, and lost it. Howbeit, the overthrow was not great, and happened rather because his men were at a jar among themselves by reason of their faction and division, then otherwise. Dion therefore prepared to fight another battle, and gathered his men together again, encouraging them, when even at twilight word was brought him, that Heracles with all his Fleet was under saile, towards SYRACUSA, meaning to take the City, and to shut Dion and his Army out of it. Wherefore, he presently tooke with him the chiefe men of authority in the City, and the most willingest men, and rode all night with them in such haste, that they were at the gates of SYRACUSA the next morning by nine of the clocke, having ridden seven hundred furlongs. Heracles that had failed with all the possible speed he could, to prevent him with his ships, perceiving that he came short, he turned saile, and taking seas at all adventure, by chance he met with Gelytus LACEDÆMONIAN, who told him he was sent from LACEDÆMON, to be General to the SYRACUSANS in this war, as Gelytus was sent at other times before. He was glad he had met with him to have such a remedy and defence against Dion, and boasted of it unto the friends and confederates of SYRACUSA, and sent an Herald before unto the SYRACUSANS, summoning them to receive Gelytus LACEDÆMONIAN, who was sent to be their General. Dion made answer: That the SYRACUSANS had Goyngers enough; and though that their affairs did of necessity require a LACEDÆMONIAN Captain, yet that himself was he; for that he was made free in SPARTAN. Then Gelytus perceiving he could not obtain to be General, he went unto SYRACUSA, and came to Dion, and there made Heracles and him friends again by the great and solemne oaths he made, and because Gelytus also did swear, that he himself would be revenged of him for Dions sake, and punish Heracles if ever after he he did once more conspire against him. After that, the SYRACUSANS brake up their Army by sea, because it did them no service, and was beside chargeable keeping of it, and further did also breed sedition and trouble amongst their Governours: and so went to lay a straighter siege to the Castle then ever they did; and built up the wall again, which the enemies had overthrowen. Then Dionysius son seeing no aide to come to him from any part, and that victuals failed them; and further, that the souldiers began to mutine being unable to keepe them, he fell to a composition with Dion, and delivered up the Castle into his hands, with all the armor and munition in it, and so took his mother and his sisters of Dion, and put them aboard upon five Gallies, with the which he went unto his father, through the safe conduct of Dion. There was not a man at that time in all SYRACUSA, but was there to see this fight; or if by chance there were any absent, the other that were there called them thither as loud as they could cry, saying: That they did meet the goodliest day and Sunshyne, which the City of SYRACUSA might see then at her rising, the same being now restored again to her former liberty. If untill this present day they do reckon the flying of Dionysius son, one of the rarest examples of fortunes change, as one of the greatest and notablest things that ever was: what joy (think we) had they that drave him out, and what pleasure had they with themselves, that with the least mean that could be possible, did destroy the greatest tyranny in the world? So when Apollotrates (Dionysius son) was imbarcked, and that Dion was entred into the Castle, the women within the Castle would not tarry till he came into the house, but went to meet him at the gates, Aristomache leading Dions son in her hand, and Arete following her weeping, but very fearful how she should call and salute her husband, having lain with another man, Dion first spake to his sister, and afterwards to his son, and then Aristomache offering him Arete, said unto him: "Since thy banishment O Dion, we have led a miserable and captive life, but now that thou art returned home with victory, thou hast rid us out of care and thraldome, and hast also made us again bold to lift up our heads, saving her here, whom I (wretched creature) have by force (thy selfe alive) seen married unto another man. Now then, fith fortune hath made thee Lord of us all, what judgement givest thou of this compulsion? How wilt thou have her to salute thee? as her Uncle or husband? As Aristomache spake these words, the water stood in Dions eyes: so he gently and lovingly taking his wife Arete by the hand, he gave her his son, and willed her to go home to his house where he then remained, and so delivered the Castle unto the SYRACUSANS. He having this prosperous successe and victory, would not reap any present benefit or pleasure thereby, before he had shewed himselfe thankful to his friends, given great gifts also unto the confederates of SYRACUSA, and specially before he had given every one of his friends in the City, and his mercenary souldiers the strangers, some honorable reward according to their deserts, exceeding his ability with magnanimity of mind: when he himself lived soberly, and kept a moderate diet, contenting him with any thing that came first to hand. Every man that heard of it, wondered at him, considering that not onely all SICILE and CARTHAGE, but generally all GREECE looked upon his great prosperity and good fortune, thinking no man living greater then he, nor that any Captain ever attained unto such fame and wonderful fortune as he was come unto. This notwithstanding, Dion lived as temperately and modestly in his apparel, and also in his number of servants, and service at his board, as if he had lived with Plato in the Academy at ATHENS, and had not been convertant among souldiers and Captains, which have no other comfort nor pleasure for all the pains and danger they suffer continually, but to eat and drink their fill, and to take their pleasure all day long. Plato wrote unto him, that all the world had him in admiration. But Dion, in my opinion, had no respect but to one place, and to one City, to wit, the Academy, and would have no other Judges nor lookers into his doings, but the scholars of the same: who neither wondered at his great exploits, valiantnesse, nor victory, but onely considering if he did wisely and modestly use the fortune he had, and could so keepe himself within modest bounds, having done so great things. Furthermore, touching the gravity he had when he spake to any body, and his inflexible severity which he used towards the people, he determined never to alter or change it: notwithstanding that his affairs required him to shew courttesie and lenity, and that Plato also reproved him for it, and wrote, that severity and obstinacy (as we said before) was the companion of solitari-nesse. But it seemed to me that Dion did use it for two respects. The first, because nature had not framed him courteous and affable to winne men: secondly, he did what he could to draw the SYRACUSANS to the contrary: who were overlicentious, and spoiled with too much flattery. For Heracles began againe to be busy with him: First of all, Dion sending for him to come to counsell, he sent him word, he would not come: and that being a private Citizen, he would be at the common counsell amongst others when any was kept. Afterwards he accused him, for that he had not overthrowen and razed the Castle: and also because he would not suffer the people to break open the tombe of Dionysius the elder, to cast out his body: and also because he sent for counsellors to CORINTH, and disdained to make the Citizens his companions in the government of the Commonwealth. Indeed to confesse a troth, Dion had sent for certain CORINTHIANS, hoping the better to stablish the forme of a Commonwealth, which he had in his mind when they were come. For his mind was utterly to break the government of Democracy (to wit, the absolute government and authority of the people in a City, not being as it were a Commonwealth, but rather a Faire and Market where things are sold, as Plato saith) and to establish the LACONIAN or CRETAN Commonwealth, mingled with a Princely and popular Government: and that should be Aristocrasia, to wit, the number of a few noblemen that should governe, and direct the chiefeest and weightiest matters of state: And for that purpose, he thought the CORINTHIANS the meetest men to helpe him to frame this Commonwealth, considering that they governed their affairs more by chusing a few number of the nobility, then otherwise; and that they did not refer many things to the voice of the people. And because he was assured that Heracles would be against him in all that he could, and that otherwise he knew he was a seditious, a troublesome, and a light headed fellow: he then suffered them to kill him, who had long before done it, if he had not kept them from it; and so they went home to his house, and slew him there. The murder of Heracles was much misliked of the SYRACUSANS, howbeit Dion caused him to be honourably buried, and brought his body to the ground, followed with all his Army. Then he made an Oration himself to the people, and told them that it was impossible to avoid sedition and trouble in the City, so long as Dion and Heracles did both govern together. At that time there was one Callippus an ATHENIAN, a familiar of Dions, who (as Plato saith) came not acquainted with Dion through the occasion of his study in Philosophy, but because he had been his guide to bring him to see the secret mysteries and ceremonies of the sacrifices, and for such other like common talke and company. This notwithstanding, Callippus did accompany him in all this war, and was very much honored of him, and was one of the first of all his friends that entred into SYRACUSA with him, and did valiantly behave himself in all the battels and conflicts that were fought. This Callippus seeing that Dion best and chiefeest friends were slain in this war, and that Heracles also was dead, that the people of SYRACUSA had no more any head, and besides, that the souldiers which were with Dion did love him better then any other man: he became the unfaithfullest man, and the veriest villain of all other, hoping that for reward to kill his friend Dion, he should undoubtedly come to have the whole government of all SICILE; and as some do report, for that he had taken a bribe of his enemies, of twenty talents, for his labor to commit this murder. So he began to practise, to bribe and to suborn certain of the mercenary souldiers against Dion, and that by a marvellous crafty and subtil fetch. For, using commonly to report unto Dion certain seditious words spoken peradventure by the souldiers indeed, or else devised of his own head; he wan such a liberty and boldnesse by the trust Dion had in him, that he might safely say what he would to any of the souldiers; and boldly speak evil of Dion by his owne commandement: to the end he might thereby understand the better, whether any of his souldiers were angry with him, or wished his death. By this policy, Callippus straight found out those that bare Dion grudge; and that were already corrupted, whom he drew to his conspiracy. And if any man unwilling to give ear unto him, went and told Dion, that Callippus would have inticed him to conspire against him, Dion was not angry with him for it, thinking that he did but as he had commanded him to do. Now as this treason was practising against Dion, there appeared a great and monstrous Ghost or spirit unto him. By chance sitting late one evening all alone in a Gallery he had, and being in a deep thought with himself, suddenly he heard a noise: and therewith casting his eye to the end of his Gallery (being yet day light he saw a monstrous great woman, like one of the furies shewed in plays, and saw her sweeping of the house with a broome. This vision so amazed and affrighted him, that he sent for his friends, and told them what a sight he had seen: and prayed them to tarry with him all night, being at it were a man beside himself, fearing lest the spirit would come to him againe if they left him alone, of the which notwithstanding he never heard more afterwards. Howbeit shortly after, his son being grown to mans state, for a certain light anger he had taken when he was but a boy, he cast himself headlong down from the top of the house, and so was slain. Dion being in this state, Callippus went on fill with his treason, and spread a rumor abroad among the SYRACUSANS, that Dion seeing himself now destitute of children, was determined to send for Apollotrates, Dionysius son, to make him his heir and successor, being Cozen Germane to his wife, and his sisters daughters son. Then began Dion his wife, and sisters to mistrust Callippus practises, and they were told it by diverse diverse and manifest proofes. But Dion being sorry (as I suppose) for Heraclides death; and inwardly taking that murder in very ill part, as a foul blot to his life and doings, he said, he had rather die a thousand deaths, and to offer his throat to be cut to any that would, rather than he would live in that misery, to be compelled to take heed as well of his friends, as of his enemies. Callippus then seeing the woman so busie and inquisitive of his doings, and fearing lest he should be bewrayed, he came weeping unto them, and told them, it was nothing, and that he was ready to assure them of it by any manner of way they would devise: The women then willed him to swear by the great Oath, which was in this manner. He that must take this Oath, cometh into the temple of the goddesses Thestophores, which are, Ceres and Proserpina: and after certain sacrifices done, he putteth on the purple chaplet of the goddess Proserpina, holding a burning torch in his hand, and sweareth in this manner. Callippus having done all these ceremonies, and made the Oath in forme as I have told you, he made so light account of the goddesses, that he tarried no longer to do the murder he had determined, but till the very feast day of the goddess Proserpina should come, by whom he had sworn: and slew him on the day of the feast of Proserpina. Now, I do not think that he chose that day of set purpose, knowing right well that he did alwayes sin against her, what time soever he had killed his brother, being by his means specially admitted to the society and brotherhood with him, of the fraternity and mysteries of Ceres and Proserpina. Of this conspiracy there were divers For, as Dion was set in his chamber talking with his friends, where there were many beds to sit on, some compassed the house round about, others came to the doors and windowes of his Chamber; and they that should do the deed to dispatch him, which were the ZACYNTHIAN souldiers came into his chamber in their coates without any sword. But when they were come in, they that were without did shut the doors after them, and locked them in, lest any man should come out, and they that were within, fell upon Dion, and thought to have strangled him. But when they saw they could not, they called for a sword. Never a man that was within, durst open the doors, though there were many with Dion. For they thought every man to save their own lives, by suffering him to be killed, and therefore durst not come to helpe him. So the murderers tarried a long time within, and did nothing. At length there was one Lycon a SYRACUSAN, that gave one of the ZACYNTHIAN souldiers a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throat, as a weather they had holden a long time in their hands, even dead for fear. The murder being executed, they cast his sister, and wife great with child, into prison, and there the poor lady was pitifully brought to bed of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to bring up, then otherwise to do any thing with the child. Their keepers that had the charge of them, were contented to let them do it, because Callippus began then a little to grow to some trouble: for at the first, after he had slain Dion, he bare all the whole sway for a time, and kept the City of SYRACUSA in his hands: and wrote unto ATHENS, the which next unto the immortal gods he was most afraid of, having defiled his hands in so damnable a treason. And therefore (in my opinion) it was not evil spoken, that ATHENS is a City, of all other, that bringeth forth the best, when they give themselves to goodness; and the wickedest people also, when they dispose themselves to evil: as their Country also bringeth forth the best Hony that is, and Hemlocke in like manner that quickly dispatcheth a man of his life. Howbeit, the gods and fortune did not suffer this treason and wicked man to reigne long, having come to the government of a Realme by so damnable a murder: but shortly after they gave him his payment he had deserved. For Callippus going to take a little Town called * CATANA, he lost the City of SYRACUSA: whereupon he said, That he had lost a City and got a Cheefe-knife. Afterwards he went to assaile the MESSINIANS, and there he lost a great number of his men and amongst them were slain those that killed Dion. Now Callippus finding no City in all SICILE that would receive him, but that they all did hate and abhorre him, he went to take the City of RHEGIO in ITALIE. There being in great distresse and need of all things, and not able to maintain his souldiers; he was slaine by Lepides and Polysperchon, with the self same dagger wherewith Dion before was slain: the which was known by the fashion, being short like the LAECONIAN daggers; and also by the workmanship upon it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was the end and death of Callippus. Now for Aristomache and Arete, they were taken out of prison: and Ietes SYRACUSAN, that sometimes had been one of Dions friends, took them home to his own house, and used them very well and faithfully for a certain time, but afterwards was won and corrupted by Dions enemies. So he caused a ship to be provided for them, and bare them in hand that he would fend them into PELOPONNESUS: but he gave them charge that carried them away, to kill them as they went, and to throw them over board into the sea. Some say that the two women, and the little young boy, were cast alive into the sea. But this reward of the sinful act that he committed, returned againe upon himself, as it had done before unto others. For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death: and besides, the SYRACUSANS did also kill two of his daughters in revenge of the unfaithfulness he had shewed unto Dion.

THE LIFE OF MARCUS BRUTUS.

Ann. Mund.
3901.

Ant. Christ.

*M*arcus Brutus came of that Julius Brutus, for whom the ancient ROMANS made his statue of Brass to be set up in the Capitol, with the images of the Kings, holding a naked sword in his hand: because he had valiantly put down the TARQUINES from the Kingdome of ROME. But that Julius Brutus being of a fowre sterpe nature, not softened by reason, being like unto sword blades of too hard a temper, was so subject to his choller and malice he bare unto the Tyrants, that for their sakes he caused his owne sonnes to be executed. But this Marcus Brutus in contrary manner, whose life we presently write, having framed his manners of life by the rules of vertue, and study of Philosophy, and having employed his wit, which was gentle and constant, in attempting of great things; methinks he was rightly made and framed unto vertue. So that his very enemies which with him most hurt; because of his conspiracy against Julius Caesar, if there were any noble attempt done in all this conspiracy, they referred wholly unto Brutus; and all the cruell and violent acts unto Cassius, who was Brutus familiar friend, but not so well given, and conditioned as he. His mother Servilia, it is thought, came of the blood of Servilius Hala, who, when Spurius Melius went about to make himself King, and to bring it to passe had enticed the common people to rebell, took a dagger, and hid it close under his arme, and went into the Market place. When he was come thither, he made as though he had somewhat to say unto him; and pressed as near him as he could: wherefore Melius stooping downe with his head, to hear what he would say, Servilius stabbed him in with his dagger and slew him. Thus much all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father some for the evil will and malice they bare unto Brutus, because of the death of Julius Caesar, do maintaine, that he came not of Julius Brutus that drove out the TARQUINES: for there were none left of his race, considering that his two sonnes were executed for conspiracy with the TARQUINES, and that Marcus Brutus came of a meane house, the which was raised to honour and office in the Common-wealth but of late time. Possidonius the Philosopher writeth the contrary; that Julius Brutus indeed slew two of his sonnes which were men growne; as the histories do declare; howbeit that there was a third sonne, being but a little childe at that time, from whom the house and family afterwards was derived: and furthermore, that there were in his time certaine famous men of that family, whose stature and countenance resembled much the intage of Julius Brutus. And thus much for this matter. Marcus Caro the Philosopher was brother unto Servilia, Marcus Brutus mother: whom Brutus studied most to follow of all the other ROMANS, because he was his Uncle; and afterwards he married married his daughter. Now touching the Grecian Philosophers, there was no sect nor Philosopher of them, but he heard and liked it: but above all the rest, he loved Platoes sect best, and did not much give himself to the new or mean Academy (as they call it) but altogether to the old Academy. Therefore he did ever greatly esteeme the Philosopher Antiochus, of the City of Ascalon: but he was more familiar with his brother Ariston, who for learning and knowledge was inferior to many other Philosophers, but for wisdom and courtesie, equal with the best and chiefest. Touching Emilius, whom M. Brutus himself doth mention in his Epistles, and his friends also in many places, he was an Orator, and left an excellent booke he wrote of the death of Julius Cæsar, and intituled it, Brutus. He was properly learned in the Latine tongue, and was able to make long discourse in it: beside that he could also plead very well in Latine. But for the Greek tongue, they do note in some of his Epistles, that he counterfeited that brief compendious manner of speech of the Lacedæmonians. As when the war was begun, he wrote unto the Pergamenians in this sort: I understand you have given Dolabella money: if you have done it willingly, you confesse you have offended me; if against your wills, shew it then by giving me willingly. Another time againe unto the Samians: Your counsels be long, your doings be slow, consider the end. And in another Epistle he wrote unto the Patareians: The Xanthians despising my good will, have made their Country a grave of despair, and the Patareians that put themselves into my protection, have lost no jot of their liberty: and therefore whilest you have liberty, either chuse the judgement of the Patareians, or the fortune of the Xanthians. These were Brutus manner of letters, which were honoured for their briefnesse. So Brutus being but a young stripling, went into Cyprus with his Uncle Cato, who was sent against Ptolomy King of Egypt; who having slain himselfe, Cato staying for certain necessary business he had in the Isle of Rhodes, had already sent Caninius, one of his friends before to keep his treasure and goods. But Cato fearing he would be light-fingered, wrote unto Brutus forthwith to come out Pamphilia (where he was but newly recoverd of a sickness) into Cyprus; the which he did. The which journey he was fory to take upon him, both for respect of Caninius shame, whom Cato (as he thought) wrongfully slandered: as also because he thought this office too meane and unmeet for him, being a young man, and given to his book. This notwithstanding, he behaved himselfe so honestly and carefully, that Cato did greatly commend him: and after all the goods were sold and converted into ready money, he tooke the most part of it, and returned withall to Rome. Afterwards, when the Empire of Rome was divided into factions, and that Cæsar and Pompey both were in Armes one against the other, and that all the Empire of Rome was in garboile and uproare: it was thought then that Brutus would take part with Cæsar, because Pompey not long before had put his father to death. But Brutus preferring the respect of his Country and Commonwealth before private affection, and perswading himselfe that Pompey had juster cause to enter into Armes, then Cæsar, he then tooke part with Pompey; though oftentimes meeting him before, he thought scorne to speake to him, thinking it a great sinne and offence in him, to speake to the murderer of his father. But then submitting himselfe unto Pompey, as unto the head of Commonwealth, he sailed into Sicily: Lieutenant under Sestius that was Governor of that Province. But when he saw that there was no way to rise, nor to do any noble exploits, and that Cæsar and Pompey were both camped together, and fought for victory: he went of himselfe unsent for, into Macedon: to be partaker of the danger. It is reported, that Pompey being glad, and wondering at his coming, when he saw him come to him, he rose out of his chaire, and went and embraced him before them all, and used him as honorably, as he could have done the noblest man that tooke his part. Brutus being in Pompeys Campe, did nothing but study all day long, except he were with Pompey; and not onely the dayes before but the selfe same day also before the great battell was fought in the fields of Pharsalaa, where Pompey was overcome. It was in the middelt of Summer, and the Sunne was very hote, besides that the Campe was lodged neare unto Marishes, and they that carried his tent, tarried long before they came: whereupon being very weary with travell, scant any meat came into his mouth at dinner time. Furthermore, when others slept, or thought what would happen the morrow after, he fell to his booke, and wrote all day long till night, writing a brevity of Polybius. It is reported that Cæsar did not forget him, and that he gave his Captaines charge before the battell, that they should beware they killed not Brutus in fight; and if he yeelded willingly unto them, that then they should bring him unto him: but if he resisted, and would not be taken, then that they should let him go, and do him no hurt. Some say he did this for Servilia sake, Brutus mother. For when was a young man, he had been acquainted with Servilia, who was extremely in love with him. And because Brutus was borne in that time when their love was hottest, he perswaded himselfe that he begat him. For proofe hereof the report goeth, that when the weightiest matters were in hand in the Senate, about the conspiracy of Calpurnius, which was likely to have undone the City of Rome, Cæsar and Cato sate neare together, and were both of contrary minds to each other: and then, that in the meane time one delivered Cæsar a letter. Cæsar tooke it, and read it softly to himselfe: but Cato cried out upon Cæsar, and said he did not well to receive advertisements from enemies: whereupon the whole Senate beganne to murmur at it. Then Cæsar gave Cato the letter as it was sent him, who read it, and found that it was a love letter sent from his sister Servilia: thereupon he cast it againe to Cæsar, and said unto him; Hold, drunken soppe. When he had done so, he went on with his tale, and maintained his opinion as he did before: so commonly was the love of Servilia knowne, which she bare unto Cæsar. So, after Pompeys overthrow at the battell of Pharsalia, and that he fled to the sea, when when Cæsar came to besiege his Campe, Brutus went out of the Campe. Gates unseene of any man and leapt into a Marsh full of water and Reeds. Then when night was come, he crept out, and went unto the City of Larissa: from whence he wrote unto Cæsar, who was very glad that he had escaped, and sent for him to come unto him. When Brutus was come, he did not onely pardon him, but also kept him alwayes about him, and did as much honour and esteeme him, as any man he had in his company. Now, no man could tell whether Pompey was fled, and all were insatiable desirous to know it: Wherefore Cæsar walking a good way alone with Brutus, he did aske him which way he thought Pompey tooke. Cæsar perceiving by his talke that Brutus guessed certainly whether Pompey should be fled, he left all other wayes, and tooke his journey directly towards Egypt. Pompey (as Brutus had conjectured) was indeed fled into Egypt; but there he was villanously slaine. Furthermore, Brutus obtained pardon of Cæsar for Cassius and defending also the King* of Lybians cause, he was overlaid with a world of accusations against him; howbeit, intreating for him, he saved him the best part of his Realme and Kingdom. They say also, that Cæsar said, when he heard Brutus plead: I know not (said he) what this young man would; but what he would, he willeth it vehemently. For as Brutus gravity and constant minde would not grant all men their requests that sued unto him, but being moved with reason and discretion, did always encline to that which was good and honest: even so when it was moved to follow any matter, he used a kind of forcible and vehement perswasion, that calmed not till he had obtained his desire. For by flattering of him, a man could never obtaine any thing at his hands, nor make him to do that which was unjust. Further, he thought it not meet for a man of calling and estimation, to yeeld unto the requests and intreaties of a shamelesse and importunate suter, requesting things unmeet: the which notwithstanding some men do for shame, because they dare deny nothing, and therefore he was wont to say, That he thought them evill brought up in their youth Scipio, he left Brutus Governour of Gaul in Italy on this side of the Alpes, which was a great good happe for that Province. For where others were spoiled and polled by the insolency and covetousnesse of the Governours, as if it had been a Country conquered, Brutus was a comfort and rest unto their former troubles and miseries they sustained. But he referred it wholly unto Cæsars grace and goodnesse. For when Cæsar returned out of Africa, and progressed charge and Government, and Brutus himselfe, who honoured Cæsar in person, and whose company also Cæsar greatly esteemed. Now there were divers sorts of Prætorships in Rome, and it was looked for, that Brutus or Cassius would make suite for the chiefest Prætorship, which they called, The Prætorship of the City: because he that had that office, was as a Judge to minister Justice, unto the Citizens. Therefore they strove one against another, though some say, that there was some little grudge betwixt them for other matters before, and that this contention did set them further out, though they were allied together: for Cassius had married Junia, Brutus Sister. Others say, that this contention betwixt them came by Cæsar himselfe, who secretly gave either of them both hope of his favour. So their suite for the Prætorship was so followed and laboured of either party, that one of them put another into suite of Law. Brutus with his vertue and good name contended against many noble exploits in Armes, which Cassius had done against the Parthians. So Cæsar after he had heard both their objections, told his friends, with whom he consulted about this matter: Cassius cause is the juster (said he) but Brutus must be first preferred. Thus Brutus had the first Prætorship, and Cassius the second: who thanked not Cæsar so much for the Prætorship he had, as he was angry with him for that he had lost. But Brutus in many other things tasted of the benefit of Cæsars favour in any thing he requested. For if he had lifted, he might have been one of Cæsars chiefest friends, and of greatest authority and credite about him. Howbeit, Cassius friends did dissuade him from it (for Cassius and he were not yet reconciled together since their first contention and strife for the Prætorship) and prayed him to beware of Cæsars sweet enticements, and to flie his tyrannicall favours: the which they said Cæsar gave him, not to honour his vertue, but to weaken his constant minde, framing it to the bent of his bow. Now Cæsar on the other side did not trust him overmuch, nor was without tales brought unto him against him: howbeit he feared his great minde, authority and friends. Yet on the other side also, he trusted his good nature, and faire conditions. For, intelligence being brought him one day, that Antonius and Dolabella did conspire against him: he answered, That these far long haired men made him not afraide, but the leane and whitely faced fellows, meaning that by Brutus and Cassius. At another time also when one accused Brutus unto him, and bad him beware of him: What (said he againe, clapping his hands on his breast) thinke ye that Brutus will not tarry till this body die? meaning that none but Brutus after him was meete to have such power as he had. And surely (in my opinion) I am perswaded that Brutus, might indeed have come to have been the chiefest man of Rome, if he could have contented himselfe for a time to have been next unto Cæsar, and to have suffered his glory and authority, which he had gotten by his great victories, to consume with time. But Cassius being a cholericke man, and hating Cæsar privately, more Brutus could evill away with the tyranny, and that Cassius hated the tyrant: making many complaints for the injuries he had done him; and amongst others, for that he had taken away his Lions from him. Cassius had provided them for his sports, when he should be Edilis, and they were found found in the City of MEGARA, when it was wonne by Calpurnius; and Cæsar kept them. The rumor went, that these Lions did marvellous great hurt to the MEGARANS: for when the City was taken, they brake their cages where they were tied up, and turned them loose, thinking they would have done great mischief to the enemies; and have kept them from setting upon them: but the Lions (contrary to expectation) turned upon themselves that fled unarmed, and did so cruelly tear some in peeces, that it pitied their enemies to see them. And this was the cause (as some do report) that made Cassius conspire against Cæsar. But this holdeth no water: For Cassius even from his cradle could not abide any manner of tyrants, as it appeared when he was but a boy, and went unto the same schoole that Faustulus the son of Sylla did. And Faustulus bragging among other boyes, highly boasted of his fathers Kingdom: Cassius rose up on his feet, and gave him two good wirts on the ear. Faustulus Governors would have put this matter in suite against Cassius: but Pompey would not suffer them, but caused the two boyes to be brought before him, and asked them, how the matter came to passe. Then Cassius (as it is written of him) said unto the other: Go too Faustulus, speake againe and thou darrest, before this Nobleman here, the same words that made me angry with thee, that my fits may walke once againe about thine eares. Such was Cassius hot stirring nature. But for Brutus, his friends and Countriemen, both by divers procurements, and sundry rumors of the City, and by many bils also, did openly call and procure him to do that he did. For under the image of his Ancestor Junius Brutus (that drave the Kings out of ROME) they wrote: O, that it pleased the gods thou wert now alive, Brutus! and againe, That thou wert here among us now! His tribunal or chaire, where he gave audience during the time he was Prætor, was full of such bills: Brutus thou art asleepe, and art not Brutus indeed. And of all this, Cæsar flatterers were the cause: who besides many other exceeding and unspeakable honours they daily devised for him, in the night time they put Diademes upon the heads of his images, supposing thereby to allure the common people to call him King, in stead of Dictator. Howbeit it turned to the contrary (as we have written more at large in Julius Cæsar life.) Now when Cassius felt his friends, and did stirre them up against Cæsar; they all agreed, and promised to take part with him, so Brutus were the chiefe of their conspiracy. For they told him, that so high an enterprise and attempt as that, did not so much require men of manhood and courage to draw their swords, as it flood them upon to have a man of such estimation as Brutus, to make every man boldly thinke, that by his onely presence the fact were holy and iust. If he tooke not this course, then that they should go to it with faint hearts; and when they had done it, they should be more fearfull because every man would thinke that Brutus would not have refused to have made one with them, if the cause had been good and honest. Therefore Cassius considering this matter with himselfe, did first of all speake to Brutus, since they grew strange together for the suite they had for the Prætorship. So when he was reconciled to him againe, and that they had embraced one another, Cassius asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate house the first day of the moneth of March, because he heard say that *Cæsar*es friends should move the councill that day, that Cæsar should be called King by the Senate. Brutus answered him, he would not be there. But if we be sent for (said Cassius) how then? For my selfe then (said Brutus) I meane not to hold my peace, but to withstand it, and rather die then lose my liberty. Cassius being bold, and taking hold of this word: Why (quoth he) what ROMANE is he alive that will suffer thee to die for thy liberty? What? knowest thou not that thou art Brutus? Thinkest thou that they be Coblers, Tapsters, or such like base mechanickall people, that write these billes and seroles which are found daily in thy Prætors Chaire, and not the noblest men and best Citizens that do it? No be thou well assured, that of other Prætors they looke for gifts, common distributions among the people, and for common Playes, and to see the Fencers fight at the sharpe, to shew the people pastime: but at thy hands, they specially require (as a due debt unto them) the taking away of the tyranny, being fully bent to suffer any extremity for thy sake, so that thou wilt shew thy selfe to be the man thou art taken for, and that they hope thou art. Thereupon he kissed Brutus, and embraced him: and so each taking leave of other, they went both to speake with their friends about it. Now amongst Pompeys friends, there was one called * Caius Ligarius, who had been accused unto Cæsar for taking part with Pompey, and Cæsar discharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Cæsar so much for his discharge, as he was offended with him, for that he was brought in danger by his tyrannickall power. And therefore in his heart he was always his mortall enemy, and was besides very familiar with Brutus, who went to see him being sicke in his bed, and said unto him: Ligarius in what a time art thou? Ligarius rising up in his bed? and taking him by the right hand, said unto him: Brutus (said he) if thou hast any great enterprise in hand worthy of thy selfe, I am whole. After that time they began to feel all their acquaintance whom they trusted, and laid their heads together consulting upon it, and did not onely picke out their friends, but all those also whom they thought stout enough to attempt any desperate matter, and that were not afraid to lose their lives. For this cause they durst not acquaint Cicero with their conspiracy, although he was a man whom they loved dearly, and trusted best: for they were afraid that he being a coward by nature, and age also having increased his feare, he would quite turne and alter all their purpose, and quench the heate of their enterprise, the which specially required hote and earnest execution; seeking by perswasion to bring all things to such safety, as there should be no perill. Brutus also did let other of his friends alone, as Statilius Epicurius, and Faonius, that made profession to follow Marcus Cato: because that having cast out words a farre off, disputing together in Philosophy to feeble their mindes, Faonius answered, That

That civill Warre was worse then tyrannickall Government usurped against the Law. And Statilius told him also. That it were an unwise part for him to put his life in danger, for a sort of ignorant fooles and asses. Labo was present at this talke, and maintained the contrary against them both. But Brutus held his peace, as though it had been a doubtfull matter, and a hard thing to have been decided. But afterwards, being out of their company, he made Labo privy to his intent; who very readily offered himselfe to make one. And they thought good also to bring in another Brutus to joyne with him, surnamed Albinus: who was no man of his hands himselfe, but because he was able to bring good force of a great number of slaves, and Fencers at the Sharpe, whom he kept to shew the People pastime with their fighting, besides also that Cæsar had some trust in him. Cassius and Labo, told Brutus Albinus of it at the first, but he made them no answer. But when he had spoken with Brutus himselfe alone, and that Brutus had told him he was the chiefe Ring-leader of all this conspiracy, then he willingly promised him the best aide he could. Furthermore, the onely Name and great Calling of Brutus, did bring on the most of them to give consent to this conspiracy: who having nevver taken Oathes together, nor taken nor given any caution or assurance, nor binding themselves one to another by any religious Oathes, they all kept the matter so secret to themselves, and could so cunningly handle it, that notwithstanding, the gods did reveale it by manifest signes and tokens from above, and by Predictions of Sacrifices, yet all this would not be beleevied. Now Brutus, who knew very well, that for his sake all the noblest, valiantest, and most courageous men of ROME did venture their lives, weighing with himselfe the greatnesse of the danger: when he was out of his house, he did so frame and fashion his countenance and looks that no man could discern he had any thing to trouble his minde. But when night came that he was in his owne house, then he was cleane changed: for, either care did wake him against his will when he would have slept, or else oftentimes of himselfe he fell into such deepe thoughts of this enterprise, casting in his minde all the dangers that might happen: that his Wife lying by him, found that there was some marvellous great matter that troubled his minde, not being wont to be in that taking, and that he could not well determine with himselfe. His Wife Porcia (as we have told you before) was the Daughter of Cato, whom Brutus married being his cousin, not a Maiden, but a young Widow after the death of her first Husband Bibulus, by whom she had also a young Sonne called Bibulus, who afterwards wrote a Booke of the acts and gestes of Brutus, extant at this present day. This young Lady being excellently well seene in Philology, loving her Husband well, and being of a noble courage, as she was also wife: because she would not aske her Husband what he ayled before she had made some proofe by her selfe: she tooke a little Razor, such as Barbers occupy to pare mens nailes, and causing her Maides and Women to go out of her Chamber gave her selfe a great gash withall in her thigh, that she was straight all of a gore blood: and incontinently after, a vehement Feaver tooke her, by reason of the paine of her wound. Then perceiving her Husband was marvellously out of quiet, and that he could take no rest, even in her greatest paine of all, she spake in this sort unto him: "I being, O Brutus, (said she) the Daughter of Cato, was married unto thee; not to be thy bed-fellow and Companion in bed and at board onely, like a Harlot, but to be partaker also with thee of thy good and "evil Fortune. Now for thy selfe, I can finde no cause of fault in thee touching our match: but "for my part, how may I shew my duty towards thee, and how much I would do for thy sake, if I "cannot constantly beare a secret mischance or griefe with thee, which requireth secrecy and fidelity? I confesse, that a Womans wit commonly is too weake to keepe a secret safely: but yee " (Brutus) good education, and the company of vertuous men, have some power to reforme " the defect of nature. And for my selfe, I have this benefit moreover, that I am the Daughter of " Cato, and Wife of Brutus. This notwithstanding, I did not trust to any of these things before, " untill that now I have found by experience, that no paine or griefe whatsoever can overcome me. With those words she shewed him her wound on her thigh, and told him what she had done to prove her selfe. Brutus was amazed to heare what she said unto him, and lifting up his hands to Heaven, he besought the goddesses to give him the grace he might bring his enterprise to so good passe, that he might be found a Husband, worthy of so noble a Wife as Porcia: so he then did comfort her the best he could. Now, a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Cæsar would not faile to come, the Conspiratours determined then to put their enterprise in execution, because they might meet safely at that time without suspicion and the rather, for that all the noblest and chiefeest men of the City would be there: who when they should see such a great matter executed, would every man set to their hands, for the defence of their liberty. Furthermore, they thought also that the appointment of the place where the Councill should be kept, was chosen of purpose by divine Providence, and made all for them. For it was one of the Porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certaine place full of Seates for men to sit in; where also was set up the Image of Pompey, which the City had made and consecrated in honour of him, when he did beautifie that part of the City with the Theater he built, with divers Porches about it. In this place was the assembly of the Senate appointed to be, just on the fifteenth day of the Moneth March, which the ROMANS call, Idus Martias: so that it seemed some god of purpose had brought Cæsar thither to be slaine, for revenge of Pompeys death. So when the day was come, Brutus went out of his house with a Dagger by his side under his long Gowne, that no body saw nor knew, but his Wife onely. The other Conspiratours were all assembled at Cassius house, to bring his Son into the Market-place, who on that day did put on the mans Gown, called Toga Virilis; and from thence they came all in a Troope together unto Pompeys Porch, looking that Caesar would straight come thither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull assured constancy of these Conspirators, in so dangerous and weighty an enterprise as they had undertaken. For many of them being Prætors, by reason of their Office, whose duty is to minister justice to every body; did not onely with great quietnesse and courtesie heare them that spake unto them, or that pleaded matters before them, and gave them attentive care, as if they had no other matter in their heads: but moreover, they gave just sentence, and carefully dispatched the Causes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certaine summe of Money, refused to pay it, and cried out, that he did appeale unto Caesar. Then Brutus calling his eyes upon the Conspirators, said: Caesar shall not let me to see the Law executed. Notwithstanding this, by chance there fell out many misfortunes unto them, which was enough to have marred the enterprise. The first and chiefeft, was Caesars long tarrying, who came very late to the Senate: for, because the signes of the Sacrifices appeared unluckily, his Wife Calpurnia kept him at home, and the Sooth-sayers bade him beware he went not abroad. The second cause was, when one came unto Caesar being a Conspirator, and taking him by the hand, said unto him: O Caesar, thou keepst it close from me, but Brutus hath told me all. Caesar being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, and said: Why, how now, how comest it to passe thou art thus rich, that thou dost sue to be Ædilis? Thus Caesar being deceived by the others doubtfull words, he told them it was a thousand to one, he blabbed not out all the conspiracy. Another Senatour called Popilius Lena, after he had saluted Brutus and Cassius more friendly then he was wont to doe, he rounded softly in their eares, and told them: I pray the goddesse you may go through with that you have taken in hand; but withall, dispatch I reade you, for your enterprise is bewrayed. When he had said, he presently departed from them, and left them both afraid that their conspiracy would out. Now in the meane time, there came one of Brutus men post haste unto him, and told him his Wife was a dying. For Porcia being very carefull and pensive for that which was to come, and being too weake to away with so great and inward griefe of minde she could hardly keepe within, but was frighted with every little noise and cry she heard, as those that are taken and posselt with the fury of the BACCHANTES; asking every man that came from the Market-place, what Brutus did, and still sent Messenger after Messenger, to know what newes. At length Caesars coming being prolonged (as you have heard,) Porcias weaknesse was not able to hold out any longer, and thereupon she suddainly swounded, that she had no leasure to go to her Chamber, but was taken in the midst of her house, where her speech and senses failed her. Howbeit the soone came to her selfe againe, and so was laid in her bed, and attended by her Women. When Brutus heard these newes, it grieved him, as it is to be presupposed: yet he left not off the care of his Countrey and Common wealth, neither went home to his house for any newes he heard. Now, it was reported that Caesar was coming in his Litter: for he determined not to stay in the Senate all that day (because he was afraid of the unlucky signes of the sacrifices) but to adjourne matters of importance unto the next Session and Councell holden, sayning himselfe not to be well at ease. When Caesar came out of his Litter, Popilius Lena (that had talked before with Brutus and Cassius, and had prayed the goddesse they might bring this enterprise to passe) went unto Caesar, and kept him a long time with a talke. Caesar gave good eare unto him, wherefore the Conspirators (if so they should be called) not hearing what he said to Caesar, but conjecturing by that he had told them a little before, that his talke was none other but the very discovery of their conspiracy, they were afraid every man of them; and one looking in anothers face, it was easie to see that they all were of a minde, that it was no tarrying for them till they were apprehended, but rather that they should kill themselves with their own hands. And when Cassius and certaine other clapped their hands on their Swords under their Gownes to draw them; Brutus marking the countenance and gesture of Lena, and considering that he did use himselfe rather like an humble and earnest suiter, then like an accuser: he said nothing to his Companion (because there were many amongst them that were not of the conspiracy,) but with a pleasant countenance encouraged Cassius. And immediately after, Lena went from Caesar, and kissed his hand: which shewed plainly that it was for some matter concerning himselfe, that he had held him so long in talke. Now all the Senatours being entred first into this place or Chapter-house where the Councell should be kept, all the other Conspirators straight stood about Caesars Chaire, as if they had had something to say unto him. And some say, that Cassius calling his eyes upon Pompeys Image, made his prayer unto it, as if it had been alive. * Trebonius on the other side, drew Antonius aside, as he came into the house where the Senate sate, and held him with a long talke without. When Caesar was come into the house, all the Senate rose to honour him at his coming in. So when he was set, the Conspirators flocked about him, and amongst them they presented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble suite for the calling home againe of his Brother that was banished. They all made as though they were intercessours for him, and tooke Caesar by the hands, and kissed his head and brest. Caesar at the first, simply refused their kindnesse and intreaties: but afterwards, perceiving they still pressed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Caesars Gowne over his shoulders, and Caesar that stood behinde him, drew his Dagger first and strake Caesar upon the shoulder, but gave him no great wound. Caesar feeling himselfe hurt, tooke him straight straight by the hand he held his Dagger in, and cried out in Latine: O Traytor Caesar, what dost thou? Caesar on the other side cried in Greeke, and called his Brother to helpe him. So divers running on a heape together to flie upon Caesar, he looking about him to have fled, saw Brutus with a Sword drawne in his hand ready to strike at him: then he let Caesars hand goe, and calling his Gown over his face, suffered every man to strike at him that would. Then the Conspirators thronging one upon another, because every man was desirous to have a cut at him, so many Swords and Daggers lighting upon one body, one of them hurt another, and amongst them Brutus caught a blow on his hand, because he would make one in murdering of him, and all the rest also were every man of them bloudied. Caesar being slaine in this manner, Brutus standing in the midst of the house, would have spoken, and staied the other Senatours that were not of the conspiracy, to have told them the reason why they had done this fact. But they as men both afraid and amazed, fled one upon anothers necke in haste to get out at the door, and no man followed them. For it was set down, and agreed between them, that they should kill no man but Caesar onely, and should intreat all the rest to looke to defend their liberty. All the Conspirators; but Brutus, determining upon this matter, thought it good also to kill Antonius, because he was a wicked man, and that in nature favoured tyranny: besides also, for that he was in great estimation with Souldiers, having been conversant of long time amongst them: and especially having a minde bent to great enterprises, he was also of great authority at that time, being Confull with Caesar. But Brutus would not agree to it. First, for that he said it was not honest: secondly, because he told them there was hope of change in him. For he did not mistrust, but that Antonius being a noble-minded and courageous man (when he should know that Caesar was dead) would willingly helpe his Countrey to recover her liberty, having them an example unto him, to follow their courage and Vertue. So Brutus by this meanes saved Antonius life, who at that present time disguised himselfe, and stole away: but Brutus and his Conforts, having their Swords bloudy in their hands, went straight to the Capitoll, perswading the ROMANES as they went, to take their liberty againe. Now, at the first time when the murder was newly done there were suddain out-cries of People that ranne up and down the City, the which indeed did the more increafe the feare and tumult. But when they saw they flew no man, neither did spoile nor make havock of any thing, then certaine of the Senatours, and many of the People emboldening themselves, went to the Capitoll unto them. There a great number of men being assebled together one after another, Brutus made an Oration unto them to win the favour of the People, and to justifie that they had done. All those that were by, said they had done well, and cried unto them, that they should boldly come down from the Capitoll: whereupon Brutus and his Companions came boldly down into the Market-place. The rest followed in Troope, but Brutus went foremost, very honourably compassed in round about with the noblest men of the City, which brought him from the Capitoll, through the Market-place, to the Pulpit for Orations. When the People saw him in the Pulpit, although they were a multitude of rake-hels of all sorts, and had a good will to make some stirre: yet being ashamed to do it, for the reverence they bare unto Brutus, they kept silence to heare what he would say: when Brutus began to speake, they gave him quiet audience: howbeit immediately after, they shew that they were not all contented with the murder. For when another called Cinna would have spoken, and began to accuse Caesar, they fell into a great uproare among them, and marvellously reviled him. Insomuch that the Conspirators returned againe into the Capitoll. There Brutus being afraid to be besieged, sent backe againe the Noblemen that came thither with him, thinking it no reason, that they which were no partakers of the murder, should be partakers of the danger. Then the next morning the Senate being assembled, and holden within the Temple of the goddesse Tellus, to wit, the Earth: and Antonius, Plancius, and Cicero, having made a motion to the Senate in that Assembly, that they should take an order to pardon and forget all that was past, and to establish friendship and peace againe: it was decreed, that they should not onely be pardoned, but also that the Consuls should referre it to the Senate what honours should be appointed unto them. This being agreed upon, the Senate brake up, and Antonius the Confull, to put them in heart that were in the Capitoll, sent them his Sonne for a pledge. Upon this assurance, Brutus and his Companions came down from the Capitoll, where every man saluted and embraced each other, among the which, Antonius himselfe did bid Cassius to supper to him: and Lepidus also bade Brutus, and so one bade another, as they had friendship and acquaintance together. The next day following, the Senate being called againe to counsell, did first of all commend Antonius, for that he had wisely stayed and quenched the beginning of a civil Warre: then they also gave Brutus and his Conforts great praises; and lastly they appointed them severall governments of Provinces. For unto Brutus they appointed GRECIA; AFRICA unto Cassius; ASIA unto Trebonius; BITHYNIA unto Cimber; and unto the other Decius Brutus Albinus, Cassars Will and Testament and of his Funerals and Tombe. Then Antonius, thinking good his Testament should be read openly, and also that his body should be honourably buried, and not in haggard manner, left the People might thereby take occasion to be worse offended if they did otherwise: Cassius stoutly spake against it. But Brutus went with the motion, and agreed unto it: wherein it seemeth he committed a second fault. For the first fault he did, was when he would not confesse to his fellow Conspirators, that Antonius should be slaine: and therefore he was justly accused, that thereby he had saved and strengthened a strong and grievous Enemy of their conspiracy. The second fault was, when he agreed that Caesars Funerals should be as Antonius would have them, the which indeed marred all. For first of all, when Caesars Testament was openly read among them, whereby it appeared that he bequeathed unto every Citizen of ROME, seventy five Drachmaes a man; and that he left his Gardens and Arbors unto the People, which he had on this side of the River Tyber, in the place where now the Temple of Fortune is built: the People then loved him, and were marvellous sorry for him. Afterwards, when Caesars body was brought into the Market-place, Antonius making his Funerall Oration in praise of the dead, according to the ancient Custome of ROME, and perceiving that his words moved the common People to compassion, he framed his Eloquence to make their hearts yearne the more; and taking Caesars Gown all bloody in his hand, he layed it open to the sight of them all, shewing what a number of cuts and holes it had upon it. Therewithall the People fell presently into such a rage and mutiny, that there was no more order kept amongst the common People. For some of them cried out, Kill the Murderers: others plucked up Formes, Tables, and Stalles about the Market-place, as they had done before at the Funerals of Clodius, and having laid them all on a heape together, they set them on fire, and thereupon did put the Body of Caesar, and burnt it in the middell of the most holy places. And Furthermore, when the fire was thoroughly kindled, some there, tooke burning Fire-brands, and ranne with them to the Murderers houses that killed him, to set them on fire. Howbeit, the Conspiratours foreseeing the danger, before had wisely provided for themselves, and fled. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had been no partaker of the conspiracy, but was always one of Caesars chiefest friends: he dreamed the night before, that Caesar bad him to supper with him, and that he refusing to goe, Caesar was very importunate with him, and compelled him, so that at length he led him by the hand into a great darke place, where being marvellously afraid, he was driven to follow him in spite of his heart. This dreame put him all night into a Feaver, and yet notwithstanding, the next morning when he heard that they carried Caesars body to buriall, being afhamed not to accompany his Funerals, he went out of his house, and thrust himselfe into the presse of the common People that were in a great uproare. And because some one called him by his Name, Cinna: the People thinking he had been that Cinna, who in an Oration he made, had spoken very ill of Caesar, they falling upon him in their rage, slew him outright in the Market-place. This made Brutus and his Companions more afraid then any other thing, next unto the change of Antonius. Wherefore they got them out of ROME, and kept at the first in the City of ANTIUM, hoping to returne againe to ROME, when the fury of the People was a little asswaged. The which they hoped would be quickly, considering that they had to deal with a fickle and unconstant multitude, easie to be carried, and that the Senate stood for them: who notwithstanding made no enquire for them that had torne poor Cinna the Poet in pieces, but caused them to be sought for and apprehended that went with Fire-brands to set fire on the Conspiratours houses. The People growing weary now of Antonius pride and infolency, who ruled all things in a manner with absolute power, they desired that Brutus might returne againe; and it was also looked for, that Brutus would come himselfe in Person to play the Plaies which were due to the People, by reason of his Office of Pratorship. But Brutus understanding that many of Caesars Souldiers which served under him in the Warres, and that also had Lands and Houses given them in the Cities where they lay, did lie in waite for him to kill him, and that they daily by small Companies came by one and by one into ROME, he durst no more returne thither: but yet the People had the pleasure and pastime in his absence, to see the Games and Sports he made them, which were sumptuously set forth and furnished with all things necessary, sparing for no cost. For he had brought a great number of strange Beasts, of the which he would not give one of them to any friend he had; but that they should all be employed in his Games: and went himselfe as farre as BYZANTIUM, to speak to some Players of Comedies and Musicians that were there. And further he wrote unto his friends for one Caninius an excellent Player, that whatsoever they did, they should intreate him to play these Plaies. For (said he) it is no reason to compell any GRECIAN, unless he will come of his own good will. Moreover, he wrote also unto Cicero, and earnestly prayed him in any case to be at these Plaies. Now the state of ROME standing in these termes, there fell out another change and alteration; when the young man Octavius Caesar came to ROME. He was the Sonne of Julius Caesar Neeces, whom he had adopted for his Sonne, and made his Heire, by his last Will and Testament. But when Julius Caesar his adopted Father was slaine, he was in the City of APOLLONIA, (where he studied), carrying for him, because he was determined to make Warre with the PARTHIANS: but when he heard the newes of his death, he returned againe to ROME, where to begin to curry favour with the common People, he first of all tooke upon him his adopted Fathers Name, and made distribution among them of the Money which his Father had bequeathed unto them. By this means he troubled Antonius sorely, and by force of Money, got a great number of his Fathers Souldiers together, that had served in the Warres with him. And Cicero himselfe, for the great malice he bare unto Antonius, did favour his Proceedings: but Brutus marvellously reproved him for it, and wrote unto him, that he seemed by his doings not to be sorry to have a Master, but only to be afraid to have one that should hate him: and that all his doings in the Common wealth, did witness, that he chose to be subject to a mild and courteous bondage, sith by his words and writings he did commend this young man Octavius Caesar, to be a good and gentle Lord. For our Prede-

Predecessours (said he) would never abide to be subject to any Masters, how gentle or mild soever they were: and for his own part, that he had never resolutely determined with himselfe to make War, or Peace; but otherwise, that he was certainly minded never to be slave nor subject. And therefore he wondered much at him, how Cicero could be afraid of the danger of civill Warres, and would not be afraid of a shamefull Peace: and that to thrust Antonius out of the usurped tyranny, in recompence he went about to stablish young Octavius Caesar Tyrant. These were the Contents of Brutus first Letters he wrote unto Cicero. Now the City of ROME being divided into two Factions, some taking part with Antonius, other also leaning unto Octavius Caesar, and the Souldiers making port-fale of their Serviceto him that would give most: Brutus seeing the state of ROME would be utterly overthrowne, he determined to go out of ITALY, and went on foot through the Countrey of LUKE, unto the City of ELEA, standing by the Sea. There Porcia being ready to depart from her Husband Brutus, and to returne to ROME, did what she could to dissemble the griefe and sorrow she felt at her heart: but a certaine painted Table bewrayed her in the end, although untill that time she shewed alwaies a constant and patient minde. The device of the Table was taken out of the Greeke Stories, how Andromache accompanied her Husband Hector, when he went out of the City of TROY to go to the Warres, and how Hector delivered her his little Sonne, and how her eyes were never off him. Porcia seeing this Picture, and likening her selfe to be in the same case she fell a weeping: and coming thither oftentimes in a day to see it, she wept still. Acilius one of Brutus friends perceiving that, rehearsed the Verses Andromache speaketh to this purpose in Homer:

*Thou Hector art my Father, and my Mother, and my Brother,
And Husbande too, and all in all: I minde not any other.*

Then Brutus smiling, answered againe: But yet (said he) I cannot for my part say unto Porcia, as Hector answered Andromache in the same place of the Poet:

*Tush, meddle thou with duty weighing out,
Thy Maides their task, and pricking on a clout,*

For indeed the weake constitution of her Body, doth not suffer her to performe in shew, the valiant Acts that we are able to do: but for courage and constant minde, she shewed her selfe as stout in the defence of her Countrey, as any of us. Bibulus the Sonne of Porcia, reporteth this Story thus. Now Brutus embarking at ELEA in LUKE, he sailed directly towards ATHENS. When he arrived there the People of ATHENS received him with common joyes of rejoycing, and honourable decrees made for him. He lay with a friend of his, with whom he went daily to heare the Lectures, of Themistocles the Academicke Philosopher, and of Cratippus the Peripateticke, and so would talke with them in Philosophy, that it seemed he left all other matters, and gave himselfe onely to study: howbeit, secretly notwithstanding, he made preparation for War. For he sent Herostatus into MACEDON, to win the Captaines and Souldiers that were upon those marches, and he did also entertaine all the young Gentlemen of the ROMANS, whom he found in ATHENS studying Philosophy: amongst them he found Ciceros Son, whom he highly praised and commended, saying: That whether he waked or slept, he found him of a noble minde and disposition, he did in nature so much hate Tyrants. Shortly after, he began to enter openly into armes: and being advertised that there came out of ASIA a certaine Fleet of ROMANE Ships that had good store of Money in them, and that the Captaine of those Ships (who was an honest man, and his familiar friend) came towards ATHENS: he went to meet him as far as the Isle of CARYSTOS, and having spoken with him there, he handled him so, that he was contented to leave his Ships in his hands: whereupon he made him a notable banquet at his house, because it was on his Birth-day. When the Feast day came, and that they began to drinke lustily one to another, the Guests dranke to the Victory of Brutus, and the liberty of the ROMANES. Brutus therefore to encourage them further, called for a bigger Cup, and holding it in his hand, before he dranke spake this aloud:

*My destiny and Phœbus are agreed,
To bring me to my fittall end with speed.*

And for prooffe hereof, it is reported, that the same day he fought his last Battell by the City of PHILIPPES, as he came out of his Tent, he gave them for the word and signall of Battell, Phœbus: so that it was thought ever since, that this his suddain crying out at the Feast, was a Prognostication of his misfortune that should happen. After this, Antistius gave him of the Money, he carried into ITALY, fifty Myriades. Furthermore, all Pompeys Souldiers that straggled up and down THESSALY, came with very good will unto him. He tooke from Cinna also, five hundred Horsemen, which he carried into ASIA, unto Dolabella. After that, he went by Sea, unto the City of DEMETRIADE, and theretooke a great deale of Armour and Munition which was going to Antonius: and the which had been made and forged there by Julius Caesar commandement, for the Warres against the PARTHIANS. Furthermore, Hortensius Governour of MACEDON, did resigne the Government thereof unto him. Besides, all the Princes, Kings, and Noble-men thereabouts, came and joyined with him, when it was told him, and that Caius (Antonius Brother) coming out of ITALY, had passed the Sea, and came with great speed towards the City of DYRRACHIUM, and APOLLONIA, to get the Souldiers into his hands, which Gabinus had there. Brutus therefore to prevent him, went presently with a few of his men in the midst of Winter when it did snow hard, and tooke his way through hard and fowle Countries, and made such speed indeed, that he was there long before Antonius sumpters, that carried the Victuals. So that when he came neare to Dyrachium, a disease tooke him, which the Physicians call Brahma, to say, A cormorant and unsatiabie appetite to eate: by reason of the cold and paines he had taken. This sicknesse chanceth often, both to men and beasts, that travell wherewith hath snowne: either because the naturall heate being retired into the inward parts of the Body, by the coldnesse of the Ayre hardning the Skinne, doth straight digest and consume the Meate: or else because a sharpe subtile winde coming by reason of the Snow when it is molten, doth pierce into the Body, and driveth out the naturall heate which was cast outward. For it seemeth, that the heate being quenched with the cold, which it meeteth withall coming out of the Skinne of the Body, causeth the sweates that follow the Disease. But hereof we have spoken at large in other places. Brutus being very faint, and having nothing in his Campe to eate, his Souldiers were compelled to go to their Enemies; and coming to the Gates of the City, they praised the Warders to helpe them to Bread. When they heard in what case Brutus was, they brought him both meate and drinke: in requittall whereof, afterwards, when he wan the City, he did not onely intreate and use the Citizens thereof courteously, but all the Inhabitants of the City also for their sakes. Now when Caius Antonius was arrived in the City of Apollonia, he sent unto the Souldiers thereabouts to come unto him. But when he understood that they went all to Brutus: and furthermore, that the Citizens of Apollonia did favour him much: he then forsooke that City, and went unto the City of Butthrotus; but yet he lost three of his Ensignes by the way, that were slaine every man of them. Then he fought by force to winne certaine places of strength about Byllis, and to drive Brutus men from thence, that had taken it before: and therefore to obtaine his purpose, he fought a Battell with Cicero, the Sonne of Marcus Tullius Cicero, by whom he was overcome. For Brutus made the younger Cicero a Captaine, and did many notable exploits by his service. Shortly after, having stolen upon Caius Antonius in certaine Marishes far from the place from whence he fled, he would not set on him with fury but onely rode round about him, commanding his Souldiers to spare him and his men, as reckoning them all his own without stroke striking: and so indeed it happened: for they yeelded themselves and their Captaine Antonius, unto Brutus; so that Brutus had now a great Army about him. Now Brutus kept this Caius Antonius long time in his Office, and never tooke from him the markes and signes of his Consulship, although many of his friends, and Cicero among others, wrote unto him to put him to death. But when he saw Antonius secretly practised with his Captaine to make some alteration, then he sent him into a Ship, and made him to be kept there. When the Souldiers whom Caius Antonius had corrupted, were gotten into the City of Apollonia, and sent from thence unto Brutus to come unto them, he made them answer, That it was not the manner of ROMANE Captaines to come to the Souldiers, but the Souldiers to come to the Captaine, and to crave pardon for their offences committed. Thereupon they came to him, and he pardoned them. So Brutus preparing to go into ASIA, newes came unto him of the great change at Rome: for Octavius Caesar was in armes, by commandement and authority from the Senate, against Marcus Antonius. But after that he had driven Antonius out of ITALY, the Senate began then to be afraid of him, because he sued to be Confull, which was contrary to the Law; and kept a great Army about him when the Empire of Rome had no need of them. On the other side, Octavius Caesar perceiving the Senate stayed not there, but turned to Brutus that was out of ITALY, and that they appointed him the Government of certaine Provinces: then he began to be afraid for his part, and sent unto Antonius to offer him his friendship. Then coming on with his Army neare to Rome, he made himselfe to be chosen Confull, whether the Senate would or not, when he was yet but a stripling or springall of twenty yeares old, as himselfe reporteth in his owne Commentaries. So when he was Confull, he presently appointed Judges to accuse Brutus and his Companions, for killing of the noblest person in Rome, and chiefe Magistrate, without Law or Judgement: and made L. Cornelius accuse Brutus, and M. Agrippa, Cassius. So the parties accused were condemned, because the Judges were compelled to give such sentence. The voice went, that when the Herauld (according to the Custome after sentence given) went up to the Chaire or Pulpit for Orations, and proclaimed Brutus with a loud voice, summoning him to appeare in person before the Judges, the People that stood by sighed openly, and the Noblemen that were present hung down their heads, and durst not speake a word. Among them the teares fell from Publius Silius Eyes: who shortly after, was one of the Proscriptors or Outlawes appointed to be slaine. After that, these three Octavius Caesar, Antonius and Lepidus made an agreement between themselves, and by those Articles divided the Provinces belonging to the Empire of Rome among themselves, and did set up Bills of Proscription and Outlawry condemning two hundred of the noblest men of Rome to suffer death, and amongst that number, Cicero was one. Newes being brought thereof into MACEDON, Brutus being then enforced to do it, wrote unto Hortensius that he should put Caius Antonius to death, to be revenged of the death of Cicero, and of the other Brutus, of the which the one was his friend, and the other a Kinsman. For this cause therefore, Antonius afterwards taking Hortensius at the Battell of PHILIPPES, he made him to be slaine upon his Brothers Tombe. But when Brutus said, that he was more ashamed of the cause for the which Cicero was slaine, then he was otherwise sorry for his death, and that he could not but greatly reprove his friends he had at Rome, who were Slaves more through their own fault, then through their

their valiantnesse or man-hood which usurped the tyranny: considering that they were so cowardly and faint-hearted, as to suffer the sight of those things before their eyes, the report whereof should onely have grieved them to the heart. Now when Brutus had passed over his Army (that was very great) into ASIA, he gave order for the gathering of a great number of Ships together, as well in the Coast of BITHYNIA, as also in the City of CYZICUM, because he would have an Army by Sea; and himselfe in the meane time went unto the Cities, taking order for all things, and giving audience to Princes and Noblemen of the Countrey that had to do with him. Afterwards he sent unto Cassius in SYRIA, to turne him from his Journey into EGYPT, telling him that it was not for the Conquest of any Kingdome for themselves, that they wandered up and down in that sort, but contrarily, that it was to restore their Countrey againe to her liberty: and that the multitude of Souldiers they gathered together, was to subdue the Tyrants that would keepe them in slavery and subjection. Wherefore regarding their chief purpose and intent, they should not be farre from ITALY, as neare as they could possible, but should rather make all the haste they could, to keepe their Countrey men. Cassius beleeveth him, and returned. Brutus went to meete him, and they both met at the City of SMYRNA, which was the first time that they saw together since they tooke leave each of other, at the Haven of PIRÆA in ATHENS, the one going into SYRIA, and the other into MACEDON. So they were marvellous joyfull, and no lesse courageous, when they saw the great Armies together which they had both leaved: considering that they departed out of ITALY like naked and poor banished men, without armour and money, nor having any Ship ready, nor Souldier about them, nor any one Town at their commandement; yet notwithstanding, in a short time after they were now met together, having Ships, Money, and Souldiers enough, both Footmen and Horsemen, to fight for the Empire of Rome. Now Cassius would have done Brutus much honour, as Brutus did unto him, but Brutus most commonly prevented him, and went first unto him, both because he was the elder man, as also for that he was sickly of Body. And men reputed him commonly to be very skillfull in Warres, but otherwise marvellous cholerick and cruell, who fought to rule men by feare, rather then with lenity: and on the other side he was too familiar with his friends, and would jest too broadly with them. But Brutus in contrary manner, for his Vertue and Valiantnesse, was wel-beloved of the People and his owne, esteemed of Noblemen, and hated of no man, not so much as of his Enemies; because he was a marvellous lowly and gentle person, Noble-minded, and would never be in any rage, nor carried away with pleasure and covetousnesse, but had ever an upright minde with him, and would never yeeld to any wrong or injustice; the which was the chiefe cause of his fame, of his rising, and of the good will that every man bare him: for they were all persuaded that his intent was good. For they did not certainly beleieve, that if Pompey himselfe had overcome Caesar, he would have resigned his authority to the law, but rather they were of opinion, that he would still keepe the sovereignty and absolute Government in his hands, taking onely, to please the People, the Title of Confull, or Dictator, or of some other more civill Office. And as for Cassius, a hot, cholerick, and cruell man, that would oftentimes be carried away from justice for gain, it was certainly thought that he made Warre, and put himselfe into fundry dangers, more to have absolute power and authority, then to defend the liberty of his Countrey. For, they that will also consider others, that were elder men then they, as Cinna, Marcius, and Carbo, it is out of doubt that the end and hope of their Victory, was to be the Lords of their Countrey, and in manner they did all confesse, that they fought themselves did never reprove Brutus for any such change or desire. For, it was said that Antonius spake it openly divers times, that he thought, that of all them that had slaine Caesar, there was none but Brutus onely that was moved to do it, as thinking the act commendable of it selfe: but that all the other Conspirators did conspire his death for some private malice or envie, that they otherwise did beare unto him. Hereby it appeareth, that Brutus did not trust so much to the power of his Army, as he did to his own vertue, as it is to be seene by his Writings. For approaching neare to the instant danger he wrote unto Pomponius Atticus, that his affaires had the best hap that could be. For, said he, either I will set my Countrey at liberty by Battell, or by honourable death rid me of this bondage. And furthermore, that they being certaine and assured of all things else, this one thing onely was doubtfull to them: whether they should live or die with liberty. He wrote also that Antonius had his due payment for his folly. For where he might have been a partner equally of the glory of Brutus, Cassius, and Cato, and have made one with them, he liked better to chuse to be joyned with Octavius Caesar alone: with whom, though now he be not overcome by us, yet shall he shortly after, also have Warre with him. And truly he proved a true Prophet, for so Brutus a true came it indeed to passe. Now whilst Brutus and Cassius were together in the City of SMYRNA, Prophet of Brutus, prayed Cassius to let him have some part of his Money whereof he had great store; because all that he could rap and rend of his side he bestowed it in making so great a number of Ships, that by means of them they should keepe all the Sea at their commandement. Cassius friends hindered this request, and earnestly dissuaded him from it: persuading him, that it was no reason Brutus should have the Money which Cassius hath gotten together by sparing, and leaved with great evil will of the People their subjects, for him to bestow liberally upon his Souldiers, and by this means to winne their good wils, by Cassius charge. This notwithstanding, Cassius gave him the third part of this totall summe. So Cassius and Brutus then departing from each other, Cassius went to the City of RHODUS, where he too dishonestly and cruelly used himselfe: although when Rhodus

he came into the City, he answered some of the Inhabitants who called him Lord and King, that he was neither Lord nor King, but he only that had slain him, that would have been Lord and King. Brutus departing from thence, sent unto the LYCIANS to require Money, and men of Warre. But there was a certaine Orator called Naukrates, that made the Cities to rebell against him, inso much that the Countrey men of that Countrey kept the Straights and little Mountains, thinking by that meanes to stop Brutus passage. Wherefore Brutus sent his Horsemen against them, who stole upon them as they were at dinner, and slew six hundred of them: and taking all the small Towns and Villages, he did let all the Prisoners he tooke, go without payment of Ransome, hoping by this his great courtesie to win them, to draw all the rest of the Countrey unto him. But they were so fierce and obdurate, that they would mutinie for every small hurt they received as he passed by their Countrey, and despite his courtesie and good nature: untill that at length he went to besiege the City of the XANTHIANS, within the which were shut up the cruellest and most warlike men of LYCIA. There was a River that ranne by the Walls of the City, in the which many men saved themselves, swimming betwene two Waters, and fled: howbeit they laid nets overthwart the River, and tied little Bels on the top of them, to sound when any man was taken in the nets. The XANTHIANS made a fallie out by night, and came to fire certaine Engines of the battery that beat down their Walls: but they were presently driven in againe by the ROMANES, so soone as they were discovered. The winde by chance was marvellous bigge, and increased the flame so fore, that it violently carried it into the cranes of the Wall of the City, that the next houses unto them were straight set on fire thereby. Wherefore Brutus being afraid that all the City would take on fire, he presently commanded his men to quench the fire, and to save the Town if it might be. But the LYCIANS at that instant fell into such a frenzy, and strange and horrible despair, that no man can well expresse it: and a man cannot more rightly compare or liken it, then to a franticke and most desperate desire to die. For all of them together, with their Wives and Children, Masters and Servants, and of all sorts of age whatsoever, fought upon the Rampiers of their Walls and did cast down Stones and Fire-works on the ROMANES, which were very busie in quenching the flame of the fire, to save the City. And in contrary manner also, they brought Faggots, drie Wood, and Reeds, to bring the Fire further into the City as much as might be, increasing it by such things as they brought. Now when the Fire had gotten into all parts of the City, and that the flame burnt bright in every place: Brutus being sorry to see it, got upon his Horse, and rode round about the Walls of the City, to see if it were possible for to save it, and held up his hands to the Inhabitants, praying them to pardon their City, and to save themselves. Howbeit they would not be perswaded, but did all that they could possible to cast themselves away, nor onely men and Women, but also little Children. For some of them weeping and crying out, did cast themselves into the Fire: others headlong throwing themselves down from the Walls, brake their neckes: others also made their backs bare, to the naked Swords of their Fathers, and undid their cloathes, praying them to kill them with their own hands. After the City was burnt, they found a Woman hanged up by the necke, holding one of her Children in her hand dead by her, hanged up also: and in the other hand a burning Torch letting fire on her house. Some would have had Brutus to have seene her, but he would not see so horrible and tragically a sight: but when he heard it, he fell a weeping, and caused an Herald to make proclamation by sound of Trumpet, that he would give a certaine summe of Money to every Souldier that could save a XANTHIAN. So there were not (as it is reported) above fifty of them saved, and yet they were saved against their wils. Thus the XANTHIANS having ended the revolution of their fatal destiny after a long continuance of time, they did through their desperation, renew the memory of the lamentable calamities of their Ancestors, who in like manner, in the Wars of the PERSIANS, did burne their City, and destroyed themselves. Therefore Brutus likewise besieging the City of the PATARIANS, perceiving that they stoutly resisted him, he was also afraid of that, and could not well tell whether he should give assault to it, or not, least they would fall into the despair and desperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit having taken certaine of their Women Prisoners, he sent them backe againe, without payment of Ransome. Now they that were the Wives and Daughters of the noblest men of the City, reporting unto their Parents, that they had found Brutus a mercifull, just, and courteous man, they perswaded them to yeeld themselves and their City unto him; the which they did. So after they had thus yeelded themselves, divers other Cities also followed them, and did the like: and found Brutus more mercifull and courteous, then they thought they should have done, but specially farre above Cassius. For Cassius, about the selfe same time, after he had compelled the RHODIANS every man to deliver all the ready Money they had in Gold and Silver in their Houses, the which being brought together, amounted to the summe of eight thousand Talents: yet he condemned the City besides, to pay the summe of five hundred Talents more. Where Brutus in contrary manner, after he had leaved of all the Countrey of LYCIA but an hundred and fifty Talents onely, he departed thence into the Countrey of IONIA, and did them no more hurt. Now Brutus in all this journey, did many notable acts and worthy of memory, both for rewarding, as also in punishing those that had deserved it: wherefore among the rest, I will tell you of one thing, of the which he himselfe, and all the Noblemen of the ROMANES were, marvellous glad. When Pompey the Great (having lost the Battell against Julius Caesar, in the Fields of PHARSALIA) came and fell upon the Coast of EGYPT, hard by the City of PELUSIUM, those that were Protectors to the young King Ptolemy being then but a Child, sate in Councell with his Servants and Friends, what they should determine in that case.

case. They were not all of one minde in this consultation: for some thought it good to receive Pompey: others also, that they should drive him out of EGYPT. But there was a certaine Rhetorician called Theodotus, that was borne in the Isle of CHIO, who was the Kings Schoole-master to teach him Rhetoricke. He being called to the Councell for lacke of sufficient men, said, That both the one and the other side went awry, as well those that were of opinion to receive Pompey, as the other that would have had him driven away: and that the best way was (considering the present time) that they should lay hold on him, and kill him, adding withall this sentence, That a dead man biteth not. The whole Councell stucke to this opinion: So, for a notable example of incredible misfortune, and unlooked for unto Pompey, Pompey the Great was slain, by the motion and counsell of this wicked Rhetorician Theodotus, as Theodotus afterwards did himselfe booke of it. But when Julius Caesar came afterwards into EGYPT, the wicked men that consented to this counsell, had their payment according to their deserts: for they died every man of them a wicked death, saving this Theodotus, whom fortune respited a little while longer, and yet in that time he lived a poore and miserable life, never tarrying long in any one place. So Brutus going up and downe ASIA, Theodotus could hide himselfe no longer, but was brought unto Brutus, where he suffered paines of death: so that he wanne more fame by his death, then ever he did in his life. About that time, Brutus sent to pray Cassius to come to the City of SARDIS, and so he did. Brutus understanding of his coming, went to meet him with all his friends. There both their Armies being armed, they called them both Emperours. Now as it commonly happeneth in great affaires between two persons, both of them having many friends, and so many Captaines under them, there ranne tales and complaints betwixt them. Therefore, before they fell in hand with any other matter, they went into a little Chamber together, and bade every man avoid, and did shut the doores to them. Then they began to poure out their complaints one to the other, and grew hot and loud, earnestly accusing one another, and at length fell both a weeping. Their friends that were without the Chamber, hearing them loud within, and angry between themselves, they were both amazed and afraid also, lest it would grow to further matter: but yet they were commanded, that no man should come to them. Notwithstanding one Marcus Phoenius, that had been a friend and follower of Caio while he lived, and tooke upon him to counterfeite a Philosopher, not with wisdome and discretion, but with a certaine bedlam and franticke motion: he would needs come into the Chamber, though the men offered to keepe him out. But it was no boote to let Phoenius, when a mad moode or toy tooke him in the head: for he was a hot hafty man, and suddain in all his doings, and cared for never a Senator of them all. Now, though he used it in bold manner of speech after the profession of the Cynicke Philosophers (as who would say, Dogs) yet his boldnesse did no hurt many times, because they did but laugh at him to see him so mad. This Phoenius at that time, in despite of the Door-keepers, came into the Chamber, and with a certaine scoffing and mocking gesture, which he counterfeited of purpose, he rehearsed the Verses which old Nestor said in Homer:

My Lords, I pray you hearken both to me,
For I have seen more yeares then suchie three.

Cassius fell a laughing at him: but Brutus thrust him out of the Chamber, and called him Dogge, and counterfeited Cynicke. Howbeit his coming in brake their strife at that time, and so they left each other. The selfe same night Cassius prepared his supper in his Chamber, and Brutus brought his friends with him. So when they were set at supper, Phoenius came to sit down after he had washed. Brutus told him aloud, no man sent for him, and bade them set him at the upper end: meaning indeed at the lower end of the bed. Phoenius made no ceremony, but thrust in amongst the middle of them, and made all the company laugh at him. So they were merry all Supper-time, and full of their Philosophy. The next day after, Brutus, upon complaint of the SARDIANS, did condemne and rote Lucius Pella for a defamed Person, that had been a Prator of the ROMANES, and whom Brutus had given charge unto: for that he was accused and convicted of robbery, and pilfering in his Office. This judgement much disliked Cassius, because he himselfe had secretly (not many daies before) warned two of his friends, attainted and convicted of the like offences, and openly had cleared them: but yet he did not therefore leave to employ them in any manner of service as he did before. And therefore he greatly reproveth Brutus, for that he would shew himselfe so straight and severe, in such a time as was meetest to beare a little, then to take things at the worst. Brutus in contrary manner answered, that he should remember the Id's of March, at which time they slew Julius Caesar, who neither pilled nor polled the Countrey, but onely was a favourer and suborner of all them that did rob and spoile, by his countenance and Authority. And if there were any occasion whereby they might honestly see aside justice and equity, they should have had more reason to have suffered Caesar's friends to have robbed and done what wrong and injury they would, then to beare with their owne men. For then said he, they could but have said they had been cowards, but now they may accuse us of injustice, beside the paines we take, and the danger we put our selves into. And thus may we see what Brutus intent and purpose was. But as they both prepared to passe over againe, out of ASIA into EUROPE, there went a rumour that there appeared a wonderfull signe unto him. Brutus was a careful man, and slept very little, both for that his Diet was moderate, as also because he was continually occupied. He never slept in the day time, and in the night no longer, then

Brutus care, because he was continually occupied. He never slept in the day time, and in the night no longer, then then the time he was driven to be alone, and when every body else tooke their rest. But now whilst he was in Warre, and his head over-busily occupied to thinke of his affaires, and what would happen, after he had slumbered a little after supper, he spent all the rest of the night in dispatching of his weightiest Causes; and after he had taken order for them, if he had any leisure left him, he would read some Booke till the third Watch of the night, at what time the Capitaines, petty Capitaines and Colonels, did use to come to him. So, being ready to go into EUROPE, one night very late (when all the Campe took quiet rest) as he was in his Tent with a little light, thinking of weighty matters, he thought he heard one come in to him, and casting his eye towards the door of his Tent, that he saw a wonderful strange and monstrous shape of a body coming towards him, and said never a word. So Brutus boldly asked what he was, a God or a man, and what cause brought him thither. The Spirit answered him, I am thy evil Spirit, Brutus: and thou shalt see me by the City of PHILIPPES. Brutus being no otherwise afraid, replied againe unto it: Well, then I shall see thee againe. The Spirit presently vanished away: and Brutus called his men unto him, who told him that they heard no noise, nor saw any thing at all. Thereupon Brutus returned againe to thinke on his matters as he did before: and when the day brake, he went unto Cassius, to tell him what Vision had appeared unto him in the night. Cassius being in opinion an EPICURIAN, and reasoning thereon with Brutus, spake to him touching the Vision, thus. In our sect, Brutus, we have an opinion, that we do not alwaies seele, or see, that which we suppose we do both see and seele, but that our senses being credulous and therefore easily abused (when they are idle and unoccupied in their own objects) are induced to imagine they see and conjecture that, which in truth they do not. For, our minde is quicke and cunning to work (without either cause or matter) any thing in the imagination whatsoever. And therefore the imagination is resembled to clay, and the minde to the Potter: who without any other cause then his fancy and pleasure, changeth it into what fashion and forme he will. And this doth the diversity of our Dreames shew unto us. For our imagination doth upon a small fancy grow from conceit to conceit, altering both in passions and formes of things imagined. For the minde of man is ever occupied, and that continually moving is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cause of this in you. For you being by nature given to melancholike discouraging, and of late continually occupied, your wits and senses having been over-laboured, do easilier yeeld to such imaginations. For, to say that there are Spirits or Angels; and if there were, that they had the shape of men, or such voices, or any power at all to come unto us, it is a mockery. And for mine own part, I would there were such, because that we should not only have Souldiers, Horses, and Ships, but also the aide of the gods, to guide and further our honest and honourable attempts. With these words Cassius did somewhat comfort and quiet Brutus. When they raised their Campe, there came two Eagles that flying with a marvellous force, lighted upon two of the foremost Ensignes, and alwaies followed the Souldiers, which gave them Meate, and fed them, untill they came neare to the City of PHILIPPES: and there one day only before the Battell, they both flew away. Now Brutus had conquered the most part of all the People and Nations of that Country: but if there were any other City or Capitaine to overcome, then they made all cleare before them, and so drew towards the Coasts of THASSOS. There Norbanus lying in Campe in a certaine place called the straights, by another place called CYMBOLON (which is a port in the Sea,) Cassius and Brutus compassed him in in such sort, that he as driven to forsake the place which was of great strength for him, and he was also in danger beside to have lost all his Army. For, Octavius Caesar could not follow him because of his sicknesse, and therefore stayed behinde: whereupon they had taken his Army, had not Antonius aide been, which made such wonderfull speed, that Brutus could scant beleieve it. So Caesar came not thither of ten daies after: and Antonius camped against Cassius, and Brutus on the other side against Caesar. The ROMANES called the Valley between both Campes, the PHILIPPIAN Fields: and there were never seen two so great Armies of the ROMANES, one before the other, ready to Fight. In truth, Brutus Army was inferior to Octavius Caesar, in number of men: but for bravery and rich Furniture, Brutus Army far excelled Caesar. For the most part of their Armors were Silver and gilt, which Brutus had bountifully given them: although in all other things he taught his Capitaines to live in order without exesse. But for the bravery of armour and Weapon, which Souldiers should carry in their hands, or otherwise wear upon their backs, he thought that it was an encouragement unto them that by nature are greedy of honour, and that it maketh them also fight like Devils that love to get, and to be afraid to lose: because they fight to keepe their armour and Weapon, as also their Goods and Lands. Now when they came to muster their Armies, Octavius Caesar took the muster of his Army within the Trenches of his Campe, and gave his men only a little Corne, and five silver Drachmaes to every man to sacrifice to the gods, and to pray for Victory. But Brutus scorning his misery, and nigardinesse, first of all mustred his Army, and did purifie it in the Fields, according to the manner of the ROMANES: and then he gave unto every Band a number of Weathers to sacrifice, and fifty silver Drachmaes to every Souldier. So that Brutus and Cassius Souldiers were better pleased, and more courageously bent to fight at the day of Battell, then their Enemies Souldiers were. Notwithstanding, being busily occupied about the Ceremonies of this purification, it is reported that there chanced certaine unlucky signes unto Cassius. For one of his Sergeants that carried the Rods before him, brought him the Garland of Flowers turned backward, the which he should have worne on his head in the time of sacrificing. Moreover it is reported also, that another time before, in certaine Sports and Triumph, where they carried an Image of Cassius Victory, of cleane Gold, it fell by chance, the man stumbling that carried it. And yet further there was seene a marvellous number of Fowles of prey, that feed upon dead Carcasses: and Bee-hives also were found where Bees were gathered together in a certaine place within the Trenches of the Campe: the which place the Soothsayers thought good to shut out of the Precinct of the Campe, for to take away the superstitious feare and mistrust men would have of it. The which began somewhat to alter Cassius minde from Epicurus opinions; and had put the Souldiers also in a marvellous feare. Thereupon Cassius was of opinion not to try this Warre at one Battell, but rather to delay time, and to draw it out in length, considering that they were the stronger in Money, and the weaker in men and Armour. But Brutus in contrary manner, did alway before and at that time also, desire nothing more, then to put all to the hazard of Battell, as soone as might be possible: to the end he might either quickly restore his Countrey to her former liberty, or rid him forthwith of this miserable world, being still troubled in following and maintaining of such great Armies together. But perceiving that in the daily Skirmishes and bickerings they made, his men were alwaies the stronger and ever had the better, that yet quickned his spirits againe, and did put him in better heart. And furthermore, because that some of their own men had already yielded themselves to their Enemies, and that it was suspected moreover divers others would do the like, that made many of Cassius friends which were of his minde before (when it came to be debated in Councell, whether the Battell should be fought or not) that they were then of Brutus minde. But yet was there one of Brutus friends called Atellius, that was against it, and was of opinion that they should tarry to the next Winter. Brutus asked him what he should get by tarrying a year longer? If I get nothing else, quoth Atellius againe, yet have I lived so much longer. Cassius was very angry with this answer: and Atellius was maliced and esteemed the worse for it of all men. Thereupon it was presently determined they should fight Battell the next day. So Brutus all Supper time looked with a cheerefull countenance, like a man that had good hope, and talked very wisely of Philosophy, and after Supper went to bed. But touching Cassius, Messala reporteth that he supped by himselfe in his Tent with a few of his friends, and that all supper-time he looked very sadly, and was full of thoughts, although it was against his nature: and that after supper he tooke him by the hand, and holding him fast (in token of kindnesse, as his manner was) told him in Greek: Messala, I protest unto thee, and make thee my Witnesse, that I am compelled against my minde and will (as Pompey the Great was) to jeopard the liberty of our Countrey to the hazard of a Battell. And yet we must be lively, and of good courage, considering our good fortune, whom we should wrong too much to mistrust her, although we follow evill counsell. Messala writeth, that Cassius having spoken these last words unto him, he bade him farewell, and willed him to come to supper to him the next night following, because it was his Birth-day. The next morning by breake of day, the Signall of Battell was set out in Brutus and Cassius Campe, which was an arming Scarlet Coate: and both the Chieftaines spake together in the midst of their Armies. There Cassius began to speak first, and said: The gods grant us O Brutus, that this day we may win the Field, and ever after to live all the rest of our life quietly one with another. But sith the gods have so ordained it, that the greatest and chiefest things amongst men are most uncertaine, and that if the Battell fall out otherwise to day then we wish or look for, we shall hardly meet againe, what art thou then determined to do, to flie, or die? Brutus answered him, being yet but a young man, and not over greatly experienced in the world: I trust (I know not how) a certain rule of Philosophy, by the which I did greatly blame and reprove Cato for killing himselfe, as being no lawfull nor godly act, touching the gods: nor concerning men, valiant; not to give place and yeeld to divine Providence, and not constantly and patiently to take whatsoever it please him to send us, but to draw back and flie: but being now in the midst of the danger, I am of a contrary minde. For if it be not the will of God that this Battell fall out fortunate for us, I will look no more for hope, neither seek to make any new supply for War againe, but will rid me of this miserable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I give up my life for my Countrey in the Isles of March, for the which I shall live in another more glorious world. Cassius fell a laughing to hear what he said, and embracing him, Come on then (said he) let us go and charge our Enemies with this minde. For either we shall conquer, or we shall not need to feare the Conquerours. After this talke, they fell to consultation among their friends for the ordering of the Battell. Then Brutus prayed Cassius he might have the leading of the right Wing, the which men thought was far meerer for Cassius, both because he was the elder man, and also for that he had the better experience. But yet Cassius gave it him, and willed that Messala (who had charge of one of the warlike Legions they had) should be also in that Wing with Brutus. So Brutus presently sent out his Horsemen, who were excellently well appointed, and his Footmen also were as willing and ready to give chase. Now Antonius men did cast a Trench form the Marriish by the which they lay, to cut off Cassius way to come to the Sea: and Caesar, at the least his Army stirred not. As for Octavius Caesar himselfe, he was not in his Camp, because he was sicke. And for his People, they little thought the Enemies would have given them Battell, but only have made some light Skirmishes to hinder them that wrought in the Trench, and with their Darts and Slings to have kept them from finishing of their work: but they taking no heed to them that came full upon them to give them Battell, marvelled much at the great noise they heard, that came from the place where they were casting their Trench. In the meane time Brutus that led the right Wing, sent little Bills to the Colonels and Capitaines of private Bands, in the which he wrote the word of the Battell; and he himselfe riding a horse-backe by all the Troopes, did speake to them, and encouraged them to stick to it like men. So by this meanes very few of them understood what was the word of the Battell, and besides, the most part of them never tarried to have it told them, but ranne with great fury to assault the Enemies; whereby through this disorder, the Legions were marvellously scattered and dispersed one from the other. For, first of all Messala Legion, and then the next unto them, went beyond the left Wing of the Enemies, and did nothing, but glancing by them, overthrew some as they went; and so going on further, fell right upon Cassius Campe, out of the which (as himselfe writeth in his Commentaries) he had been conveyed away a little before through the counsell and advice of one of his friends called Marcus Antonius: who dreaming in the night, had a Vision appeared unto him, that commanded Octavius Caesar should be carried out of his Campe. Inasmuch as it was thought he was slaine, because his Litter (which had nothing in it) was thrust through and through with Pikes and Darts. There was great slaughter in this Campe. For amongst others, there were slaine two thousand Lacedaemonians, who were arrived but even a little before, coming to aide Cesar. The other also that had not glanced by, but had given a charge full upon Cassius Battell, they easily made them flee; because they were greatly troubled for the losse of their Campe, and of them there were slaine by hand three Legions. Then being very earnest to follow the chafe of them that fled, they ran in amongst them hand over head into their Campe, and Brutus among them. But that which the Conquerours thought not of, occasion shewed it unto them that were overcome: and that was, the left Wing of their Enemies left naked and unguarded of them of the right Wing, who were strait too farre off, in following all of them that were overthrowne. So they gave a hot charge upon them. But, notwithstanding all the force they made, they could not breake into the midst of their Battell, where they found them that received them, and valiantly made head against them. Howbeit they brake and overthrew the left Wing where Cassius was, by reason of the great disorder among them, and also because they had no intelligence how the right Wing had sped. So they chafed them, beating them into their Campe, the which they spoiled, none of both the Chieftaines being present there. For Antonius as it is reported, to flee the fury of the first charge, was gotten into the next Marish: and no man could tell what became of Octavius Caesar, after he was carried out of his Campe. Inasmuch that there were certaine Souldiers that shewed their Swords bloudied, and said that they had slaine him, and did describe his face, and shewed what age he was of. Furthermore, the Voward and the midst of Brutus Battell had already put all their Enemies to flight that withstood them, with great slaughter: so that Brutus had conquered all on his side, and Cassius had lost all on the other side. For nothing undid them, but that Brutus went not to helpe Cassius, thinking he had overcome them, as himself had done; and Cassius on the other side tarried not for Brutus, thinking he had been overthrowne as himselfe was. And to prove that the Victory fell on Brutus side, Messala confirmeth, that they wan three Eagles, and divers other Ensignes of the Enemies, and their Enemies wan never a one of theirs. Now Brutus returning from the chafe, after he had slaine and sacked Cassius men, he wondered much that he could not see Cassius Tent standing up high as it was wont, neither the other Tents of his Campe standing as they were before, because all the whole Campe had been spoiled, and the Tents thrown down, at the first coming of their Enemies. But they that were about Brutus, whose sight served them better, told him that they saw a great glittering of harness, and a number of silvered Targets, that went and came into Cassius Campe, and were not (as they tooke it) the Armors, nor the number of men that they had left there to guard the Camp: and yet that they saw not such a number of dead bodies, and great overthrow as there should have been, if so many Egions had been slaine. This made Brutus at the first mistrust that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keepe the Campe of his Enemy which he had taken, and caused his men to be sent for that yet followed the chafe, and gathered them together, thinking to leade them to aide Cassius, who was in this state as you shall hear. First of all he was marvellous angry to see how Brutus men ran to give charge upon their Enemies, and tarried not for the word of the Battell, nor commandement to give charge: and it grieved him beside, that after he had overcome them, his men fell straight to spoile, and were not carefull to compasse in the rest of the Enemies behinde: but with him tarrying too long also, more then through the valiantnesse and foresight of the Captaines his Enemies, Cassius found himselfe compassed in with the right Wing of his Enemies Army. Whereupon his Horsemen brake immediately, and fled for life towards the Sea. Furthermore perceiving his Footmen to give ground, he did what he could to keepe them from flying, and took an Ensigne from one of the Ensigne-Bearers that fled, and stucke it fast at his feet: although with much ado he could scant keepe his owne Guard together. So Cassius himselfe was at length compelled to flee, with a few about him, unto a little Hill, from whence they might easily see what was done in all the plaine: howbeit Cassius himselfe saw nothing, for his sight was very bad, saving that he saw (and yet with much ado) how the Enemies spoiled his Campe before his eyes. He saw also a great Troope of Horsemen, whom Brutus sent to aide him, and thought that they were his Enemies that followed him: but yet he sent Titinius, one of them that was with him, to go and know what they were. Brutus Horsemen saw him coming afar off, whom when they knew that he was one of Cassius chieft friends, they shouted out for joy, and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their Horses, and went and embraced him. The rest compassed him in round about on horse-backe, with Songs of Victory and great rushing of their Harness, so that they made all the Field ring againe for joy. But this marred all. For Cassius thinking indeed that Titinius was taken of the Enemies, he then spake these words: Desiring too much to live, I have lived to see one of my best friends taken, for my sake, before my face. After that, he got into a Tent where no body was, and tooke Pindarus with him, one of his Bondmen whom he

he reserved ever for such a pinch, since the cursed battell of the PARTHIANS, where Cassius was slaine, though he notwithstanding escaped from that overthrow: but then casting his cloake over his head, and holding out his bare neck unto Pindarus, he gave him his head to be stricken off. So the head was found severed from the body: but after that time Pindarus was never seen more. Whereupon, some tooke occasion to say that he had slaine his master without his commandement. By and by they knew the horsemen that came towards them, and might see Titinius crowned with a Garland of triumph, who came before with great speed unto Cassius. But when he perceived by the cries and tears of his friends which tormented themselves, the misfortune that had chanced to his Captaine Cassius, by mistaking, he drew out his sword, cursing himself a thousand times that he had tarried so long, and slew himself presently in the field. Brutus in the mean time came forward still, and understood also that Cassius had been overthrowne: but he knew nothing of his death, till he came very neare to his Campe. So when he was come thither, after he had lamented the death of Cassius, calling him the last of all the ROMANES; being impossible that Rome should ever breed againe so noble and so valiant a man as he: he caused his body to be buried, and sent it to the City of THASOS, fearing lest his funerals within his Campe should cause great disorder. Then he called his souldiers together, and did encourage them againe. And when he saw that they had lost all their carriage, which they could not brooke well, he promised every man of them two thousand Drachmaes in recompence. After his souldiers had heard his Oration, they were all of them prettily cheered againe, wondering much at his great liberality, and waited upon him with great cries when he went his way, praising him, for that he onely of the foure Chieftaines was not overcome in battell. And to speak the truth, his deeds shewed that he hoped not in vaine to be conqueror. For with few Legions he had slaine and driven all them away that made head against him: and if all his people had fought, and that the most of them had not out gone their enemies to runne to spoile their goods, surely it was like enough he had slaine them all, and had left never a man of them alive. There were slaine of Brutus side about eight thousand men, counting the souldiers slaves, whom Brutus called Brigas: and of the enemies side, as Messala writeth, there were slaine as he suppoeth, more then twice as many more. Wherefore they were more discouraged then Brutus, untill that very late at night, there was one of Cassius men called Demetrius, who went unto Antonius, and carried his masters clothes, whereof he was stripped not long before, and his sword also. This encouraged Brutus enemies, and made them so brave, that the next morning betimes they stood in battell ray againe before Brutus. But on Brutus side, both his Campes stood wavering, and in that great danger. For his owne Campe being full of prisoners, required a good guard to looke unto them: and Cassius Campe on the other side tooke the death of their Captaine very heavily; and beside, there was some vile grudge between them that were overcome, and those that did overcome. For this cause therefore Brutus did set them in battell ray, but yet kept himself from giving battell. Now for the slaves that were prisoners, which were a great number of them, and went and came to, and fro amongst the armed men, not without suspicion: he commanded they should kill them. But for the free men, he sent them freely home, and said, that they were better prisoners with his enemies, then with him. For with them they were slaves and servants: and with him, they were free men and Citizens. So when he saw that divers Captaines and his friends did so cruelly hate some, that they would by no means save their lives: Brutus himself hid them, and secretly sent them away. Among these prisoners, there was one Volumnius a jester, and Saccullio a common player, of whom Brutus made no account at all. Howbeit his friends brought them unto him, and did accuse them, that though they were prisoners, they did not let to laugh them to scorne, and to jest broadly with them. Brutus made no answer to it, because his head was occupied otherways. Whereupon Messala Corvinus said, that it were good to whip them on a scaffold, and then to send them naked, well whipped, unto the Captaines of their enemies, to shew them their shame, to keepe such mates as those in their Campe, to play the fools, to make them sport. Some that stood by, laughed at his device. But Publius Cassia, that gave Julius Caesar the first wound when he was slaine, said then: It doth not become us to be thus merry at Cassius funerals: and for thee Brutus, thou shalt shew what estimation thou makest of such a Captaine thy compeer, by putting to death, or saving the lives of these bloods, who hereafter will mocke him and defame his memory. Brutus answered againe in choller: Why then do ye come to tell me of it, Cassia, and do not your selves what you thinke good? When they heard him say so, they tooke his answer for a consent against these poore unfortunate men, to suffer them to do what they thought good: and therefore they carried them away, and slew them. Afterwards Brutus performed the promise he had made to the souldiers, and gave them the two thousand Drachmaes a peece, but yet he first reproved them, because they went and gave charge upon the enemies at the first battell, before they had the word of battell given them: and made them a new promise also, that if in the second battell they fought like men, he would give them the sacke and spoile of two Cities, to wit, THESSALONICA and LACEDAMON. In all Brutus life there is but this onely fault to be found, and that is not to be gaine-said: though Antonius and Octavius Caesar did reward their souldiers far worse for their victory. For when they had driven all the naturall ITALIANS out of ITALY, they gave their souldiers their lands and Townes, to the which they had no right: and moreover, the only marke they shot at in all this war they made, was but to overcome and raigne. Where in contrary manner they had so great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voice and opinion of the world would not suffer him, neither to overcome, nor to save himself, otherwise then justly and honestly, and specially after Cassius death; whom men burdened, that oftentimes he moved Brutus to great cruelty. now, like as the Mariners on the sea after the rudder of their ships is broken by tempest, do seek to naile on some other peece of wood in lieu thereof, and do helpe themselves to keep them from hurt, as much as may be upon that instant danger: even so Brutus, having such a great Army to govern, and his affairs very standing tickle, and having no other Captain co-equal with him in dignity and authority; he was forced to employ them he had, and likewise to be ruled by them in many things, and was of mind himself also to grant them any thing, that he thought might make them serve like noble souldiers at time of need. For Cassius souldiers were very evil to be ruled, and diddrew themselves very stubborn and lusty in the Campe, because they had no Chieftaine that did command them: but yet ranke towards their enemies, because they had once overcome them. On the other side, Octavius Caesar and Antonius were not in much better state: for first of all they lacked victuals. And because they were lodged in low places, they looked to abide a hard and sharpe Winter, being camped as they were by the Marish side, and also for that after the battell there had fallen plenty of Rain about the Autumne, where through, all their Tents were full of mire and dirt, the which by reason of the cold did freeze incontinently. But beside all these discomforts, there came newes unto them of the great losse they had of their men by sea. For Brutus ships met with a great aide and supply of men, which were sent them out of Italy, and they overthrew them in such sort, that there escaped but few of them: and yet they were so famished, that they were compelled to eat the tackle and sailes of their ships. Thereupon they were very desirous to fight a battell again, before Brutus should have intelligence of this good newes for him: for it chanced so, that the battell was fought by sea, on the selfe same day it was fought by land. But by ill fortune, rather than through the malice or negligence of the Capitaines, this victory came not to Brutus ear till twenty dayes after. For had he known of it before, he would not have been brought to have fought a second battell, considering that he had excellent good provision for his Army for a long time; and besides, lay in a place of great strength, so as his Campe could not be greatly hurt by the Winter, nor also distressed by his enemies: and further, he had been a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by sea, as he was also by land. This would have marvelously encouraged him. Howbeit the state of Rome (in my opinion) being now brought to that passe, that it could no more abide to be governed by many Lords, but required one only absolute Governour: God, to prevent Brutus that it should not come to his Government, kept this victory from his knowledge, though indeed it came but a little too late. For the day before the last battell was given, very late in the night came Clodius, one of his enemies into his Campe, who told that Caesar hearing of the overthrow of his Army by sea, desired nothing more then to fight a battell before Brutus understood it. Howbeit they gave no credit to his words, but despised him so much, that they would not vouchsafe to bring him unto Brutus, because they thought it was but a lie devised, to be the better welcome for this good newes. The selfe same night, it is reported that the monstrous spirit which had appeared before unto Brutus in the City of SARDIS, did now appear again unto him in the selfe same shape and forme, and so vanished away, and said never a word. Now Publius Volumnius, a grave Philosopher, that had been with Brutus from the beginning of this war, he doth make no mention of this spirit, but saith: that the greatest Eagle and Ensigne was covered over with a swarm of Bees, and that there was one of the Capitaines, whose Arme suddainly fell a sweating, that it dropped oile of Roses from him, and that they oftentimes went about to dry him, but all would do no good. And that before the battell was fought, there were two Eagles fought between both Armies, and all the time they fought, there was a marvellous great silence all the valley over, both Armies being one before the other, marking this fight between them; and that in the end, the Eagle towards Brutus gave over and flew away. But this is certain, and a true tale, that when the gate of the Campe was open, the first man the Standard-bearer met that carried the Eagle, was an ETHIOPIAN, whom the souldiers for ill lucke mangled with their swords. Now after that Brutus had brought his Army into the field, and had set them in battell ray, directly against the vaward of his enemy, he paused a long time before he gave the signal of battell. For Brutus riding up and downe to view the bands and companies, it came in his head to mistrust some of them; besides, that some came to tell him so much as he thought. Moreover, he saw his horsemen set forward but faintly, and did not go lustily to give charge, but still slaid to see what the footmen would do. Then suddainly, one of the chieftest Knights he had in all his Army called Camulatinus, and that was alway marvellously esteemed of for his valiantnesse, until that time: he came hard by Brutus on horsebacke, and rode before his face to yeeld himself unto his enemies. Brutus was marvellously sorry for it; wherefore partly for anger, and partly for fear of greater treason and rebellion, he suddainly caused his Army to march, being past three of the clock in the after noone. So in that place where he himself fought in person, he had the better: and brake into the left wing of his enemies, which gave him way, through the help of his horsemen that gave charge with his footmen, when they saw the enemies in amaze and affraid. Howbeit, the other also on the right wing, when the Captains would have had them to have marched; they were afraid to have been compassed in behind, because they were fewer in number then their enemies, and therefore did spread themselves, and leave the middest of their battell. Whereby they having weakened themselves, they could not withstand the force of their enemies, but turned taile straight and fled. And those that had put them to flight, came in straight upon it to compass Brutus behind, who in the middest of the confict, did all that was possible for a skilful Captain and valiant souldier; both in the middest of the confict, as also his hardnesse, for the obtaining of victory. But that which wanne him the victory at the first battell, did now lose it him at the second. For at the first time the enemies that were broken and fled, were straight cut in peeces: but at the second battell, of Cassius men that were were put to flight, there were few slain: and they that saved themselves by speed, being afraid because they had been overcome, did discourage the rest of the Army when they came to joyne with them, and filled all the Army with fear and disorder. There was the sonne of Marcus Cato slaine, valiantly fighting among the lusty youths. For, notwithstanding that he was very weary and over-harried, yet would he not therefore flie, but manfully fighting and laying about him, telling aloud his name, and also his fathers name, at length he was beaten down amongst many other dead bodies of his enemies, which he had slaine round about him. So there were slaine in the field, all the chieftest Gentlemen and Nobility that were in his Army, who valiantly ranne into any danger to save Brutus life: amongst whom there was one of Brutus friends called Lucilius, who seeing a troope of barbarous men, making no reckoning of all men else they met in their way, but going altogether right against Brutus, he determined to stay them with the hazard of life, and being left behind, told them that he was Brutus: and because they should believe him, he prayed them to bring him to Antonius, for he said he was afraid of Caesar, and that he did trust Antonius better. These barbarous men being very glad of this good hap, and thinking themselves happy men, they carried him in the night, and sent some before unto Antonius, to tell him of their coming. He was marvellous glad of it, and went out to meet them that brought him. Others also understanding that they brought Brutus prisoner, they came from all parts of the Campe to see him, some pitying his hard fortune, and others saying, that it was not done like himselfe, so cowardly to be taken alive of the barbarous people for fear of death. When they came neare together, Antonius staid a while bethinking himselfe how he should use Brutus. In the meane time Lucilius was brought to him, who with a bold countenance said: Antonius, I dare assure thee, that no enemy hath taken of he be found, alive or dead, he will be found like himself: and touching my selfe, I am come unto thee, having deceived these men of Armes, making them believe that I was Brutus, and doe not refuse to suffer any torment thou wilt put me to. Lucilius words made them all amazed that heard him. Antonius on the other side, looking upon all them that had brought him, said unto them: My friends, I thinke ye are sorry you have failed of your purpose, and that you thinke this man hath done you great wrong: but I assure you, you have taken a better booty then that you followed. For, in stead of an enemy, you have brought me a friend: and for my part, if you had brought me Brutus alive, truly I cannot tell what I should have done to him. For I rather have such men as this my friends then mine enemies. Then he embraced Lucilius, and at that time delivered him to one of his friends in custody; and Lucilius ever after served him faithfully, even to his death. Now Brutus having passed a little River, environed on either side with high Rocks, and shadowed with great trees, being then darke night, he went no further, but staid at the foote of a Rocke with certaine of his Capitaines and friends that followed him, and looking up to the firmament that was full of starres, sighing, he rehearsed two verses, of the which Volumnius wrote the one, to this effect:

Let not the wight from whom this mischief went (O Jove) escape without due punishment.

And saith, that he had forgotten the other. Within a little while after, naming his friends that he had seene slaine in battell before his eyes, he fetched a greater sigh then before, specially when he came to name Labio and Flavius, of whom the one was his Lieutenant, and the other Capitaine of the Pioners of his Camp. In the meane time one of the company being thirsty, and seeing Brutus thirsty also, he ranne to the River for water, and brought it in his Sallet. At the same time they heard a noise on the other side of the River: whereupon Volumnius tooke Dardanus, Brutus servant with him, to see what it was: and returning straight againe, and asked if there were any water left. Brutus smiling, gently told him, All is drunke, but they shall bring you some more. Thereupon he sent him againe that went for water before, who was in great danger of being taken by the enemies, and hardly escaped, being forewarned. Furthermore, Brutus thought there were not many of his men slaine in battell: and to know the truth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promised to go through his enemies, for otherwise it was impossible to go to see their Campe: and thereupon if all were well, he would lift up a torch-light in the Aire, and then returne againe with speed to him. The torch-light was lift up as he had promised, for Statilius went thither: and a good while after Brutus seeing that Statilius came not againe, he said: If Statilius be alive, he will come againe. But his evill fortune was such, that as he came backe, he fell into his enemies hands and was slaine. Now the night being far spent, Brutus as he fate bowed towards Clitus one of his men, and told somewhat in his eare: the other answered him not, but fell a weeping. Thereupon he proved Dardanus, and said somewhat also to him: and at the last he came to Volumnius himselfe, and speaking to him in Greeke, prayed him for the studies sake which brought them acquainted together, that he would helpe him to put his hand to his sword, to thrust it in him to kill him. Volumnius denied his request, and so did many others: and amongst the rest, one of them said, there was no tarrying for them there, but they must needs flie. Then Brutus rising up, said, We must flie indeed, but it must be with our hands, not with our feet. Then taking every man by the hand, he said these words unto them with a cheerful countenance: It requieth my heart, that not one of my friends hath failed me at my need, and I do not complaine of my fortune, but onely for my Countries sake: for as for me, I thinke my selfe happier then they that have overcome, considering that I leave a perpetuall fame of vertue and honesty, the which our enemies the Conquerours shall never attaine unto by force or money; neither can let their posterity to say, that they being naughty and unjust men, have slaine good men, to usurpe tyrannicall power not pertaining to them. Having so said, he prayed every man to shif for himselfe, and then he went a litle aside with two or three onely, among the which Strato was one, with whom he came first acquainted by the study of Rhetoricke. He came as near to him as he could, and taking his sword by the hilt with both his hands, and falling down upon the point of it, ranne himselfe through. Others lay, that not he, but Strato (at his request) held the sword in his hand, and turned his head aside, and that Brutus fell down upon it, and so ranne himselfe through, and died presently. Messala, that had been Brutus great friend, reconciled afterwards to Octavius Caesars friend, and shortly after, Caesar being at good leisure, he brought Strato, Brutus friend unto him, and weeping, said: Caesar, behold, here is he that did the last service to my Brutus. Then Caesar received him, and afterwards he did him as faithfull service in all his affaires, as any GRECIAN else he had about him, untill the battell of ACTIUM. It is reported also that that Messala himselfe answered Caesar one day, when he gave him great praise before his face, that he had fought valiantly, and with great affection for him at the battell of ACTIUM (notwithstanding that he had been his cruell enemy before, at the battell of PHILIPPES, for Brutus sake) I ever loved, said he, to take the best and justest part. Now Antonius having found Brutus body, he caused it to be wrapped up in one of the richest Coate-armours he had. Afterwards also, Antonius understanding that his Coate-armour was stollen, he put the thiefe to death that had stollen it, and sent the ashes of his Body unto Servilia his Mother. And for Porcia, Brutus wife, Nicolaus the Philosopher, and Valerius Maximus do write, that she determining to kill her self (her Parents and friends carefully looking to her to keep her from it) took hot burning coales and cast them into her mouth, and kept her mouth so close, that she choaked her self. There was a letter of Brutus found written to his friends, complaining of their negligence, that his wife being sick, they would not helpe her, but suffered her to kill her self; chusing to die, rather then to languish in paine. Thus it seemeth that Nicolaus knew not well the time, fith the letter (at the least if it were Brutus letter) doth plainly declare the disease and love of this Lady, and also the manner of her death.

THE COMPARISON OF DION and BRUTUS.

Come now to compare these two noble personages, it is certain that both of them having great gifts in them, namely this for the first, that by small occasions they made themselves great men: herein Dion of both deserueth the chief praise. For he had no co-helper to bring him unto that greatnes, as Brutus had of Cassius, who doubtlesse was not comparable unto him for vertue and respect of honour, though otherwise in respect of warre, he was no lesse wise and valiant then he. For many do impute unto Cassius, the first beginning and original of all the warre and enterprife: and said it was he that did encourage Brutus to conspire Caesars death: whereas Dion furnisht himselfe with armour, ships, and fouldiers, and wanne those friends and compaigns also that did helpe him to prosecute his war. Nor he did not as Brutus, who rose to greatnesse by his enterprises, and by war got all his strength and riches: but he in contrary manner, spent of his own goods to make war for the liberty of his Conuntry, and disbursed of his owne money that should have kept him in his banishment. Furthermore, Brutus and Cassius were compelled of necessity to make warres, because they could not have lived safely in peace when they were driven out of Rome, for that they were condemned to death, and pursued by their enemies. And for this cause thereby they were driven to hazard themselves in warre, more for their owne safety, then for the liberty of their Conuntry: whereas Dion on the other side, living more merrily and safely in his banishment, then the Tyrant Dionysius himselfe that had banished him, did but put himself to that danger, to deliver SICILE from bondage. Now the matter was not alike unto the ROMANES, to be delivered from the Government of Caesar, as it was for the SYRACUSANS to be rid of Dionysius tyranny. For Dionysius denied not, that he was a Tyrant, having filled SICILE with such misery and calamity. Howbeit, the domination of Caesar when it came to be established, did indeed much hurt at the first beginning thereof unto those that opposed against it: but afterwards, unto them that being overcome had received his Government, it seemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a Tyrant, then otherwise that he was so indeed. For there never followed any tyrannicall or cruel act, but contrarily, it seemed that he was a mercifull Physician, whom God had ordained of his special Grace to be Governour of the Empire of Rome, and to set all things again at quiet stay, the which required the counsell and authority of an absolute Prince. And therefore the ROMANES mere marvellous sorry for Caesar after he was slaine, and afterwards would never pardon they that had slaine him. On the other side, the cause why the SYRACUSANS did most accuse Dion, was, because he did let Dionysius escape out of the Castle of SYRACUSA, and because he did not overthrow and deface the Tombe of his father. Furthermore, touching the wars, Dion alway shewed himself a Captain unreprouceable, having wisely and skilfully taken order for those things which he had enterprised of his own head and counsel, and did amend the faults others committed, and brought things to better state then he found them: whereas it seemeth that Brutus did not wisely to receive the second battell, considering his rest stood upon it. For after he had lost the battell, it was impossible ever for him to rise againe: and therefore his heart failed him, and so gave up all, and never durst strive with his evil fortune as Pompey did, considering that he had present cause enough in the field to hope of his fouldiers, and being besides a dreadful Lord all the sea over. Furthermore, the greatest reproch they could object against Brutus, was, that Julius Caesar having saved his life, and pardoned so many prisoners taken in battell, according to his request, taking him for his friend, and honouring him above all his other friends, Brutus notwithstanding had imbrued his hands in his blood.

blood, wherewith they could never reprove Dion. For on the contrary side, so long as Dion was Dionysius friend and kinsman, he did alway helpe him to order and governe his affairs. But after he was banished his Country, and that his wife was forcibly married to another man, and his goods also taken from him, then he entred into iust and open wars against Dionysius the Tyrant. But in this point they were contrary together. For that wherein there chiefest praise consisted, to wit, the hatred of Tyrants and wicked men, was most true and sincere in Brutus. For having no private cause of complaint or grudge against Cæsar, he ventured to kill him, only to let his Country again at liberty: whereas if Dion had not received private cause of quarrel against Dionysius, he would never have made war with him. The which Plato proveth in his Epistles, where is plainly seen, that Dion being driven out of the Tyrants Court against his will, and not putting himself to voluntary banishment, he drave out Dionysius. Furthermore, the respect of the Commonwealth caused Brutus, that before was Pompeys enemy, to become his friend, and enemy unto Cæsar that before was his friend, only referring his friendship and enmity unto the consideration of justice and equity. And Dion did many things for Dionysius sake and benefit, all the while he trusted him: and when he began to mistrust him, then for anger he made warre with him. Wherefore all his friends believed, that after he had driven out Dionysius, he would stablish the government on himself, abusing the people with a more courteous and gentle title then the name of a Tyrant. But for Brutus, his very enemies themselves confessed, that of all those that conspired Cæsars death, he onely had no other end and intent to attempt his enterprize, but to restore the Empire of ROME againe to her former state and government. And furthermore, it was not a like thing to deal with Dionysius, as it was to have to do with Julius Cæsar. For no man that knew Dionysius, but would have despised him, considering that he spent the most part of his time in drinking, dicing, and haunting lewd womens company: but to have undertaken to destroy Julius Cæsar, and not to have shrunk back for fear of his great wisdom, power, and fortune, considering that his very name was dreadful unto every man, and suffered not the Kings of PARTHIA and INDIA to be in rest for him: this could not but come of a marvellous noble mind of him that for fear never fainted, nor let fall any part of his courage. And therefore, so soon as Dion came into SICILE, many thousands of men came and joyned with him against Dionysius. But the same of Julius Cæsar did set up his friends againe after his death, and was of such force, that it raised a young stripling Octavius Cæsar (that had no meanes nor power of himselfe) to be one of the greatest men of ROME: and they used him as a remedy to encounter Antonius malice and power. And if men will say, that Dion drave out the Tyrant Dionysius by force of armes, and sundry battels: and that in contrary manner Brutus slew Cæsar, being a naked man, and without guard: then do I answer again, that it was a noble part, and of a wife Captain, to chuse so apt a time and place, to come upon a man of so great power, and to find him naked without his guard. For he went not suddainly in a rage and alone, or with a small company to assaile him: but his enterprize was long time before determined of, and that with divers men, of all the which, not a man of them once failed him: but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he chose them honest men, or else by that his choise of them he made them good men. Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wife choise in trusting of evil men, or else because he could not tell how to use them he had cosen, of good men he made them become evil: so that neither the one nor the other could be the part of a wise man. For Plato himselfe reproveth him, for that he had chosen such men for his friends, that he was slaine by them: and after he was slaine no man would then revenge his death. And in contrary manner, of the enemies of Brutus, the one (who was Antonius) gave his body honourable burial: and Octavius Cæsar the other, reserved his honours and memories of him. For at MILLAN (a City of GAULE on ITALIE side) there was an image of his in brasse, very like unto him: the which Cæsar afterwards passing that way, beheld very advisedly, for that it was made by an excellent-workman, and was very like him, and so went his way. Then he staid suddainly againe, and called for the Governors of the City, and before them all told them that the Citizens were his enemies, and traitors unto him, because they kept an enemy of his among them. The Governours of the City at the first were astonied at it, and stoutly denied it: and none of them knowing what enemy he meant, one of them looked on another. Octavius Cæsar then turning him unto Brutus statue, bending his browes, said unto them: this man you see standing up here, is he not our enemy? Then the Governors of the City were worse afraid then before, and could not tell what answer to make him. But Cæsar laughing and commending the GAULES for their faithfulness to their friends, even in their adversities: he was contented Brutus image should stand still as it did.

THE LIFE OF ARATUS.

Ann. Mund.

Ant. Christ.

Hrysippus the Philosopher (my friend Polycrates) being afraid, as it seemeth, of the evil sound of an ancient Proverb not rightly as it was spoken, and in use, but as he thought it best, he wrote in this manner:

What children do their ancestors commend,
But those whom fortune favours to the end?

But Dionysodorus TROEZENIAN reproving him, doth rehearse the proverb rightly as indeed it is:

What children do their ancestors commend,
But those whose life is vertuous to the end?

Saying, that this proverb stoppeth their mouthes, who of themselves are unworthy of praise, and yet are still boasting of the vertues of their ancestors, whose praise they highly extoll. But before those that (as Pindarus saith)

Do match their noble ancestors in promesse of their owne,

And by their fruites commend the stocke whence they themselves are growne,

(As thy selfe that conformest thy life unto the examples and manners of thy vertuous ancestors:) it is no small good hap for them, often to remember the noble Deeds of their parents in hearing them spoken of, or otherwise for themselves oftentimes to remember some notable doings of their parents. For in them, it is not for lacke of commendable vertues, that they report others praise and glory: but in joyning their own vertues, to the vertues of their ancestors, they do increase their glory, as inheriting their vertuous life, as challenging their descent by blood. Therefore, having written the life of Aratus thy Countreiman, and one of thy ancestors whose glory and greatnesse thou doest not blemish, I do send it unto thee, not that I thinke but that thou hast more diligently then any man else searched out all his deeds and sayings: but yet, because that thy two sonnes, Polycrates and Pythocles, reading and still hearing something reported, might be brought up at home by the example of their ancestors, whose deeds shall lie before them to follow. For he loveth himself more, then he regardeth perfect vertue, or his credite: that thinketh himself so perfect, as he need not follow any others example.

City. Now when the common-wealth began to grow to a certaine state of Government, Timoclidus died: and Abantidas the sonne of Pasias, pretending to make himselfe Lord of the City, he slew Clinias, and put to death some of his parents and friends, drave away others, and fought also to put his son Aratus to death, that was but then seven years old. But in this hurly burly and tumult, Aratus flying out of his fathers house, among them that ranne away, and wandering up and downe the City, being scared and afraid, finding no man to helpe him: by good fortune he got into a womans house, called Soso, which was Abantidas sister, and wife unto Periphanus, his father Clinias brother. She being of a noble minde, and judging that the child Aratus by Gods providence fled unto her; hid him in her house, and in the night secretly sent him unto the City of Argos. Now after that Aratus had escaped, and was safe from this danger: from that time there bred in him a vehement malice against Tyrants, the which still increased in him as he grew in yeares. So he was veruouly brought up in the City of Argos, with his fathers friends: and perceiving with himself that he waxed bigge and stronge, he disposed his body to divers exercises, and became so excellent in them, that he contented in five manner of exercises, and oftentimes bare the best away. And in his images and statues, he appeared in face full and well liking, as one that fed well, and the majesty of his countenance argueth that he used such exercise: and such commonly are large eaters. From whence it came, that he did not give himselfe so much to pleading, as peradventure was requisite for a Governour of a Common-wealth. Howbeit, some do judge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he had an eloquent tongue then seemed unto some: because he wrote them in haste, having other businesse in hand, and even as things came first into his mind. But afterwards, Dinias and Aristotle Logician slew Abantidas, who did commonly use to sit in the Market-place, to hear their matters, and to talke with them. And this gave them good meanes and opportunity to worke their feate they did. After Abantidas death, his father Pasias possessed the Tyranny: whom Nicoles afterwards slew also by treason, and made himselfe Tyrant in his place. It is reported that this Nicoles did lively resemble the countenance of Periander, the sonne of Cypselus, as Orontes PERSIAN was very like unto Alcmaon, the sonne of Amphiaraus: and another young LACEDEMONIAN, unto Hellor of TROY, whom Myrsillus writeth, was troden under mens feet, through the over-great presse of people that came to see him, when they heard of it. This Nicoles was Tyrant four moneths together, in the which he did wonderful great hurt to the City, and had almost lost it; the ATOLIANS coming on a suddaine, who were like to have taken it. Now Aratus was come to the state of a stripling, and was greatly esteemed for the noble house he came of, and also for the great courage they found in him, which was no such matter: and besides that, he had a majestie in his countenance, being wiser then was looked for in a young man of his yeares: therefore the banished men from the City of SICYONE, repaired unto him before any other man. Nicoles for his part also was not carelesse of his doings, but had an eye ever to see what Aratus intended, although he little mistrusted any such bold enterprife, nor so dangerous an exploit of him: but did onely conjecture that he did stirre up the Kings which had been his dead fathers friends. And so indeed Aratus tooke that course. But when he saw that Antigonus still delayed his promises, and did alwayes tract time, and that the hope of aid from King Ptolomy of EGYPT was so far off, at length he determined to undertake to destroy the Tyrant himself. So he first consulted with Aristomachus and Ecdelus; of the which the one was banished from SICYONE, and the other an ARCADIAN, from the City of MEGALIPOLIS, a Philosopher, and a valiant man of his hands and had been Scholar unto Arcesilanus the Academicke, in the City of ATHENS. These two men being contented to joyne with Aratus, he practised with other of the banished men also: of the which there were some that were ashamed, not to be partakers of his hope and noble attempt, and so did also joyne with him. Howbeit the most part of them did not onely refuse to enter into that practise, but further, went about to dissuade Aratus from his enterprife, saying: that for lacke of knowledge and experience, he understood not the danger in undertaking such a matter, altogether so unlikely. Now as Aratus was thinking in his mind to keep a certaine place in the territory of SICYONE, from whence they might make warre with the Tyrant, there came a prisoner unto them out of the City of Argos, that had broken prison from the Tyrant of SICYONE and was brother unto Xenocles, one of the banished men. He being brought by the same Xenocles unto Aratus, told that in the place whereby he saved himself, the ground within was almost as high as the top of the wall, the which in that part joyned into high stony places: and that without the wall the height was not so great, but that it was easily scalable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he sent two of his men, Seuthas and Technon, with Xenocles to view the wall, being determined if it were true, rather to prove secretly to execute his pretended enterprife, and quickly to put it to a venture, then to be begin a long warre, and to prepare an open Army, he being a private man, to go against the power of a Tyrant. Xenocles being returned again to Aratus, after he had measured the height of the wall, he reported that the place was not unscalable, but yet very hard to come to it undiscovered, because of certain little curst curs a Gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would never leave barking. Howbeit Aratus would not leave off his enterprife so. Now it was not strange to see every man prepare themselves of Armor and weapon, because at that time there were great robberies and cruel murders committed by highways, and one would assault another: but for the ladders, Enphranor that was a Carpenter and maker of Engines, did not stick to make them openly, because his common occupation did take away all suspition why they were made. For this Carpenter was himselfe also a banished man from SICYONE, as the residue were. Furthermore, Aratus friends he had in Argos, of those few men they had, did did every man of them lend him ten men, and armed thirty of his own men: besides them, Aratus himselfe also did hire some pretty number of souldiers, by the practise of Xenophilus, whom the Captaines of the thieves did furnish. They were given to understand that they should be led to the territory of SICYONE, to take a prey of cattel and colts of the King, and they were sent before some one way, some another, with commandement; all to meet together at the tower of Polygnotus, where they should tarry. So he sent Caphefias also before, without any weapons, with foure companions with him: who should come to this Gardiners house in the night, like strangers and travellers, to lie in his house, and to locke him up and his dogges, because they had no other device to get in but that way. But in the mean time, there were certaine spies of Nicoles the Tyrant discovered, that walked up and down the City (making no countenance of any matter) to see what Aratus did. Wherefore, Aratus went out of his house early in the morning (as his manner was) and walked to the Market-place with his friends. Then he went to the shew-place (or place of exercises) and there stripped himselfe, anointed him, and wrestled, and in the end took certaine of the young Gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make merry, and to passe the time away with him: and immediately after, one of his servants was seen in the Market-place, carrying Garlands of flowers, another was seen also buying of Links and Torches, and another hiring of these common dancing and singing women, which follow feasts and banquets with their instruments. Nicoles spies seeing that, were deceived; for one of them laughing on another said, that they might easily see by that, there was nothing more fearful and timorous then a Tyrant: considering that Nicoles being Lord of so great a City, was afraid of a young stripling, that spent all that he could rap and send to keep him in his banishment, upon vaine bankets and feasts at noone dayes. And thus were the Tyrants spies finely mocked. Aratus selfe departed immediately after dinner out of Argos, and went unto the souldiers, whom he had appointed before to meet him at the tower of Polygnotus, and led them straight unto NEMEA. There he told them openly his full intent and purpose, having before made an Oration unto them to incourage them, and also made them marvellous faire promises. Then he gave them for their watch-word Apollo favourable, and so went directly to the City of SICYONE, marching with great speed at the first because of the going down of the Moon, and afterwards slacked his pace a little, so that they had Moone-light all the way as they came, and the Moone went not down, untill they were come to the Gardiners house that was hard by the wall. So Caphefias, whom he had sent before unto the Gardiners house, came to meet with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogges, because they ranne away; howbeit that he had made fast the Gardiner in his own house. This discouraged the most part of all the company, who would needs have him in any case to returne backe againe. But Aratus then began to comfort them, and promised that he would lead them backe againe, if it chanced that the dogges were too busie with them: and therewithal presently caused the ladder men to go before, whom Ecdelus and Mnasibius led, and he himselfe came faire and softly after. The dogges made a foule barking, and were baying about Ecdelus and his company. This notwithstanding, they came safe to the wall, and did set up their scaling ladders. But even as the first men got upon them, the Captaine of the watch that had given place to him that should ward in the morning, came by chance, and passed hard by them, visting the souldiers with a little bell, and there was a number of torches, and a great noise of men that followed him. They that were upon the ladders hearing them, ducked down, and stirred not; and thereby the souldiers that passed by them, could not see them. But now the new morning watch came toward them also, which did put them in great danger to be discovered: but yet they once againe escaped them, and were not discovered, because the second watch went beyond them, and stayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnasibius immediately scaled the wall, and sent Technon with all possible speed unto Aratus, to will him to make all the haste he could to come to them. Now there was no great distance betwixt the Garden where the dogs were, and the wall, and a little Tower where they kept a great Greyhound to keep watch: but the Greyhound never heard their coming, either because he was a cowardly cur of nature, or else for that he had been over-couried and wearied the day before. But the Gardiners little curres that bawled and barked beneath, had wakened the Greyhound with their barking, who at the first began to answer them with a soft gining; but when they came by the Tower where he lay, he barked out aloud, that all the place thereabouts range of his barking. Infomuch that the Scout which was further off, called aloud to the Hunt that kept the dogge, and asked what he ailed, that he made such a barking, and whether there were any thing stirring or not, that angered him. The Hunt within the Tower answered, that it was nothing, but that his dogge was naked, and fell a barking at the lights of the watch that passed by, and at the noise of the bell. This made Aratus souldiers a great deal the bolder: because they thought that the Hunt had been made privy to their enterprife, and that he went about to hide their secret attempt; and hoped also that there were many other within the City that would further their enterprife. When they came to get up upon the wall, it was of a great height and very dangerous, because the ladders shooke and bowed, by reason of the weight of the men, unlesse they did come up faire and softly one after another. Further more, the time did put them in some perill, because the cockes began to crow, and the Country folke that brought things to the Market to sell, began to come apace to the Towne out of every quarter. And therefore Aratus made haste to get up, having onely forty men above with him, and looked for some besides to come up, which were yet beneath. Then he marched directly toward the Tyrants Pallace, where his hired souldiers kept watch and ward: and comming suddainly upon them, laid hold of every man of them, and slew not one. Then he sent into into the City to his friends, to will them to come unto him. Thereupon they ranne out of every corner to Aratus. Now the day began to break, and straight the Theater was full of people that gathered together, because of the noise and stir they heard in the City, not knowing what the matter meant, until at length an Herald proclaimed with open voice that it was Aratus the son of Clinias who called his Countymen and Citizens to the recovery of their liberty. Then they perswading themselves that the thing which they long wished and looked for, was now come to passe, they ranne all in a troope together to the Tyrants house, and set it on fire. But the flame rose so high and great after the fire had taken it in every part, that it was seen to the City of CORINTH: insomuch that the CORINTHIANS wondering what the matter should be, were in minde to have gone to helpe it. Now for Nicoteles, he saved himselfe, and got out of the City by secret vaults he had made under the ground. The souldiers on the other side quenching the fire with the helpe of the Citizens, did sacke all they found in the Tyrants Pallace: which Aratus hindred not, but did moreover make all the rest of the Tyrants goods common amongst them. So his enterprise had so good successe, that there was none of his owne company slaine he brought with him, neither any of their enemies that were within the City; fortune kept this exploit so pure and cleane from any bloodshed. Then Aratus restored fourefcore men unto their lands and goods againe, whom the Tyrant Nicoteles had banished: and others also, that had been banished by former Tyrants, to the number of five hundred men, who had been well-neare fifty yeares-space banished out of their Country. Now the most of them being come home poore and needy, would have entred on their goods and lands they enjoyed before: and so entring againe upon their lands in their Country, and their houses in the City, they amazed Aratus withall, seeing Antigonus on the one side practise all the meanes he could to winne SICYONE being now free, and they all in an uproare and mutiny in the City. Therefore, following the best counsel he could think upon and devise, considering the danger of the present time: he joyned the City in league and friendship with the ACHAIANS, and of them all made but one body. And because the Citizens of SICYONE were DORIANS, they were glad to submit themselves to be governed and protected by the name of the ACHAIANS, who were at that time of no great fame nor power. For they dwelt in little Villages, and had no great bounds of lands, neither were they very speciall good, for that they stood upon the sea side, where was no manner of haven nor port, but stones, and Rocks good store: and the sea beating upon them, did ease in to the maine land. This notwithstanding, they made their enemies know, that the power of GREECE when it was united and governed by good policy, was of great force and almost invincible. For the ACHAIANS being in comparison of the ancient force of GREECE, of no regard, and but a part of one City enfeebled with civill and foraigne warre; so long as they could submit themselves to be ruled by the wisdom and vertue of their Capitaine, and not envy nor malice his prosperity and soveraignty: they did not onely maintaine themselves as free men, in the midst of the servitude of so many great Cities, large and mighty, but did also deliver many other people of GREECE from their Tyrants. Now, for Aratus mainers: he was one that by nature loved civil government, and equity among Citizens in one self City: he was nobly minded, and more painful about the affairs of the Commonwealth, then careful of his own business, and hated Tyrants to the death, & employed his good or evil will wholly for the service of the Commonwealth. And therefore he seemed not to be so found a friend, as he was a gentle and merciful enemy: framing himself in either of both, as time served for the Commonwealth. To be short, it was a general and common voice among all the Cities confederates, in private company, and at open meetings in the Theaters: that Aratus loved nothing but vertue, and honesty; that in open wars he was not so valiant and couragions, and he was crafty and subtile to take a City on the suddain. Furthermore, though he was valiant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he would never have brought to passe: yet it seemeth he left many things possible undone the which he might easily have done, for that he durst not venture on them. For as there be beasts whose sight is perfect by night, and by day they can see nothing, because the subtilty of the humor and moisture in their eyes is dried up, and cannot abide the bright light of the day: even so, men that otherwise by nature are very wise, are easily afraid of danger, when they must venture on it at noone days: where contrarily they are bold in secret enterprises, suddainly to attempt any thing. Now this contrariety and difference in men well brought up groweth through ignorance and lacke of instruction in Philosophy, which of it selfe doth nourish vertue, as fruit that springeth up without planting, or helpe of mans hand. But this is best discerned by examples. So Aratus having joyned himselfe and his City SICYONE unto the ACHAIANS, and serving in person as a man of Armes among the rest, he was marvellously beloved of his Generals, that saw him so obedient. For, notwithstanding, that he had made so large a contribution as the estimation of himselfe, and the force of his City unto the Commonwealth of the ACHAIANS: yet he was ready to obey and execute the commandments of the Generals, as the poorest and meanest souldier, were he of DYMA or of TRITA, or of any other small village whatsoever. Furthermore, a great summe of money being sent him from King Ptolomy for a gift, amounting to twenty and five talents, he tooke it, but forthwith disposed it amongst his poor Countymen, both to relieve their wants, as also to redeeme prisoners. This notwithstanding the banished men still vexed and troubled them that had their goods and lands, to have them out of their hands, and otherwise would be satisfied by no means. Their Commonwealth therefore being in great danger to fall into civill war, Aratus perceiving there was no other way to helpe this mischiefe, but by Ptolomies liberality: he determined to go unto him, to pray him to helpe him with money, to pacifie this grudge and tumult. So he embarked at

at the haven of METHONA, above the foreland of MALEA, to saile from thence into EGYPT: howbeit he had such a contrary wind, and the sea rose so high, that the master of the ship, was driven to let her go whither she would to take sea room. So being driven quite from his direct course, with great danger he got to the City of ADRIA, which was his enemy: because Antigonus kept it, and had a Garrison in it. But Aratus did wisely prevent it, going ashore, and wandered far from the sea, with one of his friends called Timanthes, and got into a wood, whereby they had an evil nights rest. He had not gone far after he had left his ship, but the Capitaine of the Garrison came, and sought for him. Notwithstanding, his servants had mocked him finely (being before instructed by Aratus what answer they should make) saying that he was gone, and fled into the Isle of EUBOEA. Howbeit, the Capitaine of the Garrison stayed the ship, his men, and all things else she had in her, and tooke her for a good prize. Within few dayes after, Aratus being marvellously troubled, and at a straight with himselfe what he should do, there happily arrived a ROMANE ship hard by the place where he kept most, partly to hide himselfe, and partly also to see if he could discover any thing. This ship was bound for SYRIA. So he had dealt with the master of the ship in that sort, that he took him aboard, and promised he would deliver him in CARIA, and so he did. But he was in as much danger this second journey againe by sea, as he was in the first he made towards EGYPT. From CARIA, a long time after, Aratus went into EGYPT, and spake with the King, who made very much of him: for Aratus fed him still by sending him passing faire tables, and pictures of GREECE, of excellent workmanship. And indeed having a singular good wit, he alwayes got together, and brought the excellentest painted pictures he could get, but specially the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus, to send them unto the King. For learning flourished yet in the City of SICYONE, and they esteemed the painting of tables in that City, to be the perfectest for true colours and fine drawing, of all other places. Insomuch as Apelles (though he was then of a marvellous fame for painting) went thither, and gave to these two excellent Painters a talent, to remaine a while in their company: not so much to attaine to the perfection of the Art, as thereby to win himselfe fame. And therefore when Aratus had restored his City again to liberty, he caused all the Images of the Tyrants to be defaced and plucked down: howbeit he stood doubtful a long time, whether he should deface Ariftratus picture, or not, who reigned in the time of Philip. For he was painted with the hands of all the Scholars of Melanthus, being by a triumphant Chariot, that carried a victory, and as Ptolomee the Geographer writeth, Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a passing peece of worke to see to, so that Aratus at the first yeilded, and was contented to save it for the excellency of the workmanship: yet in the end, overcome with the extreame hate he bare unto Tyrants, he bad it should be defaced. Now it is reported also, that Neacles the Painter, being one of Aratus friends, prayed him with the teares in his eyes to pardon such a notable peece of work. But when he saw Aratus so hard hearted that he would not grant it, he told him, it was good reason to make war with Tyrants, but not with their pictures. Let us then (quoth he) leave the Chariot of triumph and victory, and I will make thee see Ariftratus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus was contented to let him have his will. Then Neacles defaced the picture of Ariftratus, and in place thereof drew onely a Palme-tree, and durst adde nothing else to it of his own device. Some say, that under the Chariot were conveyed Ariftratus feet defaced. So Aratus by meanes of these tables and pictures, was marvellously well beloved of King Ptolomee. But after he was acquainted with him, and knew his conversation, he loved him then better than before. Insomuch that he gave him a hundred and fifty talents to keep his City withall: of the which, he carried fourty away with him unto PELOPONNESUS, and the King afterwards sent him the rest at sundry times. Now this was a marvellous matter of him to get such a masse of money together for his Citizens: considering that the Orators, Captaines and Governors of free Cities, for a little sum of money onely which they have taken of Kings and Princes, have been corrupted and betrayed their Towns and Country. But this was a more wonder, that by means of this money he made peace and love betwixt the poor and rich: and furthermore, saved upright all the people of SICYONE, where he shewed himselfe marvellous wise and temperate, being of that great power and authority he was. For after they had chosen him arbitrator to judge, compound and absolutely to decide all quarrels and strife between the banished men, he would never undertake it himselfe alone, but tooke fiftene other of the chiefe Citizens with him; and with them, by great paines and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his Citizens, and made them good friends one with another. Therefore not onely all the inhabitants and Citizens of SICYONE together, decreed publike honors meet for him, but also the banished men themselves did privately cast his image in brasse, and set it up, under the which they caused this inscription to be graven:

Thy prowess and thy feates of Armes, thy counsel sage and wise,
Not onely are among the Greekes extolled to the skies,
But also to the utmost straights of Marroke blowne by same.
And we that through thy goodnesse home into our Country came,
Have set this image up to thee Aratus, as a signe
Of our deliverance through thy love, and through the power divine.
For thy good nature furthred by good fortune doth restore Us Country, Lawes, and Liberty, bereft us quite before.

Aratus having done all these things, he suppressed the envy of the Citizens, through the great good good turnes he had done unto them. But then King Antigonus being angry with Aratus in his mind, and seeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be mistrusted of Ptolomy, he did him many other great courtesies, Aratus never seeking them at his hands. But one day specially above the rest, as he did sacrifice unto the gods at CORINTH, he sent Aratus part of his weathers he had sacrificed, unto SICYONE. And at the feast of his sacrifice in the hearing of many noble men that were bidden guests, he said openly of Aratus: I did alway thinke that this young SICYONIAN could not but have a liberal mind, loving the liberty of his Country and Countriemen: but I perceive now he is a man that can judge of Princes manners and affairs. For heretofore he made no account of us, because his hope was out of his Country, and he greatly esteemed the riches of EGYPT, hearing talke of so many Elephants, of such a great Fleet of ships, and of such a sumptuous Court, as King Ptolomies Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it is only but a smoke and vaine pompe, he is come to us: and for my part, he is welcome to me, and I will have you all to take him for my friend. These words of King Antigonus, were straight taken at bound of certain envious men, and carried for lacke of better matter unto King Ptolomy, every man striving who should write all the evil they could against him: so that Ptolomy thereupon sent a messenger of purpose unto him, to reprove him for it. Thus fell there out much envy and malice, between the earnest love of these Princes and Kings, that contended with each other who should have Aratus. Furthermore, the first time that Aratus was chosen Lieutenant General of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, he foraged and spoiled the Country of LOCRIE, which lieth directly over against ACHAIA, and CALYDONIA also. Howbeit he came not time enough to aid the BOEOTIANS, in the battell which they lost before the City of CHERONEA, against the ETOLIANS: where Abacritus, governor of BOEOTIA was slaine in the field, with a thousand other BOEOTIANS. Howbeit the next year following, he being the second time chosen Lieutenant General, he attempted to winne the Castle of CORINTH againe, being an enterprise which not onely concerned the private benefit of SICYONE it selfe, and the tribe of ACHAIANS, but also of all GREECE besides. For, he was fully bent to drive the Garrison of the MACEDONIANS thence, the which seemed even a very yoke that held all the GRECIANS noses to the grindstone. For like as Chares, Captaine of the ATHENIANS, having in a certain conflict discomfited the Kings Lieutenants, wrote unto the ATHENIANS, that had won a victory halfe sifter to the victory of MARATHON: even so methinks it were no disgrace to say, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tyrants, which was done by Pelopidas the THEBAN, and ThraSybulus the ATHENIAN; saving that this last act was more famous, because it was not against GRECIANS, but amongst strangers and foraigne power and government, upon whom it was executed. For the Isthmus or barre of PELOPONNESUS, which separateth the sea Egeum from the sea Ionium, doth come and joyn the firm land of the rest of GREECE with the PRESCHE and Island of PELOPONNESUS. Even so likewise the mountain called Acrocorinth, on the which the Castle standeth, rising up in the midst of GREECE, when there is any garison of men of war in it, it cutteth off all trafficke and passage by, of any Armies of them which inhabit within the straight, for them that are without the straight, both by sea and by land, and maketh him only Lord of the Country that keepeth the Castle. So that it was not for sport, but for truth, and in good earnest, that Philip the young King of MACEDON was wont to call the City and Castle of CORINTH, the stocks and gyves of GREECE. And therefore was this Castle marvellously wished and desired of every man, but specially of Kings and Princes. But the desire Antigonus had of it was so vehement, that it differed nothing from the passions of a franticke lover. For he did nothing else continually but study and devise how he might winne it upon the sudden, from them that kept it: because otherwise by open force, it was impossible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that Castle, being poisoned (as it is reported) by Antigonus practise, the Castle being left in the hands of his wife Nicea, who governed the state of CORINTH, and did carefully cause the Acrocorinth to be kept, he immediately sent his son Demetrius thither, and put Nicea in good hope to marry her with this young Prince: a thing that pleased this Lady well, though she was very old. So, for her selfe she was won straight, by meanes of his young son Demetrius, whom he used as a stale to intrap her. Howbeit Nicea for all this goodly offer, forsooke not her Castle, but alwayes made it straightly to be looked unto. Antigonus seemed to make no account of it, but daily gave himself to make sumptuous sacrifices, feasts, and playes to the gods, within the City of CORINTH for the marriage: as though he meant no other thing, but banqueting and jollity all that might be. When the houre was come to see these sports, and that the Musician Amabens, began to sing, he himself made as though he would accompany Nicea unto the Theater, being conveyed thither in a sumptuous rich litter, as it had been for a Queen. She was very glad of this honour, and thought nothing lesse then of that which happened her. But when Antigonus came to the end of a street that turned to go up the hill towards the Castle, he bade her keep on still to the Theater: and himselfe in the meane time left Amabens there with his singing, and all the feast of the marriage, and went straight up to the Castle, forcing himself above his strength and yeares. When he was at the top of the hill, and found the Gates shut, he knocked with his staffe, and commanded the Garrison to open him the Gates. They wondering to see him there in person, did let him in. When he was gotten into the Castle, he was so exceeding joyfull of it, that he had no reason to moderate his joy; but would banquet in the midst of streets, and in the Market-place, having Minstrels to play upon their instruments at his Table, wearing Garlands of Flowers on their heads for joy; and did so fondly and lightly behave himselfe, as if he had been a light young man (and not as he was) an old man, who had proved proved such sundry changes of fortune, and yet suffered himself to be thus carried away with pleasure, that he embraced and spake to every man he met. Whereby it is easie to judge, that joy possessing a man without wit or discretion, it maketh him besides himselfe, and doth more trouble his wits, then paine or feare. Now Antigonus having won the Castle of the Acrocorinth, as you have heard, he put it into the hands of those he trusted best, to be safely kept: and therefore made Persam the Philosopher, Captaine of the Castle. But indeed Aratus was in minde to have attempted the taking of the Castle in Alexanders life time: yet he let it alone, because he joyned himselfe with the ACHAIANS. But at that time there was offered him another occasion againe to attempt it, and this it was. At CORINTH there were foure Brethren borne in SYRIA, of the which, one of them being called Diocles, was a Souldier of the Castle: and the rest having robbed the Kings Treasure, went straight unto SICYONE, to Egeus the Banker, whom Aratus employed in his Faculty. These three Brethren immediately sold him part of the Gold they had robbed: and afterwards, one of them (called Erginus) coming often to see him, by little and little sold him all the rest. By this meanes Egeus fell into familiar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the Garrison of the Castle of the Acrocorinth. Erginus told him, that going unto his Brother up those steepe and high Rocks, he found a path as it were cut out of the Rocks, that went to a place of the Wall of the Castle, which was very low. Egeus hearing that, answered him smiling: Alas, my friend, what meane you to steale a little piece of Gold to hinder the King, when in one houre space you can sell such a great masse of Money together? For as well shall you die if you be apprehended for this felony, as if you were otherwise attained for Treason. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promised that he would seele his Brother Diocles minde in it, for he did not greatly trust his other Brethren. So returning shortly after, he bargained with Aratus to bring him to a place of the Wall that was not above fifteene foote high, promising that he would helpe him to execute the rest, with his Brother Diocles. Aratus promised then to give him fifty Talents, if he brought his Enterprize to passe: and if he failed, that he would then give either of them, a House and a Talent. Erginus would have the whole fifty Talents put into Egeus the Bankers hands. Aratus had not so much ready Money, and besides he would not take it up at usury, for feare of giving cause to suspect his Enterprize. Wherefore he tooke all his Plate of Gold and Silver, and his Wives Jewels, and laid them to gage to Egeus, to disburse the said summe. But Aratus had so great and noble a minde in him, and was so bent to do notable acts, that knowing how Phocion and Epaminondas had bene esteemed for the justest and honestest men of GREECE, because they had refused great Gifts that were offered them, and would never sell nor staine their Honour for Money: he yet surpassing them, was contented to spend his owne, to bring any good Enterprize to passe, and did put his life in danger for the common benefit of his Countrymen; they themselves knowing nothing of his Enterprize, which turned all to their benefit. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimity and courage of such a man, and that will not even now as it were, be willing to aide him, considering how dearly he bought so great a danger of his person, and how he laid his Plate and all the Riches he had to gage, to be brought in the night among the midst of his Enemies, where he was to fight for his owne life, having no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of such a noble Enterprize, and nothing else? But now, though the Enterprize of it selfe was dangerous, an error chancing through ignorance at the first, made it yet more dangerous. For Aratus had sent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to view the Wall. This Technon had never spoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his minde what manner of man he was, by the markes that Erginus had given him of him: that he had a blacke curled haire, that his face was blacke; and that he had no beard. Now Technon being come to the place where Erginus said he would be with Diocles, he stayed before the Towne in a place called ORNIS. So whilest he was tarrying there, the elder Brother of Diocles (called Dionysius, who knew nothing of the Enterprize, nor was made acquainted withall, and looked very like his Brother Diocles) came that way by chance. Technon being moved by the markes he saw in him, like unto those he was told of, asked him if he were nothing a kin unto Erginus. The other answered him, he was his Brother. Then Technon perswading himselfe it was certainly Diocles that spake to him, without asking him his name, or making other inquiry of him, he tooke him by the hand, and began to talke with him of the practice he had with Erginus, and to aske him of it. Dionysius taking the matter upon him, and feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the City, holding him on still with talke, Technon mistrusting nothing. But even as Dionysius was ready to take him fast by the collar, his Brother Erginus came. Who, perceiving how Technon had mistaken the matter, and the danger he was in, beckoned to him with his head to flie; and so they both ran for life unto Aratus, to save themselves. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more discouraged for this, but sent Erginus straight to carry his Brother Dionysius Money, and to pray him not to be knowne of any thing: who furthermore brought him with him unto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him sure for starting: for they bound him, and locked him up fast in a Chamber, whilest they went about their Enterprize. So when all things were ready, Aratus commanded the rest of his Army that they should tarry behinde, armed all night: and he himselfe with foure hundred of the best men he had (not knowing themselves whether they went, nor to what intent) went straight to the Gates of the City, passing by the Temple of Juno. This was about the midst of Summer, when the Moone was at the full, and the Element very cleare without clouds: insomuch that they were afraid their Armour would glister by Moone-light, and bewray them. But as the foremost of them came neare unto the City, there arose clouds out of the Sea that darkned all the City and places thereabouts, and shadowed them.

Chares fl. Aratus gave Arisippus the Victory.

Aratus Victory of the Tyrant Arisippus.

after supper turned all his men out of the doores, and then shut his Court Gates to him, and locked himselfe alone with his Concubine, in a little high Chamber with a tray-dooer, and set his Bed upon it, and so slept, as one that continually was afraid of himselfe. Then, after he was come up, his Concubines Mother came to take up the Ladder, and locked it in another Chamber: and so did let it downe againe the next morning, and called this trim Tyrant, that went downe out of his Chamber, like a Snake that should have crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrary manner, not having obtained by force of Armes, but lawfully through vertue, a continuall Government, being simply appaerled with a poore Gowne of small price, and shewing himselfe a mortall Enemy unto all sorts of Tyrants, hath left a Race and noble Off-spring among the GRECIANS, which remaine yet untill this present day. Contrarily also, there are few Tyrants that do usurpe the Castles of free Cities, that keepe so many Souldiers in pay, that make such Provision for Armour and Weapon, and have so many Gates and Draw-bridges for the safety of their persons; that in the end can keepe themselves from violent death, no more then Hares: neither do leave also any Posterity, House or Grave, why their memory should be honoured after their death. So Aratus having divers waies made sundry attempts, both by open force, and otherwise suddenly to take the City of ARGOS, and to thrust out the Tyrant Arisippus, he ever failed of his purpose, but specially one night among the rest, when he entred the City very dangerously, with a few Souldiers with him, and slew the Souldiers that came to give supply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, and that the Tyrant with all his Forces came to set upon him, the ARGIVES stirred not at all; as if Aratus had not fought for their Liberty, but as though they had beene Judges appointed to sit to see the Sports of the Games Nemece, to judge the Game unto the Conquerour without partiality, and with indifferency. Aratus in the meane time fighting like a valiant man, was thrust at with a Pike, and run through the thigh. This notwithstanding, at length he wan that part of the City where he fought, and was not thrust out till night, what force soever the Enemies made upon him. And if he could possibly have holden it out all night, he had undoubtedly obtained his purpose: for the Tyrant looked for none other but to flee, and had already sent divers of his Goods to the Sea. Howbeit no man once came to tell Aratus any newes of it; besides also, lacking water, and for that he could not helpe himselfe because of his wound, he was driven to leade his men away, and failed of his purpose. So, despairing that he could ever take it by stealth, he went thither with open Wars, and spoiled and destroyed all the Countrey of ARGOS: and having fought a great Battell against the Tyrant Arisippus, by the River of Chares, they blamed Aratus much, that he forsooke the Victory, and cowardly retired out of the Battell. For the rest of his Army doubtlesse had the better, and had followed the Enemies far in chase: when he fled being afraid, not compelled by his Enemies, but mistrusting his fortune, and retired to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chase of their Enemies were offended, for that they having put them to flight, and also slaine a great number more of them then they had lost of theirs; and yet for cowardlinesse should suffer their Enemies (whom they had overcome and put to flight) to set up Markes of triumph in token of victory: Aratus being ashamed of it, determined to fight once againe, for the Markes of triumph. Whereupon resting his men but one day, he led them againe into the Field, and setting his Army in Battell-ray, offered to fight once more. This notwithstanding, when he saw a great supply coming to his Enemy, and that the Tyrants men came to fight more lustily, and with better courage then before, Aratus durst not abide them, but retired, and sent to demand leave to take away his dead men, to bury them; yet he could speake so courteously, and behave himselfe so wisely, by the experience he had in Government, and also for the good will they bare him, that they forgave the fault he committed, and he wanne the City of CLEONES unto the ACHAIANS, where he caused the Feasts of the Games of Nemece to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquity, rather unto the CLEONIANS, then unto the ARGIVES. This notwithstanding, the ARGIVES did keepe it also; and then was the first time that the Sanctuary and Priviledge was broken, which was wont to be granted unto all them that came to play for the Games: because the ACHAIANS did make them Prisoners that fought in ARGOS, as they returned through their Countrey, and sold them as Enemies. So marvellously did Aratus and the ACHAIANS hate all sorts of Tyrants, without respect of person. Shortly after he was advertised, that the Tyrant Arisippus did lie in waite to spie opportunity, to take the City of CLEONES from him: howbeit that he was afraid of it, because he remained at that time in CORINTH. So Aratus straight sent out commandement into every place, to assemble the Army of the Tribe of the ACHAIANS, and that they should bring Victuals with them for many daies: and so craftily came downe to the City of CENCHREES, to intice Arisippus, by his going away so far off, that in his absence he should attempt to set upon the CLEONEIANS, as indeede he did. For he failed not presently to go thither with his Army. But Aratus returning from CENCHREES unto CORINTH, very late in the night, and having layed good Watch every way, he suddenly brought the Army of the ACHAIANS unto CLEONES with such speede and quietnesse, that they were not seene as they came, but entred into the City of CLEONES by night, and were ready to fight with the Tyrant, before he knew they were come. So the Gates of the City were set open by breake of day, and the signall of Battell given by sound of Trumpets; and so setting upon the Tyrants men with great cries, they suspecting nothing, were presently put to flight. And because the place where the overthrow was given, had many turnings, Aratus, following the chase, thought the way which he tooke the Tyrant fled in. The chase continued to the City of MYCENES: there the Tyrant was overtaken by a CRETAN called Tragiscus (as Dionysius reporteth) reporteth) who slew him: and there were slaine of his men also above fifteene thousand. But now Aratus having won such a famous Victory, and lost never a man, he could not yet win the City of ARGOS, nor set it againe at liberty. For one Egeus, and another Aristomachus, got into the Towne with the Kings Army, and kept it: but notwithstanding, by this noble Victory Aratus did race out a great part of the reproach that they gave him, and of the scoffes and slents the flatterers of the Tyrants devised of him: who to please them, reported, that when they should come to fight indeed, the Generall of the ACHAIANS had the winde-colicke in his belly, and a dimnesse in his eyes, with a giddinesse in his head, when he heard but the sound of the Trumpets. And furthermore also, when he had set his men in Battell-ray, and given them the Word of Battell, he asked the Generals if he should neede to be there in person, because he was hurt in the heele; and then would get him as far off as he could, to see the end of the Battell. This talke was so common, that the Philosophers themselves disputing of it, to wit, whether to tremble and change colour in present danger and perill, be signes of a faint heart, or of an ill complexion and coldnesse of body: they alway vouched Aratus, that had beene a good and valiant Captaine, and yet when he began to fight, he was ever in that taking. So when he had overcome Arisippus, he fought meanes also to destroy Lyfias MEGALIPOLITAN, who as absolute Lord and King of the Countrey, kept the City of MEGALIPOLIS. Notwithstanding he had no base minde in him, neither was he carried away with a cruell desire of Tyranny to live at his pleasure, nor through extreme covetousnesse, as most Princes be: but being a young man, and pricked forward with desire of Honour and Fame, and having unadvisedly conceived in his minde (which was great and highly bent) the vaine reasons he heard men talke of Principality, as of a state most blessed, and worthy of admiration: he found the meanes to make himselfe Lord of his Countrey. But afterwards he was soone weary of the dangers and troubles such manner of Government bringeth with it, and desired to follow Aratus, whom he saw prosper, and of great honour. Furthermore also, fearing his secret practises against him, he tooke hold of a noble device: first to rid himselfe of the malice and feare of the Prison and Guard of his Souldiers: and lastly, to be a Benefactor to his Countrey. So he sent for Aratus, gave up his Government, and delivered up his City to the Tribe of the ACHAIANS. They so extolled him for this act, that they chose him their Lieutenant Generall of all the Tribe. Wherefore, Lyfias striving at the first to excell Aratus in honour, attempted divers things which were not very needfull: as among others, to make Warre with the LACEDEMONIANS. But Aratus was very much against him in that, though some thinke it was for envie. Thereupon they chose Lyfias Generall of the ACHAIANS the second time: although Aratus openly both spake and made what meanes he could to the contrary, and would have had another to have beene chosen. For he himselfe was every other yeare Generall. So Lyfias was chosen againe Generall of the ACHAIANS the third time, with every bodies good will: and Aratus and he had absolute Power and Government by turnes, one after the other. But when they saw that Lyfias became open Enemy unto Aratus, and did still accuse him in all their Councils and Assemblies: they fell in such milking with him, that they rejected him. For they thought his but a counterfeite vertue, to contend with the perfectnesse of Aratus vertue, much like unto one of Aesops Fables, saying, That little Birds did answer the Cuckow on a time, asking them why they did flee from her: Because we are afraid (said they) thou wilt be a Sparrow-hawke one day. Even so it seemeth, that there was a certaine suspicion in mens mindes of Lyfias Tyranny, which made them mistrust that he went not from his Tyranny with good will. Now Aratus on the other side, wanne as great praise and honour by his doings against the ETOLIANS. For when the ACHAIANS would needes have fought upon the Confines of the Territory of the MEGARIANS, and that Agis King of LACEDÆMON, being come with his Army to the Campe of the Tribe of the ACHAIANS, did perswade them hardly to give Battell: Aratus was stoutly against it, and did abide many mocks and taunts they gave him, saying, That it was for cowardlinesse he would not go. This notwithstanding, he would not leave his wife and safe determination, for all that open shame: but suffered the Enemies to passe over the Mountaine Gerania, and to invade PELOPONNESUS, and would never fight with them. But afterwards, when he saw that at their first coming they had taken the City of PALENA, he then changed his minde, and would defer time no longer, to tarry till all his Power were come together, but marched forthwith, with those few he had, against his Enemies; who marvellously weakened themselves by their insolvency and disorder after their Victory, keeping no Watch nor Ward. For after they had entred the City of PALENA, the Souldiers ranne into every house, one thrusting in anothers necke, and fighting for the Goods they found. The Captaines also fell to ravishing of Maides, and the PALENIANS Wives, and put their Burganets and Morriions upon their heads, that none other should take them: because that by the same the Souldiers should know whose they were, and to whom the Women belonged. So they being in this ruffe and jollity, newes came suddenly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for feare, when they saw they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all understood of the danger by their sudden setting on them, the ACHAIANS were fighting already within the Suburbs and Gates of the City, against the first that resisted, whom they slew. They being broken and put to flight, made the rest so afraid that were gathered together to aide them, that they wist not what to do. In this tumult and hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a Prisoner, that was the Daughter of Epigethes, one of the noblest men of the City, and she a marvellous goodly woman, and passing faire: who being set in the Temple of Diana, whither a Captaine that had chosen her for himselfe had brought her, and had put his Burganet on her head, when she heard the noise of them that fought, she suddenly ran to the Gate of the Temple with the Burganet on her head, to see them fight. The Citizens seeing her in that array, found her the goodlier to behold, and of greater majesty, then any worldly creature. The Enemies on the other side were so afraid to see her, thinking she had beene some Spirit, that not a man of them durst once defend themselves. So the PALLONIANS say, that the Image of Diana all the rest of the time is kept locked up, and no body touched it; and that when the Nunne that keepeth it, doth carry it elsewhere, no man dare looke on it, but every man turneth his eyes away: because the sight of it is not only fearfull and hurtfull unto men, but it also killeth the fruite of the Trees it passeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cause that then troubled the ETOLIANS mindes so much, because the Nunne removing the Image of the goddesse Diana, she turned it towards them. Howbeit, Aratus in his Commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth, that when he had defeated the ETOLIANS, following them in chase, he entred hand over head with them that fled into the City, out of the which he drave them, and slew seven hundred of them. This noble Victory hath beene esteemed amongst the chiefeft afterwards: and the Painter Timanthes hath drawne and set it forth in Table very lively. This notwithstanding, because divers Princes and People did immediately prepare force against the ACHAIANS, Aratus presently made Peace with the ETOLIANS by the practice of Pantoleon, who bare great sway and authority amongst them. Furthermore, Aratus being desirous to set the ATHENIANS at liberty, he suddenly attempted to take the Haven of PIREAE: for the which the ACHAIANS reproved him, because he had broken the Peace they had made with the MACEDONIANS. But Aratus in his Commentaries doth stoutly deny that it was he, and layeth the fault upon Erginus, by whose meanes he wan the Castle of the Acrocorinth: saying, that it was he, that of his owne minde did set a scaling-Ladder to the Wall, and that his Ladder breaking under him, he fled upon it; and perceiving he was followed neare by the Enemies, he still cried out, Aratus, as if he had beene there; and by this policy mocked his Enemies, and saved himselfe. Howbeit, methinketh this answer is not true. For it is not credible, that Erginus a private Souldier, and a SYRIAN borne, should have so great an Enterprize in his head, unlesse it had beene by Aratus consent and commandment, who had given him men, time and meanes to undertake it. And this appeared plainly afterwards: for Aratus did not attempt it twice or thrice onely, but oftener then so (as those that extremely desire a thing) to take the Haven of PIREAE on the sudden, not giving over for once failing, but rather emboldened himselfe againe with good hope, because he missed it but little, and that he came so neare the taking of it. And another time also amongst others, flying through the Plaine of THIRASIA, he brake his leg, and was driven to make many incisions to heale it: so that he was a long time together carried in his Litter unto the Warres. After that King Antigonus was dead, and that Demetrius his Sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, he attempted then more earnestly then ever before, to set the City of ATHENS at liberty, making small account of the MACEDONIANS. Aratus therefore being overthrowne in Battell neare unto PHYLACIA, by King Demetrius Lieutenant, called Bibis, and the rumour running straight abroad, that Aratus was dead, or at the least that he was taken Prisoner: one named Diogenes, Captaine of the Haven of PIREAE, wrote a Letter unto CORINTH, and commanded the Garison of the ACHAIANS that kept it, to deliver the Towne, for Aratus was dead. But he by chance was at the selfe-same time in CORINTH: so that they which brought the Letters went home with a mocke, without their purpose, and made all the company merry. Furthermore, King Demetrius himselfe sent a Galley out of MACEDON, to bring Aratus bound unto him. The ATHENIANS themselves also, to please the MACEDONIANS, exceeding all lightnesse of flattery, wore Garlands on their heads a whole day together, in token of common joy, when newes was brought them of Aratus death. Aratus was so mad in his minde to heare this, that he brought his Army presently against them, even to the very Suburbs of the Academy. Notwithstanding at their earnest requests, he did no hurt there. And afterwards the ATHENIANS acknowledging his valiantnesse, when King Demetrius died, it tooke them in the heads to recover their Liberty againe. So Aratus, though that yeare another man was Generall of the ACHAIANS, and that he kept his bed lying sicke of a long disease: yet to further this, he was carried unto ATHENS in a Litter, and so perswaded Diogenes (Captaine of the Garison there) that for the summe of an hundred and fifty Talents (towards the which Aratus gave of his owne, twenty Talents, he made him deliver to the ATHENIANS, the Haven of PIREAE, the Castle of MUNICHIA, the Ile of SALAMINA, and the Castle of SUNUM. After this the EGINETS, the HERMIONIANS, and the most part of ARCADIA it selfe, did presently joyne with the ACHAIANS: so that the MACEDONIANS being occupied with Warres at that time in other places against their neighbours, the Power of the ACHAIANS marvellously increased, having also the ETOLIANS their Confederates. Then Aratus to performe his old promise, and being angry to see the City of ARGOS (being so neare neighbour unto them) yet kept in bondage, he sent unto Arifomachus, to perswade him to be contented to set his City againe at liberty, and to joyne it to the Tribe of the ACHAIANS, as Lyfadas had done his Towne of MEGALIPOLIS: and rather to like to be made a Generall with Honour and praise of so great and famous a State as the ACHAIANS, then Tyrant of one onely City, hated, and every houre of the night and day in danger of his life. Arifomachus gave eare to his perswasions, and sent unto Aratus, telling him that he had neede of fifty Talents to discharge the Souldiers he had about him. The Money was straight prepared. And Lyfadas that was at that time Generall

Aratus bringing the ETOLIANS in league with the ACHAIANS, Aratus attempted to set ATHENS at liberty.

Aratus overthrowne by the MACEDONIANS.

Aratus by perswasion delivered ARGOS from tyranny.

Generall of the ACHAIANS, and that marvellously desired this matter might be brought to passe by his meanes: he secretly sent unto Arifomachus to accuse Aratus, and shewed how he had beene alwaies a mortall Enemy unto Tyrants, and therefore counselled him rather to put himselfe into his hands, as indeed he did. For Lyfadas brought Arifomachus unto the Councell of the ACHAIANS. There all the Councell plainly shewed their good wills, and the confidence they had in Aratus: for when he spake against it, that they should not receive Arifomachus, they rejected him with great anger. But afterwards also when Aratus was wonne, and that he began to move the contrary to the Councell, they straight agreed to receive the ARGIVES, and the PHILASIANS in League with them; and also the next yeare following they chose Arifomachus Lieutenant-Generall of all their Tribe. Arifomachus seeing himselfe in credit now with the ACHAIANS, would needes invade the Countrey of LACONIA with a maine Army, and sent for Aratus being then at ATHENS. Aratus wrote unto him, and wished him in any wise not to meddle with that Journey, because he would not have the ACHAIANS to deal with Cleomenes King of LACEDÆMON, that was a courageous and stout young Prince, and marvellously growne in short time. Howbeit, Arifomachus being selfe-willed in that point, Aratus obeyed him, and was there in person all that Journey. So Cleomenes being come to them upon the sudden with his Army, neare unto the City of PALANTIUM, Arifomachus would needes fight with him; but Aratus dissuaded him from it. Whereupon Lyfadas afterwards accused him to the ACHAIANS, and the next yeare following he contended with him, suing to be Generall; howbeit he was rejected by most voices, and Aratus chosen Generall the twelfth time. The selfe-same yeare he was overthrowne in Battell by Cleomenes, neare unto the Mountaine Lycæum, and being fled, wandered up and downe in the night, that every man thought he had beene slaine, and it ran for good payment among all the GRECIANS. Howbeit, he saved himselfe, and having gathered his men together againe, nor contenting him that he had escaped with life, but wisely taking the opportunity and occasion offered, no man knowing it, nor mistrusting his coming: he suddenly went to assaile the MANTINIANS, which were Confederates of Cleomenes, and having taken the City of MANTINEA, he left a great Garison in it, and made the strangers that were there, free of the City. Thus Aratus was he alone, that being overcome, wanne the ACHAIANS that which they themselves could scarcely have wonne if they had beene Conquerors. Afterwards, the LACEDÆMONIANS invading the Territories of the MEGALIPOLITANS with a great Army, Aratus suddenly went thither to aide them, but would hazard Battell no more, nor give Cleomenes vantage, who desired onely to fight, and still constantly resisted the MEGALIPOLITANS, that provoked him to come into the Field. For besides that in nature he was not meete for a set Battell, at that time also he was the weaker in men; and had to do with a vertuous young man, that was all fire: where his courage and ambition on the other side was coole and quiet enough. Furthermore he considered, that as King Cleomenes fought honour by valiant venturing, which he had not before: even so it was his part wisely to keepe that which he had long since gotten, and to stand upon his guard and safety. This notwithstanding, the light armed men being put out into the Field, and having chased the LACEDÆMONIANS even into their Campe, and entering in with them hand over head: Aratus would never bring out his Citizens, but stayed them in a great Valley that lay betweene them both, and would not let them come on any farther. Where-withall Lyfadas being mad with himselfe, and falling out with Aratus, he called for the Horsemen, and said, that he would yet helpe them that followed the chase; and prayed them not to lose the Victory so cowardly, of the which they were so sure: nor to forsake him at a pinch, fighting for the defence of their Countrey. So having gotten a great number of choice Horsemen together, he went with a great fury and gave Charge on the right Wing of his Enemies Battell, and having dispersed them, and put them to flight, he unadvisedly followed them with great courage, into evill-favoured crooked waies, among Trees and great broad Ditches. Whereupon Cleomenes came, and so lustily set on him, that he slew him dead in the place, valiantly fighting and defending himselfe. The other men of Armes flying also, rushed in againe, into the Battell of the Footmen, and so disordered their ranks, that they made all their Army lie for feare. For this cause they greatly blamed Aratus, because he had forsaken Lyfadas: and being enforced unto it by the ACHAIANS that went without his leave, he followed them at length, and fled himselfe also unto the City of ÆGIUM. There the ACHAIANS sitting in Councell, they decreed, that they would furnish Aratus with no more Money, neither would they pay his strangers any more: and bade him pay them at his owne charge, if he would entertaine them for the Warre. Aratus perceiving that they did him great wrong, stood even indifferent to deliver up his Commission of Lieutenantcy, and to discharge himselfe of his Office: but after he had bethought himselfe better, he bare it patiently, and led the ACHAIANS directly to the City of ORCHOMENE. There he valiantly fought with Megistonus, King Cleomenes Father-in-law, and had the upper hand of him: for he slew three hundred of his men, and tooke Megistonus selfe Prisoner. Furthermore, where before every second yeare they did use to choose him their Lieutenant-Generall, when his turne came about againe, they called him to give him the Office; but he refused it, and Timaxenus was chosen in his roome. Now the cause alleadged for his refusal, was said to be, for that he misliked of the common People. But that foundeth like a lye: for the truth of it, to my seeming, was, for that he saw the State of the ACHAIANS to decline. For King Cleomenes proceeded no more faire and softly as he did at the first, when he was controlled and bridled by the Ephori: but having slaine them, and equally divided the Lands through LACEDÆMONIA, and made the strangers free Citizens of SPARTA, being then absolute Lord of LACEDÆMON, he straight straight set upon the ACHAIANS with all the Power he could, and sought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deserveth just reproofe, for that he forsooke his Countrey in such extreame trouble and danger, that being as the Master of a Ship, he gave another the Sterne to steere, when it had been most honourable and meetest for him to have taken it in hand (though they would not have given it him) to have saved his Countrey. Or otherwise, if he had indeed utterly depaired of the good successe of the ACHAIANS, he should then have put it rather into Cleomenes hands, and not to have poysoned PELOPONNESUS againe with the manners of the barbarous People (bringing in as he did, the Garison of the MACEDONIANS, filling the Castle of the Acrocorinth with GAULES and ILLYRIAN Souldiers, and making them his Lords and Masters, whom he had so often overcome in Wars, and bereaved of their Government, and of whom he also spake so much evil in his Commentaries;) not to have put them into Townes, and calling them friends and Confederates, to thinke thereby to colour and disguise his wicked practice. Admit Cleomenes had been a Tyrant, and a cruell man (if I should so tearme him) yet came he of the bloud of Hercules, and was borne in SPARTA: from whence they should rather have chosen the meekest man Governour, then the greatest King of MACEDON; and those specially that prefer the honour and glory of GREECE, before strangers. Yet King Cleomenes required no more of all the ACHAIANS, but the name onely to be their Lieutenant Generall: and so they would grant him that honour, he promised he would be very good unto the Cities Confederates to ACHAIAS. Where Antigonus notwithstanding, when they had chosen him their Lieutenant Generall, with absolute power and authority both by Sea and also by Land, refused the charge, unless they would let him have the Castle of the Acrocorinth for his hire. The which was even like to Æsops Hunter, that bridled his Horse: for he would not get upon the ACHAIANS that requested him, and that by their Ambassadors and Decrees of Councell, did refer all unto himselfe, before he had first saddled and bridled them, by the Garison he made them receive, and the Pledges he caused them to give him; and yet he spake as much as might be to clear himselfe of the accusation against him, bearing them in hand that he was forced to it. Howbeit Polybius writeth, that long time before he was compelled, being afraid of Cleomenes valiantnesse, he had secretly practised that with Antigonus, which he was openly seene in afterwards: and that he had enticed the MEGALIPOLITANS (who were the first that moved it to the Councell of the ACHAIANS) to call King Antigonus to their aide, because they were nearest neighbours to the fire, and continually harried with Cleomenes Warre, that alwaies knocked at their Gates to come and spoile them. Thus much is affirmed by Philarchus in his History, who was hardly to be credited notwithstanding, had not Polybius confirmed it. For he loved Cleomenes so well, that it seemed he was ravished with some spirit as often as he spake of him: and frameth his History, as a common Counsellor that did pleade a Case in Law before the Judges, still accusing the one, and defending the other. The ACHAIANS lost the City of MEGALIPOLIS againe, the which King Cleomenes tooke of them, and overcame them in a great Battell by Hecatombæon. Wherewithall they were so amazed, that they sent Ambassadors presently unto him, and prayed him to come to the City of ARGOS, and there they would make him their Lieutenant Generall. But when Aratus heard he came indeed, and that he was not far from the City of LERNA with his Army: being afraid, he sent other Ambassadors to tell him that he should safely come with three hundred men onely, as unto his friends and Confederates: and yet if he mistrusted craft and evil dealing, that then they would give him pledges for the safety of his person. Cleomenes answered him, That was a plaine mockery, and an injury they offered him. Wherefore he presently departed thence, and sent a Letter before to the Councell of the ACHAIANS, full of foule words and reproaches he gave unto Aratus: who likewise replied to him againe, bitterly taunting each other, that they came to talke of their Marriage and Wives. After this Letter, Cleomenes sent defiance by an Herald unto the ACHAIANS, and proclaimed open Warre against them: inso-much as he had almost gotten the City of SICYONE by practice of Traytors. Howbeit, failing of his purpose he returned suddenly, and went unto the City of PALLENA, which he tooke, and drove out the Generall of the ACHAIANS thence, and immediately after he wan the Cities also of PHENEIA, and PENTELION. After that, the ARGIVES and PHILASIANS willingly yeelded unto him, so that of all which the ACHAIANS had conquered, and joyned unto their Tribe, they could reckon of nothing of certainty unto them. Then Aratus was marvellously troubled in his minde, to see all PELOPONNESUS in tumult and uprore, and that all the Cities fell to open rebellion by those that practised change and alteration. For no man was contented with the State and Government at that time, but divers of the SICYONIANS and CORINTHIANS both were bewrayed which had secretly practised with Cleomenes, and that of long time maliced the Government of the ACHAIANS, desiring themselves to be Lords and Governours of their Cities. Aratus having full Commission and Authority from the Councell of the ACHAIANS, to make enquiry of them, and to put them to death, without further triall of Law, he did execute them accordingly, whom he found faulty in the City of SICYONE. Furthermore, attempting to do the like at CORINTH, he made inquiry of them, and put them to death: whereby he made the common People very angry with him, who otherwise of themselves were weary of the Government and subjection of the ACHAIANS. The CORINTHIANS therefore gathering together in the Temple of Apollo, they sent for Aratus, intending to make him Prisoner before they would openly enter into actual rebellion. Aratus went thither, to shew that he neither feared nor mistrusted them, but yet he held his Horse in his hand following of him. Then many rose up against him, and did both reprove and injuriously intreate him. But Aratus with stayed countenance and gentle words, prayed them to keepe their their places, and not to cry out in such rage upon their feete, and withall, caused them also to come in, that were at the Temple doore. But as he spake unto them, by little and little he drew backe out of the preale, as though he meant to have given his Horse to some body to hold. So being gotten out of the preale, he gently spake without any feare unto the CORINTHIANS he met, and bade them go to the Temple of Apollo. When he was come to the Cattle, he then suddenly tooke his Horse backe, and commanded Cleopater, Captaine of the Garison of the ACHAIANS there, to looke well to the safe keeping of the Cattle. Then he set spurs to his Horse, and galloped towards the City of SICYONE for life, being followed onely by thirty of his Souldiers, all the rest having forsaken him, and dispersed themselves here and there. Shortly after, the CORINTHIANS understanding that for King Cleomenes, and delivered the City of CORINTH into his hands, the gaine whereof pleased him not so much, as he was sorry for the losse of Aratus, whom they had let go. So King Cleomenes joyning unto him all the People dwelling along the Sea Coast, commonly called the River of CORINTH, who yeelded up themselves, Holds and Townes into his hands, he then intrenched in the Castle of the Acrocorinth with a great Trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the City of SICYONE, many of the ACHAIANS gathered about him, and holding a Councell and Assembly, he was chosen their Lieutenant Generall, having absolute Power and Authority to do what he would, and gave him of their owne Citizens to guard his Person. So, having managed the Affaires of the State and Common-wealth of the ACHAIANS the space of three and thirty yeares together, and having all that time bene counted of all men the chiefe man of power and authority in GREECE, he then found himselfe in poore estate, forsaken, and in great misery, as in the Shipwrack of his Countrey beaten with storme, and in great danger of himselfe. For when he sent unto ATHENIANS being very desirous to send aide for Aratus sake, were dissuaded from it through the practice of Enclidas and Micion. Aratus also had a House in CORINTH, where all his Money was: the which King Cleomenes at the first medled not withall, neither would suffer any other to touch it, but sent for his friends and Officers, and charged them to looke to it, to give Aratus a good account of it afterwards. Furthermore, he privily sent Triplym unto him, and his Father-in-law Megisthenes, and offered him great gifts, and specially an annuall Pension of twelve Talents, which was double as much as King Ptolomy gave him, who sent him yearly fixe Talents. Besides, he onely prayed the ACHAIANS, that they would make him their Lieutenant Generall, and also that the Garison in the Castle of Acrocorinth, might be divided in common betwene them. Aratus made answer, that he had an absolute power in his hands, and that it was in the ACHAIANS, not in him. Cleomenes thinking this but a device and excuse of Aratus, he presently invaded the Countrey of the SICYONIANS, and destroyed all as he came, and continued the space of three Moneths. Aratus in the meane time stood doubtfull how to determine, whether he should receive King Antigonus or not: because Antigonus would not aide him before he delivered him the Castle of the Acrocorinth into his hands. So the ACHAIANS meeting at the City of ÆGUM to consult upon it, they sent by the City of SICYONE: besides also that the Citizens kept Aratus, and held him by force, saying, That they would not let him venture himselfe in such apparent danger, their Enemies being so neare unto them. Moreover, the women and little children, hung about him, weeping and compassing him about, as their common father and saviour. But Aratus comforting them, bade them not be afraid, and so tooke his Horse, with ten of his friends and his Sonne (that was a young stripping growne) and went towards the Sea, and imbarqued in certaine Ships that rode at Anker. Thence he sailed unto ÆGUM, where the Diet or Parliament was kept: and there it was resolved, that they should send for Antigonus, and deliver the Castle of Acrocorinth into his hands. And so it was performed: for Aratus sent thither his owne Sonne among the other Hostages. The CORINTHIANS were so sore offended withall, that they made havocke of his Goods, and gave his House he had in CORINTH unto King Cleomenes. So King Antigonus being onwards on his way to come into PELOPONNESUS with his Army, bringing with him twenty thousand Footmen all MACEDONIANS, and four hundred Horsemen: Aratus with the greatest States and Officers of the ACHAIANS, unwitting to their Enemies, went to meete him as far as the City of PEGES, having no great trust nor confidence in Antigonus, nor the MACEDONIANS. For he remembered very well, that he came first to his greatnesse, by the injuries he had offered them: and how that the chiefe cause of his rising, was the malice he bare unto old Antigonus. Howbeit making vertue of necessity, and weighing the instant occasion of their present extremitie (of Governours, to be driven to be Subjects) he put himselfe in adventure. So, when Antigonus was told that Aratus was come in person to him, having with good countenance after common sort saluted those that came in his company: to Aratus himselfe at his first coming he gave an honourable welcome and entertainment. Afterwards also, finding him a good and discreet man, he fell into inward friendship and familiar good order and Government: but moreover, his company and conversation was very pleasant, to entertaine a Princes leisure with. Wherefore though Antigonus was but young at that time, yet seeing thoroughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meete man to be well thought of, and esteemed about a Prince, he used his counsell and advice more then any other mans, in all matters, not onely touching the Affaires of the ACHAIANS, but of the MACEDONIANS also. came to passe, which the gods had promised in their Sacrifices. For in a Beast that was sacrificed, there were two galls wrapped in one selfe caule: the which the Soothsayers interpreted did prognosticate, that two which before were mortall Enemies, should now become assured friends. But Aratus made no account of their prediction, neither did he give any credit to the Sacrifices, but trusted rather to his owne determination. So, the Warres afterwards having good successe, and Antigonus making a Feast in the City of CORINTH, where he had bidden many Guests, he would needes have Aratus lie upon him at the Table, and a little while after, commanded his men to bring him a Coverlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a cold. Aratus answered him, It freezed. Then Antigonus bade him come neare him, and when the Servants brought a Coverlet for the King, they cast it over them both. Then Aratus remembering the Sacrifice, fell a laughing, and told the King what a wonder he had seene in the Sacrifice, and what interpretation the Soothsayers made of it. This was long after. So Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in the City of PEGES, they were sworn Brethren together: and then went both with all speede against the Enemies. Thus there fell out hot Skirmishes betweene them, hard by the City of CORINTH. For Cleomenes was very well fortified, and the CORINTHIANS valiantly defended themselves. In the meane time, Aristoteles of ARGOS (Aratus friend) secretly sent him word, that he would make the City rebell, if he came himselfe with any number of Souldiers. Aratus told it unto King Antigonus, who gave him fiftene hundred men, with the which he imbarqued, and passed over with great speede from the Isthmus (or Barre in the Streight) unto the City of EPIDAUROM. Howbeit, the ARGIVES tarried not Aratus coming, but were all up before he came, and did set upon King Cleomenes men, and had driven them into the Castle. Cleomenes being advertised of it, and fearing lest his Enemies (keeping the City of ARGOS) should cut off his way from returning into his Countrey againe with safety, if he were driven to a streight: he forooke the Castle of the Acrocorinth, and went his way by night to helpe his men in the City of ARGOS. So he came thither in time, and overthrew certaine of his Enemies. But shortly after, Aratus and King Antigonus both being come thither with all their aide, Cleomenes was driven to flie to the City of MANTINEA. After the recovery againe of the City of ARGOS, all the residue of the Cities of PELOPONNESUS did againe returne to the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus tooke the Castle of the Acrocorinth. So Aratus being chosen Generall by the ARGIVES, he counselled them to present Antigonus with all the Tyrants Goods, and those that had bene Traytors to the Common-wealth. And after they had cruelly tormented the Tyrant Aristomachus in the City of CENCHREES, in the end they cast him into the Sea, and drowned him. Aratus was marvellously reprovod for his death, that would suffer the poore man to be so vilely handled, that was a good man, and one that had done him great pleasure: who through his perswasion willingly resigned up his Tyranny, and delivered the City of ARGOS unto the ACHAIANS. But besides this, they blamed him for many other things else: for that the ACHAIANS through his meanes had put the City of CORINTH into Antigonus hands, as though it had bene some meane Village: for that when they had sucked the City of ORCHOMENE, they suffered him to place a Garison of the MACEDONIANS there: for that they had enacted by Parliament, that they should neither write, nor send Ambassadors any whither, without Antigonus privy and consent: furthermore, for that they were compelled to give pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made Sacrifices, Feasts, and Games unto Antigonus, as if he had bene a god; following the example of Aratus Citizens, who were the first that began, and had received Antigonus into the City by the perswasion of Aratus, that lodged and feasted him in his owne Houfe. With all these faults they burdened Aratus, and considered not, that after they had put the reynes of the Government into Antigonus hand, Aratus himselfe (whether he would or not) was compelled to follow the swinge of the unbridled Prince, having no other meanes to stay it, but onely the liberty of speech to admonish him: and that also was not to be exercised, without apparent and great danger. For it is most true, that many things were done greatly against Aratus minde: as amongst others, that Antigonus caused the Tyrants Images of ARGOS to be set up, which he had before pulled downe: and also that he made them to be overthrowne, which Aratus had set up for those that had taken the Castle of CORINTH, and onely left Aratus one Statue, notwithstanding all the earnest intreaty Aratus made to the contrary, yet he could get no grant of any thing to be requested. Besides also, it appeareth that the ACHAIANS dealt not so friendly with the MANTINEANS, as became GRECIANS one to another. For they having the City in their hands by Antigonus meanes, did put all the noblest and chiefeest men of MANTINEA to death; others they sold as Slaves, and sent the rest into MACEDON with irons on their legs, and brought the poore women and children into bondage, and sold them for Slaves: and of the Money they got by spoile, they divided the third part among themselves, and left the other two parts unto the MACEDONIANS. Now surely it cannot be said, but this was done for some cruell revenge. For though it was an over-great cruelty, in rage and passion of minde, to handle People of one selfe-blond and language in this lameable fort: yet Simonides saith, When men are driven and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to ease their great stomacks inflamed with rage and malice. But for that which was done afterwards unto the City, no man can excuse Aratus, nor say, that he was either driven to it by necessity, or that he had otherwise any honest occasion to do it. For King Antigonus having given the City of MANTINEA unto the ARGIVES, they determined to make it a Colony, and chose Aratus their Generall: who made a Decree, that thenceforth the City should no more be called MANTINEA, but ANTI-GONIA, as it beareth name unto this day. Thus it seemeth that gentle MANTINEA (for so the Poets Poets called it) was utterly destroyed, and bare the name of another City through Aratus meanes, preferring the name of him that destroyed the City, and did put all the Inhabitants of the first to death. After that, King Cleomenes being overthrowne in a great Battell by the City of SELLASIA, he left the City of SPARTA, and fled into EGYPT. So Antigonus having used Aratus with all kinde of honourable courties, he returned againe into MACEDON. There falling sicke, he sent Philip that should succeed him in the Kingdome (being a young stripling growne) into PELOPONNESUS, and straightly charged him specially to follow Aratus counsell, and to employ him when he would speake unto the Cities, and become acquainted with the ACHAIANS. So Aratus having received him in that sort, made him so well affected and loving towards him, that he sent him againe into MACEDON, being thoroughly determined to make Wars with GREECE. So after the death of Antigonus, the ETOLIANS began to despise the carelesnesse and cowardlinesse of the ACHAIANS (because that they being used to be defended by strangers, and having bene altogether governed by the Armies of the MACEDONIANS, they lived very idly and dissolutely) whereupon they tooke upon them to make themselves Lords of PELOPONNESUS. So they assembled an Army, and by the way as they went, they onely tooke some prey and spoile upon the Lands of the PATRIANS, and the DYMÆIANS: but invading the Territory of MESSINA with all their Army, they destroyed the whole Countrey before them. Aratus being very angry withall, and perceiving that Timoxenus (who at that time was Generall of the ACHAIANS) did still tract and delay time in vaine, because he was upon going out of his yeare; he being appointed Generall for the yeare following, did anticipate his time five daies before, to go and aide the MESSINIANS. Wherefore leaving an Army of the ACHAIANS, who persons were now neither exercised in Armes, nor yet had any desire to go to the Wars, he was overthrowne by the City of CAPHYES. Now, because it was thought that he went too hotly and courageously to the Wars, he so extremely cooled againe, and left things in such case, that all hope being cast aside, he suffered the ETOLIANS in manner to treade PELOPONNESUS under their feete before his eyes, with all the infolency and cruelty that might be possible, notwithstanding that they sundry times gave him great advantages of them. Thus were the ACHAIANS once againe forced to pray aide out of MACEDON, and to send for young Philip to him, that he would use them gently, and do as they would have him. But when first of all began Apelles, Megareus, and a few other Courtiers to accuse Aratus: unto whom King Philip giving easie eare, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrary faction unto Aratus, was chosen Generall by the ACHAIANS. Howbeit, this new Generall Eparatus being extremely hated by the ACHAIANS, and Aratus also leaving to deale any more with matters of State, no act was done to any purpose. Whereupon King Philip finding his fault, returned againe unto Aratus, and was ruled altogether by him: and when he found that his Affaires prospered in all things he went about, he then let him alone with all, as from whom came all his honour and greatnesse. Thereupon every man esteemed Aratus a wife Governour, not onely to rule a Common-wealth, but also a whole Realme and Kingdome. For his manners, intent, and chiefeest purpose appeared in the deeds of this young King, as a rich colour that did set forth and beautifie them. For the clemency this young Prince used to the LACEDÆMONIANS that had offended him, the great courtesie he shewed to the CRETANS, whereby in few daies he wan all the Isle of CRETA: and the Journey he made against the ETOLIANS, which was a wonderfull great Exploit, wan the Prince great Fame, for following good counsell, and Aratus to be accounted a wife Governour, and of deepe understanding. Now the Kings Flatterers ennying Aratus more then before, and perceiving they got no good by secret back-biting of him, they then began with open mouth very insolently to revile him at the Table, and with great derision: inso much as one night going home to his Tent after Supper, they pelted him with stones all the way as he went. King Philip when he knew it, was so offended therewith, that he did condemne them in the summe of twenty Talents: and afterwards also, because they troubled his Affaires, he did put them to death. But King Philip in the end being puffed up with the good fortune and successe of this Warre, which prospered as he would have it, he then grew to be covetous, and began to shew his naughty nature, and to bewray his dissimulation wherewith he disguised himselfe, and by little and little to make his vices plainly to appeare. For first of all, he abused young Aratus Wife, which was kept secret a long time, because he lay in their Houfe, and began daily to grow more severe and cruell to the Common-wealth; and then the World saw plainly that he cared no more for Aratus. For the first suspition and beginning of the mistrust he had of Aratus, came for that which was done at MESSINA. For the MESSINIANS being fallen together by the eares, and in great Civill Warres one with another, Aratus went thither to make Peace betweene them. Howbeit, King Philip came thither the next day following, and in stead of pacifying the quarrell, he set them further out together then they were before. First, he asked the Governours of the City, whether they had no Lawes to bridle the infolency and stomack of the common People; and privately also talked with the heads of the Faction of the People, and asked them if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. So both the one and the other Faction trusting to King Philip, the Governours would have layed hold on the Orators of the City: but they rising with the common People, slew of their Nobility and Magistrates, well neare two hundred of them. Aratus that came soone after this Fact, shewed that he was greatly offended with King Philip, and caused his Sonne with open mouth shamefully to reprove him. Now it seemed that this young Aratus was in love with King Philip

Aratus the Sons words unto Philip.

Philip before : but then he told him before all the People, that for this shamefull act he had done, he thought him now no more faire of face, but the foulest creature that could be. Philip made no answer to it, although every man looked he would have answered him in rage, and that oftentimes as the other reproved him, he bit it in with his teeth : but yet as if he had not beene offend- ed at all with the big words his Sonne had spoken against him (for that he was a civill man, and milde of nature) he tooke Aratus the Father by the hand, and carried him out of the Theatre where the Assembly was kept, to the Castle of Ithome, to do Sacrifice there to Jupiter, and to see the Fort. This Fort was of no lesse strength then the Castle of the Acrocorinth : and when any Garrison is in it, it keepeth all the Countrey about it in obedience : and besides it is very hard to drive them out of it. Now Philip being gotten up into that Castle, he did Sacrifice there : and when the Soothsayer had brought him the intrailles of the Oxe which they had sacrificed, he tooke it himselfe with both his hands, and shewed them unto Aratus, and to Demetrius Phalerian, now turning to the one, then to the other, and asked them what they judged of these signes of the Sacrifice : whether he should keepe the Castle to himselfe, or else deliver it to the MESSINIANS. Demetrius smiling, answered him : If thou beest of the Soothsayers minde, then thou shalt deliver it up : but if thou hast a Kings minde in thee, thou shalt then hold the Oxe by both hornes. (By the Oxe, he meant the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS : and moreover, that if he kept both these Castles, of Ithome and the Acrocorinth, all PELOPONNESUS were wholly at his commandement.) Aratus still held his peace, and said not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to speake, he said : In CRETA, and in the Countrey of the BOEOTIANS and PHOCIANS, there are many strong Castles situated on high hills from the Valleys. Moreover, there are also many places of great strength in the Marches of the ACARNANIANS, both within maine Land, as also upon the Sea Coast : of all the which thou hast not taken one of them by force, and yet they all do willingly obey thee notwithstanding. It is for Thieves to hide their heads in high Rocks and Mountaines, but a King can have no stronger Castle, then the love, faith, and good will of men. That is it, that opened the Sea of CRETA. That is it, that hath brought thee into PELOPONNESUS. Those are the meanes which have made thee being so young a man, some of them to choose thee their Cap- taine, and others also to make thee their absolute Lord and Master. Aratus going on with his tale, Philip gave the intrailles againe to the Soothsayer that brought them, and taking Aratus by the hand (as if by force he had cast him out of the Castle, and had also taken the City of MESSINA from him) said unto him : Come on then, let us even take that course. But after that time, Ara- tus came as little to the Court as might be, and so by little and little left Philips company. For when he went to make Warre in the Realme of EPIRUS, he was earnestly in hand with Ara- tus to go that Journey with him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excused, and so remained at home, being afraid to be brought into an evill name with Philips doings. For Philip afterwards having shamefully lost his Army by Sea against the ROMANES ; and besides, having had also very ill successe in all other his Affaires, he returned againe to PELOPONNESUS, and thought once more to have deceived the MESSINIANS. But when they found his practice, then he began with open force to spoile their Countrey. Aratus then flatly fell out with Philip, and utterly re- fused his friendship, for that he perceived then the injury he had done his Sonnes Wife, the which grieved him to the heart ; but yet he made not his Sonne privie to it, because he could get no other amends, then to know what injury had beene done to him, considering that he had no way nor meanes to be revenged. For King Philip was marvellously changed, and from a courteous and chaste young Prince, became a vicious and cruell Tyrant : the which to speake truly, was not a change or alteration in nature, but a manifest declaration (when he was no more afraid of any man) of his wicked and devillish minde, the which through feare had of long time beene kept se- cret. Now, to prove that Philips first love and good will he bare unto Aratus, was also mingled with feare and reverence, that which he did afterwards unto him did plainly shew it. For he being desirous to put Aratus to death, not thinking himselfe free so long as he lived, neither King, nor Ty- rant : he durst not go about to kill him himselfe, but procured one of his Captaines called Taurion, and commanded him to make him away as secretly as he could possible, and specially with poyson in his absence. This Taurion fell in friendship with Aratus, and poysoned him with no violent poyson, but so tempered and qualified it, as it did by little and little heate the body, and procure a pretty cough which brought him into a consumption. Aratus knew he was poysoned : but because he saw it booted not to bewray it, he bare it patiently, and made no words of it, as if he had had some naturall dis- ease about him. Yet on a time, one of his chiefeft friends being in his Chamber with him, who won- dred to see him spit bloud as he did : he told him, Friend Caphalon mine, this is the reward of a Kings love. So he died of this poyson in the City of EGIRUM, being the seventeenth time chosen Gen- erall of the ACHAIANS, who would have had him buried in the selfe-same place, and have made some honourable Monument for him, worthy of his noble life. But the SICYONIANS thinking themselves dishonoured, if his body were buried any where else but in their owne City, they so per- suaded the Councell of the ACHAIANS, that they suffered them to take Aratus body with them. Yet was there an ancient Law that forbade buriall within the Walls of the City, of any manner of per- son whatsoever : and besides that Law, they had a certaine superstitious feare in them, that made them they durst not. Whereupon they sent to Apollo's Temple at DELPHES, to aske counsell of his Nunne that gave the Oracles ; who made them this answer :

The wife answer of Aratus

ing the safety

Thou happy soile of Sicyon, Aratus native place, Wher as thou askest counsell in that noble Captaines case,
For keeping of a yeare minde, and for making selfe full waies
In honour of that worthy weight, to last henceforth alwaies :
If any hinder your intent, through fondnesse or through spite,
Both Sea and Land, and Heaven it selfe will punish that same weight.

This Oracle being brought, all the ACHAIANS were marvellous glad of it, but the SICYONIANS specially : who presently changing their mourning into publike joy, they carried the Body from the City of EGIRUM, and brought it home as in manner of procession, in white Robes, and Garlands of Flowers on their heads, singing Hymmes and Songs of joy, and dancing, till they came to the City of SICYONE. And there they chose out the chiefeft place, and buried him as their Founder, Father, and Saviour of their City : and the place is called at this present time, ARATAUM. There they yearly make two solemne Sacrifices, the one the fift of November, a which time he de- livered the City of SICYONE from tyranny ; and they call this Sacrifice Soteria, as much to say, as the Feast of health : and the other on his birth day, as it is reported. For the first Sacrifice, that was done by the Priest of Jupiter the Saviour. The second Sacrifice also was done by Aratus Son, who was girt about with a cloath, not altogether white, but mingled with Purple colour. So du- ring the Sacrifice, they sung Hymmes upon the Harpe in praise of him ; and the Master of the Mulicians made a procession round about, being accompanied with Boyes and young men of the City, after whom followed the Senate crowned with Garlands of flowers, and other Citizens that were disposed to go to a Procession : Howbeit the most part of the honours that were appoint- ed to be done unto him, were left off by processe of time, and change of things that followed afterwards. Thus you see what the Life of Aratus the Father hath been, as we finde in Histories. Now Philip being a wicked man, and cruell of nature, caused his Son Aratus also to be poisoned, not with a deadly Poyson, but with such a Poyson as troubleth a mans wits so, that through their divellish receit, he becometh a starke foole without any wit at all, and maketh him to attempt strange and abominable things, and to have certaine shamefull and detestable desires : inso much as his death (though he died in the prime of his youth) could not be thought miserable, but rather a happy deliverance to him out of all his miseries and mishaps. But Philip afterwards, so long as he lived, paid unto Jupiter (Protectour of all justice and friendship) the punishment his wicked life deserved. For, after he was overcome in Battell by the ROMANES, he was compelled to yeeld himselfe to their mercy : by whom he was deprived from all the rest of his Lands and Dominions he had, and of all his Ships, but five onely, and condemned besides to pay a thousand Talents for fine, and to give his Sonne in hostage : and they onely left him for pitie sake, the Kingdome of MACEDON, with all the Appertenances. And there he daily putting to death the chiefeft of his Nobility, and nearest of bloud unto him, he filled his Realme with cruelty and mortall hate a- gainst him. Furthermore amongst such a heape of evils, having but one onely joy, to have a vertuous Son, he put him to death, for spite and malice that he saw the ROMANES honour him ; and left his other Sonne Perseus Successeur of his Realme : who as it is reported, was not his lawfull begotten Sonne, but taken for his Sonne, and borne of a Tay- lours Wife called Gnathanium. It is that Perseus, whom Paulus Emylius over- came, and led in Triumph in ROME : and at him the Race of the Kings descended from Antigonus, failed ; where the issue and Offspring of Aratus continueth yet untill our time, in the Cities of SICYONE, and PALLENA.

Aphrates saying, what manner of man a mercenary Souldier ought to be.

AEmilius saying of Souldiers.

Plato saying of an Army.

Demades saying of Alexanders Army, after his death. The Empire of Rome, whereto likened.

In Aphrates the ATHENIAN Captaine said, that a mercenary Souldier should be covetous, a lover, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintaine his pleasure, he should be the valianter, and readier to put himselfe into any danger. But most men thinke, that Souldiers should be as one entire strong body, that stirreth not of it selfe without the moving of the Generall. And to approve this opinion, it is said that Paulus Aemilius arriving in MACEDON, and finding the Souldiers full of words and curiosity (every man meddling with the affaires of the Generall) he made open proclamation, No man so hardy to meddle with his Office and affaires; but every man onely to keepe his Sword sharpe, and to be quick of hand against the Enemy: and for the rest, to referre all to him, who would take sufficient order for things of his charge and Government. Therefore Plato saith, that it little availeth to have a good and wise Captaine, if the Souldiers also be not wise and obedient; thinking it as requisite for the vertue of obedience, to have men of a noble minde and good education, as otherwise it is meet for a Captaine to know how to direct and command well; considering it is that which with lenity and mildnesse doth mitigate all fury and cholere. He hath divers other examples and sufficient proofes to prove his words true; and namely, the great miseries and calamities which came to the ROMANES after the death of Nero, do plainly shew, that nothing is more dangerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, then a great Army living licentiously and disorderly. For Demades after the death of Alexander the Great, compared Alexanders Army unto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out: considering how blindly and loofly they were governed. Howbeit the Empire of ROME being divided into sundry factions at one selfe time and rising against it selfe in many places, it fell into the like misfortunes and calamities faign-ed by the Poets of the TITANS: not so much through the ambitiousnesse of the Emperours, as by means of the covetousnesse and infolency of the Souldiers, who drave the Emperours out of their Imperiall Seates one after another, as one naile driveth out another. And Dionysius also the Tyrant of SICILE, was wont to call Phereus (who had been Tyrant of THESSALIA only ten moneths space) space) a Tyrant in a Play, deriding his so suddain change of State. But the Imperiall House of the Cæsars at ROME, received foure Emperours, in lesse then ten Moneths space, the Souldiers now putting in one, and then taking out another, as if they had been in a Play on a Scaffold. So that the ROMANES being thus grievously oppressed: had yet this comfort: that they needed not to seeke to be revenged of them that did oppresse them. For they saw one of them murder another, and him first and most justly of all other murdered, that had first of all corrupted the Souldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the change of the Emperours: and so depraving a worthy deed of it selfe, which was their forsaking of Nero: and mingling it with bribery, made it plaine treason. For Nymphidius Sabinus, being Captaine of the Emperours Guard, which are called the Prætorian Souldiers, together with Tigellinus, when he saw Nero in despaire of himselfe and of his Estate, and that he was ready to flie into EGYPT: he perswaded the Guard they should call Galba Emperour, as if Nero had not been at ROME, but fled and gone; and promised every one seven thousand five hundred Drachmaes apiece: and to the rest of the Souldiers that were dispersed up and down in Garrison upon the Provinces, twelve hundred and fifty Drachmaes a man. For the leaving of which summe, they could not possibly do it, but they must needs commit ten thousand times more extortion on every body, then Nero had done. This large promise made them presently put Nero to death, and shortly after him, Galba himselfe also. For the Souldiers forooke Nero, for the hope they had to receive this promised Gift: and shortly after they slew the second, which was Galba, because they received not their Gifts in time to their contentment. Afterwards also, in seeking who should still feed them with like Gifts, before they could obtaine their wished hop, one of them destroyed another by treason and rebellion. But now to set down all things particularly which happed at that time, it were to write one whole entire History: and therefore, I will content my selfe, not to passe over with silence the notable deeds, and lamentable calamities, which happed at that time unto the Cæsars.

It is manifestly known to all men, that Sulpitius Galba of a private man, was the richest and wealthiest that came to be in the number of the Cæsars: who, though he came of a very noble house, deriving himselfe from the Race and Family of the Servij, yet he was honoured the more, because he was a kin unto Quintus Catulus, who for vertue and estimation, was one of the chiefest men of his time, albeit that otherwise he willingly resigned his authority and power unto others. So Galba thereby was somewhat a kin unto Livia the Wife of Augustus Cæsar, and therefore for her sake he came out of the Emperours Pallace, when he went to take possession of his Consulship. Moreover it is reported, that when he had charge of the Army in GERMANY, he did valiantly behave himselfe. And in the Government of LYBIA also, where he was Vice Consul, he did as honourably behave himselfe, as any man whatsoever. Howbeit his meane and simple ordinary of diet, voide of all exceffe, was reputed misery and niggardinesse in him; when he was proclaimed Emperour: because the practise of sober and temperate diet which he would have brought in use, was then so raw a thing, that it was taken for a new and strange device. He was sent Governour also into SPAYNE by Nero, before he had learned to be afraid of the Citizens of great authority: howbeit, besides that he was of a courteous and gentle nature, his age moreover increased the opinion they had of him, that he was timorous and fearefull. For when the wretched Officers of Nero did cruelly vex and torment the Provinces, and that it lay not in Galba any way to helpe them: yet was it some comfort to them, which were judged and sold as slaves by the Officers, to see that Galba did lament the miseries and calamities they endured, as if they had been done unto himselfe. So when any slanderous Rimes were made against Nero, which were sung up and downe in every place, he would neither forbid them, nor yet was offended as Neroes Officers were. Therefore he was marvellously beloved in the Countrey, of them that were acquainted with him: because he was then in the eight yeare of his Government as Pro-Consull amongst them, at which time Junius Vindex being Pro-Prætor of GAULE, rebelled against Nero, who as it is reported, had written unto Galba, before he entred into an open action of rebellion. But Galba did neither beleve him, nor also accuse and bewray him, as divers others which were Governours of Armies and Provinces did: who sent Vindex Letters unto Nero which he himselfe had written unto them, and so did as much as in them lay to hinder the enterprise, who afterwards being of the conspiracy did confesse they were Traitors to themselves, as much as unto him. Howbeit when Vindex afterwards had proclaimed open Warre against Nero, he wrote againe unto Galba, and praised him to take the Imperiall Crown upon him, and to become the head of a strong and mighty body (which were the GAULES) that lacked nothing but a head and Governour, being a hundred thousand fighting men ready armed, and might also leave a great number more of them. Then Galba consulted thereupon with his friends, and among them some were of opinion that he should stay a while, to see what change and alteration would grow at ROME upon this stirre. Howbeit Titus Junius, Captaine of the Prætorian Band, said unto him: O Galba, what meaneth this doubtfull deliberation? Be not we wise men, to call in question, whether we shall allow of Vindex friendship; or accuse him; yea, and with armes persecute him, that desired rather to have thee Emperour, then Nero Tyrant over the State of ROME? Afterwards Galba by Bills set up every where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchise such as would make suite for it. This rumour flying straight abroad, he gathered a great number of Souldiers together, that were very willing to rebel: and he was no sooner gotten up into the Tribunall or Chaire of State, but all the Souldiers did salute him by the Name of Emperour. Howbeit he was not content with this Name at the first, but accusing Nero, and lamenting the death of the noblest man whom he had cruelly put to death, he promised

Nymphidius Sabine taken upon him to be Emperour.

Honours done to Nymphidius by the Senate, made him grow too bold and insolent.

mised that he would employ his best wit and discretion to the service and benefit of his Countrey, neither naming himselfe Caesar, nor Emperour, but onely Lieutenant to the Senate, and state of Rome. Now, that Vindex did wisely to call Galba to be Emperour, Nero himselfe in his doings doth witness it: who having alwaies made a countenance as though he passed not for Vindex, and that he weighed not the rebellion of the GAULES: when it was told him that Galba was called Emperour, being then at supper, for spite he overthrew the Table. Moreover, though the Senate had judged Galba an Enemy, yet Nero to be pleasant with his friends, made as though he was nothing afraid of it, and said, This newes made all for him, because he stood in need of Money, and also that it was a happy occasion offered him to helpe him withall. For said he, we shall soone have all the GAULES goods, as the spoile of a just War, after we have once againe overcome and conquered them: and moreover, Galbaes goods also would quickly be in his hands, that he might sell them, considering that he was become his open Enemy. So he presently commanded Galbaes goods should be openly sold, to them that would give most. Galba understanding that, did also by sound of Trumpet sell all Neroes goods he had in all the Province of SPAIN, and did also finde more men readier to buy, then there were goods to sell. Daily men rose against Nero in every Countrey, who tooke Galbaes part, Clodius Macer onely excepted in AFRICKE, and Verginius Rufus in GAULE, both of them having charge of Legions appointed for the safe keeping of GERMANY: and both of them did follow severall directions by themselves, varying in minde and intent. For Clodius Macer having robbed much, and put divers men also to death through his cruelty and covetousnesse, shewed plainly, that he swam between two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, nor yet keepe it. Verginius also on the other side, being Generall over great and mighty Legions, who had sundry times called him Emperour, and did in manner force him to take upon him the Name and Empire: he notwithstanding did ever answer them, that he neither minded to take the Empire upon him, nor yet to suffer any other to do it, then such as the Senate should choose and call unto the fame. This at the first somewhat amazed Galba. But when both the Armies of Vindex and Verginius, in spite of their Captaines (who could not stay nor keepe them backe, no more then Coach-men can keepe backe the Horse with their bridles) were joynd in a great Battell together, where were slaine twenty thousand GAULES in the Field, and Vindex also flew himselfe shortly after: it was given out, that the Conquerors after so great a Victory obtained, would compell Verginius to take upon him to be Emperour, or else that they would take Neroes part againe. Then Galba being not a little perplexed, wrote unto Verginius, and perswaded him to joyne with him to hold up the Empire and Liberty of the ROMANS, and thereupon fled straight into a City of SPAIN called *COLONIA, rather repenting him of that he had done, and wishing for his wonted peaceable and quiet life wherein he was brought up, then otherwise occupying himselfe about any necessary or profitable thing for the furtherance of his enterprize. Now it was about the beginning of Sommer, and one day towards evening, there came to Galba one of his Slaves enfranchised, a SICILIAN born, that was come from Rome in seven daies: who understanding that Galba was alone, went presently to his Chamber door, and opened it, and coming in against the wils of the Grooms of the Chamber, that stood at the door, he told him that Nero being yet alive, but seen no more, first the People of Rome, and then the Senate had proclaimed him Emperour, and that immediately after, newes came that Nero was dead: the which he hardly believing notwithstanding, went thither himselfe, saw his body laid out upon the ground, and then made towards him with all speed to bring him these newes. The newes marvellously revived Galba, and a multitude of men thronged straight about the door, which began to be courageous, seeing him lively againe, although the speed of the Messenger seemed incredible. Howbeit two daies after, Titus also arrived, with certaine others of the Campe, who told Galba particularly what the Senate had decreed in his behalf. So this Titus was called to great honour: and the Slave enfranchised had priviledge given him to wear Rings of Gold, and he was called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the enfranchised bondmen, became the chiefeft man about his Master Galba. In the meane time, Nymphidius SABINE began at Rome, not covertly, but with open force, to take upon him the absolute Government of the Empire, perswading himselfe that Galba was so old, that he could hardly be brought in a Litter unto Rome, being at the least seventy three yeares old: besides also, that the Army of the PRÆTORIANS which were in Rome, did beare him good will of long time, and then acknowledged no other Lord but him onely, for the large promise he had made them, for the which he received the thanks, and Galba remained the Debter. So he presently commanded Tigellinus, his Companion and Captain with him of the Army of the PRÆTORIANS, to leave off his Sword: and disposing himselfe to banqueting and feasting, he sent for all those that had been Consuls, Prætors, or Pro-consuls of Provinces, and made them all to be invited in the Name of Galba. So there were certain Souldiers gave out this rumour in the Camp, that they should do well to send Ambassadors unto Galba, to pray him that Nymphidius might be their only Captain still, without any Companion joynd with him. Furthermore, the honour and good will the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their Benefactor, and going daily to visit him in his house, procuring him to be the Author of all their Decrees passed in Senate, and that he should authorize them: this made him high-minded, and the bolder by much; inso much that shortly after, they that came to honour him in this sort, did not onely hate and dislike his doings, but moreover he made them afraid of him. Furthermore, when the Consuls had given to common Pursivants any Commissions under Seale, or Letters Patents signifying the Decrees of the Senate, to carry them to the Emperour (by Vertue of which Letters Patents, when the Officers of the City do see the Seale, they straight provide the Pursivants of Coaches and fresh Horses to further their speed and hasty journey: Nymphidius

Nymphidius was very angry with them, because they did not also come to him for his Letters, sealed by him and his Souldiers, to send likewise to the Emperour. But besides all this, it is also reported that he was like to have deposed the Consuls: howbeit they excusing themselves unto him, and craving pardon, did appease his anger. And to please the commons also, he suffered them to put any of Neroes friends to death they could meet withall. Among other, they slew a Fencer called Spicilius, whom they put under Neroes Statues, which they dragged up and down the City. Another also called Aponius, one of Neroes Accusers, they threw him to the ground, and drave Carts over him laden with Stones. And divers others also, whom they slew in that manner, of the which some had done no manner of offence. Hereupon one Mauriscus, one of the noblest men of the City, and so esteemed, said openly in the Senate: I feare me we shall wish for Nero againe, before it be long. So Nymphidius being come in manner to the fullnesse of his hope, he was very glad to heare that some repined at him, because he was the Soone of Caius Caesar, that was the next Emperour after Tiberius. For this Caius Caesar, when he was a young man, had kept Nymphidius Mother, which had been a faire young Woman, and the Daughter of one Callistus, one of Caesars enfranchised Bondmen, whom he had gotten of a Laundresse he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Caius Caesar could know his Mother: and men thought that he was begotten of a Fencer called Martianus, with whom his Mother Nymphidia fell in fancy, for that he had a great Name at that time in Rome; and indeed Nymphidius was liker to him in favour, then unto any other. So, he confessed that he was the Sonne of this Nymphidia, howbeit he did ascribe the glory of the death of Nero unto himselfe, and thought himselfe not sufficiently recompenced with the honors they gave him, neither also with the goods he enjoyed, neither for that he lay with Sporus whom Nero loved so dearly, whom he sent for to Neroes Funerals while his body was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had been his Wife, and called him Poppaeus. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet secretly he aspired to be Emperour, partly practising the matter in Rome it selfe, by the meanes of certaine Women and Senators which were secretly his friends: and partly also through one Gellianus, whom he sent into SPAIN, to see how all things went there. Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things prospered with Galba, saving Verginius Rufus onely, who stood doubtfull yet, and made him sorely mistrust him; for that he was afraid (besides that he was Generall over a great and puissant Army, having also newly overthrown Vindex, and secretly ruling the best part of the Empire of Rome, which was all GAULE, and then in tumult and uproare, ready to rebell,) lest he would hearken unto them that perswaded him to take the Empire to himselfe. For there was no Capitaine of Rome at that time so famous, and of so great estimation as Verginius: and that deservedly, for that he had done great service to the Empire of Rome in time of extremity, having delivered Rome at one selfe time from a cruell tyranny, and also from the danger of the Warres of the GAULES. This notwithstanding, Verginius persisting still in his first determination, referred the Election of the Emperour unto the Senate: although, that after the death of Nero was openly known, the common sort of Souldiers were earnestly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the Souldiers (otherwise called a Colonel of a thousand men) went into his Tent with a Sword drawn in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperour, or else to looke to have the Sword thrust into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, Capitaine of a Legion, was sworne unto Galba, and that he had received Letters from Rome, advertising him of the Ordinance and Decree of the Senate: in the end, with much ado, he perswaded the Souldiers to proclaim Galba Emperour, who sent Flaccus Ordeonius to succeed him, unto whom he willingly gave place. So, when Verginius had delivered up his Army unto him, he went to meet with Galba, on whom he waited, coming on still towards Rome. And Galba all that time neither shewed him evill countenance, nor yet greatly esteemed of him, Galba himselfe being cause of the one who feared him, and his friends of the other, but specially Titus Junius: who for the malice he bare unto Verginius thinking to hinder his rising, did unwittingly indeed further his good hap, and delivered him occasion to draw him out of the civill Warres and mischiefs (the which lighted afterwards upon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. Furthermore, Ambassadors were sent from the Senate, and met with Galba at NARBONA, a City of GAULE: where after they had presented their humble duty, they perswaded him to make all the haste he could possible to shew himselfe to the People of Rome, who were marvellously desirous to see him. Galba received them very graciously and courteously, and made them great cheer, howbeit very modestly. For notwithstanding that Nymphidius had sent him divers Officers, and store of Neroes moveables: yet he would never be served with any of them, at any Feasts or Banquets he made, nor with other then his owne stuffe; wherein he shewed his noble minde, and how he could Master all vanity. But Titus Junius shortly after told Galba, that this noble minde, and civill moderation, without pride or pompe, was too lowly a manner to flatter the People, and that it was a certaine respect of honesty that knew not it selfe, and became not his greatnesse and majesty. So, he perswaded him to use Neroes Money and stuffe, and to be sumptuous and Princely in his Feasts, without niggardinesse. To conclude, the old man Galba began plainly to shew, that he would be ruled by Titus Junius: who above all other was extreme covetous, and besides too much given to Women. For when he was a young man, the first time he went to the Warres under The candidus Calvisius SABINE, he brought his Captaines Wife (which liked good fellowship) disguised one of Titus like a Souldier into the Campe, into his Generals Tent (which the ROMANS called Principia) Junius, and there was somewhat bold with her. Wherefore Caius Caesar committed him to Prison, but he escaped escaped at his death. Another time, when he supped with Clodius Cesar, he stole a Silver Pot. Clodius hearing of it, bade him againe to supper the next night: but he commanded his men they should give him drinke in a earthen Cruse. Thus this theft (through Cesar's pleasancie) seemed rather a matter of sport, then of anger: howbeit the faults which he committed afterwards through extreame covetousnesse of Money (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the sway about him, gave unto some just cause, and unto others apparent colour of tragical mischiefs, and grievous calamities. For Nymphidius, so soone as Gellianus was returned out of SPAIN, whom he had sent thither to see what Galba did, informing him that Cornelius Lacon was Capitaine of the guard and house of the Emperour; and that Titus Junius did all in all about him, and that he could never be suffered to come neare Galba, nor to speake with him apart, because those which were about Galba did mistrust him, and ever had an eye to him to see what he did; he was marvelously perplexed withall. Thereupon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and petty Captaines of the Campe of the Pratorian Army, and perswaded them that Galba touching his own Person, was a good old and discreet man, howbeit that he did not follow his owne advice and counsell, but was ruled altogether by Junius and Lacon, who marred all: and therefore, that it were good (before they came to be of greater power, and to have such great authority in managing the affaires of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before) to send Ambassadors to the Emperour, in the name of all the Campe, to tell him that in putting those two men from about him, he should be the better welcome to ROME, and to all men else besides. The Captaines utterly misliked this device. For they thought it too strange, and beyond all reason, to seeme to teach an old Emperour, as if he were but a Child that did not know what it was to governe: and to appoint him what Servants and Friends he should keepe, and whom he should trust or mistrust. Nymphidius perceiving this, rooke another course, and wrote Letters unto Galba o' terrifie him; one time sending him word that he was marvellous evill beloved of many in ROME, and that they were ready to rebell against him: another time also that the Legions of GERMANIE were revolted, and that he understood the like from the Legions of JUDIE and SYRIA: and another time also that Clodius Macer in AFRICKE stayed all the Ships fraughted with Corne that were bound for ROME. But in the end finding that Galba made no account of him, and that he gave no credit to his words nor writings, he determined first of all to set upon him. Howbeit Clodius Celsus, borne in the City of ANTIOCH, a wife man, and his faithfull friend, dissuaded him marvellously not to do it: declaring unto him, that he thought there was no one house nor family in ROME that would call Nymphidius, Cesar. Howbeit in contrary manner, divers others mocked Galba, and specially one Mitridates of the Realme of PONT, that said he was a bald writhen man. For the ROMANS (said he) have him indeed now in some estimation: but when they have once seene him, they will thinke it a perpetual shame and reproach to our time, that he was called Cesar. So they thought it good to bring Nymphidius about mid-night into the Camp, and there openly to proclaim him Emperour. "Howbeit the chief Tribune of the Souldiers called Antonius Honoratus gathered his Souldiers together in the night, and before them all did first openly reprove himselfe, and then them, for that they had so often turned and changed in so short time, without any wit or discretion, having no judgement to choose the best way, but to be pricked forward and carried headlong in that sort by some wicked Spirit, which brought them out of one treason into another. And yet (said he) your first change had some countenance of reason, to wit, the horrible Vices and faults of Nero: but now wherein can we accuse Galba, to have any countenance to falsifie our faith unto him? hath he slaine his Mother? hath he put her to death? hath he shamefully played the tumbler or common player upon a Scaffold in the Theater? And yet for all these vile parts, we never durst once begin to forsake Nero, but gave credit to Nymphidius words, who told us that Nero had first forsaken us, and that he was fled into ÆGYPT. What shall we do? shall we kill Galba after Nero? what shall we kill him that is a Kin unto Livia, to make the Sonne of Nymphidia Emperour, as we have already slain the Son of Agrippina? or shall we rather kill him that hath rashly entered into this enterprise, and thereby to revenge the death of Nero, and to shew our selves faithfull Souldiers unto Galba? All the Souldiers yeelded straight to the Colonels words, and therewith went to their other Companions to perswade them to keepe their faith and promise they avowed unto the Emperour: so that they made many of them revolt againe from Nymphidius. Thereupon the noise and crier being great, Nymphidius supposing (as some thought) that the Souldiers did call for him, or else hoping betimes to quench this tumult, to stay such as were yet wavering: he went thither himselfe with great store of Torch-light, and carried an Oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Varro had made for him, and the which he had learned without booke to speake unto the Souldiers. But when he found the Gates of the Campe shut, and saw divers men armed upon the walls, he began to be afraid: and coming nearer, asked them what they meant by it, and by whose commandement they had armed themselves as they did. Answer was made him by them all, that they acknowledged no other Emperour but Galba: the which he seemed to like of, and also commanded them that followed him to do the like, and therewithall drew nearer. Whereupon certaine of the Souldiers that warded at the Gate, did open him the Gate, and suffered him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit as soone as he was come in, first there was a Dart thrown at him, the which one Septimius that went before him received upon his shield: and then others also came with their Swords drawn in their hands to set upon him, and followed him as he fled into a Souldiers Cabine, where they slew him. Then they layed his body in an open place, and railed it about, that every man that would, might the

the next day see it. So Nymphidius being slaine in this sort, Galba understanding of his death, commanded that all Nymphidius friends and Confederators that had not been slaine at that time, should for his sake be put to death, as indeed they were. Amongst them they slew Ciconius that had made the Oration for Nymphidius, and Mitridates also of PONT. Howbeit, though indeed they had deserved it, yet men thought it a very cruell part to command these men to be put to death in that sort, which were men of such quality and calling as they were, without due forme and order of Law. For every man stood in good hope upon the coming in of this new Emperour, to have seen another manner of Government then they had yet seene: howbeit they were deceived of their hope at the first chop. But yet they misliked this moit of all, when he commanded them to kill Petronius Tertullianus, that had been Confull, because he was Nero's faithfull friend. But now for the death of Clodius Macer, whom Trebonianus slew in AFRICKE by his commandement, and for Ponticus that was also slaine in GERMANIE by Valens, he had some reason to feare them because they were in armes, and commanded great Armies. But for Tertullianus, that was an old man, naked and unarmed, truly he should have put him to his Triall by Law, if he would have ministred justice, the which he promised to keepe at his first coming to the Imperiall Crown. Herein they greatly reprov'd Galba. Now when he drew neare to ROME within five and twenty Furlongs, he was compassed about with a multitude of Mariners and Sea-faring men, that kept the high-way on every side, wandering up and downe in every place. These were the men whom Nero had gathered together into one Legion, and had taken them from the Oare and made them Souldiers. So they were come thither to be Suiters to him, that he would allow them still to be Souldiers; and they pressed so arrogantly upon him, that they would not suffer those which came to the new Emperour, to see him nor speake with him, but they fell to tumult and uproare, crying out to have Ensignes for their Legion, and to be appointed a place to lie in, in Garrison. Galba referred them over to another time, and bade them they should then let him understand their demand. They told him againe, that this delay was a kinde of deniall, and thereupon fell to plaine mutiny, and followed him with great cries: inso much that some of them stucke not to draw out their Swords. Then Galba commanded the Horsemen he had about him, to set upon them. So there was not a man of them that resisted, but some of them were overthrowne and troden under their Horse feet, and others also slaine as they fled. This was a very evill tigne and presage for him, to enter into ROME with such bloudshed, upon so many poore dead mens bodies as lay slaine on the ground. Howbeit, where some before did despise and mock him for an old feeble man, every man then was afraid of him, and quaked for fear. Furthermore because he would shew a great change and alteration from the unreasonable vaine gifts and expences of Nero, it seemeth he did many uncomely things. As when one Cannus an excellent Player on the Recorder, had played all supper-time, because it was marvellous sweet Musick to heare, he praised and commended it marvellously, and commanded one to bring him his Casket, out of the which he rooke a few Crowns, and put them into his hand, saying: that it was not Money of the Common-Treasure, but of his own. Furthermore, he gave straight commandement that they should require and call backe againe the Gifts Nero had given and bestowed upon common Players, Minstrels, Wrestlers, and People of such kind of faculty and Profession, and to leave them onely the tenth part. But he got little by this device. For the most part of those that had Gifts given them, had spent and consumed it all, as men that lived without any rule or order, and spent at night that which they got in the day: and besides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them restore it againe. But this was an endlesse worke: for things had been so conveyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinit number of mens hands. But of all this, the shame and dishonour returned to Galba himself, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Junius: who onely made the Emperour straight-laced to all others, whilst he himselfe took unreasonably of all men, making port-faile of every thing that came to hand. For Hesiodus the Poet saith:

As well when the Vessell is full that it spill,
As when it is empty, thirst craveth drinke still.

But Junius perceiving Galba to be old and feeble, would wisely take his fortune and time while time served, supposing it almost to be at an end so soone as he began to enter into it. So in the meane time he did much dishonour the poor old man, over-greatly abusing (under cloke of his Authority) the chiefest and weightiest matters, in reproving, or altogether hindring those, the which the Prince himselfe had a good desire to deale uprightly in, as to punish the Officers of Nero. For he put some of them to death, among the which Elius was one, and certaine other, as Polyclitus, Perennius, and Patrobis: whereat the People marvellously rejoyced, and cried out, as they went to execution through the Marker-place, that it was a goodly and blessed procession, and required Tigellinus of the gods and men, that had been chiefe Master and guide of all Nero's tyranny. Howbeit the trim man had gotten the vantage, and had largely fed Junius before: for afterwards he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being as he was, and had never offended, nor was partaker of any of the wicked parts he played when he was alive. Whereas he that made Nero worthy of death, and that afterwards had also betrayed him, was let alone, and nothing said unto him; being a manifest proove to all others, that they should not doubt to hope to abtaine any thing at Titus Junius hands, so they fed him with Gifts. For the common People of ROME never desired any thing so much, as to see Tigellinus to be carried to execution: and

and they never left crying out to demand him in all Assemblies of the Theater or shew-place, untill such time as the Emperour Galba did forbid them by proclamation, the which declared that Tigellinus would not live long, because he was sicke of a consumption of the Lungs, which by little and little did wear him to nothing: and Galba prayed the People that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloody. The People were much offended with this, but yet they seemed to laugh at it: and Tigellinus did sacrifice to the gods for his health and safety, and prepared a sumptuous Feast. Where Junius rising from Supper, being set by the Emperour, went unto Tigellinus to be merry with him, and tooke his Daughter being a Widow with him, unto whom Tigellinus dranke, and offered her a Gift of five and twentie Myriades of Silver: and commanded one of his chiefeft Concubines to take from her necke a Carcanet she wore, being worth fiftene Myriades, and to give it the other. After he had handled the matter thus, those things that were done uprightly, and with justice, were reproved and taken in evill part: as the thing that was granted to the GAULES, because they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not discharged of the Subsidies and Taxes they were wont to pay, nor that they were made free of ROME, so much through the bounty and liberality of the Emperour, as it was by Junius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For these causes the People hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the Souldiers still lived in good hope, for the Gift that was promised them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as much as was promised them, yet they should enjoy as much as Nero had given them. But Galba understanding that they complained of him, spake a word meet for so noble and worthy a Prince as he was: that he used to choofe Souldiers, not to buy them. This word being reported to the Souldiers, it bred a marvellous mortall hatred in them against him: because they thought it was not onely to take the Gift away from them which they hoped presently to have received, but that it was also a president to teach the Emperours that should come after him, what they should do. Howbeit the rebelling mindes of the Prætorian guard at ROME appeared not yet, but was secretly kept in for the reverence they bare unto the Majesty and person of Galba, who kept them that were desirous to rebell, because they saw as yet no beginning of any change or alteration. This did somewhat smother and keepe in the shew of their wicked intent. But they which had before served under Virginius, and were at that time under Flaccus in GERMANY, thinking themselves worthy of great reward for the Battell they had wonne against Vindex, and having nothing given them in recompence, they would not be pleased with any thing their Captaine said unto them, neither did they make any account of Flaccus, because he could not stirre himselfe, he was so plagued with the Gout, and besides that, he had no manner of experience in Warres. So one day when certaine Sports were made, at the bringing in of the which, the Colonels and Captaines (according to the manner of the ROMANS) made prayers unto the gods for the health and prosperity of the Emperour Galba: there were divers of them that made a noise at the first, and afterwards when the Captaines continued on their Prayers, in the end the Souldiers answered: If they be worthy. The Legions in like manner under Tigellinus charge, did oftentimes use such insolent parts: whereof Galbaes Officers did advertise him by Letters. Wherefore Galba being afraid, and mistrusting that they did not onely despise him for his age, but also because he had no Children, he determined to adopt some young Gentleman for his Sonne, of the noblest house of the City of ROME, and to proclaime him his Successour in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Ottho, of a noble house, but ever given to sensuality and pleasure from his cradle, as much as any ROMANE could be. And as Homer oftentimes doth call Paris the Husband of the faire Helen, naming him by the Name of his Wife, because he had no other commendable Vertue in him: even so Otho came to be known in ROME, by marrying Poppæa, whom Nero loved when she was Crispinus his Wife: howbeit, bearing some respect to his Wife, and being afraid also of his Mother, he had inticed Otho to be his baud unto her. Nero loved Otho dearly, and much delighted in his company, because he was so good a fellow and free of his selfe: and was very glad sometime to hear how he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was anointing himselfe with precious Oyles and Perfumes, he cast a little upon Otho as he went by: who the next day made him a Feast in his house, where suddenly were thrust into the Hall, divers Vessels of Gold and Silver full of this perfumed Oyle, that ran out of them like Conduit-water, and did wet all the Hall. So Otho having first possessed Poppæa, and abused her under hope of Neroes love, he perswaded her to be divorced from her Husband. The which she did, and he received her home to his own house, as his lawfull Wife: no being so well pleased to have part, as he was sorry and angry also to let another enjoy her. Now Poppæa her selfe (as it is reported) did not mislike this his jealousy, for sometimes she would shut her door against Nero, though Otho were not within: either because she would keepe Nero in breath, and in love-likeing still, or as some thought, because she would not have Cæsar to her Husband: and likewise that she would not refuse him for her friend because he was wantonly given. But so it is, Otho was in danger of his life by marrying of Poppæa: and so was it also a strange thing, that Nero having put his Wife and Sister to death, onely to marry Poppæa, he did yet pardon Otho, and saved his life. Howbeit it was for Senecaes sake that was his friend, through whose perswasion he was sent to the furthest part in SPAIN along the Ocean Sea, to be Governour of LUSITANIA. And there he governed so wisely, that he was nothing chargeable nor troublesome unto the Countrey: knowing that this honourable charge was given him onely to mitigate and hide his banishment. Afterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the first of all the Governours of the Provinces that joynted with him, and bringing with him all his Plate, both Gold and Silver, unto the Mint-master, he gave it him to put into bullion, and so to be converted into currant Coine. Moreover, he gave of his Officers unto Galba, those which he thought the meetest men to serve a Prince: and otherwise when he was tried, he shewed himselfe as faithfull and skillfull in matters of State, as any one that followed the Emperours traine. Inasmuch as all the way he went many daies journey in Coach, with Galba himselfe, and did marvellously curry favour with Titus Junius, bestowing great Gifts upon him, and also entertaining him with pleasant speeches: but specially, because he willingly gave him the upper-hand, whereby he was assured to be the second person in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he farre excelled Junius, for that he granted mens suits frankly and freely without one penny taking, and was besides easie to be spoken with of every man that had any suite to him: but specially of the Souldiers, whom he did greatly helpe and further, and caused divers also to be called to honourable Office, he himselfe partly moving the Emperour for them, without any labour or suite made unto him, and partly also obtaining them at Junius hands, and of the two infranchised bondmen of Galba, Isidrus, and Asiatius. For these three men did beare all the sway and credit about the Emperour in the Court. Moreover, alwaies when he invited the Emperour to his house, he bribed the Prætorian Guard that waited upon him, and gave every Souldier a Crown. Now this in fight, seemed chiefly to be done to honour the Emperour with: though indeed it was a fine device to overthrow him, to bribe the Souldiers in that sort as he did. So Galba consulting whom he should make his Successour, Titus Junius preferred Otho unto him: the which he did not simply of himselfe, nor without reward, but onely with promise that Otho should marry his Daughter, if Galba did adopt him his Sonne, and proclaime him Successour in the Empire. Howbeit, Galba did alway specially regard the Common-wealth before his private liking, and sought to adopt such one, as should not so much please himselfe, as otherwise should be profitable and meet for the Empire. But surely in my opinion Galba would not make Otho Heire of his goods, considering what an unreasonable spender he was, and how sumptuous in all his things, and besides, farre gone in debt: for he ought above fivethousand Myriades. So when he had heard Junius counsell about this adoption, he gently without other answer, did put over his determination until another time, and made Otho only Confull at that time, and Titus Junius Confull with him: whereby it was straight supposed, that at the beginning of the new yeare, he would proclaime him his Successour in the Empire. Which was the thing the Souldiers most desired of all other. But now, delaying still his determination, the Legions of the ROMANS in GERMANY, did rise and rebell against him all at an instant. For he was generally hated of all his Souldiers, because he paid them not the Gift he had promised them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alledged for their cause of rising, that he had dishonourably rejected Verginus Rufus: and that the GAULES which had fought against them, were rewarded with great and rich Priviledges, and they that tooke not part with Vindex, had been grievously punished and put to death. Moreover, that Galba did onely honour Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his good will unto him, offering publique Oblations and funerall Sacrifices for him, as by him onely he had been proclaimed Emperour. Now such such speeches and rumours ran through the Campe amongst them, when the first day of the yeare came, which the ROMANS call the Calends of January; on which day when Flaccus had called the Souldiers together, to sweare them to the Emperour according to the custome, they plucked down Galbaes Images, and sware onely in the Name of the People and Senate of ROME. The Captaines seeing what course they tooke, were as much afraid of the danger to be without a head, as they stood doubtfull of the mischief of their rebellion. So there slept up one amongst them and said: "My fellows in armes, what do we meane? we neither chuse any other Emperour, nor yet do allow of him that is Emperour at this present: whereby we shew plainly, that we do not onely refuse Galba, but also all other to be our head and Emperour that may command us. Now for Flaccus Ordeonius, that is but Galbaes shadow and Image, I would wish we should let him alone there as he is. And for Vitellius, Governour of the lower GERMANY, he is not farre from us, but one daies journey onely, whose Father was Censor at ROME, and thrice also, Confull, and that was in a manner a Peere and Companion of Cledius Cæsar in the Government of the Empire: whose poverty if any man mislike in him, is a manifest proove of his goodnesse and magnanimity. Him therefore let us chuse, and let the world know that we can tell how to chuse an Emperour, better then the SPANIARDS or LUSITANIANS. Some of the Souldiers that stood by, confirmed these words, but others misliked of them: inasmuch that amongst the rest there was an Ensign-bearer that stole secretly out of the Campe to carry Vitellius newes hereof, who that night made a great supper, and had great store of good company with him. These newes running straight through his Campe, Fabius Valens Colonell of a Legion, came the next morning with a great number of Horsemen, and was the first man that named Vitellius Emperour, who before seemed to refuse that Name, as one that was afraid to take the charge of so great an Empire upon him: but after dinner, being full of Wine and Meate, he came out among them, and accepted the Name of Germanicus which they gave him, and refused the Name of Cæsar. But therewithall incontinently after, Flaccus Souldiers leaving their goodly popular Oath which they had sworne in the Name of the People and Senate, they all then tooke their Oathes faithfully to do what it should please the Emperour Vitellius to command them. Thus Vitellius was chosen Emperour in GERMANY. So Vitellius named Galba hearing of this new change, thought it not good to deferre time longer for the adoption he had intended: wherefore certainly understanding that those whom he trusted most about him, were parties in this matter, some taking part with Colabella, and the most part of them with Otho, neither liking the one nor the other, suddainly without any word spoken to any man, he sent for Piso (that was the younger Sonne of Crassus and Piso, whom Nero had put to death) a young man faire conditioned, and shewed by his grave and modest countenance he had by vertue, that he was endued with many noble vertues. Galba came downe presently from his Pallace, and went straight to the Campe to proclaime Piso, Cesar, and his Successour in the Empire. Howbeit at his setting out of his Pallace, there appeared many great signes in the Firmament which followed him. And moreover when he was also come into his Campe, and that he began to say without booke part of his Oration, and partly also to read it, it lightned all the while he speake, and there fell such a great shower of raine upon it, and a marvellous thicke Mist in the Campe, and over all the City, that men might easily see the gods did not like this adoption, and that it would not prosper. The Souldiers themselves shewed their discontentment by their heavy looks, and the rather, because at that time there was no speech of reward or liberality. And furthermore, they that were present also marvelled much (for that they could gather by the countenance and words of Piso) that Piso nothing rejoiced at this great favour, although he lacked not wit and understanding otherwise to acknowledge it. And on the other side also, they found easily by Orb's looks, many signes and proofes that he was marvellously offended in his minde, to see that he was thus deceived of his hope. For he being the man that was first spoken of, and thought most worthy of all other, and being come also so neare unto it, no to see himselfe thus whipped out of it, he supposed that it was a plaine proofe that Galba had no good opinion of him, and that he maliced him in his heart, so that after that time he still stood in feare of his life. For he being afraid of Piso, hating also Galba, and being grievously offended with Titus Junius, he went his way full of divers thoughts in his minde. But the Soothsayers, Astronomers, and Chaldeans, which he ever kept about him, did perswade him not to be discouraged for this, nor to cast all hope aside: and specially one Ptolomy, in whom he had great confidence, because he had oftentimes before fore-told and assured him, that Nero should not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero should die first, and he himselfe survive him, and should become Emperour of Rome. Whereby Ptolomy having proved his first Prediction true unto him, he bade him be bold, and feare not that to come. But now besides him, those that secretly complained unto him, did prick him forward the more, fighting to see him so evil dealt with by Galba, and divers of them chiefly, which bare great authority and credit about Tigellinus and Nymphidius: who being then cast off, and discountenanced, came all unto him, and stirred him up the more. As amongst others, Veturius and Barburius chiefly, of the which the one had been Optio, and the other Tesserarius: (for so the Romans call those that be their Messengers, Spials, and Officers to the Captaines) who with an enfranchised bondman of his called Onomastus, went unto the Campe, and there corrupted some Souldiers with ready Money, and other some with faire words, being of themselves evil inclined, and expected but occasion to utter their malice. For otherwise had the Souldiers been all of one minde, it had not been an enterprize to have been brought to passe in foure daies space (being no more betwixt the adoption and murther) to make a whole Campe rebell in that fort. For they were slaine the fifteenth day of January, on which day Galba did sacrifice in the morning within his Pallace, before his friends. But at that time the Soothsayer called Ombrius, when he had the Intrails of the Beasts sacrificed in his hands, and had looked upon them, he spake not doubtfully but plainly, that he saw signes of great tumult and rebellion, and that the Emperour was in present danger of great treason. Whereby it plainly appeared, that the gods had put Galba into Orb's hands: for he stood at that time behinde Galba, and both heard and saw all that the Soothsayers did. So he seeming to be grieved withall in his minde, and his colour changing oft for for the feare he was in, his enfranchised bondman Onomastus came and told him, that the Masons and chiefe Carpenters were come to speake with him, and tarried for him. This was the watch-word agreed upon between them, at which time Orb should then go unto the Souldiers. Then Orb said, that he went to looke to an old house he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would shew it unto the Work-men. So he went his way, and came from the Pallace, by the place they call Tiberius house, into the Market-place, where the golden Pillar standeth, where also the greatest high-waies of all Italy do meet together. There certaine met him that first called him Emperour, which were not in all above three and twenty Persons. Thereupon, though Orb was not unconstant, as it appeared (notwithstanding he was so fine and effeminate a man) but rather resolute and stout in instant danger: yet feare so oppressed him at that time, that he would faine have left his enterprize. Howbeit the Souldiers would not suffer him, but compassing his Litter round about with their Armes, and their Swords drawn in their hands, they commanded the Littermen to go forward. So Orb as he went hastening on his drivers, he often muttered to himselfe, I am but dead, Some hearing him as they passed by him, rather wondered, then that they were otherwise troubled, to see such a small number of men about him, that they durst venture upon so hard an enterprize. Now as he was carried through the Market-place, he was met withall by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three and by foure in a company: all which came and joynd with him, and cried Cesar, Cesar, having their Swords drawn in their hands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to guard the Field of Mars, knew nothing of this conspiracy, but being amazed and afraid with their suddaine coming, he suffered them to come in. So when Orb was come in, he found no man that resisted him. For they that knew nothing of the practise, being compassed in with those that were made privy to it, and had knowne it of long time, being found straggling here and there, by one and by two, they followed the rest for feare at the first, and afterwards afterwards for good will. This was brought straight to Galba to the Pallace, the Soothsayer being yet busie about this Sacrifice: inasmuch that they which before gave no credit to those Divinations, began then to marvell much at this heavenly signe. Then there ran immediately a great number of People from the Market-place, unto the Pallace. Thereupon Junius and Lacon, and certain other of Galba's enfranchised bondmen, stood to Guard Galba's person with their Swords drawne in their hands. Piso also went to speake unto the Souldiers that guarded the Emperours person. Moreover, because the ILLYRIAN Legion lay out of the Campe in a place called Vipanna, they dispatched away Marinus Celsus with all speed, a very honest man to get that place. Galba in the meane time stood in doubt whether he should come out of the Pallace or not: for Junius would not let him go, but Celsus and Lacon perswaded him to go out: inasmuch as they fell at great words with Junius that went about to dissuade him from it. In this stirre there ranne a rumour that Orb was slaine in the Field. Immediately after came Julius Articus, one of the noblest men of all the Emperours guard, and shewed his Sword drawne, crying that he had slaine Cæsar's Enemy: and thrust through the presse, and got to Galba, and shewed him his Sword bloudied. Galba looking him in the face, asked him who commanded him to do it. The Souldier answered him: the Faith and Oath he had made unto him: Therewithall the People that stood by cried out, it was nobly done of him, and clapped their hands for joy. Then Galba taking his Litter, went out of his Pallace to do Sacrifice to Jupiter, and also to shew himselfe openly. Howbeit he was no sooner come into the Market-place but he heard contrary newes, that Orb was Lord and Master of the whole Campe and Army. Then as it happeneth in so great a presse of People, some cried out to him to returne backe againe, others would have him to go forward: others had him be afraid of nothing, and others willed him to looke to himselfe. So his Litter being thus turmoiled to and fro, as toft upon the Sea, sometime borne backe, other-while carried forward, first of all they saw certain Horsemen, and then Footmen also armed, coming from Paulus Pallace, all of them together crying out with loud voice, Hence, hence, private man. Then all the People set upon a running, not flying dispersedly, but in heapes, upon Porches and Stalls in the Market-place, as it had been to have seene some sight or sport. Then one called Attilius * Sarcello, overthrew one of the Images of Galba, which was as it were a beginning of open Warres. Others round about threw Darts on every side of him against his Litter. But when they saw they could not kill him, then they came nearer to his Litter with their Swords drawn in their hands, and never a man of his left with him to offer to defend him, saving one man onely, whom the Sonne saw that day, amongst so many thousands of men, worthy of the Empire of Rome: and he was called * Sempronius. He having received privately no manner of pleasure at Galba's hand, but onely to discharge his Oath and duty stepped before the Litter, and lifting up a Vine Branch he had in his hand (with the which the Romans Captaines do use to beate their Souldiers that have offended) he fell out with them that did set upon him, and prayed them to hold their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the end when he saw they would not leave, but that they fell to it in good earnest, he then drew his Sword, and bare off the blowes as well as he could, until they hought him, that he fell to the ground. Then Galba's Litter being overthrowne right in the place called Curtius Lake, Galba lay on the ground armed in his Curaces. The traitorous Souldiers flew upon him, and gave him many a wound: and Galba holding out his necke unto them, bad them strike hardly, if it were to do their Country good. So he had many wounds on his Armes and his thighs, as it is reported: howbeit the Souldier that slew him was called Camurius, of the fifteenth Legion. Others do report that it was one Terenius, other also say Arcadius: and some other do call him Fabius Pabulus: who having stricken off his head, wrapped it in the lap of his Gown, because he could not otherwise take hold of it, for that he was all bald. Howbeit his fellowes and consorts would not suffer him to hide it, but rather that his notable fact he had done should be seene. Therefore he set it upon the point of his Lance, and so shaking the face of this poor old man, (a wife and temperate Prince, and chiefe Bishop, and Consull) he ran up and down (like mad Women possessed with the spirit and fury of Bacchus at the Feasts of Bacchus) bowing down his Launce being all of a gore blood. When his head was brought to Orb, it is said he cried out aloud: Tush, my fellowes, this is nothing, unless you bring me also Piso's head. So not long after, they brought him his head also. For the young man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who slew him hard by the Temple of Vesta. So did they also kill Titus Junius: who openly confessed that he was one of the conspiracy against Galba, and cried out to them that slew him, that Orb did not know that they did kill him. This notwithstanding, the Souldiers strake off his head and Lacon's also, and brought them both to Orb to receive the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Archilochus saith:

Of seven peradventure slaine dead on the ground,
A thousand will say, that they all gave the wound.

So there was divers men at that time, who being no partakers of this murther, had bloudied all their hands and Swords, and so shewed them bloudied to have reward also: but Vitellus notwithstanding made enquiry of them afterwards, and caused them to be put to death. There came into the Field also, one Marinus Celsus, whom divers men accused to have perswaded the Souldiers to aide Galba, and the common People cried out, and bad he should be put to death. Howbeit Orb would not suffer them to kill him: and yet being afraid to contrary the Souldiers minde, he told them they should not kill him so rashly, because he was first to learne some things more of him.

So he commanded them to binde him, and delivered him to be kept of those he trusted most. Afterwards the Senate was presently affrabled: who as if men had been suddainly changed from them they were, or as if there had been new gods, they all sweare by the Name of Otho, (the which Oath he himselfe had before sworne unto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him besides, Augustus and Cesar; the bodies of them that were flaine lying yet headlesse on the ground in the Market-place, all in their Consuls Robes. And as for their heads, the Souldiers after they could tell no more what to do with them, they sold the head of Titus Junius unto his Daughter, for the summe of two thousand five hundred Drachmes. And for Piso's head, his Wife through intreaty begged it of one Veranius. On the other side, for Galba's head, they gave it unto Patrobis and Vitellius Servants: who, after they had used it as vilely as they should devise, they threw it at length in a place where their bodies are cast, whom the Cesars put to death, the which they call Sestertium. Now for his Body Helvidius Priscus, through Otho's sufferance, carried it away, and Argus, one of his enfranchised bondmen, buried it by night. Thus have you heard the History of Galba, a man that in nobility and wealth was inferior to few ROMANS, and in them both was the chiefest man of all his time, and had alway lived in honourable fame and estimation, in the Reigne of five Emperours. So that he overcame Nero by his good Name, and the good opinion men had of him, and not through his own force and power. For of them that strove to make themselves Emperours at that time, some found no man that thought them worthy of it: others did put forth themselves, as thinking themselves worthy of it. Howbeit Galba was called unto it, and obeyed them that called him, using his Name against Vindex boldnesse: whereby he procured, that his rising (which before was called innovation and rebellion) was then called civill Warre, after that his faction came to have a man to be their head, thought worthy to be their Emperour. And therefore he did not so much desire to be Emperour for himselfe, as to do good to his Countrey and Common-wealth. But yet he erred, in seeking to command the Souldiers, whom Tigellinus and Nymphidius had spoiled by their flatteries: even as in old time Scipio, Fabius, and Camillus did command the Souldiers of the Empire of ROME at that time. So he being now a very old man, shewed himselfe a good Emperour and after the old sort, in his behaviour towards the Souldiers onely: but in all other things else, being carried away with the covetousnesse of Titus Junius and Laco, and of other his enfranchised bondmen, he left none desirous to be governed by him, but many that were sorry for his death.

THE LIFE OF O T H O.

Ann. Mund.

Post. Christ.

THE next morning, the new Emperour by breake of day went unto the Capitoll, and sacrificed, and there sent for Marinus Celsus to come unto him, whom he courteously saluted, and prayed him rather to forget the cause of his imprisonment, then to remember his delivery. Marinus Celsus made him a wife and noble answer againe, and said, that the matter for the which they would have accused him unto him, did witness his behaviour, shewing himselfe faithfull unto Galba, who never did him any pleasure. These words of them both did marvellously please the people: and so did they like the souldiers also wonderfully well. Moreover, after he had very favourably and graciously taken order for matters in the Senate, the rest of the time he had to be Consull, he employed partly about Verginus Rufus; and did also establish them Consulls in their place and degree, which had been called unto that dignity by Nero, or otherwise by Galba: and he also honoured the oldest Senators and of greatest estimation, with certaine Priesthoods. Besides all this, he restored unto all those Senatours that were banished by Nero and called home againe, all their goods yet unfold. Whereupon the chiefest Magistrates and Noblemen of the City that quaked before for fear, supposing that he was not a man, but rather a divell or fury of hell that was come to be Emperour, they all became glad men, for the good hope of this smiling and gracious reigne they were so lately entred into. Moreover, nothing pleased all the ROMANS together more, nor wanne him the good will of all men so much, as that he hid unto Tigellinus: for it was punishment enough for him, if he had no more but the feare of the punishment every man threatened him withall, as a thing due to the Common-wealth, and also by reason of the incurable diseases his body was infected withall. Now, though the Noblemen thought his unreasonable insolency and lust of the flesh (following naughty-packs and common Strumpets, burning still in filthy concupiscence) an extreme punishment, comparable to many deaths; and being also no better then a dead man in a manner, still following pleasure and sensuality as long as he could: this notwithstanding, all men were offended with him, that they should see such a wicked creature as he live, that had put so many Noblemen to death. So Otho sent for him, who lived very pleasantly at his houses in the Countrey, by the City of SINUSSEA, and had ships ever ready upon the Sea Coast, to flee if necessity drave him to it. Thereupon he first sought to bribe him with money which was sent with Commission to apprehend him, and perswaded him to let him escape: but when he saw he could not frame him to his mind, yet he refrained not to give him gifts, and prayed him to give him leave to shave his beard. The other granted him. Then Tigellinus tooke a razor, and did cut his with his choice men of Armes, and did not follow them over rashly, but compassed in the place where the Ambush lay, the which he raised, and in the meane time sent to his Campe with all possible speed to his footmen to make haste thitherward: and it seemeth, that if they had come in time, they had not left one of their enemies alive, but had marched upon the bellies of all Cecinna's Army, if they had followed the horsemen in time, as they should have done. But Paulinus being come too late to aide them, for that he came so slowly, he was burdened that he did not the duty of a Captaine that bare the name and countenance he carried. Furthermore, the common fouldiers accused him of treason unto Otho, and stirred up their Emperour against him, and spake very bigge words of themselves, saying, that they had overcome for their owne parts, had not the cowardlinesse of their owne Captaines been, who put them by the victory. So Otho did not trust him so much, that he would not make him beleefe but that he mistrusted somewhat. Therefore he sent his brother Titianus to the Campe, and Proclus with him, Captaine of the Prætorian Guard, who indeed commanded all; but in fight, Titianus had all the honour, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenant. Marinus Celsus and Paulinus followed after, bearing the name of Counsellors and friends onely: howbeit otherwise they medled with nothing, neither had any authority given them. On the other side, the enemies were in as much trouble as they, and those specially whom Valens led. For when newes was brought of the conflict that was betwene them in this Ambush, they were angry with him, because they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to helpe their men that were slaine: inso much that he had much adoe to pacifie and quiet them, they were so ready to have slowne upon him. So Valens at length removed his Campe, and went and joyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being come to his Campe at the Towne of BEBRICUM, which is a little Towne hard by CREMONA, he consulted with his Captaines whether he should give battell or not. So Proclus and Titianus gave him counsell to fight, considering that the fouldiers were very willing to it, by reason of the late victory they had wonne, and wished him not to deferre it: for thereby he should but discourage his Army, which was now willing to fight, and also give their enemies leisure to stay for their Chieftaine Vitellius, who came himself out of GAULE. But Paulinus in contrary manner alledged, that the enemies had all their force and power present, with the which they thought to fight with them, and also to overcome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas Otho looked for another Army out of MYRIA and PANNONIA, as great an Army as his enemies had already, so that he could tarry his time, and not serve his enemies turne: and also, that if the fouldiers being now but a few in number were willing to fight, they should then be much more encouraged, when they should have greater company, and should also fight with better safety. Furthermore he perswaded them, that to delay time was for their avails, considering that they had plenty and store of all manner of provision: where the enemies on the other side, being also in their enemies Countrey, their victuals would quickly faile them. Marinus Celsus liked very well of these perswasions; and so did Annius Gallus, who was not present at this counsell (but gone from the Campe, to be cured of a fall he had from his horse) but he was written to by Otho to have his opinion also. So Annius Gallus returned answer, that he thought it not best to make haste, but to stay for the Army that came out of MYRIA, considering they were onwards on their way. Howbeit Otho would not hearken to this counsell, but followed their minds that concluded of battell: for the which were alledged divers occasions. But the chiefeft and likeliest cause of all was, that the fouldiers which are called the Prætorian Guard (being the daily guard about the Emperours person) finding then in effect what it was to professe to be a fouldier, and to live like a fouldier, they lamented their continuing in ROME, where they lived at ease and pleasure, feasting and banqueting, never feeling the commodities and bitter paines of war: and did therefore so earnestly cry out to fight, that there was no staying of them, as if they should at their first cry and setting forward, have overthrowne their enemies. Moreover, it seemed also that Otho himselfe could no more away with the feare and doubt of the uncertaine successe to come, neither could any longer abide the grievous thoughts of the danger of his estate, he was so effeminate, and unacquainted with sorrow and paines. This was the cause that carried him on headlong, as a man that shutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and so to put all at adventure. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, and Othoes Secretary: Others also do report, that both Armies had divers determinations and minds: as to joyne all together in one Campe, and joyntly to chuse among them, if they could agree, the worstliest man of all the Captaines that were there: if not, then to assemble the whole Senate in a place together, and there to suffer the Senators to chuse such a one Emperour, as they liked best of. And sure it is very likely it was so, considering that neither of them both which were then called Emperours, was thought meet for the place they had: and therefore that these counsells and considerations might easily fall into the ROMANE fouldiers heads (who were wise men and expert fouldiers) that indeed it was a thing for them justly to dislike, to bring themselves into the like miserable time and calamity, which their predecessors before them had caused one another to suffer: first for Sylla and Marinus sakes, and afterwards for Cæsar and Pompey; and now to bestow the Empire of ROME either upon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his drunkennesse and gluttony: or else upon Otho, to maintaine his wanton and licentious life. This was the cause that moved Celsus to delay time, hoping to end the wars without trouble and danger: and that caused Otho to make the more haste, being afraid of the same. Howbeit Otho returning backe againe into BRESSELLES, he committed another fault, not onely because he tooke his mens good will from them to fight, the which his presence, and the reverence they bare unto him did put in them: but because also he carried away with him for the Guard of his person, the valiantest fouldiers and most resolute men of all his host. About that time there chanced a skirmish to fall out by the River of Po, because Cecinna built a bridge over it, and Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. Howbeit when they saw they prevailed not, they laid certaine Barges with Faggots and dry wood, and rubbed over with brimstone and pitch, and setting them one fire, they sent them downe the streame. When the Barges were in the midst of the streame; there suddenly arose a winde out of the River, which blew upon this wood-stake they had prepared to cast among the enemies workes of this Bridge, that first made it smoake, and immediately after fell on a flame; which did so trouble the men in their Barges, that they were driven to leape into the River to save themselves: and so they lost their Barges, and became themselves also prisoners to their enemies, to their great shame and mockery. Furthermore, the GERMANES under Vitellius, fighting with Othoes Fencers, which of them should win a little Island in the midst of the River, they had the upper hand, and slew many of the Fencers. Thereupon Othoes fouldiers which were in BEBRICUM, being in a rage withall, and would needs fight, Proclus brought them into the field, and went and Camped about fifty furlongs out of the City; so fondly, and to so little purpose, that being the spring of the yeare, and all the Countrey thereabout full of brookes and rivers, yet they notwithstanding lacked water. The next morning they raised their Campe to meete with their enemies the same day, and were driven to march above an hundred furlongs. Now Paulinus perswaded them to go faire and softly, and not to make more hast then needed; and would not so soone as they should come (being wearied with their journey and travell) set upon their enemies that were well armed, and besides had leisure and time enough to set their men in battell ray, whilest they were coming so longa journey with all their carriage. Now the Captaines being of divers opinions about this matter, there came a horseman from Otho, one of those they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commanded them to make all the hast they could, and to lose no time, but to march with all speed towards the enemies. So when the letters were reade, the Captaines presently marched forward with their Army. Cecinna understanding of their coming, was astonished at the first, and suddenly forooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his Campe, where he found the most part of his fouldiers ready armed, and Valens had given them their signal and word of battell. And in the meane time, whilest the Legions were taking their places to set themselves in battell ray, they sent out before, the choice horsemen they had, to skirmish. Now there ranne a rumour (no man knew how, nor upon what cause) that Vitellius Captaines would turne on Othoes side in battell inso much that when these men of Armes came neare to meete with the vaward of Othoes Army, Othoes men did speake very gently to them, and called them companions. Vitellius men on the other side tooke this salutation in evill part, and answered them again in a rage, as men that were willing to fight: Inso much that those which had spoken to them, were quite discouraged: and the residue also began to suspect their companions which had spoken to them, and mistrusted them to be traytors. And this was the chiefeft cause of all their disorder, being ready to joyne battell. Furthermore, on the enemies side also, all was out of order: for the beatts of carriage ranne in amongst them that fought, and so did put them marvellously out of order. Besides that also, the disadvantage of the place where they fought, did compell them to disperse one from another, because of sundry ditches and trenches that were between them, whereby they were compelled to fight in diverse companies together. So there were but two Legions onely, the one of Vitellius, called the Devourer: and the other of Otho, called the Helper: which getting out of these holes and ditches apart by themselves, in a good plain even ground, fought it out so a long time together in good order of battell. Othoes fouldiers were men of goodly personages, strong and valiant of their hands, howbeit they had never served in the warres, nor had ever foughten battell but that. And Vitellius men on the other side, were old beaten fouldiers, and had served all their youth, and knew what wars and battells meant. So when they came to joyne, Othoes men gave such a lusty charge upon the first onfet, that they overthrow, and slew all the first ranke, and also wanne the Ensigne of the Eagle. Vitellius men were so ashamed of it, and therewith in such a rage, that they tooke heart againe unto them, and ran in so desperately upon their enemies, that at the first they slew the Colonel of all their Legions, and wanne divers Ensignes. And furthermore, against Othoes Fencers (which were accounted the valiantest men, and readiest of hand) Varus Alphenus brought his men of Armes called the BATAVIA, which are GERMANES in the lowest part of GERMANIE, dwelling in an Island compassed about with the River of Rhene. There were few of his Fencers that stucke by it, but the most of them ranne away towards the River, where they found certaine Ensignes of their enef in battell ray, who put them all to the sword, and not a man of them escaped with life. But above all other, none proved more beatts and cowards, then the Prætorian guard. For they would not tarry till the enemies came to give them charge, but cowardly turned their backs, and fled through their owne men that were not overthrow: and so did both disorder them, and also make them afraid. This notwithstanding, there was a great number of Othoes men who having overthrowne the vaward of those that made head against them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were conquerours, and so valiantly returned backe into their Campe. But of their Captaines, neither Proclus nor Paulinus durst returne backe with them, but fled another way, being afraid of the fury of the fouldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their overthrow upon their Captaines. have seene his Tombe in the City of BRESSELLES a meane thing, and the Epitaph upon it translated out of Latine, saith no more but this: This is the Tombe of Marcus Otho. He died being but seaven and thirty yeares old, and was Emperour but three moneths: and there were as famous men that commended his death, as they that reproved his life. For though he lived not much more honest than Nero, yet he died farre more honourably. Furthermore, when Pellio one of the Captaines would have compelled his souldiers presently to have taken their oathes to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him: and understanding that there were yet remaining some Senators, they would not medle with them, but onely troubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his doores armed, and called him by his name, and commanded him to take charge of them, and to go as Ambassador to intreate for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were already overcome, considering he refused it when they had overcome: and also he was afraid to go Ambassador to the GERMANES, because he had compelled them to do things against their wills. Therefore he went out at his backe doore, and saved himselfe. So when the souldiers heard of it, they were at length contented to be brought to be sworne unto Vitellius: and so joynd themselves with Cecinnaes souldiers, so they might be pardoned for all that was past.

Hannibal.

IF we do call to mind the first PUNICK warre the CARTHAGINIANS had with the ROMANES, we shall find many Captaines who by the glory of their noble deeds have left great fame and renown unto their posterity. Howbeit amongst all the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, none are found more worthy of fame, and so commended of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilcar, Hannibal's father, otherwise surnamed Barcho, a valiant man doubtlesse, and in his time a skillfull souldier as any was. The same Hamilcar, first of all made warre with the ROMANES, a longer time in SICILE then was looked for, who had done great hurt to his Country and Common-wealth. After that also in the warres of AFRICKE (at what time the mercenary souldiers through their rebellion did put the Country of CARTHAGE in great danger) he did so valiantly appease the insurrection, that to every mans judgement, he was reputed the onely preserver of his Country. Then he was sent Governor and Captain into SPAIN, and carried with him at that time (as it is reported) his son Hannibal, being but a young boy, where he did noble service. In fine, in the ninth year of his abode there in that Province, he died fighting valiantly against the VATHONS. After his death, Hannibal his son in law (whom the CARTHAGINIANS through the aide and friendship of the BARCINIAN faction had made General of all their Army) remained Governour there the space of eight years. This Hasdrubal sent for Hannibal into SPAIN, after his father Hamilcar's death, against the minds of the chiefe of the contrary faction; to the end that as he had been trained from his youth in the discipline of wars, in his father Hamilcar's life: even so in like manner, that now being come to mans state, he should the better harden his body, to away with the paines and dangers of the warres. Now although at the first, the remembrance of his father was a great helpe unto him to win the love and good will of the souldiers: yet he himself afterwards, through his diligence and industry so handled the matter, that the old souldiers forgetting all other Captaines, they onely desired to choofe him (and none other) for their governour. For they found in him all the perfections that could be wished for in a noble Captaine or General. He had a present and ready wit to give counsell what was to be done, in greatest attempts: and besides, he lacked neither manhood nor industry to put it in execution. He had a valiant and invincible mind, even in greatest dangers and adversities of body: the which are wont to stay others from performing their endeavors and duty. He would watch and ward as any private souldier, and was quick and ready to do any kind of service, either like a valiant souldier, or a good Captaine. In this sort Hannibal continued in service in the wars, the space of three yeares, under the conduct of Hasdrubal. In that time he won the hearts of all the Army, that immediately after Hasdrubal's death, he was chosen to be Lieutenant General, with the common consent of all the souldiers: and this honour was laid upon him without contradiction of any of the CARTHAGINIANS, through the friendship and good will of the BARCINIAN faction. Hannibal was now sixe and twenty yeares old, when the souldiers made him their Lieutenant General. For at what time his father Hamilcar brought him into SPAIN, he was then but nine yeares old: and from that time unto Hasdrubal's death (according to Polybius declaration) it was seventeen yeares moe. So he was no sooner made Lieutenant General of all the Campe, and his Country, but he bent himselfe to make war with the ROMANES: having long before determined it. For first of all, he chiefly maintained almost a common hate of all the CARTHAGINIANS against the ROMANES, because of the losse of SICILIE and SARDINIA. Besides also, he bare them secret malice in nature, as a thing inheritable from his father Hamilcar: who of all the Captaines the CARTHAGINIANS ever had, was the mortallest enemie unto the ROMANES. And it is written also, that at what time Hamilcar made his preparation to go into SPAIN, he compelled Hannibal (being but a boy) to sweare in a sacrifice he made, that he would be a mortall enemie to the ROMANES, as soon as ever he came to the state of a man. So, the remembrance of these things were still fresh in the young mans mind, as the Idea (or Image) of his fathers hate, and still provoked him to spie out all the meanes he could, how to destroy the Empire of ROME. Besides also, the BARCINIAN faction never left to prick him forward unto it, because by wars he might raise himselfe to greatnesse, and so increase his estate. These causes, as well common as particular, inticed Hannibal to attempt war against the ROMANES, and gave the stout young man occasion by these meanes to practise innovation. There was a people at that time called the SAGUNTINES, who confined indifferently betwixt the ROMANES and CARTHAGINIANS: and were left free by the former peace concluded. These SAGUNTINES ever after tooke part with the ROMANES and by meanes of the league that was made betwixt them, the ROMANES always found them very true and faithful to the Empire of ROME. Hannibal therefore thought with himself, he could not devise to make a better match to anger the ROMANES withall, and to kindle the fire of his malice also against them, then to make war with the SAGUNTINES their confederates. Howbeit, before he would be openly seen to set upon them, he first determined to lead his Army against the OLCADES, and other people on the other side of the River Iberus: and after he had overcome them, then to finde occasion to molest the SAGUNTINES, to make it appear that the war was rather begun by them, then purposely intended by him. So after he had overcome the OLCADES, he did set upon the VACCINIANS, spoiled their Country, besieged many Cities, and took HERMANDICE, and ARBOCOLE, great and rich Cities. Now he had in manner overcome all the whole Country, when divers fugitives from the City of HERMANDICE, encouraging one another, conspired against him, leaved men, and inticed the OLCADES that were fled, to take their part. Then they periwaded the CARTHAGINIANS their neighbours, that they would all agree suddenly to set upon Hannibal at his returne. They being a people that desired nothing more then to fight, and considering also that they had received injuries by Hannibal, did easily hearken unto that counsel; and thereupon leaving a great number of men, to the number of a hundred thousand, they went to assaile Hannibal at his returne from the VACCINIANS, by the River of Tagus. When the CARTHAGINIANS discovered their Army, they staid upon it, and were marvellously afraid. And doubtlesse they had had a great overthrow, if they had fought with those so fierce people, being afraid of their suddaine coming, and also laden as they were with so great spoiles: the which Hannibal deeply considering, like a wise Captaine as he was, he would not fight, but lodged his Campe in the place where they were. Then the next day following, he passed his Army over the River with as little noise as he could, leaving the passage where the enemies might easiliest come over, unguarded: because under pretence of dissembled fear, he might intice the barbarous people to passe over the River, to take the opportunity and occasion offered them. Now indeed as he was the subtillest Captaine, and had the finest stratagemes of any other Captaine of his time: so his policy was not in vain, and his purpose to good effect, in abusing of the enemy: for the wild barbarous people reposing too great trust in the multitude of their men, supposing the CARTHAGINIANS had been afraid, afraid, with great fury entred the River to passe over it. So they being greatly troubled, and out of order by this meanes, and specially before they could passe all over the River, they were set upon by the CARTHAGINIANS, first by certain horsemen, and afterwards with the whole Army; so that there was a great number of them slain, and the residue were put to flight. After this victory, all the people inhabiting about the River of Iberus, yielded themselves unto him, saving the SAGUNTINES: who, though they say Hannibal at hand coming towards them, trusting to the friendship of the ROMANES, they prepared to defend themselves against him: and therewithal sent Ambassadors presently to ROME, to shew the Senate in what great danger they were, and also to pray aid against their so great enemy, that made wars so hotly with them. The Ambassadors that were sent to ROME, were sent out of SPAIN, when Hannibal made open war on them with all his Army, and pitched his Campe before the City of SAGUNTUS. When this matter was reported at ROME, and consulted of for the wrongs that had been done to their confederates, the Senators dealt but slackly in it, and by decree onely sent P. Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bibulus Pampilius unto Hannibal, to will him to raise his siege from SAGUNTUS: and if they found he would not hearken to them, that then they should thence repair to CARTHAGE, and to pray them to deliver their General Hannibal unto them, because he had broken the peace. Polybius writeth, that Hannibal did hear these Ambassadors, howbeit, that he made them a slender answer. Livy writeth in contrary manner, that they were never heard, nor came at any time to his Campe. Howbeit, they both agree thus far, that they came into SPAIN, and afterwards went into AFRICK, and from thence came to CARTHAGE; where after they had delivered their message unto the Councel, the BARCINIAN faction was so much against them, that they dishonourably returned to ROME, and obtained not their desire. Now in the Senate of CARTHAGE there were two contrary parts and factions: of the which, the first took his beginning from the government of Hamilcar, surnamed Barca, and so descended as it were by succession to his son Hannibal, and grew afterwards unto such greatnesse, that that faction (as well abroad as at home) ruled all matters judicial. The second faction came of Hanno, a grave man and of great authority in the same Common-wealth: howbeit, a man more given to embrace peace and quietnesse, then otherwise disposed to war and trouble. It is he onely (as it is reported) who at that time when the Ambassadors of the ROMANES came to CARTHAGE, to complain of the injuries done to their confederates, that did then in manner against the will of all the whole Senate, counsell them to keep peace with the ROMANES, and to beware of wars, the which one day might peradventure utterly destroy their Country. Doubtlesse, if the CARTHAGINIANS would have followed the grave counsel of Hanno, rather then to have given place to their desires, & had followed the author of peace, and not to have been ruled by them that gave counsell to make warres, they had not tasted of those miseries which their Country afterwards came unto: but giving place to the fury and ambitious mind of a young man, they heaped such mischiefs on their heads, as afterwards fell out upon them. Therefore it is very meet for wise magistrates and governors of Common-wealths, always rather to have an eye to the beginning of any matters, then to the end: and ever to decide all matters by advice and counsel, before they should take any wars in hand. Now the SAGUNTINES seeing themselves besieged by Hannibal, and that against all reason and equity he made warres upon them, they notwithstanding valiantly defended the siege many moneths together. Yet in fine, though Hannibal had many moe men then they (having a hundred and fifty thousand men in his Campe) and that the most part of their Rampiers were battered and overthrown: they liked rather to abide the sacke of their City, then to yeeld themselves to the mercy of their mortal enemy. So some do report, that SAGUNTUS was taken the eight moneth after siege was laid unto it. But Livy seemeth not to agree to that, neither to set down any certaine time of the continuance of the siege. Now the taking of this so wealthy a City, was a great furtherance divers wayes to Hannibal's enterprises. For many Cities taking example of the sacke of SAGUNTUS, who before mistaking to be subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, were ready to rebell, kept themselves quiet, and the souldiers also waxed lively and courageous: seeing the rich spoiles that were divided in the Campe. So Hannibal sent great presents of the spoiles of the SAGUNTINES, unto CARTHAGE, whereby he wanne the chiefe men of the City, and made them like the better of warres: whom he determined to lead with him against the ROMANES, not into SPAIN, as many supposed, but into ITALY it selfe. Whilest these matters were in hand, the Ambassadors returned from CARTHAGE to ROME, and declared in open Senate, the slender answer they had received, in manner at the selfe same time when they had intelligence of the sacke of SAGUNTUS. Hereupon the ROMANES greatly repented themselves (though somewhat too late) for that they aided not their friends and confederates in so great danger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very sorry for it, and therewith also marvellously offended, they divided the Provinces unto the Consuls, to wit, SPAIN unto Publius Cornelius, and AFRICK and SICILIE also unto Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certaine of the noblest men of the City were sent Ambassadors unto CARTHAGE, to make their complaints in open Senate for breach of the peace, and also to denounce unto them the cause of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to proclaime open warre against them, after they had declared the occasion thereof to come of themselves. This was as bravely received of the CARTHAGINIANS, as lustily offered unto them: but therein they were not so well advised, as the successe of that war in the end sufficiently proved it to them. Now Hannibal being advertised how things were concluded in the Senate at CARTHAGE, and thinking with himselfe that it was time to go into ITALY, as he had determined from the beginning: he made all the possible speed he could to prepare his ships and things ready, and so required

ed aide of the Cities that were his best friends and confederates, and commanded that all the bands should meet him at new CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, he appointed good Garrisons in places most convenient, in AFRICA and SPAIN, which he thought above all things else to be most necessary: because that when he should go into ITALY, the ROMANS should not winne it from him. Therefore he sent into AFRICA twelve hundred horsemen, and thirteen thousand footmen, all SPANIARDS: and besides, he brought out of divers parts of AFRICA four thousand souldiers, and placed them in Garrison in CARTHAGE, obtaining both Hostages, and souldiers by this meane. So he left the Government of SPAIN to his brother Hadrubal, and gave him an Army of fifty Ships of warre, two thousand horsemen, and twelve thousand footmen. These were the Garrisons he left in both those Provinces. Now he thought them not sufficient to withstand the power of the ROMANS, if they bent their warres into SPAIN or AFRICA: but he thought them strong enough to stay the enemy from over-running of the Country, untill that having brought his Army by land, he had set foot in ITALY. Moreover, he knew that the CARTHAGINIANS were strong enough to leavy a new Army if they listed: and if need so required, to send him aide also into ITALY. For, after that they had driven away this so dangerous a warre, procured against them through the spite of the mercenary souldiers, having ever after obtained victory: first under the conduct of Hamilcar: secondly, under Hadrubal: and lastly, under Hannibal: they were growne to such greatnesse and strength, that at what time Hannibal came into ITALY, their Empire and Dominions were marvellously enlarged. For they had all the coast of AFRICA, which lieth over against the sea Mediterraneum, from the Altars of the Philenians, which be not farre from the great Syrtis, unto Hercules pillars, and containeth in length * two thousand paces. So after they had passed the strait which divideth AFRICA from EUROPE, they possessed almost all SPAIN, to the mountaines Pirenei, which do divide SPAIN from GAULE. Thus order being taken for all things in AFRICA and SPAIN, Hannibal returned againe to new CARTHAGE, where his Army was ready for him, and well appointed. So, meaning to delay time no longer, he called his men together, and encouraging them with great and large promises, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALY: and made great account unto them of the friendship of the GAULES, and in the end bad them be of good courage, and set lustily forward. Thereupon, the next day following he depart from CARTHAGE, and brought his Army all along the coast, unto the River of Iberus. It is reported, that the next day following, Hannibal dreamed he saw a young man, of a marvellous terrible looke and stature, who bad him follow him into ITALY: but afterwards, that he saw a Snake of a wonderful greatnesse, making a marvellous noise: and being desirous to understand what the same might signifie, that it was told him, that it betokened the destruction of ITALIE. It is not to be marvelled at, though the great care and thought he tooke in the day time for the warre of ITALY, made his mind to runne of such fancies in the night, as dreaming of victory or destruction, or such other calamities of war. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Oratour saith: that our thoughts and words do beget such things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet writeth of Homer: to wit, like to those his mind most ranne on, or that he talked of most. Now after Hannibal had passed over the mountaines Pirenei, and that he had wonne the GAULES hearts with beautiful gifts, in few dayes he came to the River of Rhone. The head of the River of Rhone, is not farre from the heads of the Rivers of the Rheis and Danuby, and running eight hundred furlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at GENEVA. Then it runneth from thence towards the West, and divideth the GAULES a pretty way: and then being increased by the River of Arar (called in French, Saone) and with other Rivers, in the end it falleth into the Sea with divers heads betwixt the VOLSCES and the CAVRIANS. The VOLSCES at that time inhabited both the sides of the River of Rhone, and were full of people, and the richest of all other GAULES. They having understanding of Hannibals coming, passed over the River, and armed themselves, and prepared on the other side to stoppe the CARTHAGINIANS, that they should not passe over. Now, though Hannibal had wonne all the other GAULES, yet those he could never winne neither by gifts nor threats, to cause them rather to prove the friendship of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Hannibal perceiving he was to handle such enemies rather by policy, he commanded Hanno the sonne of Bemilear, secretly to passe over the River of Rhone, with part of the Army, and so to set upon the GAULES on the suddaine. Thereupon Hanno (as he was commanded) made a long journey, and having passed over the River at passable fords, he shewed himselfe hard by the enemies Campe before they say him, or that they knew what he was. The GAULES hearing their shouts and cries behind them, and having their hands full of Hannibal before them, who had many beates ready to passe over his men: they having no leisure to consult of the matter, neither to arme themselves to stand to defence, left their Campe and fled for life. So they being driven from the oile side of the River, the rest of the Army of the CARTHAGINIANS passed over it with safety. In the meane time, P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a little before was come unto MASSILIA, still heard newes of Hannibals Army. Wherefore, to be more assured of the matter, he sent a band of choice horsemen to discover what the enemies intent was: who making great speed as they were commanded, met by chance with five hundred horsemen of the NUMIDIANS, whom Hannibal had also sent to bring him word of the ROMANS Army. So, they first suddainly gave charge upon the NUMIDIANS, and after a hotte and valiant conflict betwixt both the parties, in the end the ROMANS overcoming them, they made them flee, but with great losse of their men: howbeit the greatest losse and slaughter slaughter fell upon the Enemies. So Hannibal by this meane found where the ROMANS lay, and stood in a great doubt with himselfe, whether he should keepe on his way into ITALY, or else leade his Army against the Consull that then was, and so to prove his hap and successe. At length debating many waies in his minde, and uncertaine which way he should determine, the Ambassadors of the BOIANS perswaded him to leave all other devices, and to go on into ITALY. For before that Hannibal had passed over the Mountaines Pirenei, the BOIANS having by craft taken the ROMANS Ambassadors, and done great mischief unto Mannius the Prætor, and inticed the INSUBRIANS also, they were revolted from the ROMANS, and tooke part with Hannibal, and onely because the ROMANS had replenished the Cities of PLACENTIA, and CREMONA with People, and had made them Colonies to ROME. So Hannibal being ruled by their counsell, raised his Campe, and keeping the Rivers side, still going against the River in few daies he came to the place which the GAULES do call the Island, the which the River of Arar and Rhodanus, coming from divers Mountaines, do make there. So at this present, there is the famous City of LIONS in GAULE, which they say was built long time after by Plancus Munatius. From thence he came to the Countrey of the ALLOBROGES, and having pacified the variance betwixt two Brethren for the Realme, he came through the Countrey of the CASTINIANS and VOCONTIANS, to the River of DURANCE. The head of this River cometh from the Alpes, and from thence running with a swift streame, falleth into the River of Rhone: and as it oftentimes changeth her course, so hath it in manner no passable ford. Yet Hannibal having past it over, he led his Army unto the Alpes, through open and plaine Countries, as far as he could: howbeit, as he passed through them, he had great losses, as it is reported. Infomuch that some that were living at that time, did affirme, that they heard Hannibal himselfe say, that he had lost above thirty thousand men, and the most part of his Horsemen. For Hannibal made waies through the Straights: so that in certain places of the highest Rocks, he was driven to make passages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had passed the Alpes in fifteene daies space, he came downe into the Valley, not far from the City of TURINE. Whereby it seemeth to vime, that he passed over the Mountaines they commonly called Genua, the which on the one side of it hath the River of Druentia, and on the other side it goeth downe to the City of TURINE. Now it is hard to say truly, what number of men he had when he was come into ITALY, because of the diversity of mens opinions. For some write, that he had a hundred thousand Footmen, and twenty thousand Horsemen: others also write, that he had twenty thousand Footmen, and sixe thousand Horsemen, all AFRICANS and SPANIARDS. But others reckoning the GAULES and LIGURIANS, do count fourscore thousand Footmen, and ten thousand Horsemen. Yet it is not credible, that his Army was so great, as the first men report, and specially having passed through so many Countreys, and also received such losses as he had: neither also could his number be so small, as the second reporters do make it, if a man will consider the famous Exploits and great Enterprises he did afterwards. So that I like their opinions best, which keepe the meane between them both: considering that he brought into ITALY, the better part of fourscore thousand Footmen, and ten thousand Horsemen, the which he had leaved in SPAIN: as it is manifestly knowne also, that Hannibal Armice they bare unto the ROMANS, that gave no place nor ground unto the CARTHAGINIANS. So Hannibal being come from TURINE, into the Countrey of the INSUBRIANS, he was met withall by Publius Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull speede from MASSILIA, and having passed the River of Po and Tefin, he camped not far from the Enemy. So shortly after, both the Generals being come into the Field to view each others Campe, the Horsemen of either side grew to skirmish, which continued long, and was not to be discerned which of them had the better. Howbeit, in the end the ROMANS seeing the Consull hurt, and also that the Horsemen of the NUMIDIANS, by little and little came to compass them in, they were driven to give ground: and so prettily retired, defending the Consull the best they could to save him, and so at length recovered their Campe. It is reported, that Publius Cornelius Scipio was saved at that time through his Sonnes helpe, who afterwards was called AFRICAN, and at that time was but a young stripling: whose praise, though it was wonderfull in so Greene a Youth, yet it is likely to be true, because of the famous and valiant Acts that he did afterwards. Now Scipio having proved how much his Enemy was stronger then himselfe in Horsemen, he determined to place his Campe so, as his Footmen might be in best safety, and also fight with greatest advantage. And therefore the next night following he passed the River of Po, and made as little noise as he could, and went unto PLACENTIA. The like shortly after did T. Sempronius Longus, who had beene restored from banishment by the Senate, and sent for out of SICILE: because both the Consuls should governe the Common-wealth by one selfe-Authority. Hannibal also followed them both with all his Army, and pitched his Campe neare unto the River of Trebia, hoping that because both Campes lay so neare together, some occasion would be offered to fight: the which he chiefly desired, both because he could not long maintaine Warre for lacke of Victuals, as also that he mistrusted the ficklenesse of the GAULES: who like as they soone fell in League and friendship with him, drawne unto it with the hope of change, and with the Fame also of his Victory obtained: so he mistrusted that upon any light occasion (as if the Warre should continue any long time in their Countrey) they would turne all the hate they bare unto the ROMANS, against him as the onely Author of this Warre. For these respects therefore, he devised all the meanes he could to come to Battell. In the meane time Sempronius, the other Confull, met with a Troupe of the Enemies, loaden with Spoile, stragling up and downe the Fields, whom he charged and put to flight. So, imagining the like successe of all the Battell, by this good Fortune he had met withall, he had good hope of Victory, if once both the Armies might come to fight. Therefore being marvellously desirous to do some noble Enterprize before Scipio were recovered of his hurt, and that the new Confull should be chosen, he determined to joyne Battell against the will of his other Colleague and fellow Confull Scipio: who thought nothing could be to lesse purpose, then to put all the State and Common-wealth in jeopardy, specially having all the whole GAULES in manner in the Field against him. Now Hannibal had secret intelligence of all this variance, by Spials he had sent into the Enemies Campe. Wherefore, he being possitick and subtil as he was, found out a place straight betwene both Campes, covered over with Bushes and Briers, and there he placed his Brother Mago to lie in Ambush, with a company of chosen men. Then he commanded the Horsemen of the NUMIDIANS, to scurry to the Trenches of the ROMANES, to intice them to come to Battell: and thereupon made the residue of his Army to eare, and so put them in very good order of Battell, to be ready upon any occasion offered. Now the Confull Sempronius, at the first tumult of the NUMIDIANS, suddenly sent his Horsemen to encounter them, and after them put out fixe thousand Footmen, and in the end came himselfe out of his Campe with all his Army. It was then in the midst of Winter, and extreame cold, and specially in the places inclosed about the Alpes, and the Mountaine Appenine. Now the NUMIDIANS as they were commanded, inticed the ROMANES by little and little on this side the River of Trebia, untill they came to the place where they might discerne their Ensignes: and then they suddenly turned upon the Enemies, which were out of order. For it is the manner of the NUMIDIANS, often-times to flie of set purpose, and then to stay upon the sudden when they see time, to charge the Enemy more hotly and fiercely then before. Whereupon Sempronius incontinently gathered his Horsemen together, and did set his men in Battell-ray, as time required, to give Charge upon his Enemy, that stayed for him in order of Battell. For Hannibal had cast his men into Squadrons, ready upon any occasion. The Skirmish began first by the light Horsemen, and afterwards increased hotter by supply of the men of Armes: howbeit, the ROMANES Knights being unable to beare the shooke of the Enemies, they were quickly broken; so that the Legions maintained the Battell with such fury and noble courage, that they had beene able to have resisted, so they had fought but with Footmen onely. But on the one side, the Horsemen and Elephants made them afraid, and on the other side the Footmen followed them very lustily, and fought with great fury against famished and frozen men. Wherefore the ROMANES notwithstanding, suffering all the miseries that vexed them on every side, with an unspeakable courage and magnanimity, such as was above their force and strength, they fought still, untill that Mago coming out of his Ambush, came and suddenly assailed them with great shoutes and cries; and that the middle Squadron of the CARTHAGINIANS also (through Hannibal's commandement) flew upon the CINOMANIANS. Then the ROMANES seeing their Confederates flie, their hearts were done, and utterly discouraged. It is said that there were ten thousand Footmen of the ROMANES got to PLACENTIA, and came through the Enemies. The rest of the Army that fled, were most part of them slaine by the CARTHAGINIANS. The Confull Sempronius also scaped very narrowly from the Enemies. The Victory cost Hannibal the setting on also: for he lost a great number of his men, and the most part of his Elephants were slaine. After this Battell, Hannibal overcame all the Countrey, and did put all to Fire and Sword, and tooke also certaine Townes: and with a few of his men made a great number of the Countrey men flie, that were disorderly gathered together in Battell. Then at the beginning of the Spring, he brought his Army into the Field sooner then time required: and meaning to go into THUSCAN, he was driven backe by a great Tempest at the very top of the height of Appenine, and so compelled to bring his Army about PLACENTIA: howbeit, shortly after he put himselfe againe into the Fields, for divers urgent and necessary causes. For had he not saved himselfe by that policy, he had almost beene taken tardy by the Ambush of the GAULES: who being angry with himself that the Warre was continued so long in their Countrey, they fought to be revenged of him, as the onely author and occasion of the Warre. Therefore perceiving it was time for him to avoid this danger, he made all the haste he could to leade his Army into some other Provinces. Furthermore, he thought it would increase his estimation much among strangers, and also greatly encourage his owne People, if he could make the Power of the CARTHAGINIANS to seeme so great, and also their Captaines to be of so noble a courage, as to dare to make Warre so neare to the City of ROME. All things therefore set apart, he marched with his Campe by the Mountaine Appenine, and so coming through the Countrey of the LIGURIANS, he came into THUSCAN, by the way that bringeth them into the champion Countrey, and to the Marishes about the River of Arnus. The River of Arnus at that time was very high, and had overflowne all the Fields thereabouts. Hannibal therefore marching with so great an Army as he had, could not avoid it, but that he must needs lose a number of his Men and Horse, before he could get out of those evill-favoured Marishes. Infomuch that he himselfe lost one of his eyes, by reason of the great paines he had taken day and night without sleepe or rest, and also through the evill aire: though he was carried upon a high Elephants backe, which onely was left him of all that he had brought with him. In the meane time, C. Flaminius Confull, to whom the charge of Sempronius Army was given, he was come unto ARETIUM against the Senates minde, who were marvellously offended with him, because he left his Companion Cn. Servilius at

at ROME, and went unto his Province by stealth as it were, without the Furniture of a Confull and his Officers. This was a very haſtie man of nature, and one that the People had brought to that Dignity and Office: so that he was become so proud and insolent, that men might see how he would hazard all things without wit or judgement. Hannibal having intelligence thereof, thought it the best way to anger the Confull, and to do what he could possible to allure him into the Field, before his fellow Confull should come to joyne with him. Therefore he marching forward with his Campe through the Countrey of FESULA ARETIUM, he burnt and spoiled all the Countrey thereabouts, and filled them all with feare, never leaving to destroy all before him, untill he came to the Mountaines Cortonenſes, and so to the Lake called Thraſimene. When he had viewed the place, he went about to surprize his Enemy by some Ambush: whereupon he conveyed certaine Horsemen under the Hills, hard by the Streight that goeth unto Thraſimene, and behinde the Mountaines also he placed the light Horsemen. Then he himselfe with the rest of his Army came downe into the Field, supposing that the Confull would not be quiet: and so it fell out. For hot stirring heads are easily intrapped withall into the Enemies Ambush, and oftentimes do put all in hazard, because they will follow no counsell nor good advice. C. Flaminius therefore seeing their Countrey utterly spoiled, the Corne destroyed and cut downe, and the Houses burnt, he made great haste to leade his Army against the Enemy, contrary to all mens mindes, who would have had him tarried for his Companion Cn. Servilius the other Confull. So even at Sun-ſet, when he was come to the Streights of the Lake of Thraſimene, he caused his Campe to stay there, although his men were not weary with the long Journey they had taken by the way. So the next morning by breake of day, making no view of the Countrey, he went over the Mountaines. Then Hannibal (who long before was prepared for this) did but stay for the opportunity to worke his Feate: when he saw the ROMANES come into the Plaine, he gave a Signall unto all his men to give Charge upon the Enemy. Thereupon the CARTHAGINIANS breaking out on every side, came before and behinde, and on the Flanks to assaile the Enemy, being shut in betwene the Lake and the Mountaines. Now in contrary manner, the ROMANES beginning to fight out of order, they fought inclosed together, that they could not see one another, as if it had beene darke: so that it is to be wondered at, how, and with what minde they fought it out so long, considering they were compassed in on every side. For they fought it out about three houres space, with such fury and courage, that they heard not the terrible Earthquake that was at that present time, neither did they offer to flie or stir a foote untill they heard that the Confull C. Flaminius going from Ranke to Ranke to encourage his men, was slaine by a man of Armes called Ducarius. Then when they had lost their Generall, and being voide of all hope, they fled, some towards the Mountaines, and others towards the Lake, of the which divers of them flying, were overtaken and slaine. So there were slaine *fiftene thousand in the Field, and there scaped about ten thousand. Furthermore, the report went, that there were fixe thousand Footmen which forcibly (at the beginning of the Battell) got to the Mountaine, and there stayed on a Hill till the Battell was ended, and at length came downe upon Hannibal's promise: but they were betrayed, and slaine every Mothers Sonne of them. After this great Victory, Hannibal did let divers ITALIAN Prisoners go free without Ransome paying, after he had used them marvellous courteously: because that the Fame of his Clemency and Courtſie should be knowne unto all Nations, whereas indeed his owne nature was contrary to all Vertues. For he was haſtie and cruell of nature, and from his youth was brought up in Warres, and exercized in Murder, Treason, and Ambushes laid for Enemies: and never cared for Law, Order, nor Civill Government. So by this meanes he became one of the cruellſt Captaines, the most subtil and craftieſt to deceive and intrap his Enemy, that ever was. For as he was always prying to beguile the Enemy, so those whom he could not overcome in Warre by plaine force, he went about to intrap by sleight and policy. The which appeareth true by this present Battell, and also by the other he fought against the Confull Sempronius, by the River of Trebia. But let us returne to our matter, and leave this talke till another time. Now when the newes of the overthrow and death of the Confull Flaminius was reported at ROME, having lost the most part of his Army: there was great moane and lamentation made through all the City of ROME: some bewailing the common misery of the Common-wealth, others lamenting their private particular losse, and some also forrowning for both together. But indeed it was a wooll fight, to see a world of men and women to runne to the Gates of the City, every one privately asking for their Kin and Friends. Some do write, that there were two women, who being very sorry and pensive, despairing of the safety of their Sonnes, died suddenly for the extreame joy they had, when beyond their expectation and hope they saw their Sonnes alive and safe. At the self-same time, Cn. Servilius, the other Confull with C. Flaminius, did send him foure thousand Horsemen, not understanding yet of the Battell that was fought by the Lake of Thraſimene. But when they heard of the overthrow of their men by the way, and therefore thought to have fled into UMBRIA, they were compassed in by the Horsemen of the Enemies, and so brought unto Hannibal. Now the Empire of ROME being brought into so great extremitie and danger, because of so many small losses one in the necke of another: it was ordained, that an extraordinary Governour or Magistrate should be chosen, who should be created Dictator: an Office specially used to be reserved for the last hope and remedy in most extreame danger and perill of the State and Common-wealth. But because the Confull Servilius could not returne at that time to ROME, all the waies being kept by the Enemy: the People contrary to their custome, created Q. Fabius Dictator (who afterwards attained the surname of Maximus, to say, Very great) who likewise did name M. Minutius Generall of the Horsemen. Now this Fabius was a grave and wife Counsellor, and of great Authority and Estimation in the Common-wealth: inasmuch as the Citizens had all their hope and confidence in him onely, perswading themselves, that the honour of Rome might be better preserved under the Government and Conduct of such a Generall, rather then under the Government of any other man whatsoever. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he had carefully and diligently given order for all things necessary: he departed from Rome, and when he had received the Army of the late Consul Cn. Servilius, he added unto them two other Legions, and so went unto the Enemy. Now Hannibal was gone from the Lake of Thrasimene, and went directly towards the City of Spoletum, to see if he could take it at the first Assault. But when he saw that the Townesmen stood upon the Rampiers of their Walls, and valiantly defended themselves: he then left the Towne and destroyed the Countrey as he went, and burnt Houses and Villages, and so went unto APULIA, through the Marches of ANCONA, and the Countrey of the MARSIA and PELIGNIANS. The Dictator followed him at the heeles, and camped hard by the City of ARPY, not far from the Campe of the Enemy, to the end to draw out the Warre at length. For the rashnesse and foole-hardinesse of the former Captaines aforetime, had brought the State of Rome into such misery, that they thought it a Victory unto them, not to be overcome by the Enemy, that had so often overcome them. Whereby all things were turned straight with the change and alteration of the Captaine: for though Hannibal had set his men in Battell-ray, and afterwards perceiving his Enemies flurried not, went and destroyed the Countrey, hoping thereby to intice the Dictator to fight. when he should see the Countrey of his Confederates so spoiled as it was before his face: the Dictator, this notwithstanding, was not moved withall, but still kept his men close together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Hannibal was in a marvellous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often removed his Campe, to the end that going divers waies, some occasion or opportunity might fall out to deceive the Enemy, or else to give Battell. So when he had passed the Mountaine Appenine, he came unto SAMNIUM. But because shortly after, some of CAMPANIA, who having beene taken Prisoners by the Lake of Thrasimene, had beene set at liberty without ranfome: they putting him in hope that he might take the City of CAPUA, he made his Army march forward, and tooke a Guide that knew the Countrey, to bring him unto CASINUM. Now the Guide overhearing CASINUM, understood it CASILINUM, and so mistaking the found of the word, brought the Army a cleane contrary way unto CALENTINUM and CALENUM, and from thence about STELLA. So when they came into a Countrey environed about with Mountaines and Rivers, Hannibal knew straight they had mistaken their way, and so did cruelly put the Guide to death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this patiently, and was contented to give Hannibal liberty to take his pleasure which way he would, untill he had gotten the Mountaines of Gallicanum, and Casilinum, where he placed his Garison, being places of great advantage and commodity. So the Army of the CARTHAGINIANS was in manner compassed in every way, and they must needs have died for famine in that place, or else have fled, to their great shame and dishonour: had not Hannibal by this Stratagem prevented the danger. Who knowing the danger all his Army stood in, and having spied a fit time for it: he commanded his Souldiers to bring forth two thousand Oxen which they had gotten in spoile in the Fields, having great store of them, and then tying Torches of Fire-linkes unto their hornes, he appointed the nimblest men he had to light them, and to drive the Oxen up the Hill to the top of the Mountaines, at the reliefe of the first Watch. All this was duly executed according to his commandement, and the Oxen running up to the top of the Mountaines with the Torches burning, the whole Army marched after them faire and softly. Now the ROMANES that had long before placed a strong Garison upon the Mountaines, they were afraid of this strange sight, and mistrusting some Ambush, they forthwith forsooke their Pieces and Holds. Fabius himselfe mistrusting also that it was some Stratagem of the Enemy, kept his men within the Campe, and could not well tell what to say to it. In the meane time Hannibal got over the Mountaine, not far from the Baths of Swessa, which the Countrey men do call, The Tower of the Baths, and brought all his Army safe into ALBA: and shortly after, he marched directly as though he would go to Rome, howbeit he suddenly turned out of the way, and went presently into APULIA. There he tooke the City of GLERENUM, a very rich and wealthy Towne, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him hard, and came and camped by LAURINUM, not far from the CARTHAGINIANS Campe. So he being sent for to Rome about weighty Affaires of the State, there was no remedy, but that he must needs depart from thence with all the speede he could: howbeit before he went, he left Marcus Minutius Generall of the Horsemen, his Lieutenant of all the Army, and commanded him in his absence not once to stir nor to meddle with the Enemies. For he was fully bent to follow his determination, which was: not to vex the Enemy, nor to fight with him, though he were provoked unto it. Howbeit Marcus Minutius little regarding the Dictators commandement, his backe was no sooner turned, but he set upon a company of the Enemies dispersed in the Field a foraging, and slew a great number of them, and fought with the rest even unto their Campe. The rumour of this Skirmish flew straight to Rome, and there was such great account made of it, that it was esteemed for a Victory: and the common People were so joyfull of it, that they straight made the Power of the Lieutenant equall with the Dictator Fabius, the which was never heard of before. Fabius patiently bearing this extreame injury with a noble courage, having no way deserved it, he returned againe into the Campe. Thus there were two Dictators at one selfe-time (a thing never seene nor heard of before) who after they had divided the

the Army betweene them, either of them commanded his Army apart, as the Consuls were wont to do before. Marcus Minutius thereupon grew to such a pride and haughty minde, that one day he ventured to give Battell, and made not his companion Fabius of counsell withall: the which Hannibal having so often overcome, durst scantily have enterprised. So he led his Army into such a place, where the Enemy had compassed them in: inasmuch that Hannibal slew them at his pleasure, without any hope left them to escape, if Fabius had not come in time (as he did) to aide them, rather respecting the honour of his Countrey, then remembering the private injury he had received. For he coming fresh with his Army to the Battell, made Hannibal afraid, that the ROMANES Legions had liberty to retire with safety. Whereby Fabius wanne great Fame for his wisdom and valiantnesse, both of his owne Souldiers, as also of the Enemies themselves. For it was reported that Hannibal should say (returning unto his Campe) That in this Battell he had overcome M. Minutius, but withall, that he was also overcome by Fabius. And Minutius himselfe also confessing Fabius wisdom, and considering that (according to Hesiodus saying) it was good reason to obey a better man then himselfe: he came with all his Army unto Fabius Campe, and renouncing his Authority, came and humbly saluted Fabius as his Father, and all that day there was great joy, and rejoycing among the Souldiers. So both the Armies being placed in Garison for the Winter time, after great contention about it, at length there were two new Consuls created, L. Paulus Aemilius, and C. Terentius Varro, one that of a meane man (through the favour of the common People) was brought to be Consul. So they had Liberty and Commission to leavie a greater Army then the Generals before them had done. Whereby the Legions were newly supplied, and also others added unto them more then were before. Now when the Consuls were come into the Army, as they were of severall dispositions, so did they also observe divers manners in their Government. Lucius Paulus, who was a grave wise man, and one that purposed to follow Fabius counsell and fashions: he did desire to draw out the Warre in length, and to stay the Enemy without fighting. Varro on the other side was a hasty man, and venturous, and desired nothing but to fight. So it chanced, that not long after it was knowne, to the great colt and danger of the City of Rome, what difference there was betwixt the modesty of Aemilius, and the foole-hardinesse of Varro. For Hannibal being afraid of some stir and tumult in his Campe for lacke of Victuals, he departed from CLERENUM, and going into the warmest place of APULIA, came and camped with all his Army, by a Village called CANES. So he was followed with both the Consuls, who came and camped severally hard by him, but so neare one to another, that there was but the River of Aufide that parted them. This River (as it is reported) doth alone divide the Mountaine of the Appenine, and taketh his head on that side of the Mountaine that lieth to the Sea side, from whence it runneth to the Sea Adriaticum. Now Lucius Paulus finding that it was impossible for Hannibal being in a strange Countrey, to maintaine so great an Army of such sundry Nations together: he was fully bent, to protract time, and to avoid Battell, perswading himselfe that it was the right and onely way to overcome him, being as much to the Enemies disadvantage, as also marvellous profitable and beneficiall for the Common-wealth. And sure if C. Terentius Varro, had carried that minde, it had bene out of all doubt, that Hannibal's Army had bene overthrowne by the ROMANES, without stroake striking. Howbeit he had such a light head of his owne, and was so fickle minded, that he neither regarded wise counsell, nor Paulus Aemilius Authority: but in contrary manner would fall out with him, and also complained before the Souldiers, for that he kept his men pent up and idle, whilest the Enemy did put forth his men to the Field in Battell-ray. So when his turne came, that he was absolutely to command the whole Army (for they had both absolute Power by turnes) he passed over the River of Aufide by breake of day, and gave the Signall of Battell without the privy of his Companion Aemilius, who rather followed him against his will then willingly, because he could do none otherwise. So he caused a Scarlet Coate of Armes to be put out very early in the morning, for a Signall of Battell. Hannibal on the other side being as glad of it as might be possible, that he had occasion offered him to fight: (considering that the continuall delaying of Battell did alter all his purpose) he passed his Army over the River, and had straight put them in very good order. For he had taken great Spoiles of his Enemies to furnish himselfe very bravely. Now the Army of the ROMANES stood Southward, inasmuch that the South winde (which the men of the Countrey call Vulturinus) blew full in their faces: whereas the Enemies in contrary manner had the vantage of the Winde and Sunne upon their backs, and their Battell stood in this manner. The AFRICANS were placed in both the Wings, and the GAULES and SPANIARDS set in a Squadron in the midst. The light Horsemen first began this Skirmish, and after them followed the men of Armes: and because the space betwixt the River and the Foote-men was very narrow, so as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell Fight for the time, though it lasted not long. So, the Horsemen of the ROMANES being overthrowne, the Foote men came with such a lustie courage to receive the Charge, that they thought they should not have day enough to fight. Howbeit, the over-earnest desire they had to overcome their Enemies, made their overthrow more miserable, then their joy and good happe was great at the beginning. For the GAULES and SPANIARDS, (who as we have said before kept the Battell) not being able any longer to withstand the force of the ROMANES, they retired towards the AFRICANS in the Wings. The ROMANES perceiving that, ranne upon the Enemies with all the fury they could, and had them in chase and fought with them, till they were gotten in the midst of them. Then the CARTHAGINIANS that were in both Wings, came came and compassed them in before they were aware. Moreover, there were five hundred of the NUMIDIAN Horsemen, that colourably fled unto the Consuls, who received them very courteously, and placed them in the Reare-Ward of the Army. They seeing their time, shewed behinde the Enemies, and did suddenly give them Charge. Then the Army of the ROMANS was utterly overthrowne, and Hannibal obtained Victory. Livy writeth, that there were slaine in this Battell * forty thousand Footmen, and above two thousand seven hundred Horsemen. Polybius saith, that there many more slaine. Well, letting this matter passe, it is certaine that the ROMANS had never greater losse, neither in the first Warre with AFRICKE, nor in the second by the CARTHAGINIANS, as this overthrow that was given at CANNES. For there was slaine the Confull Paulus & Emilius himselfe, a man undoubtedly deserving great praise, and that served his Countrey and Common-wealth even to the houre of death: Cn. Servilius (Confull the yeare before) was also slaine there, and many other that had bene Consuls, Prætors, and others of such like Dignity, Captaines, Chieftaines, and many other Senators and honest Citizens, and that such a number of them, that the very cruelty it selfe of the Enemy was satisfied. The Confull Terentius Varro, who was the only Authour of all this Warre and slaughter, seeing the Enemy Victoe every way, he saved himselfe by flying. And T. Titidius a Chieftaine of a Band, coming through his Enemies with a good company of his men, he came unto CANUSIUM. Thither came also about ten thousand men, that had escaped from their Enemies, as out of a dangerous storme: by whose consent, the charge of the whole Army was given unto Appius Pulcher, and also unto Cornelius Scipio, who afterwards did end this Warre. Thus was the end of the Battell fought by CANNES. Newes flew straight to ROME of this overthrow, the which though they justly filled all the City with sorrow and calamity, yet the Senate and People of ROME kept alwaies their countenance and greatnesse, even in this extreme misery. Inso much they had not onely good hope to keepe their City safe, but furthermore they leaved a new Army, and made young men to beare Armour, and yet left not SICILE and SPAIN unprovided in the meane time: so that they made the World to wonder at them, to consider these things, how they could in so great calamity and trouble have so noble hearts, and such wise counsell. But to let passe the former overthrowes, and great losses they sustained at TICINUM, at TREBIA, and at the Lake of THRACIMENE: what Nation or People could have borne this last Plague, whereby the whole Force and Power of the ROMANS was in manner utterly destroyed and overthrowne? and yet the People of ROME so held it out, and that with so great wisdom and counsell, that they neither lacked Manhood nor Magnanimity. Besides, to helpe them the more, Hannibal being Conquerour, trifling time in taking his leisure, and refreshing his Army: he gave the ROMANS leisure that were overcome to take breath againe, and to restore themselves. For doubtlesse, if Hannibal being Conquerour, had immediately after the Victory obtained, brought his Army directly to ROME, surely the ROMANS had bene utterly undone, or at the least had bene compelled to have put all in venture. So it is reported, that Hannibal oftentimes afterwards repented himselfe he followed not his Victory, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counsell which wished him to let his Souldiers rest, then Maharbals advice, Generall of his Horsemen, who would have had him gone straight to ROME, and so have ended all this Warre. But he seeing Hannibals delay, told him (as it is reported) this that is now common in every mans mouth: Hannibal, thou knowest how to overcome, but thou knowest not how to use Victory. But what? all things are not (as Nestor saith in Homer) given to men all together. For some had no skill to overcome, others knew not how to follow their Victory, and some also could not keepe that they had won. Pyrrhus King of the EPIROTES that made Warre with the ROMANS, was one of the famousest Captaines that ever was: yet as men write of him, though he was marvellous fortunate to conquer Realmes, he could never keepe them. Even so in like manner, some Captaines have bene endued with excellent vertues, and yet notwithstanding have bene insufficient in Martiall Affaires, deserving praise in a Captaine, as we may reade in divers Histories. Now after this Battell fought by CANNES, the ATTELANIANS, the CALATINIANS, the SAMNITES, after them also the BRUTIANI, the LUCANIANS, and divers other Nations and People of ITALY, carried away with the fame of this great Victory: they all came and yielded to Hannibal. And the City of CAPUA also (which Hannibal was desirous to have won long before) forsaking their old Friends and Confederates, made new League and friendship with Hannibal: the which won him great estimation with other Nations. For at that time the City of CAPUA was very populous and of great power, and the chieftest City of estimation of all ITALY next to ROME. Now to tell you in few words what is reported of CAPUA, it is certaine that it was a Colony of the TRUSCANS, the which was first called VULTURNUM, and after that CAPUA, by the name of their Governour called Capim; or otherwise (as it is most likely) because of the Fields round about it: for on every side of it, there are goodly pleasant Fields, full of all kinds of fruits growing on the Earth, called in GREEKE, Kepi. Furthermore, all the Countrey is confined round about with famous Nations. Towards the Sea there dwell the SUBSANIANS, the CUMANIANS, and the NEAPOLITANS. On firme Land also towards the North, are the CALENTINIANS and the CALENIANS. On the East and Southside, the DUNIANI and the NOLIANS. Furthermore, the place is of a strong situation, and on the one side is compassed in with the Sea, and on the other side with great high Mountaines. Now the CAMPANIANS flourished marvellously at that time: and therefore seeing the ROMANS in manner utterly undone by the Battell they had lost at CANNES, quickly tooke part with the stronger, as it commonly falleth out: and furthermore besides that they made League with Hannibal, they received him into their City

City with great triumph, hoping that the Warre being ended, they should be the chieftest and wealthiest of all ITALY. But marke how men are commonly deceived in their expectation. Now when Hannibal came into the City of CAPUA, there was a World of People that went to see him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talke, but of his happy Victories he had won of the Enemy. So being come into the City, they brought him unto Pacuvius House, his very familiar friend, who was a man of great Wealth and Authority, as any among all the CAMPANIANS. Then he made him a notable Banquet, to the which no Citizens were bidden, saving onely Jubellius Tanrea a stout man, and the Sonne of Pacuvius his Host: who through his Fathers meanes, with much ado, was reconciled to Hannibal, for that Hannibal hated him as he did, because he followed Decius Magius, who alwaies tooke the ROMANS part. But now let us consider a little I pray you, how great men sometimes unawares are subject to great dangers and misfortunes. For this young man dissembling his reconciliation with Hannibal, watching time and occasion notwithstanding to do him some displeasure, in the time of this Feast, while they were making merry, he tooke his Father aside into a secret corner of the house, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turne, to redeem the favour and good will againe of the ROMANS, the which they had lost through their great wickednesse. Then he told him how he was determined to kill Hannibal the Enemy of his Countrey, and all ITALY besides. His Father that was a man of great countenance and Authority, was marvellously amazed withall, to heare what his Sonne said: wherefore embracing him with teares running downe his cheekes, he prayed him to leave off his Sword, and to let his Guest be safe in his house. The which his Sonne in the end yielded with great ado. Thus Hannibal having before withstood all the force of his Enemies, the Ambushes of the GAULES, and having brought with him also a great Army from the Sea, and the farthest part of SPAIN, through so many great and mighty Nations, he escaped killing very narrowly by the hand of a young man, whilest he was at the Table making merry. The next morning Hannibal had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promises, and told them many things, which the CAMPANIANS easily believed; and therefore flattered themselves, that they should be Lords of all ITALY: howbeit they reckoned beside their Host. And to conclude, they did so cowardly submit themselves to Hannibal, that it seemed they had not onely suffered him to come into their City, but that they had also made him their absolute Lord, like men that neither remembered nor regarded their Liberty. And this appeareth plainly by one example I will shew you amongst many. Hannibal willed them to deliver Decius Magius, the head of the Countrey-faction to him. Whereunto the Senate not onely obeyed with all humility, but worit of all, suffered him to be brought bound into the Market-place, in the presence of all the People: who because he would not forsake the ancient League and friendship with the ROMANS, had shewed himselfe a more faithfull Citizen to his Countrey and Common-wealth, then unto the barbarous People. Now whilest these things passed thus in CAPUA, Mago (Hannibals Brother) went to CARTHAGE, to report the newes of his happy Victory to his Countreymen, which they had won of the Enemies: and withall, before the Senate to declare the noble Exploits of Armes done by Hannibal. And to prove the words true he spake, he poured out at the coming in of the Senate-house, the Gold Rings which had bene taken from the ROMANE Knights: of the which there were (as some do report) above a bushell full, and as other some do write, above three bushells full and a halfe. After that, he prayed a new supply for Hannibals Army; which was granted them by the Senate with greater joy then afterwards it was sent. For the CARTHAGINIANS perswaded themselves by the things present, that the Warre would fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was faire: they thereupon decreed to continue the Warre, and to aide Hannibals attempts, by leavying of Souldiers. Now no man withstood this new supply to be sent to Hannibal, but Hanno a perpetuall Enemy of the BARCINIAN Faction. Howbeit the CARTHAGINIANS weighed not his counsell and advice then, though it tended to peace, and was good counsell for them, as oftentimes before he had used the like. So when Hannibal had made League with the CAMPANIANS, he led his Campe before the City of NOLA, hoping they would yeeld of themselves without compulsion. And certainly so it had come to passe, had not the sudden coming thither of Marcellus the Prætor beene, who both kept the People in, pacified the Sedition, and repulsed the Enemy that was coming into the City, by a Salley he made upon him at three severall Gates, chasing and killing them even to their Campe with great losse. This is that noble Captaine and valiant Souldier Marcellus, who with a noble courage made the World know, that Hannibal was not invincible. Hannibal perceiving that there was no other way, but to let NOLA alone till another time: he came to ACERRES, and tooke and spoiled it without resistance. Then going on with great power unto CASILINUM, a fit place to offend the CAPUANS, he went about to win them that lay there in Garison, but when he saw that neither his faire promises, nor otherwise his threats could prevaile, he left part of his Army to besiege the City, and bestowed the residue in Garisons before the Winter Season. Howbeit he chose for his chieftest seate and strength the City of CAPUA, which stood very pleasantly, and had plenty of all things. There it was that Hannibals Souldiers being used to lie hard, and easily to away with cold, hunger and thirst, became then of valiant men, ranke cowards, of strong men weaklings, and of serviceable and ready men, timorous and effeminate persons, through the daily pleasures they enjoyed at will. For sweete enticing pleasures do corrupt the strength and courage of the minde, and mans disposition unto vertue: moreover they spoile his wit, and take all good counsell from him, all which things are dangerous for men. And therefore Plato rightly calleth pleasure, the baite of all evils. And doubtlesse in this case, the pleasures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS, more more then otherwise the highest Alpes, and all the Armies of the ROMANES did. For one onely Winter passed over in such pleasure and wantonnesse, was of such great force to extinguish the vehement courage in the Souldiers, that when they were brought into the Field at the beginning of the Spring, sure you would rightly have said that they had forgotten all Martiall Discipline. Thus the Winter being passed over, Hannibal returned againe to CASILINUM, hoping that the Citizens within would willingly yeeld unto him, after they had abidden so long a Siege. Howbeit they were bent to abide all extremitie, before they would yeeld to their so cruell an Enemy, although they lacked Victuals. Wherefore living first by Spealt, or bare Barley, and afterwards with Nuts which they had received of the ROMANES by the River of Vulturius: they held it out so long, that Hannibal in the end being angry with the continuance of the Siege, he was content to take the City upon composition, the which he had refused before. Now this Warre, in the which the CARTHAGINIANS had alwaies had great Victories and good Fortune, and received no losse worthy of memory, began at that time to decline, and to fall to great change and alteration. For the League that was made with Philip King of MACEDON, and the new Aide and Supply that was sent from CARTHAGE, and the taking of PETILIA, CONSTANTIA, and of other Cities of the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other side, the great Victories which the ROMANES had wonne upon the Enemies of SPAIN and SARDINIA, did greatly encourage them, and gave them also good hope that their Affaires would prosper better and better. They had also chosen three excellent Captaines, Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracchus, and Marcus Marcellus, a man most worthy of praise for Martiall Discipline: who so wisely governed the Affaires of the State, that Hannibal found he should make Warre with an Enemy, no lesse politicke and wife, then hardy and valiant. For first of all, he was driven from the City of CUMES, with great slaughter of his men, by Sempronius Gracchus, and forced to raise his Siege: and shortly after he was overcome by Marcellus, in a Battell he fought at NOLA. For there were slaine above a thousand ROMANES, and * six thousand CARTHAGINIANS slaine and taken flying. Now it is easily seene what great importance that Battell was of: because Hannibal immediately upon it, raised his Siege from NOLA, and went into APULIA to winter his Army there. By this meanes came the ROMANES to recover againe, as out of a great sicknesse, and sent a great Power against the Enemy: and were not content onely to keepe their owne, but they durst also invade others. So their chiefest intent was, to besiege the City of CAPUA, for the injury they had but lately received of the CAMPANIANS. For incontinently after the Battell was fought at CANES, they forooke the ROMANES, even in their greatest extremitie and misery, and tooke part with Hannibal that was Conquerour, forgetting the great pleasures their City had received in old time by the ROMANES. On the other side, the CAMPANIANS knowing they had made a fault, and being afraid of this new Preparation of the ROMANES, they sent to Hannibal into APULIA, to pray him to come and aide their City (being of the number of the Confederates) in their greatest necessity. Hannibal departed out of APULIA without delay, and came on with great Journeys into CAMPANIA, and camped by TIPATA over CAPUA, whereby he rather deferred till another time, then prevented the Plague hanging over the CAMPANIANS heads: so spoyling the Countrey round about NAPLES, he began to take conceit of a new hope, that he might take NOLA by Treason. For in NOLA, the People and Senate were at variance the one against the other, as they were likewise in divers other Cities of ITALY. The common People desirous of change, favoured Hannibal and the Noblemen, and men of Authority, tooke part with the People of ROME. So when Hannibal went to take the City of NOLA, Marcellus met him with his Army in Battell-ray, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, even at the first meeting. There the ROMANES overcame, and drave the Enemy with such manhood and readinesse, that if the Horsemen which had taken another way, had come in in time, as Marcellus commanded them; no question the CARTHAGINIANS had beene utterly overthrowne. Hannibal after he had retired his Army into his Campe with great slaughter, he shortly after departed thence, and went into the Countrey of the SALENTINIANS. For certaine young TARENTINES that had beene taken Prisoners in former Battells, where the ROMANES had beene overthrowne, and that were afterwards delivered free without Ransome: they to shew themselves thankfull, had put Hannibal in hope to deliver him the City of TARENTUM, so he would bring his Army before the City. Hannibal inticed by their promises, did what he could to obtaine it, because he might have some City upon the Sea in his power, the which he had desired of long time. And indeede, of all the Cities upon the Sea Coast, there was none so meete as TARENTUM, to bring aide out of GREECE thither, and also to furnish the Campe with many things that were to be occupied daily. So though this thing was drawne out in length, by the Garison of the ROMANES that valiantly resisted: yet Hannibal never gave over his Enterprize, untill that Nico and Philomenes, the Authours of the Treason, had delivered him the City into his hands. The ROMANES kept onely the Castle, the which is in manner environed with the Sea on three sides: and on the fourth side, that lay upon the firme Land, it was very strong with Rampiers and Bulwarkes. Hannibal perceiving that he could do no good on that side, because of their great strength: he determined to shut up the mouth of the Haven of TARENTUM, hoping that was the onely way to make the ROMANES yeeld, when their Victuals should be cut from them. Yet the Enterprize seemed very hard, because the Enemies had all the Streights of the Haven in their power, and the Ships also that should besiege the issue of the Haven, were shut up in a narrow little place, and were to be drawne out of the Haven, at the foote of

of the Castle, to bring them into the next Sea. But when never a man of the TARENTINES could devise how to bring this Enterprize to passe: Hannibal himselfe perceived that these Ships might be drawne out of the Haven with certaine Engines, and then to cart them through the City to the Sea. So having his cunning Workmen in hand with the matter, the Ships within few daies after were taken out of the Haven, and carried into the Sea, and then came and shewed before the Barre of the Haven. Thus the City of TARENTUM being won againe, after the ROMANES had kept it the space of a hundred yeares: Hannibal leaving the Castle besieged both by Sea and Land, he returned into SAMNIUM. For the Consuls of the ROMANES had spoiled and stripped the CAMPANIANS that went out to forage, and having brought their Army before CAPUA, they determined (if it might be) to win it by Siege. Wherefore Hannibal being very sorry for the Siege of CAPUA, he came with all his Army against the Enemy: and seeing shortly after that the ROMANES did not refuse to fight, they both marched forward, and doubtlesse to fight, it would have proved a bloody Battell, had not Sempronius Army severed them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA under the Conduct of Cn. Cornelius, after they had lost Sempronius Gracchus in the Countrey of LUKE. For they seeing this Army far off, before they could know who they were, the ROMANES and CARTHAGINIANS were both afraid, and so retired into their Campe. Afterwards the Consuls went unto severall Countreys, the one into LUKE, and the other towards CUMES, to make Hannibal remove from CAPUA: who went into LUCANIA, and found occasion to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly and desperately did hazard his Army left him in charge, against a subtill and dangerous Enemy. The Battell being begun, M. Centenius was slaine valiantly fighting, and few other escaped. After this also there hapned another losse: for Hannibal returning shortly after into APULIA, he met with another Army of the ROMANES, the which Fabius the Praetor led, who also entrapped that Army by Ambushes, and slew the most of them: so that of twenty thousand men, two thousand scant escaped the edge of the Sword. In the meane time the Consuls perceiving that Hannibal was gone, they came with all their Army unto CAPUA, and did besiege it round. This being come to Hannibal's eare, he came with his Army into CAMPANIA, in very good order and well appointed: and at his first coming he set upon the Campe of the ROMANES, having first willed the CAMPANIANS at the selfe same instant to make a Salley out on them. The ROMANES Consuls at the first tumult of their Enemies, divided the Army betweene them, and went against them. The CAMPANIANS were easily driven againe into the City: howbeit against Hannibal, the Battell was very bloody. For if ever he proved himselfe a valiant Captaine or noble Souldier, that day he shewed it. He attempted also to surprize the ROMANES by some Stratagem. For as his men were about to breake into the ROMANES Campe, he sent one thither that had the Latine Tongue excellently well, who cried out by the commandement of the Consuls, that the ROMANES should save themselves in the next Mountaines, considering they had almost lost all their Campe and strength. This cry made on the sudden, had easily moved them that heard it, if the ROMANES being thoroughly acquainted with Hannibal's subtilties, had not found out his deceit. Wherefore one of them encouraging another, they made the Enemy retire, and compelled him in despite of his beard to sic into the Campe. When Hannibal had done what he could by all device and practice possible, to raise the Siege from CAPUA, and perceiving all would not serve, being sorry for the danger of his Confederates: he then determined to call a Councell, the which he had passed over a long time, having reserved it for the last refuge. For he trusted up his Carriage, and marched away with his Army, and as quietly as he could, he passed over the River of Vulturius, and coasting through the Countreys of the SIDICINIANS, ATIFANIANS, and CASSINIANS, he came to ROME with Ensignes displayed, hoping thereby he should make them raise their Siege, being so earnestly bent to win CAPUA. This flying straight to ROME by Currers, they were so afraid there, as ROME was never in like feare it stood in then. For they saw their mortall Enemy come to them with Ensignes displayed, whom they had so often proved, almost to the utter destruction of their Empire: and now they saw him present, whom they could not resist being absent, threatening to bring the Senate and People of ROME into subjection. So all ROME being in feare and tumult, it was ordained that Fulvius Flaccus (one of the Consuls lying before CAPUA) should be sent for home. And that the new Consuls Sulpius Galba, and Cornelius Centimalus, should lie in Campe out of the City: and that C. Calpurnius Praetor should put a strong Garison into the Capitoll, and also that the Citizens that had borne any Office or Dignity, should be appointed by their Countenance and Authority to pacifie the sudden tumults that might happen in the City. So Hannibal marched forward without staying, till he came to the River of Anienes, and there camped within twenty four furlongs of ROME: and shortly after that, he came with two thousand Horse so neare unto ROME, that riding from the Gate Collina, unto Hercules Temple, he had leisure to view at his pleasure, the situation and Walls of so great a City. Fulvius Flaccus seeing that, could not abide it, but straight sent out certaine men at Armes of the ROMANES against him: who coming with great fury to give Charge upon him as they were commanded, they easily sent him packing. The next morning Hannibal brought his Army out of the Campe, and did set them in Battell-ray, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the Enemy to battell. The ROMANES on the other side did the like. So both Armies marched one against the other, with such life and courage, that to see them, they appeared mgn that feared no danger, so they might obtaine the Victory that day. For on the one side, the CARTHAGINIANS were to fight (in manner) for the Empire of the World: the which they thought depended upon this Battell, as being the last they should fight. The ROMANES in contrary manner, they were to fight for their Countrey, Liberty, and their Goods, to see whether they could keepe them, or that they should come into their Enemies hands. Howbeit there fell out a thing worthy of memory. For as they were ready set in Battell-ray, tarrying but for the Signall of Battell to give Charge, there fell such a wonderfull great shower and storme upon them, that both of them were driven in spight of their teeths to bring backe their Army into their Forts againe. The next day following in like manner, unto the which it seemed the Battell had bene deferred, when they had againe both of them set their men in Battell-ray, there fell the like storme upon them, which did as much hurt to the ROMANES and CARTHAGINIANS, as the first: so that it forced them onely to looke to save themselves; and not to thinke otherwise to fight. Hannibal perceiving this, he turned to his friends and told them, that the first time he thought not to winne to ROME, and that at the second time the occasion was taken from him. So there was a thing that greatly troubled Hannibal, and that was this. That though he came so neare to ROME, with an Army of Horsemen and Footmen: yet he heard that the ROMANES had sent aide into SPAIN, and that he had redeemed the Countrey where he had bene, at a far greater price then reason required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he caused all the Goldsmiths and Bankers Shops of the ROMANES Citizens to be sold by the Crier. But afterwards casting with himselfe, what a hard Enterprize it was to take the City of ROME, or else being afraid to lacke Victuals (for he had stored himselfe onely but for ten daies) he raised his Campe, and removing thence came unto the holy Wood of the goddesse Feronia, and rifled the rich Temple there, and afterwards went thence into the Countrey of the BRUTIANS and LUCANIANS. The CAPUANS having intelligence thereof, being left out of all hope, they yielded up their City unto the ROMANES. The City of CAPUA being thus yielded up, and brought againe to the subjection of the ROMANES, it was of great importance to all the People of ITALY, and withall brought great desire of change. Hannibal himselfe also following evill counsell, did spoile and destroy many Cities he could not keepe: whereby he did stir up the hearts of divers Nations against him. For where before when he was Conquerour, he had often let Prisoners go without Ranfome paying, through which liberality he had won the hearts of many men: even so at that present time, his barbarous cruelty made divers Cities (mislaking to be subject to the CARTHAGINIANS) to rebell against him, and to take part with the ROMANES. Amongst them was SALAPIA, the which was yielded up unto the Consull Marcellus, by Blacius meanes chiefe of all the ROMANE Faction: and a Band also of choice Horsemen which was left there in Garison, were in manner slaine every man of them. This is the City where Hannibal fell in fancy with a Gentlewoman, and therefore they greatly reprove his immoderate lust and lasciviousnesse. Howbeit there are others, that greatly commending the continency of this Capitaine, say, that he did never cate lying, and never dranke above a pint of wine, neither when he came to make Warre in ITALY, nor after that he returned into AFRICA. Some there be also that say, Hannibal was cruell and unconstant, and subject to divers such other vices: howbeit they make no manner of mention of his chastity or incontinency. But they report that his Wife was a SPANIARD, borne in CASTULO, a good Towne: and that the CARTHAGINIANS granted her many things, and trusted her very much, because of the great faith and constancy of that Nation. Now Hannibal after he had lost (as we have told you) the City of SALAPIA, he found the meanes to cry quite, and to make the ROMANES lose more then he had lost. For at the self-same time Fulvius Vice-Consull lay besieging of HERDONIA, hoping to win the City without resistance. And because he stood in no feare of any Enemy round about him (for Hannibal was gone into the Countrey of the BRUTIANS) he kept no Watch, and was altogether negligent in Martiall Affaires, contrary to the nature of the ROMANE Captains. Hannibal being advertised thereof by Spials, would not lose such a goodly opportunity: and therefore coming into APULIA with his Army ready, he came so hastily upon HERDONIA, that he had almost stollen upon Fulvius, unprovided in his Campe. Howbeit the ROMANES valiantly received the first Charge with such courage, that they fought it out longer then it was looked for. Notwithstanding in the end, as the ROMANES two yeares before that had bene overcome not far from thence, with their Consull Fulvius: even so likewise under the Conduct of this Fulvius Vice-Consull, the ROMANES Legions were utterly overthrowne, and their Capitaine slaine, with the most part of his Army. The Consull Marcellus was at that time in the City of SAMNIUM, who being advertised of this great overthrow, desired to be even with him: and though it seemed he came too late to helpe things past remedy, yet he brought his Army into the Countrey of the LUCANIANS, whither he understood Hannibal was gone after his Victory, and came and camped directly over against his Enemy, and soone after came to Battell. The which the CARTHAGINIANS refused not, but gave such a fierce onset on either side, that they fought it out till Sun-set, and no man knew who had the better, and so the night parted them. The next morning the ROMANES shewing againe in Field in Battell-ray, made it knowne that the Enemies were afraid of them. For Hannibal kept his men within the Campe, and the next night following stole away without any noise, and went into APULIA. Marcellus also followed him foote by foote, and fought to put all to hazard by some notable Battell: for he bare himselfe thus in hand, that of all the ROMANE Captains, there was none matchable with Hannibal but himselfe, either in Counsell, Wit, or Policy, or else in Martiall Discipline, or Warlike Stratagems. Howbeit the Winter following kept him, that he could not fight any set-Battell with the Enemy: for after he had made a few light Skirmishes, because he would not trouble his Souldiers any more in vaine, he bestowed them in Garison for the Winter time. At the beginning of the next Spring, procured partly by Fabius Letters (who was one of the new Consuls for that yeare) and partly also through his owne disposition, he

he brought out his Garisons sooner then they were looked for, and came with his Army against Hannibal, who lay at that time at CANUSIUM. Now it chanced, that through the nearnesse of both their Campes, and the good desire they both had to fight, in few daies they fought three severall times. The first Battell, when they had fought it out till night, in manner like hope of both sides, and that it could not be judged which of them had the better: they both of purpose retired into their Campe againe. The second day Hannibal was Conquerour, after he had slaine almost two thousand seven hundred Enemies, and put the residue of the Army to flight. The third day, the ROMANES to recover the shame and dishonour they had lost the day before, they were the first that prayed they might fight, and so Marcellus led them out to Battell. Hannibal wondering at their valiantnesse, laid unto his People, that he dealt with an Enemy that could never be quiet Conquerour, nor conquered. So the Battell was more bloody and cruell then any that was before: because the ROMANES did their best to be revenged of their losse, and the CARTHAGINIANS on the other side were mad in their mindes, to see that the vanquished durst provoke the Vanquishers unto Battell. In the end, the ROMANES being sharply reproved, and also perswaded by Marcellus to stick to valiantly like men, that the news of their Victory might come to ROME, before the news of their overthrow: they flew in among the prease of their Enemies, and never left fighting, till that after they had thrice broken their Enemies, they made them all flee. At the self-same time Fabius Maximus tooke the City of TARENTUM againe, almost after the self-same sort it was lost. This being reported unto Hannibal, he said: The ROMANES have also their Hannibal. The next yeare following, Marcellus and Crispinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing to put themselves in readinesse for Warre, they led both the Armies against the Enemy. Hannibal despairing that he was not able to resist them in Battell, he sought all the wits he had to devise some way to intrap them by subtilty: whom he could not overcome by Battell. So Hannibals head being occupied thus, there was offered him a better occasion to bring this Enterprize to passe, then he looked for. Betweene Both Campes there was a pretty Grove, in the which Hannibal laid certaine Bands of the NUMIDIANS in Ambush, to intrap the Enemies passing to and from. On the other side, the Consuls by consent of them all, thought it best to send to view this Grove, and to keepe it if neede required: left in leaving it behinde them, the Enemies should come, and so be upon their jacks afterwards. Now before they removed their Army, both the Consuls went out of their Campe, with a small company of Horsemen with them, to view the situation of this place: and so going on very undiscerely, and worse appointed then became men of their Authority and Place, they unfortunately fell into Hannibals Ambush. So, when they saw themselves in a moment compassed about on every side with Enemies, that they could not go forward, and were also fought withall behinde: they defended themselves the best they could, rather by compulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So, Marcellus was slaine fighting valiantly: and Crispinus the other Consull also very sore hurt, who hardly escaped the Enemies hands. Hannibal being advertised that Marcellus was slaine, who was the chiefe man of all the ROMANE Captains, that had most hindered the happy successe of his Victories, and had besides troubled him most: he presently went and camped there where the Battell was fought, and when he had found Marcellus body, he gave it honourable Pompe and Funerall. Hereby we may see how Magnanimity, and excellent Vertues, are esteemed of all men: considering that the cruell and most mortal Enemy gave honourable buriall to so noble and excellent a Capitaine. The ROMANES in the meane time seeing one of their Consuls dead, and the other Consull very sore hurt, they drew straight to the next Mountaines, and camped in a strong place. Howbeit Crispinus had sent to the next Townes of the Mountaines, to advertise them that Marcellus his Companion was dead, and that the Enemy had gotten the Ring he sealed his Letters withall, wherefore he wished them to be ware of any Letters written in Marcellus name. Crispinus Messenger came but newly unto SALAPIA, when Letters were brought also from Hannibal in the behalfe of Marcellus, to tell them that he would be there the next night. The SALAPIANs knowing his craft, they sent his Messenger away, and carefully looked for Hannibals coming. About the fourth watch of the night, Hannibal came to the City of SALAPIA, who of purpose had put all the ROMANES that had fled, in the Vauntguard, because that they speaking the Latine Tongue, might make them believe that Marcellus was there in person. So when the Citizens had suffered six hundred of them to come in, they shut to the Gates, and with their Shot and Darts thrust out the rest of the Army, and then put all them to the Sword they had let into the City. Thus Hannibal being in a marvellous rage he had missed of his purpose, he removed thence, and went into the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, to aide the LOCRIANS that were besieged by the ROMANES, both by Sea and by Land. After all these things, at the earnest request of the Senate and People, two new Consuls were created, both famous Captaines, and valiant Souldiers, Marcus Livius, and Claudius Nero: who having divided the Army betwixt them, went unto their severall charge and Provinces. Claudius Nero went into the Countrey of the SALENTINIANS, and M. Livius into GAULE, against Hasdrubal BARCHINIAN, who was come over the Alpes, and made haste to joyne with his Brother Hannibal, bringing with him a great Army both of Footmen and Horsemen. Now it chanced at the same time, that Hannibal had received great losse by Claudius the Consull. For first of all, he overcame him in the Countrey of the LUCANIANS, using the like policies and fetches that Hannibal did. Afterwards againe, meeting with Hannibal in APULIA, by the City of VENUSIA, he fought such a lusty Battell with him, that many of his Enemies lay by it in the Field. By reason of the great losses, Hannibal suddenly went to METAPONT, to renew his Army againe. So having remained there a few daies, he received the Army from from Hanno, the which he joyned unto his, and then returned unto Venusia. C. Nero lay not far from Venusia with his Campe: who having intercepted Letters of his Enemies, he understood by them that Hafdrubal was at hand with his Army. Thereupon he bethought himself night and day, what policy he might use to prevent the joyning of two so great Armies together as these. So, after he had taken advice of himself, he followed in fight a dangerous determination, but peradventure necessary, as the time required. For leaving the Campe unto the charge of his Lieutenant, he took part of the Army with him, and making great journeys, came to Pisenum (being the Marches of Ancona) so that on the sixth day he came to Sena. There both the Consuls joyned their Forces together, and setting upon Hafdrubal by the River of Metaurum, they had very good luck at that Battell. For, as it is reported, there were six and fifty thousand of the Enemies slain on that day: so that they almost had as great an overthrow, as the Romans had received before at the Battell of Cannes. Now C. Nero, after this famous Victory, returning as speedily unto Venusia as he went thence, he set up Hafdrubals head, where the Enemies kept the Watch: and did let certaine Prisoners go, to carry newes to Hannibal of this great overthrow. For afterwards it was knowne, that Hannibal knew nothing yet of Claudius secret Enterprize, nor of the speedy execution and great slaughter he had made. Whereat sure I can but wonder, that so subtle a Captaine as Hannibal, could be deceived by Claudius, considering both their Campes lay so neare together: so that he first heard the newes of the overthrow of his Brother, and of all his Army, before he understood any thing of the Consuls departure, or heard of his returne againe to the Campe. Now Hannibal having not onely received a generally, but also a particular great losse by the death of his Brother, he said then, he plainly saw the change and alteration of the CARTHAGINIANS good fortune: and shortly after removed his Campe, and went thence into the Countrey of the BRUTIANS. For he knew that this great overthrow given by the River of Metaurum, was a marvellous encouragement to the ROMANS, and would also be a great log in his way, for the successe of this War. This notwithstanding, he gathered together all his Power he had left in ITALY, after so many great Battels and Conflicts, and so many Cities taken: and maintained the War with an invincible courage. But the most strangest thing in Hannibal was this, that through his authority and wisdom, he kept all his Army in peace and amity together (being a medley of SPANIARDS, AFRICANS, GAULES, and of divers other Nations) and never man heard that there was any brawle or tumult among them. Howbeit the ROMANS themselves, after they had won SICILE, SARDINIA, and SPAINE againe, they could never utterly overcome him, nor drive him out of ITALY, before they had sent P. Cornelius Scipio into AFRICKE: who making War with the CARTHAGINIANS, he brought them to such great extremitie, that they were driven to lend for Hannibal home out of ITALY. Hannibal at that time (as we have said before) was in the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, making War by Inrodes and sudden Invasions, rather then by any fought Battell: saving that once there was a Battell fought in haste betwixt him and the Consull Sempronius, and immediately after he came and set upon the same Sempronius with all his Army. At this Battell Hannibal had the Victory: but at the second, Sempronius overcame him. Since that time, I can finde in no Greeke nor Latine Authour, that Hannibal did any famous act in ITALY worthy memory. For being sent for into AFRICKE by the CARTHAGINIANS, he left ITALY sixteen yeares after this AFRICKE War was begun, greatly complaining of the Senate of CARTHAGE, and of himself also. Of the Senate, because that all the time he had been in his Enemies Countrey so long, they had allowed him so little Money: and so scant him besides with all other things necessary for the Wars. And of himselfe, because that after he had so often overcome the ROMANS, he had alwaies delayed time after the Victory, and had given the Enemy liberty to gather force againe. It is reported also, that before he imbarqued and tooke Sea, he set up a triumphing Arch or Pillar, by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, in the which were briefly graven his noble Victories, both in the Punicke and Greeke Tongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the winde served him so well, that in few daies he arrived at LEPTIS, and landing all his Army, he first came to ADRUMENTUM, and afterwards unto ZAMA. There receiving advertisement how the Affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS prospered, he thought it best to devise some way to end this Warre. For this cause he sent unto Scipio, to pray him to appoint him some convenient place where they might both meete, and talke together of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainly knowne, whether Hannibal did this of his owne head, or by commandement of the Senate. Scipio refused not to come to parley. Wherefore at the day appointed, there met two famous Generals of mighty Nations, in a great Plaine together, either of them having his Interpreter, to talke together of divers matters touching Peace and Warre. For Hannibal was altogether bent to Peace, because he saw the Affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS waxe worse and worse every day: that they had lost SICILE, SARDINIA, and SPAINE: because the Warre was brought out of ITALY into AFRICKE: because Syphax (a mighty King) was taken Prisoner of the ROMANS: and also because that their last hope consisted in the Army he had brought into AFRICKE, which was the onely remaine and reliefe of so long a Warre as he had made in ITALY: and also because that the CARTHAGINIANS had so small a Power left (both of Strangers, and also of Citizens) that there were scarce men enough to defend the City of CARTHAGE. So he did his best to perswade Scipio with a long Oration he made, rather to agree to Peace, then to resolve of Warre. Howbeit Scipio that lived in hope to bring this Warre to a good end, would not seeme to give care to any Peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either side, in the end they brake off, and made no Agreement. Shortly after, was this famous Battell striken by the City of ZAMA, in the which the ROMANS obtained Victory. For

For first of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne upon their own Army, so that they did put all Hannibals Horsemen out of order. And Lelins and Mafinissas, who made both the Wings, increasing their feare, gave the Horsemen no leasure to gather themselves in order againe. Howbeit the Footmen fought it out a long time, and with a marvellous great courage: inso much that the CARTHAGINIANS (trusting in their former Victory) thought that all the safety and preservation of AFRICKE, was all in their hands, and therefore they layed about them like men. The ROMANS on the other side had as great hartes as they, and besides, they stood in the better hope. Howbeit one thing indeed did the ROMANS great service to helpe them to the Victory: and that was, Lelins and Mafinissas returne from the chafe of the Horsemen; who rushed into the Battell of the Enemy with great fury, and did put them in a marvellous feare. For at their coming, the CARTHAGINIANS hearts were done, and they saw no other remedy for them, but to hope to scape by flying. So it is reported, that there were slaine that day, above twenty thousand CARTHAGINIANS in the Field, and as many more Prisoners. Hannibal their Generall, after he had tarried to see the end of the Battell, fled with a few of his men out of the great slaughter. Afterwards when he was sent for to CARTHAGE, to helpe to save his Countrey, he perswaded the Senate not to hope any more in Warres, but did counsell them, that setting all devices apart, they should send unto Scipio the ROMANE Captaine, to make Peace with him upon any condition. When the ten Ambassadors had brought the Capitulation and Agreement unto CARTHAGE of the Articles of Peace, it was reported that there was one Gilgo, who misliking to heare talke of Peace, made an Oration, and perswaded all he could to renew Warre against the ROMANS. Wherefore Hannibal perceiving that divers men confirmed his Opinion, and being much offended to see such beastes, and men of no understanding, to dare to speake of such matters, in so dangerous a time: he cast himselfe down headlong, whilest he was yet in his Oration. So when he saw that the Citizens and all the whole Assembly thought this too presumptuous a part of him, and unmeet altogether for a free City, he himselfe got up into the Pulpit for Orations, and said: Let no man be offended, if a man that from his youth had been alway out of CARTHAGE, and brought up all his life time in Wars, be ignorant of the Lawes and Ordinances of the City. After that he spake so wisely of the Articles of Peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediatly moved by the authority of so great a person, they all agreed to accept the conditions which the vanquisher, and the necessity of time offered them. The Articles out of doubt were very extreme and such as the vanquished are wont to receive with all extremity by the Conquerors. But besides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were bound to pay the ROMANS an Annuall Tribute, untill a certaine time were run out. So when the day came that the first Pension was to be payed to the ROMANS, and that every man grugged when the Subsidie was spoken of: some say, that Hannibal being offended with the vaine teares of the CARTHAGINIANS, he fell laughing. And when Hafdrubal Hadm reproved him because he laughed in such a common calamity of all the City, he answered, that it was no laughter nor rejoycing from the heart, but a scorning of their fond teares, that wept when there was lesse cause (and onely because it touched every private mans Purse) then before, when the ROMANS tooke from the CARTHAGINIANS their Ships, Armour, and Weapons, and their spoiles of the great Victories which they had wonne before, and now gave Lawes and Ordinances unto them that were vanquished. I know some Authours write, that Hannibal immediatly after he had lost the Battell, fled into ASIA, for that he was afraid they would deliver him into Scipios hands, that perhaps might demand him of them. But whether that was done suddainly, or some time after the Battell was lost at ZAMA, it makes no great matter: considering that all the world knoweth, that when he saw things brought to extremity, he presently fled into ASIA unto King Antiochus. So it is most true, that King Antiochus received him with great courtesie, and used him very honourably: inso much as he made him of counsell with him all in all, both in private and publique Causes. For the Name of Hannibal carried great reputation with all men: besides that, he had a common and mortall hate to the ROMANS, which was a pricking spurre still to move Warre against them. And therefore it seemeth that he came in happy houre into that Countrey, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the King against them, but also to set Warres at liberty against the ROMANS. So he told him, that the onely way to make Warre with the ROMANS, was to go into ITALY to leavy ITALIAN Souldiers, by whom onely, that Victorious Countrey of all other Nations might be subdued. He requested of the King a hundred Ships, sixteen thousand Footmen, and a thousand Horsemen onely. With this small Army he promised to invade ITALY, and that he would marvellously trouble the ITALIANS: whom he knew yet to stand in no small feare of him, for the very sound of his Name onely, because of the late Warres he had made there, so fresh yet in memory. Furthermore, he tooke heart againe unto him to renew the warres of AFRICKE, if the King would licence him to send men unto CARTHAGE, to stirre up the BARCINIAN faction, whom he knew hated the ROMANS to death. When he had gotten the King to grant him his request, he called Arifon TYRIAN unto him, a fine subtle fellow, and meet for such a purpose: to whom he made large promises, and perswaded him to go to CARTHAGE to his friends, and to carry them Letters from him. Thus Hannibal being a banished man, and fled out of his Countrey, raised Warre in all parts against the ROMANS. And surely his counsell had taken good effect, had King Antiochus rather followed his advice, as he did at the first, then the vaine persuasions of his fine Courtiers. But envy, a common plague frequenting Princes Courts, bred Hannibal great Enemies. For they being afraid that by his counsels he should grow in great favour with the King (for he was a wife and politick Captaine) and that thereby he should beare great sway and authority: to prevent it, they lacked no device to bring him in disgrace with the King. And it so chanced at that time that Vilius, who came Ambassadour unto EPHESUS, had often conference with Hannibal. Thereupon his privy Enemies took occasion to accuse him, and withall, the King himselfe became jealous of it, that from thenceforth he never more called him to counsell. At the selfe same time also, as some do report, Publius Cornelius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambassadors sent unto King Antiochus) talking familiarly with Hannibal, prayed him amongst other things to tell him truly, whom he thought the worthiest Captaine of all others. Hannibal answered him. First he thought Alexander King of MACEDON the chiefe: next unto him, Pyrrhus, King of the EPIROTES: and thirdly, himselfe. Then Scipio African smiling, asked him: what wouldst thou say Hannibal, if thou hadst overcome me? Truly said he, then I would be chiefe: I myselfe. This answer pleased Scipio marvellous well, because he saw he was neither despised, nor yet brought to be compared with the other, but left alone as peerelesse, by some secret flattery of Hannibal. After these things Hannibal found occasion to talke with King Antiochus, and began to lay open his Life unto him from his youth, and bewray the malice he had alwaies borne unto the ROMANES: whereby he so satisfied the King, that he was againe received into his grace and favour, which he had almost utterly lost. Thereupon the King was determined to have made him Admirall of his Army by Sea, the which he had put in readinesse for ITALY, and also to make proofe of his great courage and service, whom he knew to be a worthy man, and a mortall Enemy to the ROMANES. But one Thous, Prince of the ETOLIANS, thwarting this opinion, either for malice, or else for that his fancy was such: he altered the Kings minde, and cleane changed his purpose, the which was a matter of great importance for the Warre he pretended to make. For he gave counsell unto Antiochus, that he should go himselfe into GREECE, and direct his own affaires: and that he should not suffer another to carry away the honour and glory of this War. So King Antiochus shortly after went into GREECE, to make War with the ROMANES. Within few daies after, when he consulted whether he should make league with the THESSALIANS, Hannibals opinion was specially asked: who spake so wisely touching the State of the THESSALIANS, and the chiefe matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, and gave their consents unto it. Now his opinion was, that they should not need much to care for the THESSALIANS, but rather to make all the meanes they could to get King Philip of MACEDON to take their part, or else to perswade him to be a Neuter, and to take neither part. Furthermore, he gave counsell to make War with the ROMANES in their own Countrey, and offered himselfe to aid him the best he could. Every man gave good eare to his words, but his opinion was rather commended, then followed. Wherefore every man marvelled, that such a Captaine as he, that had so many yeares made Warre with the ROMANES (who had in manner conquered all the World) should then be so light set by of the King, when it specially stood him upon, to have such a mans helpe and counsell. For, what Captain living could a man have found more skillfull or politike, or meeter to make Warre with the ROMANES then him? Howbeit the King made no reckoning of him at the first beginning of this Warre, but shortly after, disdainning all their counsell, he confessed that Hannibal onely saw what was to be done. For after the ROMANES had obtained Victory in the Warre he made in GREECE, Antiochus fled out of EUROPE into EPHESUS, where making merry, and following pleasure, he hoped to live in peace, little thinking the ROMANES would come with an Army into ASIA. Now, these flattering Courtiers fed still his humour: a perpetuall plague to Kings and Princes, that suffer themselves to be flattered, and are contented to be deceived, because they give good eare to that that pleaseth them. But Hannibal, who knew the power and ambition of the ROMANES perswaded the King to hope for any thing rather then Peace, and bad him trust to it, that the ROMANES would never stay, till they had proved whether they could enlarge the Dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in AFRICK, and EUROPE. Antiochus perswaded by the authority of such a man, straight commanded Polyxenidas, a very serviceable man, and skillfull in Sea service, that he should go meet with the Army of the ROMANES that was coming thither. Then he sent Hannibal in SYRIA, into leavy a great number of Ships together, and afterwards made him and Apollonius (one of his favoured Courtiers) Generals of his Army by Sea: who notwithstanding that Polyxenidas was put to the worst by the ROMANES, they went and fet upon the RHODIANS, and were Confederates with them. Hannibal in this Battell assailing Eudamus the Captaine of the RHODIANS, that led the left Wing, he had already compassed in the Admirall Galley, and doubtlesse had obtained the Victory, but that the other Wing came in to rescue, after they had followed Apollonius in chase, and tooke the Victory from him, that was his own. After this Battell by Sea, which had no great good successe, we do not finde that Hannibal did any thing worthy of memory. For King Antiochus being overcome, besides other conditions, the ROMANES offered him, they desired that Hannibal (the mortall Enemy of the Countrey) should be delivered unto them. Hannibal foreseeing this long before, he suddenly stole from Antiochus, after this notable Battell that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the Kings Power was overthrowne. So, after Hannibal had wandered up and down a long time, he fled at length unto Prusias King of BITHYNIA, for succor. Now he did not so much trust to his friendship, but because he sought for the meekest place he could come by, as also for the safest, the which he most desired: considering that the ROMANES had the most part of the Sea and Land in their subjection. Some say, that after King Antiochus was overcome, Hannibal went into CRETA unto the GORTYNIANS: and that the ramour ran immediatly, he had brought a great Masse of Gold and Silver with him: Wherefore being afraid lest the CRETANS should offer him some violence, he devised this shift to scape the danger: he filled earthen Pots with Lead gilt, and sent them into the Temple of Diana, faining that he was marvellous careful for them, as though all his Treasure had been there. On the other side he had hid all his Gold in Images of Brasse, the which he had left carelesly lying on the ground in the houle. In the meane time, whilst they watched the Temple carefullly, that these earthen Pots should not be carried away without their privy, Hannibal hoised saile, and fled into BITHYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a Village upon the Sea side, which the Countrey men call LIBYSSA, of the which by some mens saying, there ran an old Oracle and Prophecy in this sort:

*The Land of Libyssa shall cover under mould,
The valiant Corps of Hannibal, when he is dead and cold.*

There Hannibal lay, not spending his time idly, but passing it away in exercising of the Mariners, riding of Horses, and training of his Souldiers. Some Authours also do write, that at that time Prusias made Warre with Eumenes, King of PERGAMUS, who was a Confederate and friend of the ROMANES: and that he made Hannibal his Lieutenant-Generall of his Army by Sea: who assailing Eumenes with a new found and unknowne device, won the Victory of the Battell by Sea. For before they began to fight, it is reported that Hannibal had gotten an infinite number of Snakes into earthen Pots, and when the Battell was begun, and they busily tending their fight: he threw those Pots with Snakes into the Enemies Ships, and that by this fearefull and strange device he made them flee. Now whether this was true, or not, the old Chronicles do make no manner of mention, but onely Amylius and Trogus: and therefore I report me to the Authours. So, the news of the disfection betwixt these two Kings, Prusias and Eumenes being brought to ROME, the Senate sent T. Q. Flaminius Ambassadour into ASIA, whose Name was famous for the noble Victories he had obtained in GREECE: to the end (as I conjecture) to make peace betwixt these two Kings. Flaminius being come unto King Prusias, he was marvellously offended, and sorry in his minde to see Hannibal yet alive (that was the mortallest Enemy of the ROMANES) after the Conquest of so many Nations, and the sacking of so many People: therefore he was very earnestly in hand with King Prusias, to deliver him Hannibal. Hannibal from the first beginning mistrusted King Prusias inconstancy very much, and therefore had digged divers Vaults in his houle, and made seven severall vents to flie out at, if he were suddenly taken. The report of Flaminius coming did increase his suspicion the more, for that he thought him the greatest Enemy he had in ROME: both generally for the hate he bare unto all the ROMANES, as also particularly for the remembrance of his Father Flaminius, that was slaine in the Battell fought by the Lake of Thrasymene. So Hannibal being full of care and griefe (as it is reported) he found devices to escape, the which stood him to no purpose against such a great power. For when the Kings Guard which was sent to take him, had compassed his houle about, Hannibal thought to flie at their first coming, and to save himselfe by the secretest Vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the Guard, then he determined to rid himselfe out of the ROMANES hands, by destroying himselfe. So some do report, that he was strangled by one of his men, whom he had commanded to helpe to dispatch him. Others write again, that he had drunke Bulls Blood, and when he had drunke it, died, as Clitarchus, and Stratocles do falsly report of Themistocles. Howbeit Titus Livius, that famous Historiographer writeth, that Hannibal called for the Poyson he had ready for such a mischief, and that holding this deadly Drinke in his hand, before he dranke, he said, Come on, let us rid the ROMANES of this paine and care, sith their spite and malice is so great, to hasten the death of a poore old man, that is halfe dead already. The ancient ROMANES advertised Pyrrhus King of the EPIROTES, who came with Ensignes displeased to the very Walls of the City of ROME, that he should looke to himselfe, and beware of poysoning: and these ROMANES now do make a friend forgetting his Kingly State and faithfull promise, vilely to betray his poor Guest. After he had said, bitterly cursing King Prusias, he poysoned himselfe, being seventy yeares old, as some Writers do testifie. His Body was buried in a Tombe of Stone by LIBYSSA, on the which was engraven no more but this: Here lieth Hannibal. The ROMANES being advertised of his death, every man said his opinion, as his fancy served him. Some greatly blamed T. Q. Flaminius cruelty, who to make himselfe famous by some notable act (as he thought) made a poore old man put himselfe to death, that was in manner halfe dead by age, and besides, was past doing the State of ROME any more hurt, they being Conquerors in manner, of all the world. But some againe on the other side, commended Flaminius for it, and said, it was a good deed of him, to rid the ROMANES of their mortall Enemy: who though he had a weak Body, yet he lacked no wit, wife counsell, and great experience in Warres, to intice King Prusias to make War, and to molest all ASIA, besides new Wars. For at that time, the power of the King of BITHYNIA was so great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Atibridates King of the same BITHYNIA, did marvellously molest the ROMANES both by Sea and by Land, and moreover fought Battels with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the ROMANES. And so the ROMANES might also be afraid of Prusias, and specially having Hannibal his Captaine. So some judge, that T. Q. Flaminius was specially sent Ambassadour unto King Prusias, secretly to praefise Hannibals death. Howbeit it is to be supposed, that T. Q. Flaminius was not so desirous to have Hannibal so suddenly put to death, as he would have been glad otherwise to have brought him againe to ROME, that had done such mischief to his Countrey: and this had been a great benefit for ROME, and much honour also unto himselfe. Such was the death of Hannibal the CARTHAGINIAN, a famous man doubtlesse and highly to be commended for Martiall praise, setting his other Vertues aside. So we may easily judge, of what power and force his Noble-minde, his great Wisdome and Courage, and his perfect Skill of Martiall Discipline was in all things. For in all the Warres the CARTHAGINIANS had so vehemently, and with such great preparation enterprised, they never thought themselves overcome, till Hannibal was overthrowne at that great Battell by ZAMA. So it appeareth that all their strength and skill of Warres began, and also ended with Hannibal their Captaine.

THE LIFE OF SCIPIO AFRICAN.

The Parentage of Scipio.

Publius Scipio a PATRICIAN, of the Family of the Cornelij (who was the first ROMANE Captaine against whom Hannibal fought in ITALY) was the Father of Cornelius Scipio afterwards surnamed African, the First: so called because he had conquered that Nation. The same Scipio, after he had obtained many great Victories in SPAIN, and done notable feates of Armes, was in the end slaine with a wound he had in a Battell against his Enemies, as he was plying and encouraging of his men from place to place, thronging in the greatest danger and fury of the Battell. Shortly after did his Brother Cn. Scipio also end his life, much after one selfe manner, and was slaine valiantly fighting. So these two Captaines besides the fame they atchieved by their noble deeds, left behinde them great praise of their faithfulness, modesty, and courage: the which made them not onely wished for of their Souldiers that were then living, but also of all the SPANIARDS besides. Cn. Scipio had a Son called P. C. Nasica, one that had been Consul, and had also triumphed: who being but a young man, was thought the meetest man of all the City of ROME to receive Idea the Mother of the gods. This Publius had two Sons, the so famous Scipios: of the which the one was called African, because he conquered ASIA: and the other African, because he subdued AFRICK at that famous Battell of ZAMA, where he overthrowne Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, as we said before. Whose Life we purpose now to write, not so much to make the glory of his Name (so famous by all the Greek and Latine Authours) the greater by our History, as for that we would make all men know the order of his noble deeds, and morall vertues, to the end that all Princes and noble Captaines in reading it, should behold the lively Image of perfect vertue, which many move an earnest desire in them to follow the example of P. C. Scipios Life, who from his child-hood gave great hope and shew of a noble nature, and excellent vertue, after he followed the instruction of Martiall Discipline, under the Conduct of his Father. He was carried carried into the Field at the beginning of the second Warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, followed the Campe being but seventeen yeares old, and in a very short time grew so toward and forward in all things, in riding, in watching, in taking all manner of paines like a Souldier, that he wan great commendation of his own Father, and besides, great estimation also of all the Army. Furthermore, he shewed such tokens of a sharpe wit and noble courage, that he made him beloved, and also feared of his Enemies. For this Scipio was present at the Battell of the Horsemen, where Publius Cornelius Scipio the Confull fought with Hannibal, by the River of Thesin: and some Writers do affirme, that Cornelius the Father being hurt, was almost taken by the Enemy, had not his Son Scipio saved him, who had then but a little downe on his beard, he was so young. After that also, at the Battell that was fought by CANUS, to the great losse, and in manner utter destruction of the Empire of ROME, when the ten thousand men that fled to CANUSIUM, had all together with one consent referred the Government of the Army unto Appius Pulcher, that had been Edilis, and unto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very young the same. Scipio shewed then by his deeds, what noble minde and courage was in him. For when he saw certaine young men confult together between themselves to forsake ITALY, he thrust in among them, and drawing out his Sword, made them all sweare they would not forsake their Countrey. These, and such like deeds done by him with a lively courage and noble minde, being then but a young man, wan him such favour with the ROMANS, that not respecting his young yeares, nor their ancient custome, they called him forward, and laied Offices of great charge and Government upon him. Infomuch that when he sued for the Office of Edilis before his due time, notwithstanding that the Tribunes of the People were against his suite, because he was so young a man: yet the People suffered him to be brought from Tribe to Tribe, and so was presently chosen Edilis with the most voices. So after his Father and Uncle (both famous and noble Captains) had been slaine one after the other in SPAIN, and that the ROMANS were in consultation to appoint some worthy Captaine in the roome: they could finde no man that durst undertake this so dangerous War, considering the losse of two so great Captaines before. Wherefore the whole assembly being called to choose a Vice-Confull, all the other Princes and Peeres of the Realme being silent at so worthy a motion: Scipio onely of all the rest, being but twenty four yeares old, stood up in the midst of them, and said with a good hope and confidence he would willingly take the charge upon him. He had no sponer offered this promise, but he was presently made Vice-Confull of SPAIN, with the wonderfull good will and favour of the People, who gave him all their voices. Howbeit the Senatours afterwards considering better of the matter, against what Captaines and Nations, he should make Warre, they thought it impossible so young a man could performe so weighty a charge. Wherefore mens mindes were wonderfully changed againe on the suddain, as if the Tribes of the People had repented them of their voices and election. Scipio perceiving it called an Assembly presently, and made such an Oration of his age, and Discipline of Warres, that every man that heard him wondred at him, and the People began againe to renew the good hope they had of him for the Warres. For he had not onely a noble courage in him, being indued with so many singular vertues, but he was also a goodly Gentleman, and very comly of person, and had besides a pleasant countenance: all which things together, are great meanes to win him the love and goodwill of every man. Moreover, even in his gesture and behaviour, there was a certaine Princely grace. Now the glory of Martiall Discipline being joyned unto those his rare Gifts of minde and nature, it was to be doubted, whether civill Vertues made him more acceptable unto strangers, then wonderfull for his skill in Warres. Furthermore, he had filled the common Peoples hearts with a certaine superstitious feare, because he did daily (after he had taken the mans Gowne) use to go up to the Capitoll, and so into the Church without any company: infomuch that all men began to thinke that he learned some secret things in the Temple, which others might not know, as they were perswaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nymph Ageria. Furthermore, it seemeth that some had the like opinion of Scipio, as in old time they had of Alexander King of MACEDON, to wit, that oftentimes there was a Snake seene in his Mother Chamber. But let these things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with ten thousand Footemen, and a Fleece of thirty Gallies, every one of them having five Oares to a banke, he sailed into SPAIN: and in few daies arriving at EMPORIA, he landed his men and marched by land to TARRACON. There he kept a Councell, and many Ambassadors of the Cities their confederates came thither, who being courteously received, returned to their lodgings with such answer as they liked. After this, Scipio being carefully bent to prosecute the Warre he had taken upon him, he thought it best to joyne the remaine of the old Bands with his Army, which had been saved through the manhood and valiantnesse of Lucius Martius. For after both the Scipios were slaine, and both SPAINES almost lost, and the ROMANE Legions also overthrowne and put to flight, Lucius Martius a ROMANE Knight, having gathered together the remnant of both Armies, resisted (beyond all hope of man) the Enemies puffed up with glory of the Victory they had gotten, and with great valiantnesse, and unpeakeable industry he maintained Warre in SPAIN, against three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS. Now Scipio being come to this Army that lay in Garrison for the Winter time, every man did certainly perswade themselves that the Warre should prosper: and when they saw him, they remembered their old Captaines, infomuch that there was never a Souldier could have his fill with looking upon this young man. Howbeit, after he had commended the Souldiers for their noble courage, not despairing for the calamity of their Countrey, he greatly honoured Lucius Martius: to shew, that who so trusteth in his owne vertues, need not envy the glory of another man. So Winter being past, he tooke the old and new Bands out of the Garrisons, and first of all determined to go and lay siege unto new CARTHAGE. For of all the Cities of SPAIN it was the wealthiest, and none more meet to make War both by Sea and Land, then that. Moreover, the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS had bestowed in this City all their Munition, and greatest Treasure: and left a strong Garrison, both in the City, and Castle. But the Captaines themselves were divided in divers Countries, to the end that they there might keepe the whole Region from spoile, least of all looking then, that CARTHAGE should be besieged. But Scipio having put all in readinesse, he came and besieged new CARTHAGE with all his Army both by Sea and Land. This seemed to be a marvellous hard enterprize, and would continue long, both because the City was very strong of it selfe, and also for that the men within it were so courageous, that they did not onely thinke themselves able to defend the City, but their hearts served them also to make sallies out upon the Enemy, and to skirmish with them, even to the very Trenches of the ROMANES Campe. Howbeit it hapneth often, that what a man cannot obtaine by force, he may winne by industry. Now Scipio knew, that the Lake or Meare which is not farre from the Walls of CARTHAGE, did ebbe and flow with the Tide, and that it was passable by foord on that side where they might easiliest come to the Walls: so, he thinking to embrace this occasion, and that he could not possible meet with a better device to take CARTHAGE: when he saw his time, he set his men in Battell-ray, and having divided them into severall Squadrons, gave a more desperate assault upon the City, then he had done before. In the meane time, he chose out a Band of the valiantest men he had, and commanded them to wade over the Lake, and to scale the Walls on that side, where they within the Towne made least account of it. So, these Souldiers that were commanded to give this attempt, after they had passed over the Lake without any let or trouble, they found that part of the Wall without any Watch or Guard, because the greatest fury of the fight, was on the other side of the City. Therefore they easily getting up on the Wall, came and assailed the Enemies behinde them. The Citizens, and those of the Garrison, perceiving they were unware fallen into that great danger, they immediatly forooke the Walls, and seeing themselves charged on every side, betooke them to their Legges, and fled. The ROMANES pursued them so hotly, that they wanne the City, and sacked it: where they found a wonderfull great spoile, and abundance of all things necessary for Warre. Scipio greatly prayed his Souldiers and did reward them, for that they had done so valiant service. Howbeit when he should come to give the scaling Crowne of the Walls, unto the first man that got up upon the Walls, there were two Souldiers at such variance for the matter, that all the Army was in danger of division and mutiny upon that occasion. Thereupon Scipio called his men together, and in open assembly told them, that he knew they both got up on the Wall together, and so gave them both a scaling Crowne: and by this means their tumult was presently pacified. Afterwards he sent unto all the Cities of SPAIN, the hostages that were found in the City, which were a marvellous number: the which wanne him great fame for his courtesie and clemency, whereby he allured many Nations to yeeld themselves unto the ROMANES, and to forsake the CARTHAGINIANS. But one thing above all the rest chiefly increased his praise, and wanne him great love and goodwill, as a mirrour and example of all vertue. There was a young Lady taken prisoner, that in beauty excelled all the Women in CARTHAGE: whom he carefully caused to be kept and preserved from violence and dishonour. And afterwards when he knew that she was married unto Lucius Prince of the CEBTIBERIAN, he sent for her Husband, that was a very young man, and delivered her unto him, untouched or dishonoured. Lucius not forgetting his noble courtesie unto her, did let all his Subjects understand the great bounty, modesty and rare excellency of all kinde of Vertues that were in this ROMANE General, and shortly after, he returned again to the ROMANES Campe with a great number of Horsemen. The three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago Hasdrubal BARCINIAN, and the other Hasdrubal, the Son of Gisgo) knowing that the losse of new CARTHAGE did them great hurt, as well in the impairing of their credit with other strange Nations: as also by the conjecture divers made of the Successe of this Warre: they first practised to dissemble the losse of it, and then in speech to make light of it as much as they could. Scipio having joyned to him divers Nations and Princes of SPAIN, (among the which were the two little Kings, Mandonius and Indibilis, understanding where Hasdrubal BARCINIAN lay, he marched towards him with his Army to fight with him, before Mago and the other Hasdrubal came to joyne with him. Hasdrubal BARCINIAN lay in Campe by the River of Besula, and was very desirous to fight, trusting wholly to his strength and Army: but when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the Valley, and got to a Hill of pretty strength. The ROMANES Legions followed him, and gave him no respite, but pursued so neare, that he came and assailed his Campe at the first coming. So they fought it out upon the Trenches and rampires, as if they had been at the assault of a City. The CARTHAGINIANS trusting to the strength of the place, and driven to it of necessity (which maketh cowards most desperate,) they valiantly resisted their Enemies the best they could. The ROMANES in contrary manner, being valiant, and full of good hope, fought it out lustily like men, and the fight was so much more cruell, for that it was in the sight of their Generall Scipio, and of all the Army besides: inasmuch that their valiant service there could not be hidden. Therefore they never gave over the assault, untill that having done their uttermost endeavour, they got up upon the Rampires, and entred into divers places into the Enemies Campe, and made them flee. Hasdrubal Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, saved himselfe by flying, with a few with him, before the ROMANES entred entred into their Fort. After this Battell, Scipio according to his manner, caused all the Spanish Prisoners to be brought before him, and then gave them liberty to depart without paying of Ranfome. Among the Prisoners, there was a young Gentleman of the Kings blood, and Nephew unto Masinissa, whom when he had used very honourably, he sent unto Masinissa, with great and rich Gifts: to shew thereby, that a General of an Army, should beas bountifull and full of civill Vertues, as otherwise skilfull and expert in Martiall Discipline. For the end of Warre is Victory: the benefit whereof consisteth in bounty and clemency. From thence cometh the glory and all other praises due to Captaines: as it hapned in those things whereof we now Treat. For a great number of SPANIARDS being present, wondering at the great clemency of the General of the ROMANES, they could do no lesse but call him King, to honour and recompence his vertue. But Scipio strake that word straight, the which was no common sound to the ROMANES eares, and therefore he would by no means allow that Tide, which he knew to be hateful to the Noble-men of his Countrey, and also unmeet for the liberty of the ROMANES. He onely prayed the SPANIARDS, that if they had any minde and desire not to shew themselves unthankfull to him, that then they would be faithfull and loving to the People of ROME. So whilst these things were done by Scipio, the other two Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, and Hasdrubal the Sonne of Gisgo) after they understood of the overthrow of their men by the River of Besula, made all the speed they could to joyne together: and shortly after came and met with Hasdrubal BARCINIAN, to consult together, and to take order for the Warre. So after they had laid their heads together, and considered all things, they concluded thus: that Hasdrubal BARCINIAN should go into ITALIE to his Brother Hannibal, where the Warre was greatest: and that Mago, and the other Hasdrubal should remaine in SPAIN, should fend for aide from CARTHAGE, and should not fight with the ROMANES untill all their forces looked for, were assembled, and so might make a great and puissant Army. When Hasdrubal was gone into ITALY, Hanno was sent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practising in his journey to make the CARTHAGINIANS to rebell. M. Syllanus came and set upon him by Scipio's commandement, and was so fortunate, that he overcame him in Battell, and tooke him Prisoner. Now there was a City which the Countrey men called ORINGS, the which was very wealthy, and meet to renew the War. Lucius Scipio was sent thither with part of the Army to besiege it: but finding it a very strong situation, and too well manned to take it at the first assault, he environed the Town, and within few daies tooke and sacked it. Winter came on apace, and the time of the yeare made them both to retire into their Gerrisons, for the winter. So Scipio having had so good fortune in this War, he went unto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Hasdrubal, the Son of Gisgo, went to the Sea side. The next Summer, Warres growing more bloody and cruell then before in the lower SPAIN, the ROMANES and CARTHAGINIANS met, and joyned Battell by the River of Besula, and fought set Battells. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the Victory, and made the Enemies flee (of the which there were slaine a great number in the Field) and giving them no leasure to gather together againe, and to make head against him, he fought with them and followed the chafe so hotly, that Hasdrubal and Mago were driven to leave the maine Land, and to flee to GADES, after they had lost all their Army. In the Army of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a young man of a noble courage, and very wife, called Masinissa, who finding means to have secret conference with Syllanus, he was the first man that offered him friendship, either being brought to it through Scipio's liberality, or else because he thought the time was come, that it was the surest way to take part with the ROMANES, which were the Conquerours. It is that Masinissa that afterwards (through the goodnesse of the ROMANES) became the great and mighty King of NUMIDIA, and indeed he was divers waies a profitable friend unto the ROMANES. Furthermore the selfe same yeare (which was the fourteenth of the second Warre with the AFRICANS) SPAIN was the first Nation and People of the up-land men dwelling in the heart of the Realme, that was conquered under the happy conduct of the Vice-Consull Scipio: howbeit it was the last Realme that was made a Province long time after, by Augustus Caesar. Now Scipio not contenting himselfe with the great Victories he had obtained, in very short time in SPAIN (for he had an imagination and good hope also to conquer AFRICA) he thought it his best way, to make all the means he could possible, to get Syphax King of the MASASYLIANS, a friend to the ROMANES. Wherefore after he had felt the Kings minde, perceiving that he was well inclined to make league with the ROMANES, he presently set all his other affaires aside, and sailed into AFRICKE with two Gallies onely, at five Oares to a Banke. At the selfe same time also came Hasdrubal, the Son of Gisgo thither, from GADES: so that both these valiant and lusty Captaines came of purpose to the King envying one the other, to crave the Kings goodwill, unto their Countrey and Common-wealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his Court, and did use them very honourably and courteously, and appointed that they should both eate at one Table, and lie in one selfe Chamber, because the one should not thinke his entertainment better then the other. It is reported that Hasdrubal wondering at the magnanimity and great widome of Scipio that was present, he considered with himselfe the great danger the City of CARTHAGE and all AFRICKE besides was in, through that mans means: for he saw him yet a young man, quick, and excellent in all manner of great Vertues, and that had continually obtained such Victories: and therefore considering the lusty youth of this Gentleman, he imagined that it was impossible to perswade him to embrace Peace, rather then Warre. Besides, he was afraid also that Syphax, moved by the perage and authority of him that was present, would take part with the ROMANES: and indeed his minde minde gave him rightly, for so it hapned. For though Syphax at the first shewed himselfe indifferent to them both, and had moved talke to end the Warre betwixt the ROMANES and the CARTHAGINIANS: yet afterwards when Scipio told him he could conclude no Peace without consent of the Senate of ROME, he rejected Hadrubal, and inclining to Scipios request, he made league with the People of ROME. So Scipio being returned againe into SPAINE, himselfe partly by force, and partly also by L. Marius meanes, conquered LITURGIUM CASTULO, and certaine other places that refused to yeeld themselves unto the ROMANES. And to the end nothing should be lacking for all kinde of sports and pleasures, after he had so fortunately obtained so many famous Victories: when he was come to new CARTHAGE, he caused the Fencers to prepare themselves to fight with great pompe, where there were many great Estates, not onely to see that pastime, but also they themselves to handle the Weapons in person. But amongst other SPANIARDS of noble Houses, there were two called, Corbius and Orsua, which were at strife together for the Kingdome: but that day they ended their quarrell, the one being slaine by the others hand. The Fight was very lamentable and grievous to the Beholders: but the death of him that was slaine, troubled them much more, for they were both Cosen-Germanes. After all this Scipio having his minde still occupied in matters of greater weight and importance, then those which he had already brought to passe, he fell sicke. His sicknesse being carried through all SPAINE, and as it hapneth often, his dis ease being reported to be much greater and dangerous then it was indeed: thereupon, not onely the Nations of SPAINE began to rise in hope of change, but the Army it selfe also of the ROMANES, the which he had left at SUCRO. First of all, Martiall Discipline was corrupted through the absence of the Generall. Afterwards also, the report of his sicknesse, and danger of his life being spread abroad in the Army, raised such a rebellion among them, that some of them little regarding the authority and commandement of the head Captaines of the Bands, they drave them away, and chose two meane Souldiers for their Captaines; who presumptuously tooke upon them the Name given unto them by men of no authority, and yet more arrogancy; made the bundles of Rods and Axes to be carried before them. Such folly doth fury and vaine ambition oftentimes worke in mens mindes. On the other side, the SPANIARDS slept not, and specially Mandonius and Indibilis: who aspiring to the Kingdome of SPAINE, came to Scipio when he was Conquerour, after he had taken new CARTHAGE. But afterwards being offended to see the power of the ROMANES increase daily, they sought occasion to make some alteration. So after they had heard, not onely of Scipios sicknesse, but also how he was at deaths doore, and did beleve it: they presently leaved an Army, and went and made Warre with the SWISSITANS which were confederates of the ROMANES. But Scipio being recovered againe of his sicknesse, like as upon the false rumour of his death every man began to rise: even so after the truth was known indeed of his recovery, they were all put down againe, and not a man of them durst proceed any further in their rebellion. Scipio being more skillful in Martiall Discipline, then acquainted with sedition and rebellion, although he was marvelously offended with the Souldiers that had committed this folly; yet in the end, left following his anger, men should have thought him to have exceeded all bounds of reason in punishing of them, he referred all unto the Consull. The most part of them gave advice, that the Authours of the rebellion should be punished, and all the rest pardoned: for by this meanes, said they, the punishment shall light upon a few that have deserved it, and all the rest shall take example by them. Scipio followed that advice, and presently sent for all the seditious Bands, to come to new CARTHAGE to receive their pay. The Souldiers obeyed his commandement, some of them making their fault lesse then it was, as men do often flatter themselves: others also trusting to the Captaines clemency, as knowing him not to be extreme in punishment. For Scipio was wont to say, that he had rather save the life of one ROMANE Citizen, then to kill a thousand Enemies. This rumour ran also, that Scipio had another Army ready, the which he looked for to joine with them, and then to set upon the Kings (Mandonius and Indibilis) who made Warre with the SWISSITANS. These Souldiers departing from SUCRO, with good hope to obtaine pardon, came unto CARTHAGE. Howbeit the next day after they were come into the Town, they were brought into the Market-place: where there Armour and Weapons being taken from them, they were environed with all the Legions Army. Then the ROMANE Generall sitting in place of judgment, shewed himselfe before all the company in as good health and good disposition of body, as ever he was in all his youth. Then he made a sharpe and bitter Oration, full of grievous complaints: insomuch as there was not one of all the Souldiers that were unarmed, that durst cast up their eyes, or look their Generall in the face, they were so ashamed. For their consciences did accuse them for the fault they had committed, and the feare of death did take their wits and senses from them, and the presence of their gracious Captaine, made them blush as well that were innocent, as the parties that were offenders. Wherefore there was a generall and sorrowfull silence of all men. So after he had ended his Oration, he caused the chiefe Authours of this rebellion to be brought forth before the whole Assembly: who after they had been whipped according to the manner, were presently beheaded, the which was a fearefull and lamentable sight to the beholders. These matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other Souldiers to be sworne againe, and then went and proclaimed Warre against Mandonius and Indibilis. For they considering with themselves, how the ROMANE Souldiers that had rebelled in the Campe, were put to death, they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leaved an Army of twenty thousand Footmen and two thousand Horsemen, and came downe with them against the ROMANES. Scipio having intelligence thereof, before that Kings could increase their Army, and that that other Nations could rebell: he departed from CARTHAGE, and went with as great speed as he could, to meet with the Enemy. The Kings were camped in a very strong place, and trusted so to their Army, that they were not determined to provoke the Enemy, nor also to refuse the Battell if it were offered them. Howbeit it chanced by the nearnesse of both Campes, that within few daies, they being provoked by the ROMANES, came down and set their men in Battell-ray, and joyned Battell with Scipio: so that a good while together, the fight was very bloody and cruell. But at length the SPANIARDS seeing themselves compassed in behinde, and being driven to fight in a ring to defend the Enemy on every side, they were overcome: so that the third part of them scarcely saved themselves by flying. Mandonius and Indibilis seeing themselves utterly undone, and that there was no hope nor remedy left, they sent Ambassadors unto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receive them to mercy, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the ROMANES; yet thinking it more honourable to overcome the Enemy by courtesie and clemency, then by force: he did pardon them, and onely commanded them to give him Money to pay his Souldiers. In the meane time Masiniissa came from GADES, and landed; because he would himselfe in person confirm the friendship he had offered Scipio in his absence, by the meanes of M. Syllanus, and also speake with him face to face, whom he judged to be a worthy man, for the famous Victories he had obtained. And in truth Masiniissa was not deceived in the opinion he had of the valiantnesse and Vertues of Scipio, but found him the selfe same man whom he before had imagined him to be in his minde: the which but feldome hapneth so notwithstanding. For besides the great rare gifts of nature that Scipio had above all others, there was in him also a certaine princely grace and majesty. Furthermore, he was marvellous gentle and courteous unto them that came to him, and had an Eloquent Tongue, and a passing Gift to win every man. He was very grave in his gesture and behaviour, and ever wore long haire. Masiniissa being come to salute him, when he saw him, he had him in such admiration, as it is reported, that he could not cast his eyes off him, nor have his fill of looking on him. So he thanked him marvellously for sending his Nephew unto him, and promised him that his deeds should confirme and witnesse the friendship agreed upon between them: the which he ever after inviolably kept unto the ROMANES, even to the houre of his death. So all the Nations of SPAINE became subject to the Empire of ROME, or at the least their Confederates: whereupon those of GADES also following the example of others, came and yeilded themselves unto the ROMANES. This is a very ancient Nation, and if we may credit their report of it, as CARTHAGE was in AFRICK, and THEBES in BOEOTIA; so was GADES upon the Sea, a Colony of the TYRIANS. Scipio after he had conquered all SPAINE, and driven out the CARTHAGINIANS, considering that there remained nothing more for him to do; he left the Government of the Province unto L. Lentulus, and to Manlius Acidinus, and returned to ROME. When he was arrived at ROME, the Senate gave him audience out of the City, in the Temple of Belona. There, when he had particularly told them of the things he had valiantly and fortunately brought to end: and further, that he had overcome foure Captaines in divers foughten Fields, and also put to flight foure Armies of the Enemies, and driven the CARTHAGINIANS out of both SPAINES, and that there was no Nation left in all those parts, but was subdued to the ROMANES: the Senate gave judgement, that all these things were worthy of a noble Triumph. But because never man yet was suffered to enter into ROME in Triumph, for any Victories he had obtained, whilst he was onely but Vice-Consull, and not yet been Consull: The Senatours thought it not good, and Scipio himselfe also made no great suite for it, because he would not be an occasion, to bring in any new Custome, and to breake the old. So when he came into the City, he was afterwards declared Consull, with the great good will and consent of the whole Assembly. It is reported that there never came such a world of People to ROME, as were there at that time, not onely for the Assemblies sake, but more to see Publius Cornelius Scipio. Wherefore not the ROMANES onely, but all the strangers also that were there, all their eyes were upon Scipio, and said both openly and privately: that they should send him into AFRICK, to make Warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, at home in their owne Countrey. Scipio also being of the same opinion, said, that he would aske advice of the People, if the Senate would be against such a worthy enterprise. For amongst the Peeres and Senatours, there were some that vehemently inveighed against that opinion, and amongst the rest, Fabius Maximus specially, a man of great fame and authority. Scipio went forward with the matter, and thwarted him, and shewed many reasons that there was no way to overcome the CARTHAGINIANS, and to drive Hannibal out of ITALY, but that onely: and that all other counsels were in vaine, and unprofitable. After this matter was long debated in Councell, SCIPIO was appointed unto Scipio: and the whole Senate gave him Commission to go with his Army into AFRICK, if he thought it meet and profitable for the Common-wealth. The decree of the Senate being published, every mans minde ranne of so great enterprises, that they perfwaded themselves AFRICK was already their owne, and had great hope to end this Warre. Howbeit Scipio saw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this journey, because of the poverty of the Common-Treasure, and for lacke of young men, the flower and choice of the which was utterly gone, by the former great losses and overthrowes Hannibal had given them. Howbeit to satisfie every mans expectation of him, he made all the possible speed he could, to prepare things necessary for the Warres. So divers People of THUSCAN, and of the UMBRIANS, offered to helpe him to their best power: some of them gave him Timber to build his Ships, others holpe him with Armour, and others also furnished him with Corne, and all other kinde of Victuals, and munition for his Army.

The

Scipio prepared his Army and Navy by Sea in five and forty daies.

Scipio's policy in Sicile.

The Ships being built, and all the Army by Sea put in a readinesse, in the space of five and forty daies, a thing incredible to many, Scipio departed out of ITALIE, and sailed towards SICILE. But when he came to take muster of his Army, he specially chose those that had served long time in the Warres, under the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for very expert Souldiers. And for the SICILIANS, he partly wan them by courtesie, and partly by compulsion compelled them to give him aide for the Warre he tooke in hand, the which he meant to make in AFRICKE, when the time of the yeare should serve for it. Among other things, it is reported, that Scipio chose out of divers Cities, three hundred young Gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the said Province, and commanded them to meet at a certaine day appointed, every man with Horse and Armour. They then coming at the day appointed, according to his commandement, the Consull bade them choose whether they would follow him in the Warres of AFRICKE, or else deliver up their Armour and Horse to as many other ROMANES as they were in number. So when they all prayed they might be dismissed from the Warre, Scipio appointed three hundred other young ROMANES in their places, whom he had brought out of ITALY with him unarmed, because he would mount and arme them at the SICILIANS Coast, as indeed it chanced. Afterwards they did him great service in AFRICKE, in many great Battels. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his Army in Garrison for the Winter-time, when he came to SYRACUSA, taking order not onely for the preparation of Warre, but also for the affaires of SICILE. There when it was told him by complaint of divers, that there was a great company of ITALIAN Souldiers in that City, who would not restore the spoiles which they had gotten in the Warres, but kept them still in their hands, notwithstanding that the Senate had enjoyned them by speciall commandement to make restitution to the SYRACUSANS: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplish the Senates commandement. Whereby he wanne all the Peoples hearts of SICILE, and was reported to be a iust and upright Consull. In the meane time he was advertised by Caius Lelius, that returned out of AFRICKE with great spoile, how King Masiniissa was very desirous of his coming thither, and that he instantly prayed him he would come into AFRICKE, as soone as he could possible, so it were without the prejudice of the Common-wealth. Moreover, that divers Nations and People of AFRICKE had the like desire: who hating the Government of the CARTHAGINIANS, desired nothing more then some good occasion to rebell. Now this journey was not deferred through Scipio's fault or negligence, considering that such a Captaine could hardly be found that was more carefull and diligent in his charge then he. Howbeit the affaires of SICILE, and the opportunity he had to recover LOCRES againe, did hinder him that he could not bring his purpose to passe according to his minde. Furthermore, his Lieutenant Pleminius disorder grieved him much, because that having left him at LOCRES, he fell to all sorts of insolvency, as to deflower Women, and to spoile the poore Citizens: insomuch that they being marvellously offended with these infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subject to the Government of so vile and wicked a man. So the Ambassadors of LOCRES being arrived at ROME, and exhibiting their complaints in open Senate, of the great wrongs and injuries Pleminius did them: the Noble-men tooke the matter so grievously, that they made bitter Decrees, not onely against the same Pleminius, but also against P. C. Scipio himselfe. Whereupon Scipio's Enemies having gotten matter enough to accuse him, they were then so bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the injuries offered the LOCRIANS, with the licentiousnesse of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his Souldiers also: and that he had suffered all these things more negligently, then became the Office or duty of a Consull. They added thereto moreover, that his Army he had in SICILE was altogether unruly and unserviceable, and regarded not the Ordinances of the Campe: and that the Captaine himselfe was carelessse, and altogether given over to pleasure and idleness. But above all others Fabius Maximus was his heavy Enemy, and so vehement against him in his words, that he exceeded the bounds of all modesty and reason, and thought good to call him presently home out of SICILE, and to dismiss him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very straight, and extreme. Wherefore, following Quintus Metellus counsell, the Senatours appointed ten Ambassadors to go into SICILE, to make diligent inquiry, whether the Accusations objected against Scipio were true: and if they found him in fault, that then they should command him in the Name of the Senate presently to returne into ITALY. And on the other side, if they found that he was unjustly accused, and onely through the procurement of his malicious Enemies and Detractors: then that they should send him to his Army, and encourage him valiantly to go forward with this Warre. So when the Ambassadors were arrived in SICILE, after they had made diligent enquiry according to the Articles of their Commission; they could not finde that Scipio was faulty in any thing, saying that he had too lightly passed over the wrongs and injuries Pleminius had done unto the LOCRIANS. For Scipio was very liberal in rewarding of his men, and exceeding courteous, and mercifull also in punishing of them. But when they saw his Army, his Ships, and his other Furniture and Munition for Warre: it is reported that they wondered so much to see the great abundance, and good order taken for all things, that when they returned to ROME, they greatly commended Scipio, and rejecting all the Accusations of his Accusers, they did promise the Senate and People of ROME assured hope of Victory. So when all these home-troubles at ROME were taken away, their chanced other out-ward troubles abroad that grieved him much. For the Ambassadors of King Syphax came and told him, that their Master had made new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and was become friend unto Hafdrubal, whole

King Syphax revolteth from the Romanes.

Daughter he had married: and therefore that he wished him if he meant to do his Countrey good; to make no attempt upon AFRICKE, for he was determined to reckon the CARTHAGINIANS his friends, and also to set upon them whom the GARTHAGINIANS account their Enemies. Scipio quickly returned the Ambassadors again unto Syphax, because the effect of their coming should not be blown abroad in his Campe: and gave them Letters, in which he praised King Syphax, that remembering his league and faithfull promise, he should beware he attempted nothing unworthy the Name of a ROMAN, and Faith of a King. Afterwards calling his men together, he told them that the Ambassadors of King Syphax were come into SICILE, to complain of his long tarrying, as Masiniissa had done before. Therefore he was to hasten his journey to go into AFRICKE, and thereupon commanded all his Souldiers to put themselves in readinesse, and to provide all things necessary for their journey. The Consuls commandement being published through all SICILE, their repaired immediately unto LILYBEA a multitude of People, not onely those that were to faile into AFRICKE, but of others also that came to see the Fleet and Army of the ROMANES: because they never saw an Army better furnished, nor set out with all things necessary for Warre, nor better replenished with Souldiers, then that. So Scipio, all things being ready embarked at LILYBEA with so earnest a desire to passe over the Sea, that neither Oares nor wind did content his minde. Yet he was brought in few daies sailing, to the Promontory or Mountaine called Faire, and there he put all his men on land. The newes of his arrivall flying straight to CARTHAGE, all the City was presently in such an uproare, that suddenly they founded the Alarme, and guarded the Gates and Walls, as appeareth by testimony of some in writing. For from M. Regulus time unto that present day it was almost fifty yeares space since any ROMAN Captaine ever entred AFRICKE with force of Armes. And therefore it was no marvel though they were afraid, and grew to uproare. The Name of Scipio did increase their feare the more, because the CARTHAGINIANS had no Captaine matchable with him. Hafdrubal the Sonne of Gisgo had the Name at that time of a luty Captaine, whom they knew had notwithstanding been overcome, and driven out of SPAIN by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope and safety of their Countrey in him, and in King Syphax that mighty King: they never left intreating the one nor perswading the other, to come and helpe the affaires of AFRICKE, with all the speed they could possible. So, whilst these two were preparing to joine both their Armies together, Hannibal the Sonne of Hamilcar, being appointed to keepe the next Countrey adjoining to it, came against the ROMANES. Scipio after he had destroyed the Countrey, and enriched his Army with great spoile, he camped by the City of UTICA, to see if it were possible for him to winne so noble and wealthy a City, and being besides so commodious for the Warres both by Sea and Land. At the selfe same time Masiniissa came to the ROMANES Campe, and was inflamed with a vehement desire to make Warre against King Syphax, by whom he had before been driven out of his Kindome and inheritance. Scipio that had known him in SPAIN, a young Prince of an excellent wit, and quick and valiant of his hand, he sent him to discover the Army of the Enemies, before the CARTHAGINIANS could gather any greater power, and willed him to use all the device and meanes he could possible to intice Hanno to fight. Masiniissa as he was commanded, began to provoke the Enemy, and drawing him out by little and little, he brought him where Scipio lay with all his Legions armed, looking for a good houre to fight. The Army of the Enemies was now wearied, when the ROMANES came to set upon them with their fresh Army. Hanno at the first onset was overcome and slaine, with most of his men: and all the rest fled and dispersed themselves here and there, where they thought they might best scape. After this Victory, Scipio returning backe againe to besiege the City of UTICA, the suddain coming of Hafdrubal and King Syphax, made him to leave off his enterprise, for that they brought with them a great Army both of Footmen and Horsemen, and came and camped not farre from the ROMANES. Scipio perceiving that, raised his siege immediately, and came and fortified his Campe upon a Hill, from whence he might go and fight with the Enemy, and molest them of UTICA, and also keepe his Ships safe that rode at Anchor. Howbeit the time of the yeare being come, that both Armies were to dispose their men in Garrisons for the Winter season, he determined to send unto King Syphax to seele his minde, and to make him leave the friendship of the CARTHAGINIANS if it were possible. For he knew well it was his marriage with Sophoniba, which through her flattering perswasions had brought him to that fury, that he had not onely forsaken the friendship of the ROMANES, but also meant to destroy them, contrary to his faith and promise: and that if he had once satisfied the heate of his love with her, he thought then he might be called home againe. Syphax having understood Scipio's message sent him, he answered, that indeed it was time, not onely to leave the league with the CARTHAGINIANS, but also to give up all thought of Warre: and so promised, that he would be a good meane to make peace. Scipio gave good care unto it, and caught hold of an excellent fine device. He chose the valiantest Souldiers in his Army, apparelled them like slaves, and made them waite upon the Ambassadors, and gave them instructions what they should do. These fellows, whilst the Ambassadors and King Syphax were in talke together about the Articles and conditions of peace, and that the consultation held longer then it was wont to do, they went and walked up and down through the Enemies Campe, to see all the waies and entrees into it, according unto Scipio's instructions. After they had done this divers times, they came againe to Scipio. Truce was taken for a time, the which being expired, Scipio seemed to make preparation for Watres, (as being out of hope of any Peace,) and to make his Army ready by Sea, preparing Engines of Battery to returne to besiege UTICA, as he had done before. He gave out this rumour through all the Countrey: to perswade his Enemies that that it was true: howbeit having called the Captaines and Petty-Captaines of his Army together, he made them privy to his intent and enterprise. He told them that both the Enemies Campes lay not farre asunder; of the which, the one of them had all their Tents and Cabins of Wood; and the building of the other Campe was all of Reeds, so that they were both easie to be burnt. Whereupon having sent for Masiniſſa and Caius Lelins to come unto him, he gave them charge about midnight to give Alarme unto Syphax Campe, and to set it on fire: and that he himselfe on the other side, would set upon the CARTHAGINIANS Campe. They two obeyed Scipios commandement, performed his will without delay, and came at the houre appointed them to assaile the NUMIDIANS Campe, and so did set the houses of Reeds on fire; which tooke fire in such sort, as the flame was immediately round about the Campe. The NUMIDIANS at the first thinking the fire had come by misfortune, ran thither straight unarmed to quench it. But when they found themselves among the Legions of the ROMANS, and that there was nothing but killing downe right, seeing themselves so compaffed in on all sides, they saw their best remedy was to flie. On the other side also, where Scipios Army was, the CARTHAGINIANS Campe was almost all burnt, and the Enemies put to flight with such cruell slaughter, that some Writers affirme, there were flaine that night about forty thousand men, aswell CARTHAGINIANS as NUMIDIANS. This great overthrow and slaughter being carried to CARTHAGE, did put the Citizens there in such a feare and terrour, that some thought best to send for Hannibal out of ITALY, and others gave advice to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BARCINIAN faction which was rich and wealthy, and altogether against the Peace-makers, they so prevailed, that they leaved a new power to begin Warre againe. King Syphax and Hafdrubal having leaved a great multitude of Footmen and Horsemen againe, renewed their Army sooner then was looked for, and came againe to pitch their Campe directly over against the Enemies. Scipio having understanding of that, would not tarry, but determined to give them Battell, whilst his men were in good heart and willing to fight. So it chanced at the first by the neareness of both their Campes, that there were certaine skirmishes: but in the end, the Armies came to joyne Battell, and the ROMANS fought with such courage and terrour, that at the first onset they made the NUMIDIANS and CARTHAGINIANS flie, and slew the most part of them. Hafdrubal and Syphax escaped, by flying out of the slaughter. Scipio sent Masiniſſa and Caius Lelins with the light Horsemen to give them chase. Syphax being come into NUMIDIA, and from thence into his own Realme and Kindome, he leaved an Army in haile of all sorts of People, and came to meet with Masiniſſa and Caius Lelins, and was not afraid to give them Battell. But it was a fond part of him, considering that he was nothing like so strong as his Enemy, neither for number of fighting men, nor yet in likelihood of Souldiers. For neither the Souldiers, nor Captaines of his Army were matchable with the Souldiers and Captaines of the ROMANS Campe: and therefore King Syphax was easily overcome by such skillfull and moreover was himselfe taken in Battell, with many other great Noble men, whom Masiniſſa would hardly have looked for: and then they were brought unto Scipio. At the first there was a marvellous joy among them, when it was told them that King Syphax should be brought Prisoner unto the Campe: but afterwards when they saw him bound they were all forry to see him in such pitifull state, remembering his former greatnesse and regall majesty. they called to minde how famous the Name of this King had been but a little before, what wonderfull great wealth he had, and also the power of so great a Realme and Kingdome. Howbeit Scipio the ROMANE Consull received him very courteously, and gently asked him what he meant to change his minde in that sort, and what moved him to make Warre with the ROMANS. Then the King remembering his former friendship and faithfull promise broken, he boldly told him, that it was the love he bare to his Wife Sophonisba, who onely had procured him to deale so dishonourably with the ROMANS: howbeit, that he had so smarted for it, as all others might take example by him, and beware how they breake their promise. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreme misery to see that his mortall Enemy Masiniſſa was so taken with that frenzy and mad humour, where-with he before was possessed. For after Syphax was overcome and taken. Masiniſſa went into CYRTHA, the chiefe City of the Realme, the which he wan, and found Sophonisba there, with whom he fell in fancy: who, after she had finely wrapped him in with her deceitfull flatteries and kindnesse, he promised her also to deliver her out of the ROMANS hands: and because he might the better performe his promise made, he took her to his Wife and married her. When Scipio was informed of these things, it grieved him marvellously. For it was known to all men, that Syphax was overcome under the conduct, and through the ROMANS meanes: and therefore all that was belonging to Syphax, was at the disposition of the ROMANS. Wherefore if Masiniſſa had without Scipios consent, undertaken to defend *Sophonisba*es quarrell, then it appeared plainly, he despised the authority of the Consull, and the majesty of the People of ROME. Furthermore, his filthy lust did aggravate his fault the more, the which seemed so much more intolerable, by how much the continency of the ROMANE Consull was the greater, the which Masiniſſa saw daily before his eyes, and might have been a patterne and example unto him. For Scipio besides many other proofes and shewes of his Vertues, in all places where he obtained Victory, he alwaies kept the Women undefiled, which were taken prisoners. So Scipio being offended with Masiniſſa, (though he shewed it not before company) received him very lovingly at his returne to the Campe: yet afterwards notwithstanding, taking him aside, he so sharply reproved him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and also a severe Captaine. Whereupon Masiniſſa went into his Tent and wept, and could not tell what way he should take: howbeit shortly after, perceiving that it was unpossible for him to keepe promise with Sophonisba, which grieved him to the heart: he sent her poyson, and a message withall; the which she dranke immediately, and so willingly made her selfe away: Furthermore, the CARTHAGINIANS after they had received such wonderfull great losses and overthrowes, one after another, perceiving that their affaires were brought to such a straight and extremity, that they were no more to looke after the enlarging of their Dominions, but onely to consider which way they might keepe their owne Countrey: they sent for Hannibal to come out of ITALIE. Who returning with great speed into AFRICK, before he did any thing else, he thought good first to talke with P. Scipio about peace: either because he was afraid of the good fortune of this young man, or else for that he mistrusted he could not otherwise helpe his Countrey and Common-wealth, which he saw decaying and like to be destroyed. Wherefore a place was appointed: where they might meet according to his desire: where when they were both met, they had long talke together about the ending of this war. In the end Scipio offered Hannibal such conditions of peace, that by them it appeared the ROMANS were not weary of warre, and that Scipio himselfe being a young man, had better hope to obtaine victory, then great desire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being set aside, they brake off their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthy Captaines of the most noble Nations that could be, prepared themselves to battell, either to give or take away in short time from their Common-wealths, the Seignory and Empire of all the world. The place where they employed all their force, and where this famous battel was fought, as it is reported, was by the City ZAMA: in the which the ROMANS being conquerours, did first make the Elephants flie, then the horsemen, and in the end brake so fiercely into the footemen, that they overthrew all the Army. It is reported, that there were flaine and taken by the ROMANS above forty thousand CARTHAGINIANS. Hannibal fled out of the fury of the battell, and saved himselfe, though that day he had shewed himselfe like a valiant and famous Captaine. For at this battell he had set his Army in better order then ever he had done before, and had strengthened it both with the commodity of the place, and relief beside: and even in the very fury and terrour of the battell he so bestirred himselfe among his souldiers, that the enemies themselves did commend and praise him for a noble Captaine. After this victory, Scipio meeting with Vormina King Syphax son, that brought aide to the CARTHAGINIANS, he put him to flight, and came and brought his Army to the Walles and Haven of CARTHAGE, thinking (as indeed it fell out) that the CARTHAGINIANS would sue to him for peace. For, as the CARTHAGINIANS before had been very good souldiers, and ready to make warres: so were they now become timorous and faint-hearted, specially when they saw their Generall Hannibal overcome, in whom they chiefly reposed all their hope and trust, for defence of their Countrey. Wherefore they being (as I have said) out of heart, sent Ambassadors unto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accustomed clemency, he would grant them peace. Now was great suite made at ROME, to have the Government of the Province of AFRICK and one of the new Consuls made haste to come and make warre, with such charge and preparation as was meet for his dignity and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that another should carry away the glory for the ending of so great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the CARTHAGINIAN Ambassadors requests. So the capitulation of the Articles of peace was offered unto the CARTHAGINIANS, according to the conquerors mind: and besides all other things, the whole Fleet of all their Ships and Gallies (in the which their hope consisted much) were taken from them. For when the whole Fleete was burnt; it was such a lamentable sight unto them all, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole City, as if CARTHAGE had been destroyed and razed to the very ground. For as some do write, there were five hundred Ships burnt of all sorts. These things therefore should make us all beware of humane frailty, the which we often forget in our prosperity. For they that before persuaded themselves to conquer the world, after they had wonne so many great battells, and victories of the enemy, and in manner conquered all ITALIE, and so valiantly besieged the City of ROME, were in short time after brought to such misery and extremity, that all their power and force being overcome, they had no more left them but the Walles of CARTHAGE, and yet they were not sure to keepe them, but through the speciall grace and favour of the enemy. After these things were done, Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not onely restore King Masiniſſa to his Realme againe, but also adding thereunto the best part of all King Syphax Countrey, they made him one of the mightiest Kings of all AFRICK: Scipio returned and afterwards he gave honourable gifts unto every man as he had deserved. In fine, after to ROME, he had set all the affaires of AFRICK at good stay, he brought his Army backe againe into ITALIE: at what time there came to ROME a world of people, to see so great and famous a Captaine, returning from such wonderfull great victories. So he entred into ROME with pompe of triumph, Terentius Culeo following him with a hat on his head, because that Scipio through his favour and friendship he was taken out of bondage. Polybius writeth, that King Syphax was led in triumph: howbeit some say he died before Scipio triumphed. Indeed divers that did triumph, some before him during the warres of the CARTHAGINIANS, and others afterwards in the warres of MACEDONIA and ASIA, they made greater shew of plate, both of gold and silver in their triumph, and led also a great number of prisoners: how-

The easyty counsell of Scipio.

The naturall love of Scipio African to his brother Lucius Scipio.

howbeit one onely Hannibal, that was overcome, and the glory of so great a warre ended, did make the triumph of P. Scipio so excellent and famous, that it far passed all the gold and magnificent pompe of all others triumphs. For after AFRICKE was conquered, no Nation then was ashamed to be overcome by the ROMANES. For he made this Province as it were a bridge and open passage to increate and enlarge the Empire of ROME, both in MACE- DON, and also in ASIA, and in other parts of the world besides. Now Scipio (whom I may rightly call AFRICAN, after the conquest of AFRICKE) being returned to ROME, he lacked no temporall dignities nor honours. For in the Counsell holden for the election of Censors, although there were divers others of the noblest houses of ROME that sued for that office, yet he himselfe, and Aelius Petus were preferred before all the rest, and after they were created Censors, they did governe in their Office like good men, and with good quietnesse. Afterwards the Censors that followed them, did still one after another chuse Scipio AFRICAN Prince of the Senate: the which dignity was wont to be given to them onely, that obtained the Type of all honour, through their great conquests and benefits done to their Countrey. Shortly after, he was againe chosen Consull with Sempronius Longus, the sonne of that Sempronius whom Hannibal overcame in that great overthrow, at the battell by the River of Trebia. They two were the first (as it is reported) that divided the Noblemen and Senators from the people, in the shew-place to see pastime. This separation was very odious to the people of ROME, and they were marvellously offended with the Consuls for it, because they tooke it, that increaseth the honour of the state of the Senators, they thereby did discountenance and imbase them. Some say also, that Scipio AFRICAN afterwards repented himselfe that he had taken away the old custome, and brought in a new. At that time there fell out great variance betwixt Masinius and the CARTHAGINIANS, touching their borders and confines. Whereupon the Senate sent Scipio thither with two other Commissioners: who after they had heard the cause of their quarrell, they left the matter as they found it, and would proceed no further in it. And this they did, because that the CARTHAGINIANS being troubled with civill warres at home, should take upon them no other warres abroad, neither should have leisure to attempt any alteration otherwise. For the ROMANES had great warre with King Antiochus, and Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN was there with him, who still stirred up the old enemies against the ROMANES, and practised to raise up new enemies against them, and in all things to counsell the CARTHAGINIANS to cast away the yoke of bondage, which the ROMANES had brought them into under the title of peace, and to prove the friendship of the Kings. Howbeit shortly after, the ROMANES having obtained victory, and driven King Antiochus out of GREECE, they intended also to conquer ASIA: and therefore all their hope was in Scipio AFRICAN as a man that was borne end warres of great importance. Howbeit Lucius Scipio and Caius Lelius were Consuls, and either of them made suite for the government of ASIA. The matter being consulted upon, the Senate stood doubtfull what judgement they should give, betwixt two so famous men. Howbeit, because Lelius was in better favour with the Senate, and in great estimation: the Senate beganne to take his part. But when P. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the elder brother of Lucius Scipio, prayed the Senate that they would not dishonour his house so, and told them that his brother had great vertues in him, and was besides very wise, and that he himselfe also would be his Lieutenant: he had no sooner spoken the words, but the Senators received him with great joy, and presently did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordained in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio should go into GREECE to make warre with ÆTOLIANS, and that from thence he should go into ASIA, if he thought good, to make make warre with King Antiochus: and also that he should take his brother Scipio AFRICAN with him, because he should go against Hannibal, that was in Antiochus Army. Who can but wonder at the love and naturall affection of Publius Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the which he first shewed from his youth unto his father Cornelius, and afterwards also unto his brother Lucius Scipio, considering the great things he had done? For, notwithstanding he was that AFRICAN by name that had overcome Hannibal, that had triumphed over the CARTHAGINIANS, and excelled all others in praise of Martiall discipline: yet of his owne good nature he made himselfe inferior to his younger brother, because he might have the honour of obtaining the Government of that Province from his fellow Consull Lelius, that was so well beloved, and of great estimation. Lucius Scipio the Consull brought great honour to his Countrey by that warre, for that he followed the sound and faithfull counsell of his brother. For first of all going into GREECE, he took truce for sixe moneths with the ÆTOLIANS, through the advice of his brother AFRICAN: who counsellled him, that setting all things apart, he should straight go into ASIA, where the warre was risist. Afterwards also he wanne Prusias King of BYTHINIA from Antiochus friendship, who before was wavering up and downe, doubtfull which side to take, and all through his brother AFRICAN's meanes and practise. So the authority of the AFRICAN was very great, and all those that would obtaine any thing of the Consull, came first to the AFRICAN to be their meane and intercessor. Now when he came into ASIA, Antiochus Ambassadors: and Heraclides BIZANTIAN, came unto him to offer to make peace, and after they had openly told their message, perceiving that they could not obtaine reasonable conditions of peace, they pri-

Great Kingdomes and wealth, are full of troubles.

Privately talked with Scipio AFRICAN, as they they were commanded, and practised the best they could to make him King Antiochus friend. For they told him, that Antiochus would send his younger son which he had taken, and furthermore that he would willingly make him his companion in the Government of all his Realme, onely reserving the name and title of a King. Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no lesse in faithfulness and bounty, then in many other vertues, after he had answered them to all other matters, he told them, that for his son he would take him for a marvellous friendly gift: and that for a private good turne, he would do the best he could to requite him with the like: Howbeit, that he would counsell the King above all things to leave off thought of war, and to receive those offers and conditions of peace which the Senate and people of ROME would offer him. Shortly after, Antiochus sent P. Scipio his son according to his promise: who (as it is reported) had been taking prisone from the first beginning of the war, as he went from CHALCIDE unto ORICUM: or as other writers say, as he passed by in a pinnace. Yet some hold opinion, that he was taken as he went to discover the counsell of the enemies, and that he was then sent againe unto his father, lying sicke at the City of ELEA. This great courtesie of King Antiochus was marvellous well thought of by the AFRICAN, and not without cause: for to see his son after he had been away so long, it did greatly lighten his spirits, and diseased body. But P. Scipio to shew some token of a thankful mind, prayed the Ambassadors that came unto him, greatly to thanke King Antiochus for the exceeding pleasure he had done him, to send him his son. Afterwards he gave Antiochus advice also, that he should not give battell, till he understood of his returne from ELEA to the Campe. So Antiochus being persuaded by the authority of so worthy a man, he kept close in his Campe for a certaine time, and determined to draw the warre out at length, hoping in the end that he might come to speak with the Consull, by the AFRICAN's meanes. But afterwards, the Consull camping hard by MAGNESIA, did so vex and provoke the enemy, that the King came out to battell, and set his men in battell ray. It is reported that Hannibal himselfe was present at the battell, being one of the Generals for the King. So Antiochus being overcome, and his Army discomfited, perceiving that there was no helpe in his affaires, he came unto the AFRICAN (who being newly recovered of his sicknesse, came to the Campe a little after the field was wonne) and by his meanes obtained of the Consull to be contented to take of peace. When Antiochus Ambassadors were come to the Campe, and had humbly craved pardon in behalf of their King, and also prayed that they would give them such conditions of peace, as they best liked of: Scipio AFRICAN with the consent of them all answered them, that it was not the manner of the ROMANES to yeeld to adversity, neither also to be proud in prosperity: and therefore that he now made him the selfe same offer and conditions of peace, which he did before the victory. That the King should not meddle with EUROPE: that he should surrender up all he had in ASIA, from the mountaine Taurus, unto the River of Tanais: that he should pay tribute twenty years together: that he should also put in such hostages as the Consull would chuse out: and that specially above all the rest, they should deliver Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN unto the Consull, who was the only author and procurer of this war. But he, as we have written in his life, perceiving that King Antiochus Army was overthrowen both by sea and by land, escaped the ROMANES hands, and went unto Prusias King of BYTHINIA. Antiochus having accepted the offers and conditions of peace, said, that the ROMANES used him very favourably, to rid him of so great a care, and to appoint him so small a Kingdome. For great Kingdomes, and overmuch wealth which every man coveteth, are full of great and sundry troubles: inso much that Theocritus words are as true, as otherwise excellently written.

*The things I wisht are neither wealth, nor Scepter, Robe, nor Crowne, Nor yet of swiftnesse and of strength to beare away renowne:
But singing with a merry heart in simple shed, to looke
A loose upon the troublous seas, that are so hard to brooke.*

So when the mighty King of ASIA was overcome, and that so great a war was so easily ended beyond all mens opinion: the Consull L. Scipio returned to ROME, and made his entry into the City, shewing a great and honourable triumph. He also deserved the surname of the Province and Countrey subdued by him. So that, as his eldest brother was called AFRICAN, for that he had conquered AFRICKE: even so was Lucius Scipio surnamed ASIAN, for conquering ASIA unto ROME. And P. Scipio through whose counsell his brother Lucius had brought his warres to happie end, he went not clear without honour also. For shortly after, two noble Censors, T. Q. Flaminius, and Marcus Claudius Marcellus chose him Prince of the Senate the third time. Now at that time, the house and family of the Scipios and Cornelians flourished with supreme degree of honour: and the authority of Scipio AFRICAN was growne to such height and greatnesse, as no private man could wish to be any greater in a free City. Howbeit the secret malice of wicked hearts, which could no longer abide his greatnesse and authority, began at length to burst out, and to light upon those that were the authors of so great things. For two tribunes of the people, suborned (as it is reported) by Porcius Cato, accused P. Scipio AFRICAN for keeping backe King Antiochus money, and because he brought it not into the common Chamber or treasury. Scipio AFRICAN knowing his innocency, being called by the Magistrate, shewed himselfe obedient, and came into the Market-place with a bold countenance, and there made an Oration, declaring what things he had done for the benefit and commodity of his Countrey and Common-wealth. The rehearsal of these things did not mislike the common people that were present : because he did it rather to avoid the danger prepared for him, then otherwise for any vaine glory or ostentation. Howbeit the Tribunes not being so contented, were vehement against him, and spared no injurious words, but accused him as though he had indeed been in fault, howbeit upon suspicion, rather then of any due prooffe. The next morning being commanded to come before them againe, he appeared at the houre appointed, and being well accompanied with his friends, he came through the whole assembly, and went up to the Pulpit for Orations. When he saw that every man kept silence, then he spake in this manner: I remember, my Lords, that on such a day as this, I was that famous victory of Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, and therefore leaving aside this contention, I thinke it good if go to the Capitol, to give God thanks for the victory. So he departed thence, and all the whole assembly followed him, not onely to the Capitol, but also to all the other Temples of the City, leaving the two Tribunes all alone with their Sergeants. That day was the very last day of the AFRICANS good fortune, for the great assembly and multitude of people that waited upon him, and for the great good will they bare him. For from that day forward he determined to get him into the Country, far from all ambition, and the company of the people : and so went unto LINTERNUM in a marvellous age, that for reward of his so great service, and so sundry benefites, as he had brought into his Country, he received but shame and reproach : or else for that indeed being (as he was) of a noble mind, he thought it more honour willingly to give place to his enemies, then to seek to maintaine his greatnesse by force so Armes. So when the Tribunes did accuse him of contempt, and that his brother Lucius did excuse his absence by reason of his sickness: Tiberius Gracchus, one of the Tribunes that was against the AFRICAN, tooke his excuse (beyond all mens opinions) for good payment, and did so well defend Scipios cause, sometimes honourably praising him, another time also threatening his enemies, that the Senate afterwards thanked him very greatly for it. For they were marvellously offended for the great injurie they did him. Some do write that P. Scipio himselfe, before he went unto LINTERNUM, did with his owne hands teare the booke his brother had brought unto the Senate, to deliver the account of his charge : and that he did it not for any deceite or pride, but with that selfe boldnesse of mind he aforetime used to the treasurers, when he did against the law require the keyes of the common treasure, to supply the present need of the State. Now some there be also that say, it was not the AFRICAN, but Scipio ASIATIC that was accused before the Tribunes : and that Scipio AFRICAN was sent in Committion at that time into THUSCAN. Who, understanding of his brothers accusation, at his returne to ROME, and finding his brother Lucius condemned, and the Sergeants waiting on him to carry him, being bound into prison, he was in such a rage withall, that he rescued his brother by force out of the Sergeants hands, and from the Tribunes of the people. And they report beside, that Tiberius Gracchus one of the Tribunes, complaining first that the authority of the Tribuneship was trode under feet by a private person, he afterwards letting fall all the malice and envy he bare unto the Scipios, defended their cause, because the Tribunes should rather seem to be overcome by a Tribune, then by a private person. They said moreover, that the selfe same day the Senate supped in the Capitol, he perswaded the AFRICAN to let Tiberius Gracchus marry his younger daughter. This promise was no sooner made, but Scipio coming hom to his house, told his wife that he had bestowed their daughter : whereupon she being angry, told him againe, that he should not have married her without consent of her mother, though he could have bestowed her upon Tiberius Gracchus. This answer liked Scipio marvellous well, when he saw that his wife was of his minde, touching the marriage of their daughter. I know it is thought of some, that it was attributed to Tiberius the sonne, and to Appius Claudius his father in law. For Polybius, and other ancient writers affirme, that Cornelia, the mother of Caius and Tiberius Gracchi, was married unto Gracchus, after the AFRICANS death. For Scipio AFRICAN was married unto Emelia the daughter of L. Paulus Emilius Consul that was slaine at the battel of CANNES. By her he had two daughters, of the which the eldest was married unto P. Cornelius Nasica, and the younger unto Tiberius Gracchus, either before or after the death of his father. Now touching his sonne, there is little mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certainty to be true. We have spoken of his younger son that was taken by King Antiochus, and afterwards frankly sent unto his father : of whom notwithstanding afterwards I finde no mention in writing, saving that some say he was afterwards Prator, and that he came to this office by meanes of Cicercius his fathers Secretarie. There appeareth in writing also, that the younger AFRICAN was adopted by the sonne of P. Scipio. Cicero in his booke intituled Cato Major saith, how weake (said he) was the sonne of P. AFRICAN that adopted thee his son? And in his sixt booke also de reipub. Emilius the father exhorteth Scipio his sonne, to follow justice and piety, as his grandfather Scipio AFRICAN had done. And touching the death of P. Scipio AFRICAN, writers do diversly vary : for some say, that he died and was buried at the gate Capena, over the which stood three statues or images, two whereof were the images of Publius and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of Q. Ennius the Poet. And surely that which Cicero wrote, seemeth to confirme it true : our Ennius, said he, was marvellously beloved of AFRICAN the great, and therefore it is thought that he was buried in Scipios Tombe. Other authors write also (and surely they agree best with the common report) that Scipio AFRICAN died at LINTERNUM, and that there he was buried at his own appointment : because his Country so unthankfully acknowledging his service, should do him no honour at his death : and that there they set him up a Tombe, and his statue upon that, the which afterwards was blown down by a tempest of wind, and the which Livy him-himselfe witnesseth he saw. Furthermore, by CAIETA this Epitaph was graven in a plate of Copper, set in a Marble Tombe.

The Epitaph of Scipio African.

Now touching the time of his death, having made great search for it, I have found in certaine Greeke Authours, that the AFRICAN lived foure and fifty yeares, and died shortly after. Furthermore he was a Noble Captaine, and worthy of all commendation for Martiall Discipline, and besides excelled in other vertue : the which did so delight his mind, that he was wont to say, he was never lesse idle, then when he tooke his ease : neither lesse solitary, then when he was alone. For sometimes he would withdraw himselfe out of the Assembly, and from all mens company, and thought himselfe safe when he was alone. The fame of his noble Deeds was so great, that wheresoever he went, all sorts of people would come and see him. The common report went, that when he was at LINTERNUM, there came certaine Rovers unto him, to see so famous a man, and to kisse that so faithfull and victorious a hand. For Vertue hath great force and power with all sorts of people : because it doth not onely make the good, but the evill also to love and honour it.

THE COMPARISON OF HANNIBAL with P. SCIPIO AFRICAN.

NOW let us Compare Hannibal and Scipios Deedes together, as touching their Civill Discipline. First, if we remember their Deedes in warres, it is manifest, that both of them have been great and famous Captaines in warre, and that they have not onely been comparable with the noblest Kings and Princes in their time (being also in that age when warres flourished most) but with those that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder much at them, that they having great and heavy enemies in their Countrey (who sought to overthrow all their doings and enterprises) could possibly go through with so great matters, and to obtaine such happy and famous Victories, in strange and forraigne warres. Therefore passing over all other matters, what adoe had Publius Scipio before he could obtaine to be sent into AFRICKE, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS? Fabius Maximus, and other Noblemen of the City greatly against it. Againe, what enemy had Hannibal of Hanno, who was Prince and head of the contrary faction against him? Now they both having overcome such great troubles at home, did notwithstanding bring things to end worthy perpetuall memory : not by chance, as it happeneth unto many ; but through their industry, great wisdom, and counsell. So divers do wonder greatly at Hannibals courage and noble mind : who after he had sacked the City of SAGUNTUS, came boldly from the farthest part of the world into ITALIE, and brought with him a great Army of Footemen and Horsemen, and came to make warre with a great State and Common-wealth, the which his predecessors always dreaded: and after he had wonne many Battells, and slaine sundry Consuls and Captaines of the ROMANES, he came and Camped hard by the City of ROME it selfe, and procured strange Kings and farre Nations to make warre with the ROMANES. He that was able to do so great things as these, men cannot otherwise thinke of him but that he was a great and valiant Captaine. Others also speaking of Scipio, do greatly praise and commend him for the foure Chieftaines he overcame, and for the foure great Armies which he defeated and put to flight in SPAIN, and also for that he overcame, and tooke that great King Syphax prisoner. In fine, they come to praise that famous Battell, in the which Scipio overcame Hannibal at ZAMA. For if Fabius (said they) were praised, because he was not overcome by Hannibal, what estimation will they make of the AFRICAN, who in a pitched Battell overcame that so famous and dreadfull Captaine Hannibal, and also did end so dangerous a warre? Besides also that Scipio did alwayes make open warre, and commonly fought with the enemy in plaine field: where Hannibal in contrary manner did alwayes use crafty and subtilty, and was full of stratagemes and policie. And therefore all Authours, both Greeke and Latine, do count him very fine and subtil. Furthermore, they greatly commend Hannibal for that he maintained this Army of so sundry Nations, so long time in peace, as he had warre with the ROMANES: and yet that there was never any mutinie or rebellion in his Campe. On the other side, they blame him againe, because he did not follow his Victory, when he had overcome the ROMANES at that famous Battell of CANNES: and also because he spoiled his souldiers with too much ease, and the pleasures of CAMPANIA and APULIA, whereby they were so changed, that they seemed to be other souldiers then those that had overcome the ROMANES, at the sundry Battells of TREBIA, THRASIMENE, and CANNES. All Writers do reprove these things in Hannibal, but specially his cruelty. For amongst other things, what cruelty was it of him to make a Woman with her Children to come from ARPI to his Campe, and afterwards to burne them alive? What shall a man say of them whom he cruelly put to death in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, when he departed out of ITALY? For Scipio AFRICAN on the other side, if we shall rather credite the best Authours that write, then a number of other detracters and malicious Writers, we may say, he was a bountifull and temperate Captaine, and not onely lively and valiant in fight, but also courteous and mercifull after victory. For oftentimes his enemies proved his valiantnesse, the vanquished his mercy and clemency, and all other men his faithfullnesse. Now therefore, let us tell you what his continence and liberality was, which he shewed in SPAIN unto a young Lady taken prisoner, and unto Lucius Prince of the CELTIBERIAN: doth it not deserve great praise? Now for their private doings, they were both virtuously brought up, and both of them embraced Learned men. For as it is reported, Hannibal was very familiar with Socilius LACEDEMONIAN, as the AFRICAN was with Ennius the Poet. Some say also, that Hannibal was so well Learned in the Greeke Tongue, that he waote an History in Greeke touching the deeds of Manlius Volso. Now truly I do agree with Cicero, that said in his Booke de Oratore, that Hannibal heard Phormio PERIPATETICIAN in EPHEsus, discoursing very largely of the office and duty of a Chieftaine and Generall, and of the Martiall lawes and ordinances: and that immediately after being asked what he thought of that Philosopher, he should answer in no very perfect Greeke, but yet in Greeke, that he had seen many old doting fooles, but that he had never seene a greater doter then Phormio. Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talke, and Hannibal had a sharpe taunting wit in his answers. When King Antiochus on a time prepared to make war with the ROMANES, and had put his Army into the field, not so well furnished with Armour and Weapon, as with Gold and silver: he asked Hannibal if he thought his Army sufficient for the ROMANES; Yea Sir, quoth he, that they be, were the enemies never so covetous. This may truly be said of Hannibal, that he obtained many great victories in the warres, but yet they turned to the destruction of his Countrey. Scipio in contrary manner did preserve his Countrey in such safety, and also did so much increase the dominions thereof, that as many as shall looke into his deserts, they cannot but call ROME unthankfull, which liked rather that the AFRICAN (perseverer of the City) should go out of ROME, then that they should repress the fury and insolency of a few. And for mine owne opinion, I cannot thinke well of that City, that so unthankfully hath suffered so worthy and innocent a person to be injured: and so would I also have thought it more blame worthy, if the City had been an aider of the injury offered him. In fine, the Senate (as all men do report) gave great thanks unto Tiberius Gracchus, because he did defend the Scipios cause: and the common people also following the AFRICAN, when he visited the Temples of ROME, and left the Tribunes alone that accused him, did thereby shew how much they did love and honour the name of the Scipios. And therefore, if we should judge the Citizens hearts and good wills by those things, men would rather condemne them for cowards to have suffered such outrage, then unthankfull for forgetting his benefits: for there were very few that consented to so wicked a deed, and all of them in manner were very sorry for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of great mind, not much regarding the malice of his enemies, was content rather to leave the City, then by civill wars to destroy it. For he would not come against his Countrey with Ensignes displayed, neither would he sollicite strange Nations and mighty Kings to come with force and their aide to destroy the City, the which he had beautified with so many spoiles and triumphs, as Martins Coriolanus, Alcibiades, and divers others did, by record of ancient stories.

Hannibals witty answer unto King Antiochus.

For we may easily perceive how careful he was to preserve the liberty of ROME, because when he was in SPAIN, he refused the title and name of King which was offered him: and for that he was marvellous angry with the people of ROME, because they would have made him perpetual Consul and Dictator: and considering also that he commanded they should set up no statue of him, neither in the place of the Assembly, nor in the judgement seate, nor in the Capitoll: all which honours afterwards were given by the Citizens unto Caesar, that had overcome Pompey. These were the civill vertues of the AFRICAN, which were great and true praises of continency. Now therefore, to deliver you the summe and effect of these things, these two so famous Captaines are not so much to be compared together in their civill Vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the discipline of warres, and in the glory of their famous Victories. To conclude, their deaths were somewhat alike: for they both died out of their Countries, although Scipio was not condemned by his Countrey as Hannibal was, but would by voluntary banishment die out of the City.

*O onely like thy selfe, the world alwayes
Admireth thy great valour, grace and wit:
And thinking to have all good parts in it,
By having thee, triumpheth in thy praise.*

Riters of Histories report that Cadmus the sonne of Agenor having taken sea out of PHOENICIA into EUROPE, by commandement of an Oracle he left the Countrey of THRACIA where he had dwelt, and came into BOEOTIA, where he had great doings against a certaine neighbor-people called SPARTANS: of whom having overcome part of them by subtilties, he made alliance with the chief of those that were left alive, and grew into such favour with them, that he drew them and their people unto THEBES, where these great men which were of noble house tooke them wives, and so had a great number of worthy men of noble race descended from them. Of which some of them were very rich men, and attained to the tipe of royall dignity: as Creon and Jocastus. Now because they were divided into two principal houses, it is hard to judge out of which of the two families of the Chronians, or Echionides, Polymnus the father of Epaminondas was descended. Some are of opinion that he came out of the house of another chief man of the SPARTANS, called Udams, from whom descended the divine nobly descended Tiresias. But howsoever it was, he descended from one of the most noble and ancient houses of the ed. THEBANS, of whom they report this notable thing: that the most part of this noble linage carried upon their body even for a naturall birth-marke from their mothers wombe, a Snake: and so did did they bear it in their Armes in device of their Scutcheons. Touching this matter, I hold the say of the Poet Enripides to be true: that the honour of noble houses falleth to decay, if once their goods faile them. For the poverty whereof some of Epaminondas ancestors made profession of vertue, seemed to be the cause that they were made final account of. Otherwise I cannot allow that the said Poet spake of, that a noble and vertuous man is no body if he be poore. For one Epaminondas onely throughly confuted this opinion, who notwithstanding he was exceeding poore, obtained nevertheless the chiefeft places of honour in the Common-wealth: for he was one of the best learned and most excellent Philosophers of the world, being Platoes follower and familiar, and the most renowned man of all the GREEKES, as appeareth by the discourse of his life. Now Polymnis had two sons, to wit, Caphisias, and Epaminondas, whom he was very careful to see well brought up and taught all the liberal and honest Sciences, especially Epaminondas, who had the most stayed wit, and best inclined to vertue, desirous to hearken and to learne, humble, obedient, and wonderfull apt and docible: and according to the discipline of the THEBANS, he learned of one Dionysius to be very skillfull in song and playing upon instruments. And as for learning, and in Philosophy chiefly, it happened well for him that he fell into good mens hands by such a meane. When the Colledges and Companies of the Pythagorian Philosophers that were disperfed through the Cities of ITALY, were banished by the faction of the Cylonians: they that kept still together, met in Council at METAPONT to determine of affaires. But some seditious persons arose against them, set fire on all parts of the house where they were, and burnt them all together, leaving Philolaus and Lyfis, who being young and lusty, saved themselves through the fire. As for Philolaus, he recovered the Countrey of the LUCANIANS, and kept there with his friends: but Lyfis went further, and got to THEBES, where when he was arrived, Polymnis received him, and prayed him to be Epaminondas Schoolemafter, who was but a young boy, but yet of good capacity, and of very great hope. This Philosopher employed his endeavour to manure this noble and quickewit of Epaminondas: and in short time made him ready and perfect in all Science and Vertue: so that it is hard to finde a more Wife, Grave, and Vertuous person then he was, of whom it is fit we should say somewhat more at large. When he was but fiftene yeares of age, he gave himselfe to all manner of exercises of the body, as to runne, wrestle, play at the weapons, and to practise all manner of Armes: and being quickly skillfull in all these, he then gave himselfe to his booke, being naturally silent, fearful to speake, but never wearied to heare, and to learne. Whereupon Spintharus the TARENTINE having been a long time with him in THEBES, said, he never spake to any man that knew so much and spake so little as Epaminondas. If he fortun'd to be in any company where there was talke of Philosophy, or of State matters, he would never from thence till he saw the matter ended that was propounded. Furthermore, he had no great liking of these darke and mystical arguments of some, that thinke to hide vertue in the obscurity of their words, but he gave himselfe wholly to the true practise thereof: though otherwise he was as pleasant a man to give a fine silent discourse, as could be possible to be found, as the disputation betwixt him and Theanor, touching poverty and riches doth witnesse, which worthily deserveth to be mentioned here, as in his proper place.

Lyfis after he had lived a long time in THEBES, died, and was honourably interred by his disciple Epaminondas, who had honoured and entertained him whilest he lived, and at his death omitted no ceremonies requisite at his funerall. Arceus, one of the chiefe of the Pythagorian Philosophers that stayed in SICILIA, understanding that Lyfis was at THEBES, through age not able to go to him: appointed by his will and testament, that they should bring Lyfis alive againe into ITALY if it were possible, or at leastwise the rest of his bones, if so it happened he were dead. The warres that fell out in the interim were a hindrance, that that could not be done so speedily. But when the wayes were open and free, the Pythagorians sent Theanor of their sect to THEBES, where he found Lyfis dead and buried: and so coming to Epaminondas, after salutations and preambles, told him before Polymnis and Caphisias, that his companions which were very rich, willed him to give Polymnis and his children a good sum of money, in recompence of their courteous entertainment which they had given to Lyfis. Whereupon after pleasant excuses made, Epaminondas concluded, that none could be received: and added further that Jason a Captaine of the THESSALIANS thought I had given him a rude and uncivill answer, when he having earnestly intreated me to take a good summe of gold which he gave me, I sent him word that he did me wrong, and began to make warre with me: for that he aspiring to make himselfe a Lord, would corrupt me with money, a plaine Citizen of a free Towne, and living under the Law. But for thee, Theanor, I commend thy good will, because it is honest and vertuous, and I love it with all my heart: but I tell thee, thou bringest physicke to men that be not sicke. Admit then that thou hearing we had been in warres, haddest brought us Armes to defend us, and then in the same place thou haddest found us quiet, and in good peace and amity with our neighbours: thou wouldest not have thought it good to have bestowed these Armes, and left them with those that had no need of them. Even so thou art come to relieve our poverty, as if it were a griefe unto us: whereas to the contrary it is an easie and pleasant thing for us to carry, and we are glad we have it in our house amongst us: and therefore we need no Armes nor money against that that doth us no hurt at all. But thou shalt tell thy brethren there, that they do use their goods very honestly: and also that they have friends here which use their poverty well. And as for Lyfis entertainment and burial, he himselfe hath fully recompensed us, having taught us amongst many other goodly things, not to be afraid of poverty, nor to be grieved to see it amongst us. After Theanor had made some reply touching the good or evil of riches, as that if poverty were not evil of it self, neither were riches to be had in contempt, and despised: No, truly said Epaminondas: yet considering with my selfe that we have a world of covetous desires of many things, some naturall as they call them, and borne with us, bred in our flesh by the lusts pertaining to it: others strange unto us, grounded upon vaine opinions, which taking a settling and habit in us by tract of time, and long use through evill education, oftentimes do plucke us down, and withdraw our souls with more force and violence, then those that be naturall unto us. For reason, by daily exercise of vertue and practise thereof, is a meane to take many of those things away from us that are borne and bred within us: yet this notwithstanding, we must use continuall force and exercise against our concupiscences that are strangers unto us, to quench them in us, and by all possible meanes to repress and subdue them. Now having made sufficient proofe of that, there is also, said he an exercise of Justice against greedy covetousnesse of getting, which is not, to go rob and rife his neighbours houses in the night, nor to rob men on the high way side, nor if any man betray his friends or his Country for money: such one doth not exercise himselfe against covetousnesse, for law possibly, or feare, brideth this covetous desire to offend any man: but that man that oftentimes willingly abstaineth from just gaires, which he may lawfully take, he it is that by continuall exercise keepeth himselfe farre off from unjust and unlawfull taking of money. For it is impossible that in great pleasures, yea wicked and dangerous, the soule should containe it selfe from coveting of them, unlesse before being oftentimes at his choice to use them, he had not condemned them. And it is not easie to overcome them, nor to refuse great riches evill gotten being offered, unlesse he had long before killed in him this covetous desire of getting, the which besides many other habitudes and actions, is still greedily bent shamefully to gaine, pleasing himselfe in the pursuit of injustice, hardly sparing to wrong another, so he in any thing profit himselfe. But to a man that disdaineth to receive liberality and gifts of his friends, and refuseth to take presents offered him by Kings, and that hath rejected the benefits of fortune, putting by all covetous desires of glittering treasure layed before him: he shall never be assailed or attempted to do that that is unjust, nor his mind shall never be troubled, but will content himselfe quietly to do any thing that is honest, carrying an upright heart, finding nothing in it but that that is good and commendable.

Polymnis father to Epaminondas. Epaminondas his vertuous inclination in his youth.

Lyfis a good son oldest brother to Epaminondas.

But his life is farre more excellent then his discourse: and as touching that, I will yet speak somewhat of it. Diomedon DYZICENIAN, at Artaxerxes request, promised to winne Epaminondas to take the PERSIANS part. To bring this to passe, he came to THEBES, and brought a great masse of gold with him, and bestowing three thousand crownes, he bribed a young man called Mycibius, whom Epaminondas loved dearly. This young man went to Epaminondas, and acquainted him with the occasion of the other mans coming to THEBES. But Epaminondas straight answered him, Diomedon being present: I have no need of money: if the King wish well to the THEBANS, I am at his commandment without taking one penny: if he have any other meaning, he hath not gold nor silver enough for me: for I will not sell the love I beare to my Country for all the gold in the world. As for thee that hast now attempted me, not knowing me, haply thinking me to be like thy selfe, I pardon thee: but get thee away quickly out of the City, lest thou seduce some other, having failed to corrupt me. And for thee Mycibius, deliver him his crownes againe: and if thou doest it not presently, I will send thee before a Justice. Thereupon Diomedon besought him he would let him go away with safety, and carry that with him he brought thither. Yes marry, said Epaminondas, but it shall not be for thy sake, but for mine honor: being afraid that if thy gold and silver should be taken from thee, some man would accuse me that I had a share in that which I refused to take openly. Then he asked him: Whither wouldest thou I should cause thee to be conveyed? Diomedon said, to ATHENS: which was done, and he had a very good convoy with him: and because he should not be troubled by the way betwixt the gates of THEBES, and the haven where he should imbarke himselfe, Epaminondas gave Chabrias the ATHENIAN charge of this man, that he should see him safe at his waies end, and so he straight returned backe again.

Now though he was very poore, yet he would never take any thing of this City or friends, he was so well acquainted with poverty, which he bare more patiently through his study of Philosophy. For on a time having the leading of an Army of the THEBANS into the Country of PELOPONNESUS, he borrowed above five crowns of a Citizen for his expences in his journey. Pelopidas being a man of great wealth, and his exceeding good friend, could not possibly ever make him take any part of his goods, but rather Pelopidas learned of him to love poverty. For Epaminondas taught him to thinke it an honour to him go plainly apparelled, to eate moderately, to take paines willingly, and to make warre lustily. But to relieve others, he would make bold to use his friends goods, and in such a case their goods were common to him. If any of his Citizens were taken prisoners with the enemy, or any friend of his had a daughter to be married, and was not able to bestow her: he called his friends together, and seised every man of them at a certaine summe, and afterwards brought him before them that should have this money, and told him how much every man had bestowed upon him, that he might thanke them all. But on a time he went far beyond this: for he sent a poore friend of his to a rich Citizen of THEBES, to aske of him fixe hundred Crownes, and to tell him that Epaminondas willed him to let him have them. The Citizen being amazed at this demand, went unto Epaminondas to know what he meant to charge him so deeply, to make him disburse these fixe hundred Crownes unto him. It is, saith he, because this man being an honest man is poore: and thou that hast robbed the Common-wealth of much, art rich. He lived so soberly, and was such an enemy unto all superfluity and excess, that being on a time invited to supper to one of his neighbors, when he saw great preparation of fine meates, baked meates, made dishes, and perfumes: he said unto him: I thought thou haddest made a sacrifice, not an excess of superfluity, and even so went his way. Even the like he spake of his own table, saying, that such an ordinary never received treason. On a time being at a feast with his peeres and companions, he dranke vineger. And when they asked him what reason he had to do so, and if it were good for his health? I cannot tell, saith he, but well I wote, it is good to put me in remembrance how I live at home. Now it was not for that his nature misliked sweet meates, that he lived thus strictly, and did love and embrace poverty, for he was marvellous high and nobly minded: but by his straight and unreprieveable life, he led, he thought to bridle many insolencies and disorders then reigning amongst the THEBANS, and to reduce them to the former temperance of their ancestors. As upon a time a Cooke giving up an account to him and his fellowes of their ordinary expences for certaine dayes, he could finde fault with nothing, but with the quantity of oile that was spent. His companions marvelling at it: Tufi, saith he, it is not the expence that offendeth me, but because they have powred in so much oile into their bodies. The City of THEBES made an open feast, and they were all of them in their banquets, feasts, and great assemblies one with the other: but Epaminondas to the contrary, he went dry up and downe the Town very sad, without being annointed with any oile of perfume, or decked with brave apparel. Some of his familiar friends met him in this estate, and wondering at him, asked him why he walked so alone, and ill apparelled through the City? Because, said he, you might in the meane time safely give your selves to drinke drunke, and make merry, taking thought for nothing. Thus have we spoken enough touching his temperance: and as for his other vertues they are most famous in armes, the which he with great good fortune and happinesse managed for the good of his Country.

Now his modesty would in no wise suffer him to seeke his advancement, but contrariwise he withdrew himselfe from Government, onely to give himselfe quietly to the study of Philosophy. Howbeit it happened that the LACEDÆMONIANS on a time prayed aide of the THEBANS, at that time being in league with them, who sent them certaine foote-bands. Epaminondas being about five and thirty years of age, armed himself, and went with the rest. Then it was that that friendship began betwixt Pelopidas and him, which constantly continued even to the end For they being both in battel-ray, the one by the other, against the ARCADIANs, whom they had in front against them in the plaine of MANTINEA, it chanced that one of the points of the battel of the LACEDÆMONIANS, in the which they were, retired, and many of them left their ranks: but they being resolute, determining rather to die then to flie, stood to it like men, untill that Pelopidas being hurt in seven places, fell down upon an heape of dead bodies: then Epaminondas though he tooke him to be but a dead man, stepped manfully before him to defend his Body and Armes, and he alone fought against many, resolved to dye in the place, rather then to leave Pelopidas among the dead men, untill that himselfe being thrust into the breast with a pike and wounded in the arme with a blow of a sword (ready to give over) by good fortune, and in a happy time, King Agessipolis came on with the other point of the battell; and saved them both. Afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS finely wanne the Castle of THEBES called CADMEA, put in a strong garrison there, and gave the government of the City unto Archias, Philippus, and Leontidas, authors of all the mischief. Whereupon to avoide their violence, Pelopidas and many others with speed fled and saved themselves, and were banished by found of Trumpet. And as for Epaminondas, they said nothing to him, but let him alone in the City: for he was contemned as a man of no reckoning, because he was so given to his booke: and if he should have had any will to have stirred against them, he could have done them no hurt for his poverty. Now whilest Pelopidas and his companions being at ATHENS, had laid a plot to free THEBES, Epaminondas making no shew of any thing, had long before devised another practise, which was, to lift up the hearts and courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they went out to play and exercise their bodies, he alwayes found a way to make them wrestle with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Afterwards when he saw the LACEDÆMONIANS fiercely throw them and give them shrewd falles, they being the stronger, he rebuked the THEBANS, and told them, it was a shame for them for want of courage to suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to set their feet upon their throats, that were not halfe so strong, rough, and boisterous as they were. All this while Pelopidas and his followers went on with their complot, and they had so good successe in their purpose, that one night they got privily into the City of THEBES, and met at Charons house, where they were to the number of eight and fourty. Epaminondas knew all well enough, and some towards night taking him aside, went about to perswade him to joyne with them in this enterprise, and to take armes with them to set upon these tyrants: marvelling much, that he would be so backward, the liberty of his Country standing upon it. He answered, that he had taken order with his friends and Gorgidas, that they should put themselves in readinesse upon any occasion; howbeit that he would put none of his Citizens to death, unless they were condemned by law: yet if you will make an attempt for delivery of the City, so it be without murder, and shedding the blood of the Citizens, I will helpe you (said he) with all my heart. If you will not believe me, but persevere in your determination, I pray you let me alone, pure and undefiled with the blood of my Citizens, and so blamelesse to attend occasion, whereby I may justly take hold of that which may turne to the good of the Common-wealth: for the murder that will be committed, cannot possibly be contained with.

within reasonable bound. I do certainly believe that Pherecides and Pelopidas peradventure will specially set upon the authors of the Tyranny: but Eumolpidas and Samiadas, both cholericke and fierce men, taking the liberty of the night, they will never lay down their Armes, nor put their swords up into their sheathes, before they have filled all the City with murders, and slaine divers of the chief peronages. Moreover, it is very convenient for the people of THEBES, that some be left free, and blamelesse of this murder, and guiltlesse of all that shall be done in this fury of action: for so the people shall least suspect that we give any encouragement to their rising, although to good end. Notwithstanding all this the enterprise was executed, and the tyrants put to death, the City restored to her ancient liberty, and the Castle of CADMEA rendred up by composition, and Lyfandridas the LACEDÆMONIAN, and other commanders within, suffered to depart, with safety of their goods and the souldiers.

These were the beginnings of the long warres of the LACEDÆMONIANS against the THEBANS, with whom the ATHENIANS joynd in league. For Epaminondas, he quietly gave himselfe to his booke: notwithstanding he was put forward by Pamienes, a principall man of THEBES, and he beganne to follow the warres very hotly, and in divers encounters made great proofe of his wisdom, hardinesse and valour: insomuch that by degrees he attained at the length to the highest charges of Government in the Common wealth. And his Citizens having made no further reckoning of him, being a man of forty yeares old: after that they came to know him, and had trusted him with their Army, he saved the City of THEBES that was like to have been undone, and freed all GREEKS from the servitude and bondage of the LACEDÆMONIANS: making vertue as in a clear light shine with glory, shewing her effects when time serveth. Furthermore, Agessilas being entred into BOEOTIA with an Army of twenty thousand footmen, and five thousand horse, preyed and spoiled all the plaine Countrey, and presented the THEBANS in open field that which they would not accept, finding themselves the weaker: howbeit they defended themselves so well, through the aide of the ATHENIANS, and of the wise conduction of Epaminondas and Pelopidas, that Agessilas returned home with his Army. But after he was gone, the THEBANS went with their Troopes before the City of THESPIES, where they surprized and put to the sword two hundred men of the Garrison, and afterwards gave divers assaults one upon another unto the wall; and seeing their labour lost, they returned with their Army back againe to THEBES. Howbeit Phabidas the LACEDÆMONIAN, he that had taken the Castle of CADMEA by treason (whereupon rose all this warre that followed) and was then governour of THESPIES, made a fallly out of the Towne, and rashly went to give a charge upon the THEBANS in their retreat, where he lost five hundred of his men, and himself was slaine in the field. Not long after, the LACEDÆMONIANS with the selfe same power returned againe to make war with the THEBANS, who having won certaine streights and places of advantage, so blocked up the way, as they could not over-runne the Country, and spoile it as they had done before. Nevertheless, Agessilas had so harried and troubled them, that by little and little they came to a maine battell, which held very long and cruel. Now though Agessilas at the first had the better, yet the THEBANS charged him so hotly, that at the length he himselfe was hurt, and constrained to retire. being well payed for teaching the THEBANS military discipline. And this was the first time that the THEBANS knew themselves to be as strong and lusty as the LACEDÆMONIANS: whereupon they triumphed in sign of victory, and from that time forwards they waxed more courageous to make head against the enemy, and to present them battell. But the onely thing that did most encourage them, was the presence of Epaminondas, who counselled, commanded, and executed very wisely, valiantly, and most fortunately. A certaine time after that they went with a great number of good chosen men before ORCHOMENE, where they prevailed not, because there was a strong Garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that sallied out upon them to give them battell, which was very sharpe between them. And yet, albeit the LACEDÆMONIANS were many against one, the THEBANS gave them the overthrow, which never happened to them before: but what Nation forever they had been, they thought they had done a great feat, if with a greater number by many, they had overcome a small number of the LACEDÆMONIANS. But this victory, and the encountering of TEGYRE, where the THEBANS obtained another victory under the conduct of Pelopidas, lit up their hearts on high, and made their valour more famous then before.

The next yeare following, Artaxerxes King of PERSIA, meaning to make warre in EGYPT, and therefor to retaine divers strangers, determined to appease the warres against the GREEKES, in hope that they bring at peace, would more easily be contented that souldiers should be leaved in their Country: and thereupon sent his Ambassadors to all the Townes of GREECE, to perswade and intreate them to be at peace together. The GREEKES were very willing to hearken unto it, being wearied of all sides with so long a warre, and were easily drawne to treat of peace: whereby it was especially agreed and concluded, that all the Cities of GREECE should be free, and use their owne lawes; and Commissioners were sent all about to withdraw the Garrisons in every place where any was kept. Unto this the THEBANS onely refused to agree, that every Towne should by it selfe severally capitulate under the City of THEBES. Thereunto the ATHENIANS mightily opposed themselves, and there was one of their Orators called Calistfratus, that touching this matter made a notable Oration before the Assembly of the States of GREECE. And Epaminondas on the other side also, made a wonderful and vehement oration in defence of the right of the THEBANS: in so much as this controversie was left undecided, and the Treaty of peace was universally agreed and concluded amongst all the other GREEKES, the THEBANS onely excepted, who were not comprized within the Treaty. So through the motion of Epaminondas, they were bold to withstand the decrees of the rest of GREECE. For the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS that many years before had contended for the principality of GREECE, made then division together: so that the one should command by sea, and the other by land. Thus they could not like in one wife, that the THEBANS should aspire to be chief, and therefore they sought to dismember the other Townes of BOEOTIA from the City of THEBES. And the rather for that the THEBANS being strong and lusty of body, and encouraged for that of late they had oftentimes beaten the LACEDÆMONIANS, would strive with them for the superiority of GREECE by land, but especially they had a wonderful confidence in the wisdom and prowesse of their Captains, but specially of Epaminondas. Matters resisting thus doubtful, the Citizens of PLATÆES, a Town of BOEOTIA, desirous to be at league with the ATHENIANS, they sent to request some souldiers of them, promising to put the Towne into their hands. The governors of the Country of BOEOTIA having intelligence of it, desirous to prevent the Garrison of the ATHENIANS, brought a Troope of souldiers against them, and they all came before PLATÆES, before the Townsmen had any knowledge of their coming: in so much that part of them were surpris'd in the fields by the horsemen, and the other fled into the Town. But having no body to aide them, they were compelled to receive and accept such composition as it pleased the THEBANS to grant them: which was, to leave their Town, and to go sately with baggage and baggage, never to returne againe into the Country of BOEOTIA. After this, the THEBANS razed the City of PLATÆES to the ground, and had the sacke of the Town of THEBES, enemy unto them. All the GREEKES solicited againe by the Ambassadors of PERSIA, thought it good to make a general peace, and so assembled the Commissioners of all the Towns at SPARTA. Epaminondas that was yet scarce known, because he loved not to shew himselfe, and in all his exploits of war he had ever preferred the advancement of his great friend and companion in Arms Pelopidas, before himself: yet famous among the GREEKES for his great knowledge and experience, was sent thither by the THEBANS. Epaminondas finding that the other commissioners did lean to Agefilas, began to speak boldly and plainly, and made an oration, not only in the THEBANS behalfe, but for all GREECE also: making them plainly see, that war did still increase the greatnesse of the City of SPARTA onely, and keep all the rest of the Townes of GREECE under. Therefore he gave counsell to all to establish a firme peace indifferently betwixt them, that thereby it might have the longer continuance, when all comprized within the contract should be equals. Agefilas perceiving all the GREEKES assisstant at this assembly, to give very attentive ear unto him, and to be tickled, bearing him speak so freely of peace: he asked him aloud if he thought it just and reasonable, that all the BOEOTIA should be set at liberty. Epaminondas on the other side, did presently and boldly aske him againe, if he thought not also that it was just and reasonable, that all LACONIA should be set at liberty. Thereupon Agefilas in anger stood up on his feet, and commanded him to answer plainly, if they should not restore all the Province of BOEOTIA to her liberty. Epaminondas returned the self same speech again unto him: if they should not also put that of LACONIA in her liberty. This did so anger Agefilas, besides that it did him good to have this colour for an old grudge he bare unto the THEBANS, that forthwith he put the names of the THEBANS out of the list of those that should be comprized within the peace, and immediatly proclaimed open war against them. But this being done had evil successe afterwards, and by reason of the suddaine and rash enterprize of the LACEDÆMONIANS, it turned to their utter overthrow. For the THEBANS, there was no remedy but they must bear the whole brunt alone: for there was not a Towne that durst send them any aide, because they were all agreed and sworn to this peace, in so much as every one thought them utterly cast away and undone. Many pittied their estate, and they that loved them not, rejoiced: they made so full account, that the LACEDÆMONIANS should find nothing that could stand before them.

So the LACEDÆMONIANS made King Cleombrotus march with his Army towards THEBES: and being come neare to CHERONEA with ten thousand footmen and a thousand horse, he pitched his Campe there to stay for the rest of his Allies. The THEBANS having intelligence of the approach of the enemy, chose Epaminondas to be Captaine Generall, giving him charge of this war, with six other Counsellors, whom they call Baotarches, as who would say, Governors of BOEOTIA, to be of his counsell, and to assist him. Now there came Oracles to the THEBANS from all parts: some promising victory, others threatening overthrow. He commanded them to set those on the right hand of the chaire for Orations, that promised victory: and those that threatened overthrow, on the left hand. They being thus disposed of, he got up to the chaire for Orations, and said to the THEBANS: If you will be obedient to your Capitaines, and courageous of heart to encounter your enemies, these here (shewing the good Oracles on the right hand) are yours: but if for faint hearts you refuse danger, those there (shewing the bad on the left hand) shall be for you. Thereupon encouraging all the THEBANS names that were of age to bear Armes, and of some parts of BOEOTIA those that he thought fittest for wars: word was brought him that a very honest and valiant man of his person died in his bed. O Hercules, said he, what had this man leisure to dye in all these troubles? His presence rejoiced, and made all his Army lively: also all the time he was Captaine of the THEBANS, they never saw any of these terrors happen in this Campe without manifest cause, which they call call suddaine feares. He was wont to say, that there was no death more honest then to die in the wars: and that the body of a souldier should not onely be kept in exercise like the Champions that fight for mattery, but rather more hardened to endure any labour or paines meet for a good souldier. And therefore he could not abide very fat men, but cashiered a whole band of them for that cause onely: saying, that scarce three or foure targets could cover so great a belly, as did keep him that he could not see his own privities. So he drew his Army out of THEBES, having in all but six thousand fighting men. Even as they were marching away out of THEBES, divers of the souldiers thought they had had many unlucky signes. For as they were going out of the Gates, Epaminondas met on his way a Herald, that following an ancient ceremony and custome of theirs, brought an old blinde man as if he had been runne away, and the Herald crying out aloud, Bring him not out of THEBES, nor put him not to death, but carry him back again, and save his life. The old men took this meeting and cry for an evil sign: but the young men kept silence, and spake never a word, for fear it should be thought that their hearts failing them, they would seek to dissuade Epaminondas from going the journey he had undertaken. And he himself, unto some that made bold to tell him, that it were well done before he went any further, to consider first what successe the flying of the birds did promise unto him, answered in this verse of Homer.

It is a happy signe, to fight for his Country.

Such a present and franke resolution stopped the mouths of all those that were not very constant. But there happened yet another signe worse then the first. For there went a Secretary before him carrying a javeling, unto the which was tyed a scroll, to make the souldiers know that they should do what the General commanded them. The wind rose and blew of this scroll and carried it away, tiding it upon the square pillar that stood upon a Tombe of certain LACEDÆMONIANS, and PELOPONNESIANS that had been slain in that place when Agefilas brought his Army thither. All there came againe certaine old men unto him to speake with him perswading and protesting that he ought not to go any further with his Army, since the gods were so manifestly against it. All this notwithstanding he never ceased to march with his Campe, thinking that the conscience and resolution to fight in a good cause, ought to be much stronger and of more force to put him in good hope, then these evil signs that appeared, to make him mistrust the worst. And as in marching to meet with the LACEDÆMONIANS they heard it thunder: they that were neare unto him, asked him, what that thunder meant? That, said he, betokeneth that the enemies braines are troubled and astonished: seeing they having hard by them so commodious places, to Campe in, they now lye encamped where they are. Indeed they halted, staying for divers of their Allies that came not: all of them having at better leisure considered of the discourse Epaminondas made in SPARTA in open assembly of all the Commissioners of every Towne, against the ambition of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Epaminondas therefore applying to good purpose at that time all the goodly discourse he had learned by the study of Philosophy, for the present time the common people blamed him much: but after the fortunate successe of his intention, every man then judged him to be a man ripely understanding the duty of a wise and valiant Chieftaine of warre. For making his Army march with speed, he wanne the straights hard by the City of CORONEA, and Camped there. Cleombrotus on the other side, understanding that the THEBANS had gainted that passage, despairing he could not passe that way, made his Army go a great compass about the Country of PHOCIDE: and marching along the sea side in a very troublous and dangerous way, at the last he pierced into the Country of BOEOTIA without any danger. And as he went also he robbed in little Townes, and certaine Gallies that lay along that coast, and in the end arrived at LEUCTRES: and there sate downe to refresh his men a little, over-wearied with travell in their journey. The BOEOTIANS marched presently that way to meet with them, and so passing over some little mountaines, they discovered them in the plaine of LEUCTRES, which did amaze them, seeing so great an Army.

The Baotarches thereupon came together to consult whether they should go forward, and to fight one against many: or else retire, and finde out some better place of advantage. In this Counsell their opinions fell out to be equal: for three of them thought it good to retire: the other three with Epaminondas, said, they must tarry and fight. So the conclusion of this counsell being doubtful, and the Baotarches disagreeing, Pelopidas Captaine of the holy band came to them, who was of the second opinion: so that they all agreed together to put it to the hazard of battell. But Epaminondas seeing their souldiers afraid through the superstition of these signes, devising by some like remedy to put this mistrust out of their heads: to bring this to passe, some being newly come from THEBES, he willed them to say and give it out every where, that no man could tell at THEBES what was become of the Armes that hung up in Hercules Temple: but that the voice was all the Towne over, that the ancient demigods their ancestors had come and taken them away, for the aide of their descendants at this present time. He suborned another also, that gave it out he was newly come from Trophonius truncke or hole, and that the god which giveth the Oracles in the same, commanded him to tell the BOEOTIANS that after they had overcome their enemies in the plaine of LEUCTRES, they should celebrate yearly playes in the honour of Jupiter. And thereof it came that the BOEOTIANS long time after that did yearly celebrate a feast, which is made in LEBADIA. Now to end the painting of this artificiall device, Leandrus a SPARTAN, being a banished man out of his Country, and fighting at that time for the BOEOTIANS, being being brought before the souldiers, whom they encouraged to fight like men the day of the battell: he did sweare unto them that the LACEDÆMONIANS had an ancient Oracle, that said they should lose their principality, when they should be overcome by the THEBANS in a pitched field, in the plaine of LEUCTRES. It is true indeed that the LACEDÆMONIANS had had many Oracles and forewarnings to bid them beware of the anger of LEUCTRES: but the common people understood not what this warning meant, but were deceived by the equivocation of the word: for that there were three LEUCTRES: to wit, in LACONIA, ARCADIA, and BOEOTIA. Howbeit, the vision of Pelopidas, whereof is made large mention in his life, and the sacrifice he made of the young Filly that came into his Campe, confirmed all the former inventions, and made them bold that were most discouraged. Adding withall, that Epaminondas having assembled all his Army, beganne to encourage them with these strong and lively reasons to shew their valour: inasmuch, that being freed from this superstitious feare, they longed for nothing more then to come to blowes. Epaminondas ever concluded all his Orations in this manner: O worthy men, embrace sacred death, advancing your selves to the most honourable and famous fight for your Country, for the Tombs of your Ancestors, and for the holy things. Even at the same time came to the THEBANS an aide of five hundred horse, and fiftene hundred footmen THESSALIANS, conducted by Jason, who practised with both sides to make peace for certaine dayes, telling them he was not wise that feared not the events. Some judge it was not at that time that Jason travelled betwene them both, but rather it was after the journey of LEUCTRES. Howbeit, I have followed that which Diodorus the SICILIAN writeth, as a thing most likely. Now as Cleombrotus retired with his Army out of BOEOTIA, he met with a great supply of naturall LACEDÆMONIANS, and some of their Allies, brought to him by Archidamus, Agesilaus sonne. The LACEDÆMONIANS seeing the THEBANS so resolute, and fearing their desperate boldnesse: sent these two Troops the easilier to daunt the courage of their enemies. These two being joyned together they were ashamed to be afraid of the BOEOTIANS, and whether it was that the truce taken was neare expired, or that they forced not of it, they returned on the suddaine againe into the plaine of LEUCTRES fully bent to fight. The BOEOTIANS also for their part shrunke not an inch backe, and so on both sides they set their men in order of battell. For Epaminondas, he set his battell after a new fashion, never before shewed by any other Captaine. For having chosen out of his Army the best men and valiantest souldiers he had, he placed them together in one of the points of his battell, where he should be himselfe and fight in person, seconded with Pelopidas, with his three hundred chosen men, called the holy band: and in the other corner he placed his weaker men, commanding them expressly not to abide the charge of the enemies that should come to assaile them in front, but faire and softly to retire when they saw them come neare them. So the matter fell out as he wished: and he hoped to determine the battell by the vertue and prowesse of that point where he had placed all the flower and choise of his Army.

Now the signe to fight being given, the LACEDÆMONIANS marched of even hand with the two horns of their battell, ordered in forme of a Cressant. On the contrary part, one of the Wings of the battell of the BOEOTIANS beganne to give backe, and the other with great fury ranne to charge the enemy in the flank: straight they were both come to the sword together. And at the first, because either side fought very desperately, the victory was doubtfull for a certaine time: but at the length Epaminondas Troopes brake in amongst the LACEDÆMONIANS, and killed the most part of them that were about King Cleombrotus. So long as the King was alive, he kept backe the THEBANS from victory, because he was accompanied with all the most valiant men of his Army, valiantly fighting about him. But after he fell downe dead on the ground, having received an infinite number of wounds, and stricken downe many of his enemies: then they thronged together on all sides, and there was a cruell fight about his body, where there were heapes of mens bodies slaine one upon another. And although Epaminondas did sharply follow this point, yet the LACEDÆMONIANS made such resistance at the last, that they did a little repulse the BOEOTIANS and cleared the body of their King out of the presse and multitude: but that held not long. For Epaminondas through his persuasions did so lift up the hearts and courage of his men, that they gave a second and so fierce a charge upon them, that they wholly overthrew the LACEDÆMONIANS, and made them flie for life. Then Epaminondas fiercely pursuing the flying enemies, made great slaughter, and wanne one of the most glorious victories that ever Captaine did: having in a pitched field overcome the most noble and warlike Nation of all GREECE, with a farre smaller number of men then his enemies had. Also he rooke more glory of that above all his other exploits, and specially because it hapned unto him in his father Polymnis life time. And oftentimes he had these words up in his mouth: that of all the honest and happy fortunes that ever chanced unto him, nothing joyed his heart more, then that he vanquished the LACEDÆMONIANS at the battell of LEUCTRES, his father and mother that begat him being both alive. And to say truly, he that day preserved the life of his father and mother, and of his whole Country besides: for the LACEDÆMONIANS were fully resolved utterly to destroy the THEBANS. Now heiving at all other times to shew himselfe amongst them, fine and neat, with a pleasant countenance: the next day after after the battell at LEUCTRES he came out openly very sad, heavy and pensive. Whereupon his friends asked him presently if he had heard any evil newes, or some misfortune had happened to him. None, said he, but I perceived by my selfe yesterday, that overjoyed with the victory that I obtained, I lift up my selfe more then became me: and therefore to day I correct this joy, which yesterday was too exceeding in me. He knowing that it was the manner of the SPARTANS to hide and cover (as well as they could possible) all such misfortunes: desirous openly to expresse and shew the greatnesse of the losse they had sustained, he would not suffer them to carry away their dead bodies by great all together, but every City one after another: and so by this meanes it appeared that there were above thousand LACEDÆMONIANS slaine. Some make the number of the dead to be greater, and say they were foure thousand naturall LACEDÆMONIANS, but that must be understood of them and their Allies: and of the BOEOTIANS, there were not above three hundred or thereabouts found dead. This battell of LEUCTRES was stricken at the beginning of the second year of the hundred and second Olympiade.

The LACEDÆMONIANS having at that battell lost the greatest part of their honour and greatnesse, which men had seene before in their estate, lost not their courage for all this: but to keepe their youth still in heart, and to take away all feare which had possessed them that had escaped from this overthrow, Agesilaus entred ARCADIA with an Army, and was contented to take a small Towne of the MANTINEANS, and to prey and spoile the Country: which done, he returned home againe. Some thinke that this was the cause that brought Epaminondas into LACONIA. Othersome report it otherwise, and say that Agesilaus would not suffer the MANTINEANS to re-edifie their City. And there be that are of another opinion, which is: that Lycomedes Captaine of the ARCADIANS having made a rode hard to ORCHOMENE, he slew upon an encounter Polytropus Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and had two hundred SPARTANS with him, his purpose being to winne ORCHOMENE: and there upon they finding themselves too weake to stand against the LACEDÆMONIANS, they sought the alliance and aide of the THEBANS. Howsoever it was, the LACEDÆMONIANS and ARCADIANS being enemies, by reason of their chiefe City of MANTINEA: that was the cause the THEBANS joyned with the ARCADIANS, and being followed with their Allies, led by Epaminondas, they entred into LACONIA with an Army of fourty thousand men of warre, and with thirty thousand others that followed the Campe. The ATHENIANS sent Iphicrates Captaine with twelve thousand men to aide the SPARTANS: but before his coming Epaminondas entred into LACONIA in divers places, and sacked all the whole Country, which had not been laid wait by an enemy in fixe hundred yeares space before, when the DORIANS came to inhabit there. The SPARTANS seeing their Country waited and destroyed before their eyes, were desirous to go out with all the force they could make: but Agesilaus would not suffer them, telling them how dangerous it was to leave the City, to set upon such a mighty enemy. So they were quiet, and Epaminondas in the meane space descended the mountaine Taugete with his Army, towards the River of Eurotas, the which at that time was risen very high by reason of the Winter. He sought what he could to draw Agesilaus to fight, who beholding Epaminondas a great while, marching in battell ray alongst the River side at the head of his Troopes: he wondred at his boldnesse and valour, but would by no meanes come out of his fort. Inasmuch as after this Army had preyed and foraged all LACONIA, Epaminondas led them backe againe laden with booty. And though Agesilaus had wonne himselfe great honour for his wisdom, in looking to the safety of his City: yet Epaminondas had made his Country so poor with the former losses sustained, especially at the overthrow at LEUCTRES: that SPARTA could never afterwards recover that losse againe, nor grow into that reputation and power it had before. Furthermore, notwithstanding all the aide of the ATHENIANS, and the experience of Iphicrates, Epaminondas returned with his whole Army as he came. And the more to keepe the LACEDÆMONIANS still under their feete, and to heape new troubles upon them: he gave counsell to the ARCADIANS and other their Allies, to re-edifie and replenish the City of MESSINA with new inhabitants again, which the LACEDÆMONIANS had long before that destroyed. All the whole counsel giving their consents unto it, he made diligent inquiry forthwith to seek out all those that till that time had been ancient inhabitants in MESSINA: and in the space of fourescore and five dayes having re-edified the ruined houses, he set on foote againe one of the noblest and most ancient Cities of GREECE, and left there a strong Garrison: for the which he was as much esteemed and rather more then for any other service he had ever done.

The LACEDÆMONIANS being lightened of a marvellous great feare, made an agreement with the ATHENIANS, and left them the chiefe command by sea, reserving to themselves that by land. Afterwards through the aide of the ATHENIANS, and the supply that was sent unto them out of SICILIA, they wanne their Townes againe by little and little. The ARCADIANS to stop their course, assaulted the City of PALLENE in LACONIA, put all the garrison there to the sword, razed the Towne, and preyed on all the Country thereabout: and doubting that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be revenged, they prayed aide of the THEBANS, who sent Epaminondas thither and the other Boeotarches, with six thousand foot men, and five hundred horse. The ATHENIANS having intelligence thereof, sent their Army before under the leading of Chabrias, who marched directly to CORINTH, and there had supply of souldiers of the MEGARIANS, PALLONIANS, and

and CORINTHIANS; so that he had made up a Regiment of ten thousand men. And afterwards the Army of the LACEDÆMONIANS and of their Allies, being arrived at the very place of CORINTH, they made all together the number of twenty thousand fighting men. So they determined to repaire and fortifie all the passages and entrances into the Country of PELOPONNESUS, to stop the passage of the BOEOTIANS. And beginning from the City of CENCREES unto the haven of LECHUM, they shut and blocked up all the wayes from the one sea to the other, with mighty great peeces of timber a crosse, and with a marvellous deepe ditch. And this great peece of worke was followed with such speed, both by meanes of the great multitude of people, as also through the goodwill of those that laboured it hard: that they had finished and done all before the BOEOTIANS could arrive there. Epaminondas at his coming having diligently viewed and considered this fortification, perceived that the easiest way to be forced, was that which the LACEDÆMONIANS themselves kept. So he sent to give them defiance, though they were thrice as many men in number as his own. For all this that they had the defiance, they durst not come out, but kept them close under this fortification, which receiving certaine assaults, they were repulsed. Now all of them doing their best endeavour, being occupied, some assailing, other defending, Epaminondas chose out the best men in all his Army, and lustily charging the guard of the LACEDÆMONIANS enforced them to give him way, and in despite of them he entered into PELOPONNESUS, which was a wonderful and memorable exploit of all others. From thence he marched towards the Cities of EPIDAUROS and TROEZEN, and so forraged all the Country: howbeit he could take none of the Townes, because they were defended with strong Garrisons. Nevertheless he put SICYONE, PHEUNTE, and some other Townes in such feare, that they yielded themselves unto him. That being done, he went to CORINTH, and there overcame the CORINTHIANS in a set battell, and beate them home fighting even to the walls of their City. There were some of his men so rash, and presuming of their valour, that they entered hand over head with those that fled, even within the Gates of their City: which put the CORINTHIANS in such a terrible feare, that they ranne with all speed possible to get their houses over their heads. Chabrias beate them out againe, and killed some of them. Whereupon he caused a token of triumph to be set up, as if it had been an overthrow. Epaminondas laughing him to scorne for it, said he should not call it a Trophée, or token of triumph, but rather Hecatestes, as one would say, a statue of Proserpina: because in time past they commonly set this image of Proserpina at the first Gallows they found before the Gate of any City. The BOEOTIANS therefore came on with their battell as neare unto CORINTH as they could, and Chabrias with his Troops Camped without in a very strong place of advantage for him: so there were many skirmishes between them, in the which Chabrias shewed such valour, that he won great fame and reputation even of Epaminondas himselfe. Who being asked on a time whom he thought the greatest Capitaine, himselfe, Chabrias, or Iphicrates: It is hard to judge, said he, whilst we are all alive. Another brought him word that the ATHENIANS had sent an Army againe into PELOPONNESUS, furnished with new Armors. Well, answered he, doth Antigenidas weep when he knoweth that Tellin hath new Flutes? This Tellin was a very bad player of the Flute, and Antigenidas excellent good and skilfull. Touching the supply of this Army, they were ten thousand SPANIARDS and GAULES, whom Dionysius the Tyrant sent out of SICILIA to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, having paid them for five moneths. They had served reasonably well in this war, and so in the end of Summer returned home againe.

Now it fortuned in these last encounters, that Epaminondas having forced the LACEDÆMONIANS that stood to the defence of the fortification above mentioned, and having them in his power to have slaughtered a great number of them at his will: he contented himselfe onely with his glory, that in despite of them he had entered into PELOPONNESUS, and fought to do them no more hurt: which gave those occasion that did envy his glory to blame him, and to accuse him of treason, as having willingly spared the enemies, because they should particularly thanke him onely. But now that we have begunne to speake of this matter, we must see how he behaved himselfe among his Citizens, and the wisdom he used in defence of his integrity. Among all those that could not endure the glory of his vertues, was Menecides the Oratour, and eloquent man, but withall most wicked and malicious. He finding that Epaminondas wanne such honour by warres, never left perswading the THEBANS to embrace peace, and to preferre it before warre: because they should not live always under the obedience and command of one man. Epaminondas told him one day in open counsell: Thou wilt deceive the THEBANS, going about to counsell them to leave warres: and highly commending ease, thou goest about to put iron bolts upon their feet. For warre begeth peace, the which cannot hold long but among those that know how to seeke and keepe it with the edge of the sword. Then speaking to the Citizens: If ye will have the principality and command of all GRECE, before all others: you must shrowd your selves in your Tents and Pavilions in the open field, and not follow Games and Wrestlings here at home. Also he knew well enough that the BOEOTIANS spoiled and undid themselves by ease and idleness: which was the cause that he constantly bare this minde to keep them continually in warres. Whereupon when time came that they fell to choosing of Captaines, and that they went about to chuse him Baeotarche: he said to the Citizens: My masters, I pray you consider of it, now you are at leisure, before you chuse me: for I tell you plainly, if I be chosen your Capitaine, you must to the warres. He called the Country of BOEOTIA, which is all plaine Champion, the scaffold of war: saying it was impossible to keep it, unless the inhabitants had their Targets on their armes, and their swords in their hands.

hands. This was not because he did not love peace, and solitarie to study Philosophy, and that he was not more fearful of them he had in his charge then for himselfe, using alwayes to watch and forbear his meat, when the THEBANS were at their banquets and feasts giving themselves to all pleasure: but he knew them well enough, and he was never more careful of any thing, then to keep his Army from idleness. For on a time the ARCADIANs intreating that his troopes might enter into one of their Towns, to lie dry there in covert all the Winter, he would by no means yeeld to it. For now (said he to his souldiers) that they see you exercise your selves in Arms, they wonder at you as brave and valiant souldiers: but if they should see you at the fire side parching of Beans, they would esteeme no better of you then of themselves. No more could he endure covetousnesse: for if sometime he gave his men leave to go a booting, his meaning was, that whatsoever they got should be bestowed in furnishing of Armes. For if any man went about to fill his purse with money, he thought him unworthy to be a souldier. As on a time when he perceived that his Target-bearer had received a great sum of money for the ranome of a prisoner, he said unto him: Give me my Target, and go thou thy wayes, and buy thee a Taverne to lead the rest of thy life there: for I perceive thou wilt no more like an honest man put thy selfe in danger in the wars, as before thou hast done, because thou art now rich and wealthy. Now Epaminondas being such a one as you have heard, Menecides notwithstanding would never cease controuling of him: and one day he went so far as to reproach him that he had no children, that he was not married, and that he magnified himselfe more then ever King Agamemnon had done. Epaminondas answered him, thou hast nothing to do to counsell me to marry: for in that respect there is never a man here in all this counsell whom I would lesse use then thou. And this he spake, because the other was suspected to be an adulterer. And where thou thinkest that I do envy the glory and fame of Agamemnon, thou art foully deceived: yet I tell thee he was not a little troubled to win a Town in ten years: where I to the contrary putting the LACEDÆMONIANS to flight in one day, have delivered our City and all GRECE from them. But thanks be to you, my Lord THEBANS (speaking to all the whole assembly) through you I did it, and overthrew and ruined the power and government of our enemies. Nevertheless, Pelopidas and he were very civil recompensed for this good service of theirs: for at their returne from LACONIA, they with some other of the Baeotarches were accused, for that after the time of their charge and government was expired, they had kept it foure moneths beyond the time the law had appointed them. With much ado Pelopidas was absolved: but Epaminondas willed his companions to lay all the fault upon him, as being forced unto it by his authority: and that for his part his words could be no better this deeds. So upon this he being called before the Judges, and after he had justified that he had passed the time limited of his authority: in stead of excusing himselfe, he went and told bravely his worthy exploits he had done in this journey at that time: adding withall, that he was willing and ready to die, so they caused his condemnation to be written upon the pillar of his Tombe, to the end the GREKES should understand that they had put Epaminondas to death, because he had compelled the THEBANS, against their wills to burn the Country of LACONIA, the which in five hundred years before had never once been spoiled: that he had restored the City of MESSINA with inhabitants againe, two hundred and thirty years after the LACEDÆMONIANS had laid it wast: that he had brought all the people and Towns of ARCADIA to be as one body in league together, and had set all the GREKES at liberty: and all these things, said he, we did in our journey. The Judges understanding this worthy and true defence, they all rose from their seats and laughed a good, and would never take their bals to ballot against him.

But as for his second accusation, that he had shewed favour unto the LACEDÆMONIANS for his own particular honour, he would make no answer before the people of THEBES to this false imputation, but he rose out of the Theater, and passing through the assembly walked into the parke of exercises. The people being in uproare against him, made no choise of him againe as they were wont to do, although there was no great need: but created other Baeotarches to go into THESSALY. And the more (as they thought) to despise Epaminondas, they commanded him to go that voyage as a private souldier: the which he refused not, but went very willingly, and upon this occasion. Pelopidas being sent the second time into THESSALY, to make accord betwixt the people and Alexander the Tyrant of PHERES, was by this Tyrant (not suspecting the dignity of an Ambassador, nor of his Country) made prisoner with Ismenias. Whereupon the THEBANS being justly offended, sent thither an Army of eight thousand footmen, and five hundred horse, howbeit under the leading of unskilfull Captaines, who wanting judgement to use the time, thought it good to returne home againe without doing any thing. But as they went their way, Alexander being stronger in horsemen then they, followed them, and gave charge upon the Reare, killed some, and grievously wounded others. So they knowing neither how to go forward nor backward, were in great distresse, and the rather because their victuals fell shorter every day then other. But being now almost out of all hope to retire home with safety, Epaminondas being then amongst the foote, was earnestly intreated by the souldiers and Captaines to helpe to redresse this disorder. Thereupon he chose certaine footmen light armed, and all the horsemen, and so falling himselfe amongst them in the reaward of the Army, he so lustily repulsed the enemies, that the rest of the Army afterwards marched in great safety: and did so well, fighting at times, making head as occasion served, and keeping his Troopes in so good order, that he brought them all away safe. This act crowned him with a new glory, confounded his enemies, and won him great honour every where, besides the love and good will of his Citizens: who set great fines upon their Captaines, because they

they had behaved themselves so evil in this journey. Again, the people seeing that by so many worthy deeds Epaminondas razed out all the slanders and accusations which his evil willers had vomited out against him: they chose him anew their Captain General, to returne into THESSALY with another Army. At whose coming all the Countrey straight rejoiced for the reputation of so great and famous a Captaine, and there wanted little even to breake this Tyrants necke altogether, his friends and Captaines stood in such fear, and his subjects in good mind to rebell, and very joyfull for the hope they had shortly to see the Tyrant at one blow well recompensed for all his cursed and wicked deeds he had done long before. Nevertheless Epaminondas setting aside the consideration of his honour and glory, in respect of the deliverance and safety of his friend Pelopidas, and being afraid that Alexander, when he should see his estate in danger to be overthrowne, would take revenge in his madnesse upon Pelopidas: he purposely drew his warre in length, wheeling about in every place, refraining to set on him in earnest, dissembling to make his preparations, and still delaying, because he would prepare and soften the heart of this Tyrant by this device, not to leave him too much to his bold unbridled will, neither to stirre up (to the danger of Pelopidas) the sharpe and inhumane anger of this blood-sucker. Who being a Monster, compounded of cruelty and cowardice, was so afraid onely of the name and reputation of Epaminondas, and hanging the Wing, as they say: that he presently sent men unto him to excuse and justifie him. But Epaminondas would not that the THEBANS through his slacknesse should make peace and alliance with so wicked a man, but only he was contented to take a truce with him for thirty dayes, taking Pelopidas and Ismenias out of his hands. So with them he returned backe againe to THEBES, and alwayes continued faithfull friendship with Pelopidas, refusing ever to have any part of his goods, but did still persevere in his wonted simplicitie and discipline. Now speaking of this friendship, they report that Epaminondas having committed a man of base condition for some light fault to prison, Pelopidas prayed him to set the poore man at liberty, but he denied him: and yet afterward being intreated by a woman he kept, he did it at her request, saying that harlots were to be granted such requests, not Captaines.

This boldnesse he shewed in all places, and to all men yet mingled with a great sweetnesse, and with a good lively grace: whereof we will bring many examples, besides that he spake at SPARTA against the LACEDÆMONIANS and Agesilaus, in the presence of all the Commissioners of GREECE. The ARGIAHS having made league with the THEBANS, the ATHENIANS sent their Ambassadors into ARCADIA, to see if they could gaine the ARCADIAHS to be their friends. So these Ambassadors began roundly and hotely to charge and accuse both the one and the other: in-somuch as Callistratus speaking for them, reproved the other two Cities ORESTES and OEDIPUS. Epaminondas being present at that assembly of counsell, stood up, and said: My Lords, we confesse that in times past we had a man that killed his father in our City, and in ARGOS one that killed his mother: but for us, we have driven out of our Countrey, and banished all such wicked murderers, and the ATHENIANS have received them both. And to the SPARTANS that had laid many great and grievous imputations upon the THEBANS: If they have done nothing else, my Lords of SPARTA, answered Epaminondas, yet at the least they have made you forget to speake little. The ATHENIANS had made league with Alexander the Tyrant of PHAGES, mortal enemy of the THEBANS, who promised the THEBANS that he would let them have a pound of flesh for an halfe peny. Epaminondas hearing of it, Well said he, and we will finde them wood that shall cost them nothing to seech this flesh withall: for we will go sell and cut downe all the Trees they have in their Countrey, if they go about to make any alteration other then good. So when he went into THESSALY, and brought backe Pelopidas againe, the ATHENIANS made no great stir against him: and the tyrant that promised flesh so good cheap, had much ado at that time to keep his skin whole. But afterwards he had his payment, as you may read in the latter end of Pelopidas life. But that which did excell in Epaminondas, and did cut the throat of envy it self, was his moderation and temperance, knowing how to use any state or condition offered him, and never to rage against himselfe nor others, always bearing this mind, that howsoever they took him, and in what place soever they set him, he was well contented, and all for the good of his Countrey: for proof whereof I will shew you this example. His evil willers on a time thinking to bring him in disgrace, as they say, for spite they made him superintendent and over-seer of all the customes, whilst others his inferiors, unworthy to be compared to him, were placed in the most honorable offices. This notwithstanding he despised not this office, but did discharge it very faithfully: for, said he, office or authority sheweth not onely what the man is, but also the man what the office is.

But now further: shortly after Epaminondas returne out of THESSALY, the ARCADIAHS were overcome by Archidamus and the LACEDÆMONIANS, and they lost not a man: and therefore this dayes journey was called for them, the tearelesse battell. Epaminondas foreseeing that the ARCADIAHS should yet have a storme, gave them counsell to fortifie themselves: whose counsell they following, they built the Towne which afterwards was called MEGALIPOLIS, situated in a very convenient place. Whilst they made warre with the ELIAHS their neighbours, Epaminondas heart never fainted, but his mind was alwayes given to high enterprises for the good of his Countrey; where being respected and honoured above all others, he made an oration unto his Citizens, perswading them to make themselves strong by sea, and to attend the conquest of the principality, making themselves Lords of it. This oration of his had been long thought of before, being full of lively reasons, which did shew and prove unto them that the enterprife was both honourable and profitable, as well as well by other Arguments he alledged, as also for that he told them it was an easie thing for them that were now the stronger by Land, to make themselves also the strongest by Sea: and the rather for that the ATHENIANS in the Warre against Xerxes, notwithstanding that they had armed and set forth two hundred Gallies well appointed with men, they nevertheless willingly submitted themselves unto the LACEDÆMONIANS. So alledging many other reasons to this purpose, he prevailed so much, that the THEBANS inclined to undertake the Enterprife by Sea. Thereupon the People gave present order they should build a hundred Gallies, and withall an Arsenall with so many Roomes to lay them under covert in the Docke: and that they should send to them of RHODES, of CHIO, and of BYZANCE, to pray them to further them in this Enterprife. And for this purpose Epaminondas was sent with an Army unto these Cities: So in this course he met with Laches, a Captaine of the ATHENIANS, and a good number of Ships in his Fleete, sent of purpose to hinder the intention of the THEBANS. Norwithstanding, Epaminondas made him so afraid, that he drave him backe againe: and he holding on his Voyage, brought the Cities before named to make league with the THEBANS, who on the other side were at Warre with the City of ORCHOMENE, which had done great hurt and mischief in their Estate. So they having won it by assault, they slew every man that was able to beare Armes, and moreover made all the Women and Children Slaves.

Sometime after Pelopidas death, certaine private men of MANTINEA, fearing to be called to account for their bad behaviours and robberies they had done, if the ARCADIAHS and ELIAHS fell to agreement: they practised so, that they raised up a new quarrell within the Countrey divided into two Factions, of the which the MANTINEANS were chiefe of the one side, and the TEGEATES on the other part. This quarrell went so far, that the Parties would try it by Armes. The TEGEATES, they sent to demand aide of the THEBANS, who chose Epaminondas their Captaine-Generall, and sent him with a good number of men of Warre to aide the TEGEATES. The MANTINEANS astonished at this aide coming out of BOEOTIA to their Enemies, and at the reputation of this Captain: they immediately sent unto the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, the greatest Enemies of the BOEOTIANS for aide, which both the Cities granted. Whereupon there fell out often many great Skirmishes in divers parts of PELOPONNESUS. Epaminondas being not far off MANTINEA, understood by the same Countreymen, that Agesilaus and the LACEDÆMONIANS were come into the Field, and that they waited all the Territory of the TEGEATES.

Whereupon imagining straight that there were few men left in the City of SPARTA to defend it, he went about a great exploit, and a wonderful Stratageme of a man of Warre: and had brought it to passe, if the marvellous great good Fortune of SPARTA had not hindered it. So he departed from TEGEA by night, the MANTINEANS knowing nothing of it, and taking another way then Agesilaus, he had taken SPARTA without one stroke stricken, but for a Post of CANDIA that with speed brought Agesilaus word of it: who forthwith sent out a Horseman to give them intelligence that were left at SPARTA, that they should beware they were not surprised upon the sudden: and he himselfe came speedily after, and arrived there a little before the THEBANS coming thither: who being very neare the City by breake of day, gave assault to them that were within to defend the Towne. Then Agesilaus belittred him throughly, beyond the power of an old man. But his Sonne Archidamus, and Isadas the Sonne of Phabidas, fought valiantly on all parts. Epaminondas seeing the SPARTANS in order of Battell, began then to mistrust that his Enterprife was discovered. This notwithstanding, he left not off to force them all he could, albeit he fought with great disadvantage for the inconvenience of the places he occupied: and continued alwaies courageously doing and receiving hurt, untill the Army of the LACEDÆMONIANS came on, and the night also: whereupon he made them sound the Retraite. Now he being advertized that the MANTINEANS came on also with their Forces, he drew his Troopes somewhat further off the Towne, and there camped. After that he caused his men to refresh themselves with Victuals, and having left certaine Horsemen in the Campe, he commanded them to make Fires in the morning, and he himselfe went in the meane space, to surprise those that remained at MANTINEA before any man with he was gone. Nevertheless he failed of his purpose, albeit he had forethought him of all misfortunes that any man possible could have considered in so weighty a Cause. But the prosperity of the THEBANS was come to his height, and the course of Epaminondas life drawing neare to an end, would very shortly deprive GREECE of this noble and famous Person, from whom was taken a most notable Victory, and that twice, by a most strange accident. For at this second time, when he was neare unto MANTINEA, left without guard and defence; on the other side of the Towne there arrived six thousand ATHENIANS led by their Captaine Hegeltem: who having put sufficient force into the Towne, he ordered all the rest in Battell without the Towne-walls, as though he meant to have fought a Field: and immediately after them came also the LACEDÆMONIANS and MANTINEANS together, who prepared themselves to put all to the hazard of a Battell, and therefore sent for their Allies out of all parts. They were in all five and twenty thousand Footmen, and two thousand Horse. The ARCADIAHS, BOEOTIANS, and their partakers, made the number of thirty thousand Footmen and above, and three thousand Horse. First the Horsemen charged with so great fury as was possible, in-somuch as the Horsemen of the ATHENIANS finding the THEBANS in Front, were the weaker: not because they were lesse valiant and hardy then the other, but because they had not so good Leaders, and had few Archers amongst their Troopes. The THEBANS on the other side they were well appointed, and specially of THESShostage of Peace with thirty others.

Myntas, the Second of that Name, and seventeenth King of MACEDON, of the Race of Temenides or Caranides, descended from Hercules, and that reigned foure hundred and ninety eight yeares, reckoning from Caranus unto Antipater, in whom began another Race: he had three Sonnes by his first Wife called Eurydice, borne in ILLYRIA: to wit, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip. Alexander having succeeded his Father, reigned but one yeare, during which time he made Warre with his base Brother Ptolomeus Alorites. But to appease the strife betwixt them, they sent for Pelopidas, who was at that time in THESSALIE. He tooke up all their quarrels, restored those that were banished unto their houses, and (because this Peace should be more surely kept) he tooke of them for hostages, Philip, and thirty other of the noblest mens Sonnes in MACEDON, and brought them all away with him to THEBES. Now during the time that Perdiccas reigned, which was the space of five yeares, Philip kept at Pammenes house, with whom Epaminondas was very great: and hereof it came, that some thought Philip was a hearer of Lyfis Epaminondas Schoole-master, and that they conferred together in Philosophy. Howbeit Epaminondas was then much older then he, and surely it can hardly be that they were Scholars together: except they will say that Epaminondas continuing all his life time to profit by the study of wisdom, made Philip desirous to heare him sometime, and to follow him also. And it may be well enough also that he had learned of Epaminondas to be so quicke and suddain of execution in the Warres, as he was: which was but one of the least parts of Epaminondas Vertues. But as for his continancy, justice, magnanimity, and clemency, which were the parts that in truth made him great: Philip, neither by Nature, nor by Education, nor by Study, ever attained unto it: for all this, he wanted not great Gifts of body and minde, as shall appear in the discourse of his Life: and as Theophrastus testifieth, he was greater then any other of the Kings of MACEDON, not onely in prosperity of Fortune, but also in wisdom, bounty, and moderation of manners. So it came to passe that Alexander, notwithstanding the accord Pelopidas had made, was traitterously killed by Ptolomeus named Alorites, who usurped the Kingdome, and was slaine himselfe selfe by Perdiccas: who after he had been overcome in a great Battell by the SLAVONS, in the which he was slaine: Philip which was the last of the three Brethren, fleeing away from the place where he was in hostage, fled into MACEDON, and came to succeed in the Kingdome, the which he found in great trouble. For there were slaine at the last Battell above foure thousand MACEDONIANS, and those that escaped were so beaten and astonied with blowes, that they thought of nothing lesse then to take armes against the SLAVONS. On the other side the HUNGARIANS made inrodes into MACEDON, and the SLAVONS mustered againe to returne thither. There was one Pausanias also that aspired to the Kingdome, by the supportiof the King of THRACIA. And the ATHENIANS also, they would establish one called Argæus, and to this end sent a great Fleet by Sea, and three thousand Footmen well armed by Land, led by Mantias. Philip taking heart to him in these rude beginnings, began to embolden the MACEDONIANS by wise perswasions: he re-established military Discipline, furnished his Souldiers very well, making them arme themselves, and gave order they should be continually trained and exercised. It was he that amongst other things devised how to close his Footmen, and that framed the square Battell, which ever since was called the MACEDONIAN Phalange. He was very gracious in his words, and by his promises and Gifts he wan the hearts and good will of his Subjects.

Alexander and Perdiccas Philip's elder Brethren are slaine, and Philip succeedeth in the Crown.

Philip's first Exploits.

Now finding himselfe strong, although he was yet but young of yeares, he resolved to make head against all his Enemies, yet not by open force, but where there was need: being alwaies of this minde, to buy time and men as much as he could possible. So perceiving that the ATHENIANS did their uttermost endeavour to winne the City of AMPHIPOLIS againe, and that by this meanes they sought to bring the Kingdome of MACEDON into the hands of Argæus: he made them leave it, and thrust out their Garrisons. As for the PANNONIANS (others read PÆONIANS) or HUNGARIANS, having sent Ambassadors to them, he corrupted some with Money, and wan others by faire promises: insomuch that they were all contented to live in peace with him. And by the same meanes he brake the hope of Pausanias, having by presents gained the King of THRACIA that aided him. And for the regard of Mantias Captain of the ATHENIANS, he marched with his Army unto the City of METHONA: but he remained there, and sent Argæus with the Souldiers strangers whom they had brought with them, unto the City of EGES. Argæus approaching neare the Town with his Troope, sent to feele the Inhabitants, if they would receive him, and be the first that should be cause of his entrie into the Possession of the Kingdome of MACEDON. But perceiving they cared not for him, he returned againe. Philip that followed him hard at his heels gave him Battell, killed the most part of his men, and drave the rest unto a little Mountaine, where he besieged them so straightly, that they were forced to deliver him all the banished men of MACEDON amongst them: whereupon he let them go their lives and goods saved. This first Victory of Philip put the MACEDONIANS againe in heart, and made them bold to enterprise any thing afterwards. Hereupon he made peace with the ATHENIANS, and understanding that the King of HUNGARIA was dead, he entred into their Countrey with a maine Army, overcame them in Battell, and made them subject unto him. Of all his Enemies there were left none but the SLAVONIANS, whom he went to assaile with ten thousand Footmen, and six hundred Horse. But since they could not agree together, Bardyllis their King trusting in the Victories he had gotten before time of the MACEDONIANS, and in the valiantnesse of his SLAVONS, he came into the Field and presented Battell. The which having been fought a long time, Philip behaved himselfe so valiantly with his men of armes the MACEDONIANS, that he overthrew the SLAVONS, leaving seven thousand of them dead on the ground: and the rest escaped by flying away. Shortly after they were agreed together, and restored to Philip all the places they held pertaining unto MACEDON. Now the AMPHIPOLITANS had of long time borne Philip evill will, and whilest he was occupied in other places, they did him many injuries: wherefore he determined to make a sharpe Warre upon them. He having besieged them with a puissant Army, and having brought his Engines of Warre hard to their Walls, he beate them with such fury, that he made a sufficient breach, and entred the Town by force: out of the which he drave those afterwards that were his Enemies, and very courteously used and intreated the rest. This Town being seated in a very commodious place, upon the Frontiers of THRACIA, and of the Countries neare adjoining thereto, stood him afterwards in great stead for the furtherance and increase of his greatnesse. For by meanes of that he presently had the City of PYDNE, and made league with the OLYNTHIANS, of great power at that time: by reason whereof he and the ATHENIANS envying one the other, they both practised to win them. But Philip having won POTIDEA, drave out the Garrison of the ATHENIANS, and used them very honestly: for he sent them home to their houses, their lives and goods saved, not because he loved the People of ATHENS, but for that he feared the power of their City. After he had taken in the City of PYDNE, he gave it to the OLYNTHIANS, with all the territory belonging unto it. Then he returned to CRENIDEA, the which he having augmented with a great number of Inhabitants, he changed the first Name of it, and called it by his own Name, PHILIPPI. Within that territory he had Mines of Gold, the which he opened and digged so diligently, that he drew out yearly new made, about the summe of six hundred thousand Crownes. By this meanes in a short time he gathered together a great Treasure, and daily the Kingdome of MACEDON grew great, because it had one of the chiftest sinews and props of War. So he coyned a number of Pieces of Gold called Philipppæ, wherewith he waged a great number of men, and bribed many private GRÆKS: who afterwards sold him for ready Money the Towns of their Countrey, as we shall see hereafter. In all this business, Alexander the Tyrant of PHERES in THESSALY, having been slain by his Wife Thebe, and by her Brethren called Lycophron, and Tisiphonus, at the first they were honoured as men that had delivered their Country of a cruel tyranny: but very shortly after, these two men changing their minds, by Money wanne the Soldiers whom Alexander kept for the guard of his person, and put themselves in his place whom they had killed, putting many Citizens to death that withstood their enterprise: and having gathered together a great number of Soldiers, they made themselves Lords of PHERES. The ALEVADES, men of authority, and greatly followed in the Country for the ancient nobility of their house, would have opposed themselves against this new tyranny. But finding themselves to be too weak, they made means to Philip: who entering into THESSALY with his Army, overcame the two Tyrants, and setting the Towns at liberty, which these Tyrants held in subjection, he shewed great love and favour to the THESSALIANS. By which occasion, in all his Conquests he had obtained afterwards, he found the THESSALIANS always ready to do him service, and to aide him in all his affairs, and not himself alone, but also his Sonne Alexander. But the greatness of Philip grieved his neighbours, inasmuch as the Kings of THRACIA, HUNGARIA, and SLAVONIA, not being strong enough of themselves, they joyned Forces together to make War upon him, and to be revenged. Whilst they were preparing to joyn their Forces, Philip went before, and compelled them to do what he would.

The beginning of the holy Warre.

About this time, to wit, in the last yeare of the hundred and fift Olympiade, fiftene yeares after the Battell of MANTINEA, the holy Warre began amongst the GREEKS, which continued ten yeares space: and this was the occasion. The THEBANS not being contented with the Victory they obtained at the Battell of LEUCTRES, framed a complaint against the LACEDÆMONIANS in the Assembly of the Estates of GREECE: which they call the Councell of the Amphictions: and followed the matter so hard, that the LACEDÆMONIANS were condemned in a great summe of Money, because they had in time of Peace surpris'd the Cattle of CADMEA. The PHOCIANS also, they having plowed up a great deale of a certaine Land sacred to the gods, called the Land of CIRRE, were condemned by the Amphictions in a great summe of Money: and because they would not pay it, the Councell pronounced, without longer delay and refusal, all their Townes and Lands to be confiscated to the gods, and that all other which were condemned (of which number were the LACEDÆMONIANS) should be compelled to pay their Fines, and if they refused, they should be taken for excommunicate, and the other GREEKS should make War with them, as against accursed and execrable men. Philomelus, a man of great authority among the PHOCIANS, did so much, that he perswaded them not to pay it, but contrariwise to defend their Country with Armes, and to win DELPHES. Whereunto they giving their consents he gathered together a great Army, and in despite of all hinderances made himselfe Master of DELPHES: cut asunder with the Decrees made by the Amphictions engraven upon Marble Pillars: possessed all the Gold and Silver that was in the Temple: and afterwards rendered a reason of his fact, and prepared himselfe to make Warre against the THEBANS, THESSALIANS, and LOCRIANS; and wanne three great Battells of them. But being overcome at the fourth Battell, he threw himselfe down off a high Rocke. In the meane space, Cirfoleptes, the Sonne of Claris King of THRACIA, having rendered up to the ATHENIANS the Towns of CHERRONESUS, partly for the good will he bare the ATHENIANS, and partly for the hatred he had to Philip: the People of ATHENS sent Inhabitants thither to keep and defend the Towns. Philip perceiving that those of METHONE lent out their Town to all them that would make War against him, went and laid siege before it. They that were besieged, did valiantly defend it for a time: but in the end finding themselves too weak to make resistance, they yielded upon condition, that the Inhabitants should go out every man with one onely Gown. As soone as ever Philip had the Town in his hands, he razed it even to the ground, and gave the Country all about unto the MACEDONIANS. At this siege he was wounded with an Arrow, that put out one of his eyes. Afterwards he led his Army also at the instance of the THESSALIANS, into the Country against Lycophron, that began again to tyrannize those of PHERES: who having demanded aide of the PHOCIANS, they sent thither Phayllus with seven thousand fighting men, whom Philip overcame, and drave them out of THESSALY. Then Onomarchus that succeeded Philomelus in the charge of General, hoping to have won THESSALY, made great speed thither with all his Army, under colour to bring aid unto Lycophron. Philip went against him with the THESSALIANS, but because Onomarchus had the greater number of men, he overthrew him; and killed many of the MACEDONIANS, inasmuch that Philip himselfe was in great danger. For his men also were so afraid, that they would have forsaken him, and he had much trouble to keepe them together: and in the end was constrained to retire home into his Kingdome. Onomarchus departing from thence, entred into the Countrey of BOEOTIA, overcame the BOEOTIANS in Battell, and tooke the City of CORONEA. But Philip returned immediately with a great force into THESSALY to drive out Lycophron: who having called in the PHOCIANS, Onomarchus returned thither, followed with twenty thousand Footmen, and five hundred Horse. Hereupon Philip perswaded the Commons of THESSALY, that they must all together undertake this Warre. And he could so well sollicite them, that he assembled in one Campe twenty thousand Footmen, and three thousand Horse. Then was there fought a most cruell Battell, whereof the Victory fell to Philip, through the valiantnesse of his THESSALIAN men of armes. For Onomarchus and his men, they fled on foot towards the Sea; where was by chance Charis the ATHENIAN Captain sailing till along the Coast

Coast with certaine Gallies. & There was great slaughter of the PHOCIANS there, followed by the Victors. Others to flee with more speed, threw down their Armes, and leapt into the Sea, by swimming to get to the Gallies of the ATHENIANS. There were slain in Battell and flight as well of naturall PHOCIANS, as of strangers that came for pay, above six thousand men, and there were taken Prisoners to the number of three thousand: Onomarchus that was one of them, was hang'd, and all the other drowned as Sacrilegers, by the commandement of Philip: unto whom Lycophron yielded the Town of PHERES, and so retired out of THESSALY, which by this means was set at liberty.

hang'd.

As for Philip, he marched with his Army towards the way of THERMOPYLES, to make Warre with the PHOCIANS, within PHOCIDE it selfe: but the ATHENIANS stopped his passage. Wherefore he was constrained to returne backe into MACEDON, where he staid not long at rest, but determined to bring the Towns of CHALCIDE in subjection to him. So he tooke by assault a Fort called GYRE, the which he razed. But this was such a terrible to the other small Towns, that they put themselves under his obedience. Passing from thence into THESSALY, he drave away Pytholus that had made himselfe Master of PHERES. And intending to bring the Townes of HELLESPOINT under his subjection, he tooke in without paine or danger (rather by treason) the Towns of MYCIBERNE, and of TORONE. Afterwards he went with a great Army against the City of OLYNTH, the greatest and of most power that was in that marches: where first he overcame the OLYNTHIANS in two great fights, so that he made them leave the Field, and shut them in within their own Town, unto the which he gave many assaults, and lost a great number of his men there. But having with great summes of Money corrupted Euthicrates and Lasthenes Governors of the Town, at the length he had it by treason: and having sacked it, he sold the Towns-men for Slaves by the drum. The taking of this Town, brought him a great quantity of Silver to helpe to defray the charges of his War; and did also make the other Towns afraid, which had taken Armes to resist him. Now after he had bestowed many rich Presents upon his Capitaines and Soldiers that had done him good service in this War, he gave also all about great summes of Money to the Heads of the Towns, and found Merchants also among them that sold him their own Countrey and fellow Citizens: inasmuch that he himselfe confessed he had enlarged his Kingdome more through Gold and Silver, then he did by force of Armes: according to an answer that was made him, when he began first to put himselfe forward: for being desirous to know how he should carry himselfe, the Oracle answered:

With Silver Speares begin and end thy Warre,

So shalt thou toſſie ſurvey turne all things: what ere they are.

Now the ATHENIANS being jealous of his greatness, did ever helpe them whom he would hurt, and sent Ambassadors to all the Cities, to perswade them to maintaine and preserve their liberty, and to put their Towns-men to death home they found willing to betray the Common-wealth: promising them to aide them all, and declared themselves open Enemies unto Philip. He that set them most against him, was Demosthenes, the most Eloquent man of all GREECE at that time, and that did more trouble and hurt Philip with the blowes of his Tongue, and his continual motions, then all the Capitaines of GREECE did him besides. All this notwithstanding, with all the diligence and labour ATHENS could use, they could never bridle the wicked disposition of some private persons, but they still fought to sell their Countrey: for he that bought, sowed Silver without any spare, and there were a great number of Traitors at that time through all GREECE. And touching this purpose, they say, that he being desirous to win a very strong hold, he sent some men before to view it: who returning, reported that it was impossible almost to approach it, and did by description set it down in small points impregnable. Then he asked them if the place were so hard to come to, that a poor Ass laden with Gold could not come neare it: for he had oftentimes with Silver very easily won that, which otherwise was not to be had by force of Armes. And this was the cause that he practised to have Traitors in every Town by Gifts and Pensions, calling them that received him, his hostes and friends, corrupting mens manners besides by unworthy and dishonest means. As after that he had won OLYNTH, he made sumptuous and magnificent Sacrifices to his gods, to thank them for the Victory they had given him; and for having set down a day of Triumph for tilting and tourneying, and common sports, thither repaired a great number of strangers that came to see the Feasts: So keeping open Court, he invited many of these strangers to come to his sumptuous Feasts he made, and in them he shewed all the familiarity and courtship that might be to entertaine them. For he dranke to some, and then gave them the Cups wherein he dranke to them: to others he gave great Presents, and unto all generally he gave good words and large promises: inasmuch that many sought how to obtaine his love and favour. So it is reported, that one day a Banquet he supped Saymus, an excellent Comedian and Player; that he was very sad: and that he asked him why he did not crave something of him: that he might shew his liberality unto him. Saymus answered him againe, that he would be glad to obtaine a suite at his hands, but he durst not aske it him; being afraid he should be denied. Philip liked his answer well, and bade him aske boldly. Then he told him that a friend of his had two Daughters among other Prisoners, but of them marriageable, and besought him that he would bestow them upon him, not for any other pleasure or profit he should have of them; but because he would marry them both at his own charge, before they should be forced to their dishonour. Philip thanked him for his request, and presently caused these two Maides to be delivered unto him. Thus he bestowed many such courtesies every where, where whereof he made his profit afterwards with great usury. For a number being drawne by the sent and odour of so many good turnes, studied with themselves, envying one another, which of them might do him best service, and finde out most meanes to deliver Towns and Countries into his hands.

But now to returne againe to that we had begun to speake of the holy Warre. The PHOCIANS that had three very strong holds in BOEOTIA, to wit, ORCHOMENE, CORONE, and CORASIES, did ordinarily from thence make incursions into the Countrey of the BOEOTIANS, with a great number of Souldiers strangers whom they kept in pay, and did burne and lay wast all the Territory thereabouts, and ever had the upper-hand in all their incrodes and skirmishes they had with the Countrey-men. Upon this occasion the BOEOTIANS being weake of men, and wanting Money, sent in the end to demand aide of Philip: who was not a little glad to see them brought so low, for he desired their pride might be pulled down, which had lift them up so high since the Battell of LEUCTRES. So he sent them a good number of Souldiers, not for any desire he had to aide them, but to make them thinke that he made great account of the Temple of DELPHES, which the PHOCIANS had spoyled. After divers exploits of Warre, the one side and the other seeing themselves weary and bare, the BOEOTIANS prayed Philip to come and aide them: which he granted them: and taking a supply of THESSALIANS with him, he came to LOCRIDE with a good Army, and put himselfe in order to end this Warre at one Battell. But Phaltecus Generall of the PHOCIANS, finding himselfe not strong enough to fight with him, sent unto him to Treat of Peace: so he was suffered to go safely with his men whether he would. Whereupon under the assurance of this Peace, he retired with eight thousand men into PELOPONNESUS. The PHOCIANS then left without all hope, yeelded themselves to Philips discretion. Thus having ended this holy Warre without stroke stricken, beyond all mens opinion, he called a Councell of the BOEOTIANS and THESSALIANS in the which it was determined that there should be an Assembly of Parliament of the Amphillyons, unto whom they would wholly referre themselves for deciding of this matter. Whereupon the Commissioners for the Parliament of the Amphillyons were assembled, and there among other acts it was ordained, that from thenceforth it should be lawfull for Philip and all of his Race to sit in this Councell of the Amphillyons, and that they should have the two voices which the PHOCIANS (by him lately conquered) had before. Also, that he and his thenceforth should have the Government and superintendency of the Sports PYTHIAN, with the BOEOTIANS and THESSALIANS: because the CORINTHIANS had been partakers with the Sacrilege of the PHOCIANS. The rest of their Decrees concerned those of PHOCIDE, the safety of the Temple of DELPHES, and the union of the GREEKS. Philip having broken up the Armories of the PHOCIANS and of the strangers that had fought in their pay, he defaced their Towns, and made them sell their Horses. After he had received of the Amphillyons the greatest honour and thanks they could devise, he returned into his Realme of MACEDON, having won him the Name of a devout and valiant Prince, and laid the Foundation of the greatnesse unto the which his Sonne Alexander came afterwards. For he singularly desired to be chosen Capitaine-Generall of all GREECE, with full power and authority to make Warre with the King of PERSIA, as he did. Furthermore, the hereditary quarrels he had against the SLAVONIANS, being as irreconcilable, he entered with his Army into SLAVONIA, where having spoiled a great part of that Countrey and taken many Towns, he returned backe into MACEDON loaden with booty. After that he went into THESSALY, and drave out the Tyrants there, which held the Towns in subjection. By this means he wanne the hearts of the THESSALIANS, whom indeed he had great care to use well, hoping that if the THESSALIANS remained his faithfull friends, he should easily gaine the other GREEKS to desire his friendship; and so it hapned: for the People, neighbours to THESSALY, did presently enter into league with him. Soone after that, he led his Army into THRACIA to repress Cersobleptes, who troubled all the Towns of HELLESPOINT next adjoining to his Realme. When he had beaten the THRACIANS in divers encounters, he compelled the vanquished to pay yearly unto the MACEDONIANS the tenth part of their revenues; and fortifying a few good Towns in the best parts of their Countrey, he bridled the boldnesse of these barbarous People: whereupon the Towns within those marches being delivered from Wars, they very willingly entred into league and alliance with Philip.

Thus waxing greater every day then other, he held his Army before the City of PERINTH, because that stood against him, and tooke part with the ATHENIANS. So he layd siege unto it, and brought his Engines of Battery before it, among the which there were Rams of eighty foot long, and built up Towers of Wood higher then the highest Towers of Stone that were within the Town: upon the top whereof he marvellously annoyed the besieged: and battering the Walls with these Rammes, he made them fall down in divers places. The PERINTHIANS on the other side very lustily defended themselves, and reared up other Walls within, in place of them that were fallen down. He plyed them continually with wonderfull assaults, the Assaultants and assailed shewing all their possible force and endeavour. Now Philip had great Crosse-bowes and other Engines of all sorts to kill farre off, great Arrows long and sharpe at the end, which did wound those that came to the cranewes of the Walls: and those that were besieged, lost many of their men every day. But at the length they were supplied with armes and men, whom the BYZANTINES sent unto them: whereupon equalling their Enemies, they began to be cotragious againe, and resolutely offered themselves unto any danger for defence of their Countrey. For all this, the Battery begun discontented not, not, and Philip dividing his men into divers Troopes, gave them many assaults, continued by turnes one in the necke of another night and day. Which he might easily do, considering he had thirty thousand fighting men in his Campe, with an inestimable number of Missile Weapons, with Engines to bestow great shot a farre off, and of all sorts of Engines to beate down Townes, with the which he wonderfully plagued and hurt the besieged. Nevertheless the siege drew on in length, and many of the Towns-men died, besides those that were hurt and wounded: and because that Victuals also waxed scant amongst them: so that they hourly looked for no other thing, but to take PERINTH. But it fell out cleane contrary: for the fame of Philips greatnesse being blowne abroad throughout all ASIA, the King of PERSIA being afraid of such a Power, writ unto his Lieutenants upon the Sea Coasts, that they should aide the PERINTHIANS all they could possible. Thereupon his Satrapes having consulted of this matter together, sent unto the besieged a great supply of men of Warre, store of Gold and Silver, plenty of Corne, of Armes, and of all other necessary Provisions for the Warres. The BYZANTINES on the other side sent them the best experienced Captaines and Souldiers they had. By this means the two Forces of these Besiegers and the besieged being equall of new againe, the Warre began to be hotter then before. For Philip beating at the Walls without cease with his Rammes, made very great breaches, and with his Engines to shoot farre off, kept them that none durst stay at the cranewes of the Walls: and at one instant made his men to give an assault at the breaches of the Walls throwne downe, and caused others to scale the Walls that were yet standing whole, and so fighting with their Swords many were slaine in the place, and others fore wounded, both valiantly fighting for the reward of honour and Victory. The MACEDONIANS hoped to have the sacke of a rich and wealthy City, and more then that, to have goodly Presents of the King. They that were besieged on the other side, setting before them all the calamities and miseries of the taking of a City, did lustily endure any paines and danger to prevent so great a mischief. Besides that, the situation of the Towne was a great helpe unto them, not onely to hope well, but also that in the end they should be Masters. For the Towne of PERINTH stood all upon the Sea side, upon a Haven of halfe an Island that stood of a great height, and this Haven was about halfe a quarter of a League long. The houses there were very narrow and high, and because they stood high upon the hanging of the Coast all the Towne being underneath it on the ground, they were built much higher then those that stood beneath: so to see them above, they shewed like the degrees of seates in a Theater. And although that they without did still beate down some part of the Wall: that vantageed them nothing for all that. For those within did nothing else but mure up the entrance into the Streets which were narrow, and they alwaies defended themselves, making Rampiers before the low houses, as if they had been the best Walls in the world.

So Philip having gotten the outward Walls of the Towne, with all the troubles and dangers possible: he found other Walls ready built stronger then the other, as if they had been done of purpose: besides that the BYZANTINES did alwaies furnish them with any thing they wanted. Philip considering this, divided his Army into two, and let the halfe of them to continue the siege, under the charge of the best Captaines he had: and taking with him the other halfe, he went to besiege BYZANCE it selfe, and gave it a most brave assault: whereat the BYZANTINES were amazed, because their Souldiers, their Armes, and all other necessary Provisions for War were in the City of PERINTH. But the ATHENIANS sent them immediately an Army by Sea to aide them, as also those did of CHIO, of RHODES, and out of other places. Chares went thither, sent by the ATHENIANS, but he did nothing of worth, nor worthy of the Fleet he brought thither: because he was suspected of his friends, and despised of his Enemies. So that they sent Phocion thither, who before that time had fought bravely with Philip in the Isle of EUBOEAE, (which he thought to have won by meanes of Traitors) had overcome the MACEDONIANS in Battell, and had done many other notable exploits. Howbeit after his departure Philip being the stronger, departing from thence, came to besiege PERINTH, and after that BYZANCE, into the which Phocion entred with his Troopes: who did so valiantly in all fights and assaults, that Philip (who before that time was thought so terrible in Armes that none could resist him, neither durst any man present himselfe in Battell against him) rose from the besieging of PERINTH, and retired from BYZANCE and out of HELLESPOINT, and did nothing, but lost much of his reputation. For, besides the men that were killed at these two sieges, he lost some of his Ships, and many strong holds, out of the which his Garrisons were throwne, and his friends forraged by the ATHENIANS. This was the cause why he offered Articles of Peace, fearing the Forces of the ATHENIANS, desirous to forward his affaires some other way, or rather to meddle no more with them. Phocion counsellled the ATHENIANS to hearken unto it, and accept the Conditions unto the which Philip submitted himselfe. But the Counsellors (especially Demosthenes) that bare the sway at that time, moved the ATHENIANS to a new league, the which Demosthenes prepared against Philip: who bethinking himselfe, determined to employ all his meanes to subdue the Cities all at once, to the end that he might afterwards passe farther. So he leaved an Army with great speed, and having overcome certaine Troopes of the Towns in league together neare unto AMPHISE, he marched into the Countrey of ELATIA, and afterwards wan PHOCIDE; and being lift up with such prosperous beginnings, he resolved to go to ATHENS. Whereof the ATHENIANS having intelligence, they were straight in armes every where, the People being so amazed, that none durst be so bold as to speake, and they knew not what to do. They rejected the wise counsell of Phocion, of which Demosthenes was the cause. Wherefore to reparaire his fault, he stepped out and coun-felled the ATHENIANS to seeke the friendship of the THEBANS. So thereupon they sent him to put it in practise, and happily he obtained it, notwithstanding all Philip's oppositions to the contrary: who being affronted more then before with these crosses which the Eloquence of one man did against him: he sent againe to offer the GREEKS Peace. But they kept themselves close, and made strange of it, expecting the event of all this great Tempest: not being disposed at that time to hearken to pacification. But as if the time of their bondage had been at the Gate, they refused all Conditions, yea contemned the very Oracles of DELPHES, and Demosthenes had it often in his mouth, that the Prophetesse did Philippize, to wit favoured Philip's affaires. These Oracles threatned both the one and the other, and especially the GREEKS. Now Philip, though he saw he was deceived of the friendship of the BOEOTIANS, yet he resolved to fight with the one and the other. Therefore keeping his Campe certaine daies, looking for the Forces of his friends that were not yet come unto him: he entred into BOEOTIA, with thirty thousand Footmen, and about two thousand Horse. So both Campes being ready to give charge upon each other, they both had like courage and resolution to do well. But as touching the number of men, and skilfulnesse of Captaines, Philip did passe them farre: for having done in many places so many worthy exploits of Armes, he was become very expert in Military Discipline. To the contrary, on the ATHENIANS side, their best Captaines, as Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timotheus, were dead.

Phocion also, he never thought well of this Warre: and the factions, they had hindred the best they could that he should have no charge. Then was there but Chares and Lysicles, that were too weake to take such a great charge upon them, and were much inferiour to many of the Captaines Philip had then with him.

Philip over-throweth the Athenians.

The day being broken, and both Armies set in Battell the one against the other in the plaine of CHERONEA: Philip placed his Sonne Alexander, coming but newly out of his infancy, in one of the points of his Army, attended upon by the best Captaines he had: and he placed himselfe in the other point, with the valiantest men in his Army, giving order and direction in all things according to time and place. The ATHENIANS, having taken one of the points of their Battell, left the other unto the BOEOTIANS. So the fight began very sharply, and many were slaine on both sides, and it could not be discerned yet whether side had best occasion to hope of Victory:
untill that Alexander at the length, desirous to make his Father see some proofe of his valour, and many other valiant men seeing the courage of this young Prince, following him, they with him brake into the Battell of the Enemies, and there was a marvellous cruell slaughter. Philip on his side also giving charge upon the greatest preste and multitude of his Enemies, not enduring that any should take the honour from him, no not his own Sonne: set upon them so fiercely that withstood him, that he put them out of order, and made them flie for life. There died in this Battell above a thousand ATHENIANS, and there were taken Prisoners to the number of two thousand. And of the BOEOTIANS in like manner there were many killed in the Field, and a great number taken. After this Battell, Philip caused a token of Triumph to be set up, and suffered the Enemies to take away the bodies of their dead, and to bury them. He made sumptuous Sacrifices unto his gods, to give them thanks for his Victory: and honoured them that had done good service in this Battell, every one according to his degree and desert. Howbeit he committed certaine insofencies: for after he had drunke well with his friends, he went to the place where the dead bodies lay, and there he fell a singing in mockery, the beginning of the Decree which Demosthenes had propounded, whose counsell they following, the ATHENIANS concluded to make Warre against him, lifting up his voice, and keeping measure with his foot: Demosthenes, the Sonne of Demosthenes PEANIAN set out this. But afterwards when he began a little to come to himselfe againe out of his drunkenesse, and that he had thought a little of the danger he had been in: then his haire began to stand upright on his head, when he entred into the consideration of the force and vehemency of such an Oratour, that had brought him in a piece of a day, to put his whole Estate and his life to the hazard of a Battelle. And when the ATHENIANS sent unto him to Treat of Peace, he presently set his countenance, rubbed his eye-browes, and laying aside all madnesse and wantonnesse, made them a very sober and advised Answer. Others say, that he dranke too much at the Feast of his sacrifice, and that after supper he dancd and made a Mummery with his Minions: passed by the Prisoners, and gave them sharp taunts in mockery, touching the misfortune of their overthrow: and that Demades then being one of the number, was so bold frankly to speake a word to him, which was of such efficacy, as it made him refrain from his insofency. O King, said he, it being now thy fortune to play Agamemmons part, thou art not ashamed to shew the Deeds of Thersites. Philip finding himselfe touched to the quick with this word so well set, he presently changed his apparell and countenance, cast down to the ground his Garland of Flowers he wore on his head, caused all the other signes of mockery which were carried after him to be broken, and from thenceforth began greatly to esteeme of Demades, and would have him about him. Demades, being passing Eloquent above others of his time, did so well entertaime Philip, that he caused him to deliver all the other prisoners of the ATHENIANS, without paying of any Ransome. And further yet, humbling the Conquerours fiercenesse, he made Peace with the ATHENIANS, but put a Garrison within THEBES, and moreover granted Peace unto the BOEOTIANS.

But

But that which principally brought him to incline unto it, was the desire he had to be chosen Captaine-Generall of GREECE: And to this end he caused them to give out abroad, that he would undertake to make Warre for the GREEKS against the PERSIANS, and to be revenged of them for the outrages and sacrileges which they had committed against the Temples of the gods in GREECE: and sought to gaine the good will and friendship of all the GREEKS by all kinde of courtesies he could possibly devise or thinke of, as well openly as secretly. So he made a motive, that he desired to speake with the Townes openly, and so communicating some things unto them, which concerned the good of all their Common-wealth in General:
And for this purpose there was appointed a general Assembly of the States in GREECE in the City of CORINTH, in the which he propounded this, to undertake the Warre against the PERSI-ANS: and putting them in great hope of happy successe, he perswaded the Commissioners of every Town, which were present in this Assembly of Councill, boldly to conclude this enterprise.
He solicited his matter in such sort, that the GREEKS with general consent chose him their Captaine-Generall with soveraigne authority. Then he began to make great preparation for this Warre, and having made a description and seile of all the Contributions, as also the number of men of War which every City should furnish for this enterprise: he returned into MACEDON, and sent from thence two of his chiefe Captaines before into ASIA, Attalus and Parmenio, with a part of his Army, commanding them to deliver the GREEKS Cities of ASIA out of bondage. But his death broke the Voyage, so that they went not very farre. Now hitherto have we seen Philip natural Disposition in the midst of his Deeds, and what is commendable and reprobous in so great a Prince. But before we go further in the rest of his Life, it may peradventure not be much impertinent to insert in this place some of his Sentences and memorable Additions, whereby he may be the better discerned, to compare him afterwards with the others. For mens words and fashions amongst their familiars, be the very lively Tables of the Affections and passions of the Soule: it being impossible for any man alwaies to counterfeit so, but that they may oftentimes see his heart at his tongues end.

So then, neues being brought him in one selfe-day of three great prosperities: The first, that he had wonne the prize at the courses of Coaches with foure Horse in the solemnity of the Olympian Games: The second, that his Lieutenant Parmenio had overcome the DARDANIANS in Battell: The third, that his Wife Olympiade had brought him a goodly Son: he lifted up his hands to Heaven, and said: O Fortune, I beseech thee send me in exchange of this, some reasonable adversity, against such and so great happinesse. Lasthenes an OLYNTIAN, that for a great summe of Money had sold him the Town of OLYNTH, complained to him one day that some of his Minions called him Traytour. He answered him againe, that the MACEDONIANS were rude plaine men, that called all things by their Name. He seemed to repute the ATHENIANS happy men, for that they found yearly ten Captaines in their Town to be chosen: and that he to the contrary in many yeres could finde but one, and that was Parmenio. After he had overcome the GREEKS, many advised him to put good and great Garrisons in the Towns, that they might with more safety be kept under. But he answered them: I had rather be called a long time courteous, then a short time Lord. And when his familiars gave him counsell to banish a malicious Person, that did nothing but speake evill: he answered them he would not, fearing lest he should every where else speak evill of him.
There was an ACHAÏAN called Arcadian, that made profession to speake evill of him every where, and warned every man to flie so farre from Philip, as none could tell there what man he was. Arcadian being by chance met in MACEDON, the Courtiers would have had Philip to have punished him, and not to let him escape out of his hands. Philip to the contrary spake him faire, and sent him Presents to his Lodging. Shortly after, he commanded they should make enquiry what talke Arcadian had of him among the GREEKS. Every man brought him word, that he did wonderfully commend and praise him wheresoever he came. Then said Philip unto them: I am a better Physician for evill speech then you are. Another time in the Assembly of the Olympian Games, as the GREEKS spake evill of him, his friends said that such ill speakers would be severely punished, to speake so much evill of him that had done them so much good. Nay, but what would they do then, answered he, if we did hurt them? Smicythus did often accuse Nicanor unto him, telling him that he did nothing else but speake evill of Philip: so that his best familiars thought it good he should be sent for, and be punished according to his deserts. Yea but (replied he) Nicanor is one of the honestest men of MACEDON: were it not better therefore to enquire whether the fault be in us, or not? And forthwith having made diligent search whence this discontentment of Nicanor came, he found that he was a man oppressed with extreme poverty, and that no man would relieve him in his necessity: whereupon he sent him immediately a good Present. Afterwards Smicythus brought word, that Nicanor every where spake great praises of Philip. See then, said he, how it dependeth upon our selves to be well spoken of. He was wont also to say, that he was much beholding unto the Counsellors of ATHENS, for that they speaking evill of him, were cause to make him an honest man of word and deed: For, said he, I do daily enforce my selfe both in my deeds and words to make them lyers. He sent home (as hath been spoken before) all the ATHENIANS Prisoners at the Battell of CHERONEA, without paying any Ransome, and yet moreover they asked for their beds, their Apparell, and all their baggage, and complained of the MACEDONIANS, because they did not deliver it unto them: When Philip heard of this, he fell a laughing, and said unto them that were near about him: How say you, do not you thinke these ATHENIANS, suppose they were overcome by us at the Play at Bones? He said also, that they which gave him counsell to deale sharply with the ATHENIANS, were men of an ill judgement, to counsell a Prince that did and suffered all things for Glory, to destroy the Theater of Glory, which was the City of ATHENS, by reason of Learning. There was a great number of Prisoners taken at a Battell, and he was present to see them sold by the drum, sitting in his Chaire, his Gown being turned up a little higher then was decent. Then there was one of the Prisoners that was a selling, that cried out aloud unto him: I beseech thee, O King, to pardon me that I be not sold, for I am thy friend from Father to the Sonne. Philip asked him, how and from whence this friendship should come between us? I will tell thee in thy eare, answered the Prisoner. Philip commanded they should bring him to him. Then the Prisoner coming near to him, told him softly: O King, let thy Gown fall down before a little, for as thou sittest, thou shewest that that is unfit to be seene. Then spake Philip aloud to his men, Deliver him, and let him go: for he is indeed one of my friends and well-willers, but I had forgotten it. Such was his behaviour to his Enemies, and those that spake evill of him.

and other good qualities.

Let us now speake somewhat of his justice, and of divers other affections worthy to be noted in him: the which do appeare something in his words, and by the effects that followed. And they do shew more and more, that this Prince had learned very much with Epaminondas, but above all, to be nobly minded, patient, and desirous of honour without shame: qualities that had been much more excellent in him, if he had not made such Merchandize with wicked men as he did, that sold their Countrey: besides that they saw in him an ardent ambition, as also in that he covered to be Capitaine-Generall of all the GREEKES, and the Triumphs preceding his death, and all his life do shew. And to this purpose he counsell'd his Sonne Alexander to speake graciously unto the MACEDONIANS, to winne their good wils, whilst he had leasure now to be courteous unto them, another reigning in the Kingdome: at if he would have said, that when he came to be King, he should carry the gravity of a Master and of a Lord, and that he should do justice. He gave him counsell also to seeke to get the love of those that bare credit and authority in good Towns, as well of the wicked as of the good, that he might afterwards use the good, and abuse the evill. But now to returne to his justice againe: Being a Judge betweene two bad men, he ordained that the one should stie out of MACEDON, and the other should runne after him. It is reported of him, that he had gotten together a number of the wickedest and most disordered men that were in his time, whom he lodged all together in a Towne which he had caused to be built, and called it PONEROPOLIS, the Towne of Knaves. He had on a time bestowed the Office of a Judge upon one recommended unto him by Antipater: but understanding afterwards that he used to paint his haire and beard, heooke it from him, saying, that he that used deceit in his haire, would hardly deale truly in a good Cause. Machetas pleaded a Cause on a time before him whilst he slept, so that not conceiving nor understanding well the matter, he wrongfully condemned him. Whereupon Machetas began to cry out, that he did appeale. Philip being angry at that word, asked him presently, unto whom he did appeale from him? Before thy selfe, O King, answered he, when thou art awake, and wilt give good eare to conceive of my Fact. These words touched Philip to the quicke, whereupon he rose up on his feete, and calling himselfe better to minde, knew that he had wronged Machetas in his sentence, and yet nevertheless he would not revoke his Judgement: howbeit he himselfe with his owne Money discharged the matter, whereupon the Suite was brought before him. Harpalus had a Kinman and a Friend of his called Crates, attainted and convicted of great crimes: he besought Philip, that paying the Fine, sentence should not be pronounced against this Crates, that he might avoide the shame and disgrace. But Philip answered him againe, It is better he should bare his owne blame and discredit, then I for him. A Souldier of his, a valiant man of his hauds, having by false report obtained of him the Gift and forfeiture of the goods of a MACEDONIAN: it fortun'd that the MACEDONIAN ill willing to put up such an outrage, bewrayed unto Philip the unthankfulnesse of the Souldier whose life he had saved. Philip was so offended with the villanie of this Souldier, that after he had revoked his Gift, he made him quail in such sort, that his wickednesse was knowne of every one, and the MACEDONIAN restored againe to all his goods. A poore old Woman being in Suite of Law, besought him to give Judgement, and pressed him continually: but he excused himselfe, and told her, he was not at leasure to heare it. The old Woman cried out aloud: Leave then to be King. He being astonied and lively pricked with this word, did heare her, and all others in order. As for his friends, Philo a Gentleman of THEBES had done him many pleasures at the time when he remained in hostage in the City of THEBES: he was lodged in his house, and after that he would never receive any Gifts or Presents of him. Whereupon Philip said unto him: Take not from me the Title and Honour of Invincible, being overcome by thee of courtesie and liberality. Word being brought him of the death of Hipparchus, borne in the Isle of EUBOIA, he was very sorry: and as one that stood by, told him he was ripe and ready to die for age: Yea, said he againe, for himselfe, but not for me, to whom he is dead too soone: for he is dead before he received any recompence of me, worthy the friendship he bare me. As touching houshold matters, he fell out on a time with his Wife Olympias: and his Sonne Alexander: in which time of his anger, Demaratus a Gentleman of CORINTH went to visit him. Philip then asked him, how, and after what manner the GREEKES lived one with another. Truly, answered Demaratus, thou carest much for the Peace and Union of the the GREEKES, since the persons that touch thee so nearely, and those whom thou oughtest to make much account of, are so separated from thee. This word made him consider so well of it, that afterwards he appeased his anger: the cause thereof is shewed in the beginning of Alexander's life; and so reconciled himselfe unto them. Being told him that his Sonne Alexander milked it, and complained that he begot bastards of other women: he told him, Since thou feest now, that thou shalt have many competitors with thee for the Kingdome after my death, endeavour thy selfe to be an honest man, that thou mayest come to the Crown not so much through me, being mine heir, as through thy selfe, for that thou art worthy. He perswaded him much, diligently to study Philosophie under Aristotle, to the end, said he, thou do not many things that I have done, whereof now I heartily repent me. Being on a time fallen backward, lying all alongst the place where they exercise wrestling: and wallowing up and downe, as if he had seen the figure and print of his body in the dust: O Hercules, said he, how little quantity of ground will serve us by nature; and yet we covet to inhabite all the world! He would on a time lodge his Campe in a faire ground: but being told that there was no forrage for the beasts, he was constrained to dislodge from thence, saying: What is our life, since we must take care even to place Asse? There was an host of his, that on a time bad him to supper with him. So, as he was going, he met divers by the way, whom he carried thither with him. Whereupon perceiving his host was much troubled, because he had not meate enough to feede so many mouthes: Philip seeing it, sent secretly to tell every one in their eares whom he brought with him, that they should keepe a place in their stomacke for the Tarr. The other believing that he spake in earnest, did forbear to eate, whereby there was meate enough for them all. That which is already said, is sufficient to make us know the natural disposition of this great Prince: whose end we are now about to describe unto you. He undertaking to passe into ASIA, to make war with the PERSIANS, in the state of Capitaine-Generall of the GREEKES: being desirous his voyage should be favoured of the gods, he asked of the propheteesse of DALPHES, whether he should overcome the King of PERSIA? she answered him:

Nature content with a lie-tie.

Philip beguil-
ed his friends

Philip deceived by an ambiguous oracle.

Cleopatra, Philip's daughter married with great solemn-ties.

To offer him in sacrifice, a man doth ready stand.
This oracle being doubtfull and obscure, Philip tooke it for his advantage: as if Apollo had told him, that the King of PERSIA should be slaine by him, as an oblation of sacrifice. But cleane contrary, the oracle threatned him with death in a day of a solemne feast: and that he should be slaine as a bull, whom they crowne with Garlands and hats of flowers, when they go about to sacrifice him. Notwithstanding supposing that the gods did favour his enterprise, he was very pleasant, perswading himselfe that ASIA should shortly be tributary to MACEDON. So he prepared sumptuous and magnificent sacrifices in honour of the gods, and made preparation for the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra. Now he being desirous to draw to this feast as many GREEKES as he could possible, to that end made Proclamation every where, that there should be Games of prize for Learning and Musicke, and sent to summon all his hostis and friends, in what part of GREECE soever they were, to come to this marriage: and commanded the Lords of his Court that they should do the like for their part. For he desired to shew the GREEKES all signes of friendship, and to make them the best chaire that could be possible, in recompence of the honour they had done him: to chuse him their Capitaine-Generall. There was a wonderfull assembly of people from all parts at this feast; and the marriage was solemnized betwixt Alexander King of EPHROS and Cleopatra, and the Games also at EGESIA City of MACEDON. Where not onely Philip's private friends, and the most notable men of the GREEKES but also the principal and chiefe Townes of GREECE (and among other ATHENS) gave him presents of many rich Crownes of gold. The decree of the people presenting a Crowne of Gold, and openly proclaimed by a Herald; the effect of it was: that if it happened any man having conspired or attempted ought against the person of King Philip, should stie to ATHENS in hope of privilege there; that he should be delivered into the hands of the King. In the middelt of this great Feast at the Marriage, there was an excellent Player of Tragedies, called Neoptolemus, that rehearsed verses touching the enterprise of Philip: and as if he meant to have reproved the pride of the King of PERSIA, he lively touched that of his matter Philip; and before he was ware, foretold his death in covert termes, and which might be applied (as also Philip did, blinded and astonied with his prosperity) unto the estate, and unto the King of PERSIA. Among other verses the beginning of it was very neare to this effect:

Surmount all haughtinesse that is Within this earthly vaine so wide:
Promise thy selfe a worldly blisse,
And prosperous life for ever sure,
Yet canst thou now no longer dure.
For some already have begun
T by ruine, which thou canst not shun.

And

And death neare to that breast of thine, Shall shortly breake off thy designe.

The day after this royall marriage, the Games beganne to be played, and the people ranne from all parts to the Theater to see them, even untill it was darke night. And in the morning at the break of day there was a proceffion, in the which (among many other sumptuous and magnificent shewes) they carried the images of twelve principall gods of GREECE, wonderfull cunningly wrought with great art; and then after them was borne the image of Philip for the thirteenth, as if he would have placed himselfe in ranke with his gods. When the Theater was full set with people, Philip himselfe came in the end, apparelled all in white, having commanded all his guard to follow him a far off: desirous to shew the GREEKS, that because of the great confidence he had of their faithfull friendship, he thought he needed no guard for his body. But at that time he was put to death after a strange sort: and that we may know by what occasion, we will take the matter further off.

There was in this Court a MACEDONIAN Gentleman, called Pausanias, borne in the Countrey of ORESTIDES, one of the Gentlemen Pensioners of Philip's Guard, that sometime was beloved for his beauty. He perceiving that the King loved another, whose name was as himselfe, Pausanias: began to gill him with injurious words, calling him Androgyne (as much to say, as womanish man) and reproved him that he abandoned his body to any that would. This second Pausanias very impatiently bare these words in his heart, yet made no reply to them, but onely imparted to his friend called Attalus what he meant to do; and within few dayes after he lost his life after a notable manner. Philip fought a battell with the SLAVONS; in the which this young man behaved himselfe very valiantly, right before the person of Philip: and received upon his body all the blowes they strake at him, so that he died in the field. This valiantnesse of his being blown abroad through the Army, Attalus that then was in great favour with the King, intreated the first Pausanias to come and suppe with him, and having made him drunke, he left his body to all the horse-keepers and mule-letters to be carnally abused. His drunkenesse having left him, he was so grieved at his heart for the outrage Attalus had done him, that he went and complained to the King himselfe. Philip was marvellously offended withall, because of the villany that was offered him. But because of the love he bare to Attalus, and also for that he stood in need of his service, and for that he was Uncle to Cleopatra, the last and well beloved wife of Philip, and appointed his Lieutenant for the warre of ASIA, he made as though he knew it not. But to appease Pausanias, he gave him great presents, and placed him amongst the number of them of the Guard about his person. Pausanias having made his complaint to Olympias, unto Alexander, and to some other, had sundry answers, but no justice at that time. Wherefore keeping this despite in his heart, he resolved not onely to be revenged of him which had done him this injury, but also of Philip that would do him no justice. But to further him in this divellish purpose, amongst others a Rhetorician called Hermocrates did set him on, whom Pausanias frequented to learne of him. Discourfing one day together, he asked him how a man might in a short time make himself famous, to be spoken of by every body? Hermocrates answered, in killing one that had done many great things: for, said he, it is of necessity, that remembring his facts, the name of him that killed him must also be comprised. Pausanias applying that to the purpose of his anger, having no patience to prolong time, his heart being so full of choler and griefe, determined with himselfe to execute his enterprize the same day the playes should be: the which he did, as followeth. He layed horses ready at the gate of the Theater, and went about it, having a sword under his Gowne, after the fashion of the GAULES as they weare it. When the time was come that Philip would himselfe to go to the Theater, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen that attended upon him, went into the Theater before him, who had commanded all the Gentlemen of his guard to come a good way behind him. Then Pausanias seeing Philip going all alone, ran to him, and gave him such a blow with his sword overthwart his flanks, that he ranne him through and through, so that he fell downe starke dead. The blow being given, he ranne away straight unto his horse, and some of the Guard ranne to Philip, others swiftly followed the murderer, among which was Leonidas, Perdiccas, and Attalus. Howbeit Pausanias that had gotten the start before, had easily mounted on horsebacke before the others could come neare him to overtake him, had it not been that in the way as he fled, he stumbled at the roote of a vine, which overthrew him. Then Perdiccas and the rest lighted on him at herose, and thrusting as him, killed him in the place. Behold how Philip that was the greatest King in his time of EUROPE, and for the greatnesse of his power, placed himselfe among the gods: was brought low, even to ranke with the weakest of the world, and died being but fixe and fourty yeares old, having reigned twenty foure yeares. That therefore whereof he gloried most, was in his skill of warres, and in the actions which he managed bravely, preferring that farre above all exploits of war. For (said he) in victory all that fight in the battell have their part; but in those things that I have atchieved unto, having wisely directed them, none is partaker of the honour but my selfe onely. He had five wives, the first was Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus King of the MOLSSIANS, of the line of Æacus, of whom were born Alexander surnamed the Great, and Cleopatra. Alexander succeeded his father: and for Cleopatra, she was married to her Uncle Alexander King of EPIRUS, and brother of Olympias. The second wife of Philip was Andate, a Lady of SLAVONIA, of whom he had a daughter called Cyne, married unto Amyntas his Cousin Germane: who being slain, she was betrothed unto Lagarus King

King of the AGRINIANS, who died before consummation of Marriage. After the death of Alexander the Great, the being of a manly courage, and opposing her selfe against those that would deprive the children of Alexander of the Crowne of MACEDON, was slaine by Perdiccas commandment. The third was Phila: and the fourth was called Mede, the daughter of the King of THRACIA. These two had neither of them any children. And lastly being too old to marry, he married Cleopatra, the daughter of Hippostratus, and Attalus Niece: at the marriage of whom he would have killed his sonne Alexander, for throwing a cup at Attalus head: after the which followed great trouble and foule stirre betwixt Philip, Olympias and Alexander: but Demaratus the CORINTHIAN saved all that againe. Of this last wife, he first had a daughter called Europe, and then a sonne called Caranus, whom Olympias put to a cruell death. For his concubines, the one called Arfinone, being gotten with childe by Philip, she fell into Lagus hands, unto whom she gave Proton afterwards King of EGYPT. The second was a Girle of LARISSA, called Philinna, of whom he begat Aridaus: who first of all was poysoned, and in the end cruelly murdered by Olympias: being the last King of the race of Temenides in MACEDON. For the issue of Alexander, they were rejected by Cassander. The third was Nicaspolis, a woman of THESSALY, and Pasens sister, Tyrant of PHERES: of whom he had a daughter called Thessalonica, whom Cassander married, and was afterwards slaine by Anipater. The end of Alexander, of his mother, and of his children and successors, was lamentable in divers sorts. And thus we see in Philip and in his race, how many wayes the high Judge of the world hath in his power and hand to overthrow the greatest, when they are drunke with their prosperity.

IN the second yeare of the second Olympiad, Archias a CORINTHIAN, not daring to returne againe into his City for a foule fact committed by him in the perfon of an honest youth called Atheon: he tooke the sea and sailed into SICILIA with certaine CORINTHIANS and DORIANS, and there built the City of SYRACUSA, the which by proceffe of time became so great, that it had within it as it were foure Townes, of the which one was called the Ile, the second Acradine, the third Tyche, and the least Neapolis lay neare unto the other, with a Fort called Hexapyle, which commanded all the other, and it was in the top of a high place which they called Epipotes, as much as to say, as over all the other Towns. It was governed at the first, by the command and power of Archias onely: but he being killed by Telephus, whom he had abused in his infancy, the SYRACUSANS gathered together of diverse parts, brought their estate to Aristocratie, which flourished for a time. But being come to passe that Tyndaris one of the Lords of the Town carried himselfe after such a manner, that he made many jealous that his drift and policy was to make himselfe chiefe Lord: the other Lords made a law called Petalisme, to meet with this practise: howbeit it was that that increased his enterprife. The effect of this law was, that the name of him that aspired to make himselfe absolute Lord of the City, should be written in an Olive leafe, the which being put into the hand of this Lord, without further ceremony it was to tell him that he was banished the City for five yeares, much after the fashion that is reported of the Ostracisme of the ATHENIANS. By meanes of this Petalisme, the Lords banished another, so that in the end, the people became Lord. But hereupon a dangerous sedition happening amongst them, Gelo, Lord of the City of GELE, did so wisely look into the troubles of the SYRACUSANS: that they chose him King in the second yeare of the threescore and fourth Olympiade. After him succeeded Hieron, who at the beginning carried himselfe very well: but afterwards falling into acquaintance with the Poets Simonides, Pindarus and Bacchylides, which taught him many good things, he reigned very proudly. So, he having reigned about twelve yeares, left his brother Thrafylbulus his successor: who for his cruelties and infolencies was driven out of SYRACUSA by force, and went to LOCRES, and there ended the rest of his dayes. Then the SYRACUSANS established the government of Lords, which continued sixty yeares: in which time they make warre with the AGRIGENTINES, and compelled them to sue for peace: they they destroy the TRINACRIANS and their Town: they set upon the LEONTINES, which are aided by the ATHENIANS under the conduct of Laches and Carceadas, who behaved themselves so evil, that at their returne home they were banished. Shortly after the new troubles betwixt the SYRACUSANS and the LEONTINES, the ATHENIANS sent Phaax into SICILIA to kindle the fire a little, and to mutine the one against the other. Howbeit it had no good successe, but rather raised a cruell warre betwixt the SYRACUSANS and ATHENIANS, in the which at the last Nicias and Demosthenes were overcome by sea and land both, and afterwards put to death, and the souldiers of ATHENS that were prisoners most cruelly used. The SYRACUSANS lift up with this victory, did put downe their Lordly Government, and brought it to a popular state again. Then thinking to be revenged of the CARTHAGINIANS that were come to the aide of the SEGESTANS against the SELINONTINES, which were their friends: they sent Diocles with foure thousand good men against Hannibal the sonne of Gisco, who lay in Campe at that time before HIMERA, the which he wanne after he had overcome Diocles, and slaine the most part of his Troopes. The SYRACUSANS casting their anger for this losse upon Hermocrates one of their chiefe Citizens, they banished him with the Petalisme, and drave him out of the Towne. He helping himselfe with the meanes he had in his hand, made up and armed five Gallies, and afterwards with certaine banished men of HIMERA, attempted to put in againe into SYRACUSA. But seeing he could not prevaile, he landed and possessed the ruined Towne of SELINONTE. He repaired it, called home againe all the inhabitants dispersed through SICILIA, fortified himselfe there, and in few dayes got together a Troope of fixe thousand men. With these forces he set upon them of PALERME, and MOTYE, in league with the CARTHAGINIANS, overcame them in a pitched field, maintained his friends, and followed his victory. The SYRACUSANS hearing good report of Hermocrates valour, beganne to repent them that they had so dishonourably used him. He on the other side being advertised by his friends of the good affection of the Citizens unto him: to winne their good favour againe, he was very carefull to gather together the bones of those that were killed by HIMERA under the leading of Diocles, and sent them to SYRACUSA, in Carts very richly set out. For all this they sent not for him home, the SYRACUSANS being afraid of him, for that he was a man of such courage and wisdom, lest he should make himselfe Lord of the Towne. He seeing himselfe thus refused, went backe to SELINONTE, and shortly after being solicited by his friends, he found meanes by night to come into SYRACUSA, and possessed the Acradine. The SYRACUSANS tooke Armes immediately, fought with Hermocrates, killed him in the Market-place with part of his traine, and banished those that favoured him. His friends saved some of them from the violence of the Citizens, and amongst others Dionysius the sonne of Hermocrates, a plaine Citizen of SYRACUSA, whose life we presently write of.

nysius slaine.*

Now it is reported, that his mother being with childe of him, dreamed that she was brought to bed of a Satyre, and that the Soothsayers being asked their opinion, answered, she should have a sonne that should be famous above all the GREEKES. Furthermore, a young gentlewoman of SYRACUSA called Himera, some time before Dionysius made himself Lord of the City, dreamed that she was taken up to heaven, by a guide that having carried her to and fro, in the end brought her before Jupiter, at whose feet she saw a young man with a yellow hair, bound with iron chains: and asking her guide what he was: It is, said the other, the cruell scourge of SICILIA and ITALY, the which shall spoil a great Country, as soon as his bolts be off his feet. Within few yeares after, Dionysius having already seized upon the estate, as he came to make his entry into SYRACUSA, and that the Citizens went out to meet him to do him honour: Himera being there by chance, knew him, and straight cried out: This was the young man that she saw in heaven. This being reported to Dionysius, he caused them to kill the young damosell. Another time his horse falling in the mire that he could not get out, Dionysius left him fast there: but the poor beast with struggling got himself out, and ranne after his master: bringing in his main a swarm of Bees. This did hearten him, especially through the counsell of his Soothsayers, to follow his purpose to subdue his Country: the which he obtained by this means. The CARTHAGINIANS desirous to make themselves great in SICILIA, sent thither their Capitaine Himileo with a great Army: against whom the SYRACUSANS made head, wanne a battell, and killed fixe thousand of his men. Notwithstanding this, he went and besieged AGRIGENTE, and having upon surpriseth overthrowne the Army of the SYRACUSANS by sea, he enforced them that were besieged to save themselves as they could, entred into this great rich City abandoned, and took the spoile of it. The AGRIGENTINES that escaped gave the alarme, through all SICILIA, and retiring themselves to SYRACUSA their friend Town, beganne in full assembly of the City to accuse the Capitaines of SYRACUSA, saying, that by their treason the Country was sold unto their enemies. Dionysius, the son of Hermocrates, a young man of a stout heart, and that did embrace great matters in his mind, being in this assembly, took hold of the occasion offered; and seeing the people out of countenance, he stepped forth, charged the Capitaines very much, and gave counsell that they should do justice: whereupon the Magistrates did set a fine on their heads. And having found Philisus inclined that way, and gotten money of him (who was very rich) to pay this fine, with promise to furnish others if they were condemned: he followed his purpose in other assemblies, having speech at will, and a comely manner withall, so that almost for little or nothing, he wane the hearts of the people, who moved by his oration, did cashier the old Captains, and chose new, and among others Dionysius, who was a good souldier, and had made proofe of his valiantnesse in divers encounters against the CARTHAGINIANS. But after they had chosen him Captaine, he never came to counsell with his other companions, nor would not be acquainted with them: but under hand, made a foule report runne abroad that they practised with the enemies. This made men of good judgement to presume that he himselfe went about to make some alteration: and they could not forbear to blame him for it. Nevertheless the people not looking so inwardly into it, they esteemed him very much. Hereupon many assemblies were made to think of their affaires in warres, in one of the which Dionysius perceiving the SYRACUSANS astonished, gave advice that they should call home their banished men: saying that it was a great mockery to run into GREECE and ITALY for aide since they heard at their doores such as had been Citizens, who had rather die like vagabonds, then serve the enemy. And that the favour they should shew them, would spurre them forward to do their Country good service. The wisest men durst not gain-say this advice, perceiving that the people did incline unto it: that if they hindred that, it was to get as many enemies as there were banished: and that they being called home, should thanke none but Dionysius, at whose commandement they would ever be afterwards. No man speaking a word, the decree of repeale was authorized by the people, and the banished men returned to SYRACUSA. In the middelt of all this businesse, letters were brought from GEELE, which demanded aide. Dionysius offered himselfe straight, and was sent thither with two thousand footmen, and four hundred horse. Being arrived at GEELE, and finding the City in trouble, he tooke the peoples part, accused the principals, made them be put to death, and their goods forfeited. With which forfeiture he payed the ordinary garrison of GEELE, and promised double pay to them that followed him from SYRACUSA: unto the which he returned immediately, having the favour of his souldiers. So all the people ranne about him in multitudes, asking him where the enemies were, and what they did? You do not consider, said he, that your enemies indeed are in your Town. They that governe in your estate are more to be feared, then the CARTHAGINIANS: for whilst you are busie about your playes and feasts, they divide the common treasure among themselves, and pay not the souldiers. In the meane space Himilco prepareth himselfe to come and besiege you, whereof your governors make no reckning, neither do they give any order for it. I knew this well enough before, but now I am most assured of it: for Himilco lent a Trumpet unto me, under colour of certaine prisoners, and secretly bad him tell me, that he would give me more then any other of my companions, so that I would not search him too narrowly: and if so be that I would not helpe him, at the least yet that I would not hinder him. And therefore thinke with your selves to finde another Captaine in my place: for it is no reason whilst others sell the town to the enemies, that I should go hazard my selfe with my fellow Citizens, and in danger in the end that they should thinke of me I should be partaker with the wicked practises of others. Those that heard what he spake, being marvelously offended, carried these words immediately all about the Town. But for the present time every one went home to their house, sad, and troubled in their minds. The morrow after, as those that should speake before the people did draw by lot of letters, that they might know in order how they should speake, and that the letter F. came to his lot: some flander by told him, this F. signifieth * Foole, Dionysius, because thou wilt tell us great follies. No, replied he quickly: that I shall be a Monarch. Presently the people being assembled, and his turne being come to speake, he accused his other companions with great vehemency, was heard very attentively, and with great praise of all the people, whom the day before he had angered very much: so that in the end there were some of the assembly cryed out, that necessity required that Dionysius should be chosen alone Captaine General, with all authority and soveraigne power, and that it was no tarrying till the enemies be under our walls, and that he was a fit man to take care of this businesse: and as for traitors, that they should thinke of them at better leisure. Hereupon the people chose Dionysius their Captaine General, giving him full authority, and power of the affairs of the Common-wealth, and praying him to consider of all that should be expedient to resist the enemies. He seeing his enterprife so well grounded, propoundeth a decree to the people, that the souldiers pay should be doubled over that it was before: for that would make them more courageous and willing to do good service. And as for money, that the SYRACUSANS should take no thought for that, for he knew a way how to come by it well enough. This so suddaine advancement, and his bold promises joyned with the disposition of this young man, made many suspect him that had any understanding and judgement: inasmuch that some beganne to goe and come to houses to conferre together to finde meanes betimes to withstand the tyranny, which had now (as they say) put the irons in the fire. But Dionysius having an eye abroad, and a number of spies that slyly fell into companies, being afraid they would do him some hurt, determined to provide for it by a farre fetch to fight, but very fit to serve his turne: which was, to obtaine licence to chuse a guard for his person, unto the which he came, as followeth. He proclaimed in the Town that those that were able to bear Armes should follow him, and to make their rendez-vous with their Armes at a day set down at the Towne of the LEONTINES, and bring victuals with them for one moneth. There was then in that Towne a Garrison of the SYRACUSANS: the banished, and all sorts of men withdrew themselves, whom Dionysius hoped would have taken his part, for that they were men which desired nothing more then change and alteration, and perswaded himselfe that few of the SYRACUSANS would follow him. Hereupon he went himselfe into the field, and being encamped near the Towne, one caused his friends to give the Alarme, and to cry helpe, as if the enemies had environed him to kill him in his Tent: and making as though he had been marvellously afraid, he fled, and saved himselfe by swiftnesse within the Castle of the Towne, where he passed all the rest of the night, made fires fires all about, and sent for his souldiers in whom he put most trust, as a man that is afraid, seeing his enemies lie in waite for him. The next morning some of the people of SYRACUSA being gathered together in the Towne of the LEONTINES, in open assembly he made a long discourse of that that had passed, to make them believe that his evil willers would have surprised him, and could speak so well, that the people appointed him six hundred souldiers to guard his person, such as he himselfe would chuse out. Immediately he chose young men to the number of a thousand, which had nothing to lose, hardy and desperate to put any thing in execution that they were commanded. These he furnished with all things necessary, and made them great promises: so that he wanne their hearts, and got unto him the souldiers strangers that were in the SYRACUSANS pay. Howbeit he changed the Captaines from their companies, and put in their places some other made to his hand. And afterwards he sent Dexippus, a wife and valiant Captaine LAGEDEMONIAN, backe again into his Country, of whom he stood in fear, and perceived he would be a barre in his way to hinder that he went about. Over and above that he sent for the souldiers of the Garrison of GEELE, and gathered together all them that were banished, all Theeves and Rogues that would come and serve him, judging them to be fit men to serve the turne he purposed. When he had gotten a great troop of such Rakehels, he straight returned to SYRACUSA, and lodged his forces in the Arsenall, and then shewed himselfe openly Lord, and Tyrant, without any longer dissimulation. This amazed and grieved the SYRACUSANS most extremely: nevertheless they were enforced to bear this yoke which they could not help, because the Town was full of souldiers strangers, and for that also they were afraid of the CARTHAGINIANS that were near unto them with a mighty Army. All this happened, Dionysius being but five and twenty years old. In the third year of the ninety three Olympiads, and in the three hundred seven and fourtieth year of the foundation of ROME. Thus you see how this young man, of a base condition, meanly born, made himself Lord of one of the greatest Common-wealths in the world at that time, and continued this usurpation all the dayes of his life, which was the space of thirty eight yeares.

This being done, he made them all rich and wealthy that aided him in this enterprife, drave out all those he could finde that withstood these his attempts, put to death before all the people Daphneus and Demarchus, two of the chiefeest men, and of greatest power that were at that time in SYRACUSA, and that had most crossed him of all others in the device of his purpose. Afterward, because he would yet strengthen himselfe the better, he married Hermocrates daughter, a SYRACUSAN Captaine, that overcame Nicias and the ATHENIANS, and married his sister unto Polyxenus, brother in law unto Hermocrates. Whilst things passed thus, the CARTHAGINIANS, being masters of AGRIGENTE, after they had spoiled, burnt and razed it, they marched away with their General Himilco, and went and besieged the City of GEELE, friend to the SYRACUSANS, in manner of a like distance from SYRACUSA and AGRIGENTE, very farre in land, when the other two were ports of the sea. The besieged did wonderfull valiantly defend themselves, their Towne being weake and kept by the Citizens onely, accompanied with their wives and children that would not forsake them. Dionysius hearing of their necessity, brought a stronge aide unto them of thirty thousand footmen, and a thousand horse, besides a great number of Gallies, that lay off and on upon the Ille, to cut off victuals from Himilco, and to land also. But when they came to joyne, Dionysius having divided his bands into three troopes to trouble his enemy the more, he could not do so well but the CARTHAGINIANS had the better, and slew many of his men. He very hardly escaping with his troope entered into the Towne, and there called his friends together to counsel what they were best to do. They seeing the place dangerous, and of great disadvantage to hazard battell in, gave him counsell to retire againe. He sent a Trumpet over night to Himilco, to pray him to surcease armes till the morning, that he might gather the dead bodies together to bury them. In the mean space, in the first watch of the night, he made all the people come out of the Towne, and dislodged himselfe about midnight, leaving there two thousand men lightly armed, commanding them to make great fires and noise, that the enemies might thinke that he and his men were still in the Towne: and that they at the breake of the day should come to their troopes. Dionysius having escaped thus, came unto CAMARINE, a Towne halfe-way betwixt GEELE and SYRACUSA, and commanded all the inhabitants to dislodge and come to SYRACUSA, that they might avoide the cruelties of the CARTHAGINIANS who sacked GEELE. So, all the inhabitants of these two Townes compelled to leave their houses and Country, all the fields and high-ways were full of women, children, and of poore people of the Country. This moved the souldiers against Dionysius, who accused him that he had done this of purpose, that he might more easily seise upon the other Cities of SICILIA, which should be destroyed by the barbarous CARTHAGINIANS: and thus they complained one to another of the little aide he had given to the Townesmen of GEELE: how the souldiers of his guard had dealt cowardly in their service, and ran away without the losse of a man of theirs, and no body pursued after them. Upon this discontentment, the ITALIAN souldiers that came out of ITALIE, took their journey to returne home. And the men of Armes of SICILIA at the first began to lye in waite to kill Dionysius on the way: but seeing that the souldiers of his guard were never from him, nor he from them, they departed all together, and went with speed towards SYRACUSA, and found them that were left there in Garrison, lodged in the place of the Arsenall, who knew nothing what had happened before GEELE. By this meanes being entered without resistance, they sacked the palace of Dionysius, where they met with great riches, and did so villanously abuse his wife, that for griefe she killed her selfe. But about the time that they departed from the Campe, Dionysius imagining by the way what would follow after this, chose out certaine footmen and horsemen which he thought he might best trust about his person, and went with all speed possible with them to SYRACUSA, supposing he should not overcome these men of Armes, unlesse he did as they. And even as he thought, so it came to passe: for they perswading themselves that Dionysius could not well tell what courle to take, whether to follow them, or to keep with his Army: thought they had wonne all, and walked up and downe the Towne telling stories of the cowardlinesse of Dionysius: who having marched well-neare nineteene leagues at one journey, came about midnight to the Gates of ACRADINE, with about an hundred horse and six hundred footmen: and finding it shut, caused store of Fagots, Reeds, and Sedge of the Fennes to be laid against the Gate, wherewith the SYRACUSANS use to burn their Lime, and which they found there ready at hand. Whilst this Gate was burning, his men that could not follow him so fast, arrived one after another. And so the Gate being burnt he entred, and found in the Market-place some of these men of Armes, who in haste had set themselves in order of battell: but on the suddain they were engaged, and killed with pikes and darts. Dionysius on the other side, he ran through the Towne, putting them all to the sword he met here and there in the streets, that were running to aide their men. And not staying so, he entred into their houses whom he knew to be his enemies, killed some of them, and drave others out of the City. The rest of the men of Armes fled, some here, some there, and the next morning all his force arrived at SYRACUSA. But they of GELA, and of CAMARINE being angry with him, went into the City of the LEONTINES.

The Carthaginians by reason of the plague demand peace.

In the midst of all these stirs and doings, the plague being hot in the Campe of the CARTHAGINIANS, enforced Himilco to send an Herald unto SYRACUSA to demand peace. Dionysius accepted it very willingly. So peace was concluded, that the CARTHAGINIANS should have the SICANIANS, besides all the Townes which they had before the war in their power: That they of SELINONTE, of AGRIGENTE, of HIMERE, of GELA, and of CAMARINE, might returne home to their houses, dwell in their Country, and in their Townes without walls, paying a certaine yearly tribute unto the CARTHAGINIANS: That the LEONTINES, those of MESSINA and all other the SICILIANS should be free, and enjoy their liberties and priviledges: That the SYRACUSANS should remaine under the government of Dionysius: That the prisoners and Gallies taken in this warre should be restored againe on either side. By this meanes of this peace Dionysius got the CARTHAGINIANS out of SICILIA, established his principality surer then ever, and married againe two other wives together: the one a stranger of the City of LOCRES, called Doris: the other of SYRACUSA called Arifomache, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefe man of all the Citizens. He had asked a wife of them of RHEGE, but they refused him, and scorned his tyranny; of whom he was cruelly revenged, as we will tell you hereafter. It is reported that he married them both in one day, and it was never knowne which of them he knew first: for the rest, that ever afterwards he shewed them both a like favour. They did ordinarily eate together with him, and both of them by turnes lay with him. They of SYRACUSA were desirous that his wife of SYRACUSA should be preferred before the stranger. But Doris had this good hap, to bring forth Dionysius eldest son: which served his turne well to defend himselfe, that she was a Foraigner. Arifomache to the contrary was married a long time to Dionysius and had no children though he was very desirous to have one by her. In suchom that he put Doris mother to death, charging her that she had by charmes and forceries kept back Arifomache from conceiving. But afterwards she had children, to wit, two sons, Nisus, and Hipparinus: and two daughters, Arete, and Sophrosyne. Dionysius the younger, married his siter Sophrosyne: and Arete was married unto Thearides, brother to Dionysius the elder: and her second husband was Dion, the brother of Arifomache. Furthermore, considering that the SYRACUSANS being delivered from the war of the CARTHAGINIANS, should have leifure to thinke to recover their liberty againe: and perceiving that the quarter they called the Isle was stronger of situation, and easier to keep then any other of the three: he enclosed it in with a strong wall from the rest, and built there many great and high Towers, Palaces to keep his Courts, halls for his Counsell and publike assemblies, goodly Galleries, and spacious Gatehouses to contain a great number of people. And to retire himselfe unto upon a suddain motion of the common people, he built a marvellous strong Castle, within the compasse whereof he enclosed the Arsenal, where might lie in docke threescore Gallies: and there was a Gate also to shut to, into the which could enter but one Galley at a time. Then chusing out the goodliest and best place of all the territory of SYRACUSA, he divided it among his friends, and gave it unto them that had charge of men of war under him. That which remained, he distributed by equal portions unto other inhabitants of the Town, as well natural born Citizens, as strangers, come from other parts to dwell at SYRACUSA, concluding under the name of Citizens the bondmen enfranchised, whom he called the new Burgeses: and distributed to the people also the houses of SYRACUSA, those reserved of the quarter of the Isle, which he gave unto his friends and souldiers.

Dionysius fortified himselfe strongly against future dangers.

Dionysius made war against the free Cities of Sicilia.

So having as he thought well assured his estate, he began to make war upon the free Cities of SICILIA, under the colour that they favoured the CARTHAGINIANS. HERBESSE, a City in firme land near unto the mountaines, in the heart of the Country, was the first he attempted, and went and besieged it. But the SYRACUSANS that were a great number in his Army, and well appointed, began to have secret meetings, and to blame themselves, for that they joynd not with the men of Armes to drive out this Tyrant. He whom Dionysius had given them for their Capitaine called Doricus, was aware of their conferences, and threatened one that spake louder then the others: who who replied so fiercely againe, that the Capitaine came to him in choler to strike him: but his companions took the quarrell, and did so contend against him, that they killed the Capitaine in the place. Then stirring up their fellow Citizens to recover their liberty, they sent for the men of Armes of the SYRACUSANS, who were retired into the fort of ETNE. Dionysius amazed with this change, presently raised his siege, and with all expedition tooke his way towards SYRACUSA, that he might be there first. After he was gone, those that had mutined chose them for their leaders that had killed Capitaine Doricus, went and encamped themselves with the men Armes before SYRACUSA, in place called Epipies to make war with the Tyrant, having stopped all the passages that he could not come out into the field. And forthwith they sent to them of RHEGE and MESSINA, to pray them to send them aide: which they obtained, to wit, ninety Gallies well appointed. Furthermore, they promised by open proclamation, a great sum of money to him that would kill the Tyrant: and to the strangers that were in pay, to make them Burgeses as themselves, if they would take their part against him. They provided Engines of battery to beat down the walles of the Isle, and every day gave new assaults unto them, and made very much of all the souldiers strangers that took their part. Whereupon Dionysius seeing himselfe shut out of the field, and that his men forsooke him every hour, assembled his friends to consult with them what was to be done. Some counselled him to tarry, alledging that tyranny and absolute power usurped by him, was a faire Tomb. Polyxenus his brother was of the mind, that he should save himselfe on the swiftest horse he had in his stable, in the lands which the CARTHAGINIANS held in SICILIA. But Philistus, who afterwards wrote the story of his selfe, said then, that Dionysius should neither flee away, nor yeeld up his tyranny, the which he should never forgo but by force, and his feet forward. Dionysius tooke hold of this opinion, and resolved with himselfe to abide all extremity, rather then to yeeld up his place. But in this case he fortun'd to come to see a butcher slaughter an ox, and having observed that at one stroke he fell down stark dead: Alas, said he, were it not a great shame that for fear of death which lasteth so little while, and is so soon gone, I should leave so goodly and great a Seigniorie? But knowing what people he had to deale withall, he sent ambassadors unto them that kept him in so straightly, to beseech them to permit him with safety to come out of the Town with his followers. Even at that instant he sent men to the souldiers CAMPANIANS, to promise them all that they would have, so they would come and besiege SYRACUSA. The Townemen having suffered him to go his way with five ships, slept quietly in hope that he would be gone: and cashiered a part of their souldiers, supposing they should need no longer to besiege it. So that their souldiers dispersed themselves here and there in the fields, even as if the tyranny had been put downe. But the CAMPANIANS allured by Dionysius promises, came into the field, and being come to AGYRIDE, they left their carriage, to be so much the sooner before SYRACUSA. They were twelve hundred horsemen, and made such speed, that they surpris'd the SYRACUSANS, and in despite of them rode through the Town unto the Castle of Dionysius, in whole aide also at the very same time there arrived by sea, three hundred other souldiers: so that now he became more courageous then ever he was. The SYRACUSANS on the other side began to disfigure themselves, some being of one minde some of another: which Dionysius understanding, he made a sally out upon them that kept the quarter called NEAPOLIS, or new Towne, and put them all to flight: howbeit many were not killed: for Dionysius riding every where about, willed his men to kill none that fled. Thus were the SYRACUSANS driven and dispersed in the field, where they gathered about the horsemen above seven thousand. Now for Dionysius, he having caused them to be buried that were slaine in this conflict, he sent ambassadors unto ETNE to them that were retired thither, to intreate them to be at peace, and to returne home to their houses, promising them by oath, that he would never be revenged for any thing they had practis'd or done against him. Those that had wives and children at SYRACUSA, were compelled to trust to his words and promises. But when the Ambassadors alledged to the others, the humanity of their master in burying the dead: they answered, that the Tyrant deserved to have as much done to him, and that they prayed the gods they might quickly requite him. For all this they would not stir out of ETNE, expecting opportunity to set upon their enemy: who being escaped from so great a danger, he courteously used them that returned, to entice the others to follow. And for the rest, after he had well payed the CAMPANIANS, he put them out of the City, suspecting their inconstancy and treason. They departing from SYRACUSA, went unto the City of ATELLE, where they prevailed so much, that they were received into the Towne to dwell there. But their wickednesse burst out into such extremity, that one night they set upon the naturall inhabitants, killed every man that was able to beare Armes, and afterwards by force thrust out their wives: and by this meanes made themselves masters of the Towne, and of all the territory thereabout. At the same time Aristus, one of the chiefe men of LACEDÆMON was sent unto SYRACUSA, upon a rumour given out among the people, that it was to drive out the Tyrant: but the effect shewed that it was but to negotiate with him, and to bind him unto them, to serve their turnes in their affairs. Aristus then immediately after his arrivall having had secret conference with Dionysius, he began to mutine the SYRACUSANS, promising them all the aide he could, for the recovery of their liberty. But afterwards he himselfe killed Nicoles the CORINTHIAN, who had promised the SYRACUSANS to be the head of this enterprise: and accusing them that gave credit to his words, he made the Tyrant more bold and stronger then ever. So did he also begin to shew himselfe more then before: for he found the meanes to send the SYRACUSANS into the fields to get in their corne and harvest, and in the meane space whilst they were out of the City, he went into the houses himselfe, and fetched out out all their armes that had any. Then he environed his Castle round about with another second wall, built divers ships, and assembled a great number of souldiers strangers, whom he afterwards entertained. Now he thinking himselfe too little a Lord, undertooke to conquer some frontier Townes near unto the territory of the SYRACUSANS, and before he would assaile them, he brought his Army before ENNE, which he wanne presently. From thence he came to besiege the City of the LEONTINES, the which having resisted him, after he had foraged and preyed the Country about, he turned unto the Townes of the naturall SICILIANS, making as though he meant to set upon them, to the end that those of CATANE, and of NAXE, seeing the warre in another place, should care the lesse for themselves. So being neare unto the Town of ENNE, he put into Limnestus head, a Citizen of the same, that he should take upon him to make himselfe Lord of the Towne, promising him to helpe him in it: which the other executed. Howbeit he kept the Town for himselfe, and shut the Gates against Dionysius: who being angry with this repulse, counsellled the ENNIANS to drive out this new Tyrant. The people being set on by him, ran one day in armes into the Market-place, and cried, Liberty. Dionysius understanding that, followed with some of his faithful friends, tooke hold of Limnestus, and delivered him to the ENNIANS, and went out of the Towne againe immediately, to make others to trust him. From thence he went unto CATANE, and wanne the Towne through the treason of Arcefilans Captaine of the same: tooke all the armes from the inhabitants, and left a good Garrison there. Procles Captaine of NAXE, shortly after, played even the like part that Arcefilans had done, and was well recompensed for it: and all his kinsmen and friends were given him: but the other inhabitants were sold by the drum, their Towne destroyed, and their lands given to the SICILIANS, neighbors to SYRACUSA. For those of CATANE, they were also sold to them that would give most within SYRACUSA, and their Towne given to the souldiers CAMPANIANS. This made the LEONTINES hold up their hands, leave the Town, and to dwell at SYRACUSA. Now Dionysius fortified SYRACUSA anew, and having determined to close in the quarter called Epipoles with walls, he assembled threecore thousand labourers distributed by troopes, and serving skilful masters, accompanied with Mafons that had their day-work. These men encouraged by his presence, by his promises and gifts, finished the wall in three weeks of a reasonable height and thickness, being little lesse then two leagues about. The banished men of SYRACUSA being fled to RHEGE, did what they could possible to move the inhabitants to make war against Dionysius. They laboured it so well, that in the end the RHEGIANS went into the field, and induced the Governors of MESSINA to keep them company. But a MESSENIAN called Leomedon, having discouraged the troopes, every one went home againe, and did nothing: and as for Dionysius, he looked no further into them, but the RHEGIANS and MESSENIANS having sent unto him to treat of peace, he judging that the friendship of these two Cities would be very expedient for him, made peace with them.

Threecore thousand labourers to build and fortifie.

Dionysius preparations against the Carthaginians.

So having assured himself on that side, and considering that many GREEKES of SICILIA fled into the Townes which were subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, and that there were Townes untouched, unto the which they carried their goods: he thought that so long as he was at peace with them, divers of his subjects would be willing to do the like. Howbeit that in making war with them, those whom the CARTHAGINIANS should overcome by armes, would come to his side. Furthermore, word was brought him that CARTHAGE was wonderfully afflicted with the plague, which did the more strengthen him in his resolution. But knowing that he had to deal with mighty enemies of all the people of EUROPE, and that this war would not so soone be ended: he gathered together into SYRACUSA out of all the coasts of ITALY, of GREECE, and of SICILIA, the best workmen and artificers, unto whom he gave great wages, and great gifts unto those that were most skilfull and diligent. Who labouring in envy the one of the other, they built up in a short time two hundred Gallies, repaired an hundred and ten that had served a long time, forged an hundred and forty thousand bucklers or targets, so many swords and daggers, as many helmets and fallers: fourteen thousand corcelets, curaces, and brigandines of all sorts: Engines of battery of all fashions, and of darts, an incredible and unestimable number. Touching the Gallies, to arme them with Pilots, Mariners, and Galley-slaves, the City of SYRACUSA furnished for the one halfe: and Dionysius for the other halfe payed the souldiers strangers. The furniture of these ships, armes, and harnesse being ready, he began to gather his Army together, and would not for saving charges put himselfe in readinesse before. He gathered together within SYRACUSA all those that were able to beare armes: he drew out of the Townes subject unto him, all that were meet for warre: he leaved men out of LACONIA with consent of the Lords of SPARTA, and got a great number out of all parts because he payed well, and gave them very gracious entertainment that came to serve him. But above all the rest he shewed himself a marvellous friend to the RHEGIANS, and MESSENIANS, that had a reasonable strong Army in readinesse to be employed: being afraid that so soone as they should see the CARTHAGINIANS passed into SICILIA, they would joyne with them: for to which side soever these two Cities would incline, they would helpe to make a great weight in the balance, and to bring the victory to fall on their side. It was at that time that he gave a great Country of extent unto the MESSENIANS, and prayed the RHEGIANS to give him a wife of their Town. But they would not heare of this in any wise. Whereupon he went to the LODRIANS, who gave him her of whom we have spoken before: and for many dayes together did nothing else but make banquets and feasts, as well to his souldiers, as unto the more part of the Citizens of SYRACUSA. For he had now changed his first sourenesse and cruelty of a Tyrant into gentleness: he did use his subjects in a more civil fort, put no more of them to death, nor banished any more of them, as he did at the first beginning. Shortly after this marriage was past, he assembled the people of SYRACUSA, and did persuade them to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, telling them that they were enemies of all the universall GREEKES, and of those especially that dwelt in SICILIA, whom they practised by all meanes they could, to make subject unto them. And that albeit they did not now make any alteration, it was because of the plague that tormented them much: but so soone as they were free from that, they should see the effects of their malice against all the inhabitants of SICILIA, which they cast long before in their minds. And that it were better for him, since it must needs be, soone or late, to beginne to make warre upon them, they being now weakke, then to tarry till they were recovered again: and that it was a great shame to them to suffer the Towns of GREECE so near unto them, to be made subject to barbarous people: that being desirous to recover their liberty, so much more willing they would be to yeeld themselves unto the SYRACUSANS, so soon as they should see that it were open war. These and other reasons were received and allowed by the SYRACUSANS, who were no lesse desirous then himself to wake warre with them. For they hated the CARTHAGINIANS, because that for fear of them they were constrained to put them themselves under the yoke. And next, for that they hoped Dionysius would use them more gently, so long as on the one side he should be afraid of the force of the enemies, and on the other, of the rebellion of those whom by force he kept under. And especially above the rest, for that they hoped being armed, if occasion were offered, they might one day stand for the recovery of their liberty.

Dionysius his persuasions prevailed to make war with the Carthaginians.

Warre being concluded upon in this assembly, Dionysius suffered the SYRACUSANS to spoile the PHENECIANS that trafficked in their haven: which they executed out of hand. The other SICILIANS did as much: so that the CARTHAGINIANS were driven to runne away, and those that they could catch were cruelly handled in every place, for the hatred they bare them, because of the proud parts they committed in the wars past. Dionysius having all his Army in readinesse, sent a Herald unto CARTHAGE with letters, containing that the SYRACUSANS had decreed in their Councell to make war upon the CARTHAGINIANS, unless they departed from the Towns of GREECE, which they held in SICILIA, and did leave them at liberty. The Senate and people of CARTHAGE amazed at it, knew that they had to fight with Dionysius, nevertheless they resolved to take armes, and sent to levy men out of all parts. Dionysius on the other side, he tooke the field with an Army of fourecore thousand fighting men of foote, and three thousand horse: and had at the sea neare two hundred Gallies and ships of oares, accompanied with five hundred great ships of burden, full of all sorts of Engines of battery, and of necessary munitions for such an Army. All the Townes almost of SICILIA yeelded themselves unto him, saving MOTYE, ANCYRE, SOLES, EGESTE, PALERME, and ENTILLE. Leptines his brother and Admirall, lay before MOTYE, and besieged it: and himselfe spoiled all the Country of the SOLENTINES, PALERMITANS, and ANCIRELIANS: and besieged EGESTE, and ENTILLE, and gave them divers assaults. Newes being brought unto him that Himilco was at hand, he went and encamped before MOTYE, a Towne situated within a little while of SYRACUSA: half a league from firme land, stately built, and very rich at that time. The which he assaulted by sea and by land, drove Himilco and his forces backe, and wanne the Towne by assault: but they sold their lives and Towne very deare, having killed a great number of the enemies before they were forced. The SICILIANS yet angry in their hearts for the mischiefs they had endured through the insolency of the CARTHAGINIANS in the former warres: were so braced in blood, that all those of MOTYE were put to the sword. They that saved themselves in the Temples, had their lives granted them: but Dionysius made them all be sold by the drum. Whilst he was occupied there, the EGESTANS made a fall upon the Campe which he had left before the Town, and set it on fire, which burnt the most part of his souldiers, and the rest well warmed, saved themselves as they could. But Dionysius not much regarding this losse, set upon all the Townes of the CARTHAGINIANS with his Army. They for their part gave all the authority and power to Himilco, to prepare for this war of SICILIA. He made an Army of three hundred thousand footmen, and of a great number of horsemen, and gave the rendezvous to the shippes of burthen at PALERME: where he arrived with his Fleet of Gallies that followed him. The Admirall Leptines having deferred his coming, set forward with his ships, and fought with them in the maine sea: he killed five thousand of his men, sunke fifty ships, and two hundred Carts of warre: and the rest of them saved themselves by flying. But Himilco having landed his Army, went and assailed MOTYE, and wanne it againe of the SYRACUSANS.

At that time Dionysius was before EGESTE, where word being brought him of the arrival of the CARTHAGINIANS, and of the taking againe of MOTYE, he began to be afraid, and to take advice to returne to SYRACUSA: he commanded the SICILIANS to retire, and made their hands wait, to disadvantage their enemies by so much the more. This suddaine change of Dionysius, was cause that many of his friends tooke part with Himilco, who seeing his affaires prosper so well, made his Army march to MESSINE: tooke in (passing by) the Ile and towne of LYPARI: and then besieged the MESSINEANS so straightly, that in the end he wanne the Towne by assault. And there having refreshed his troopes, he razed the Towne to the very ground, the which did so much amaze the SICILIANS, that all except the ASSARINS, turned unto the CARTHAGINIANS. Dionysius being at his wits end for so many losses, did fortifie the strong holds that were in the territory of the LEONTINES, sent the CAMPANIANS to ETNE, that dwelt in the Towne of CATANE: and taking order for his affairs the best he could possible, he went into the field with foure and thirty thousand footemen, and a thousand horse, and lodged under the mount Taur, where the banished men of SYRACUSA were placed, favoured by the CARTHAGINIANS, and had fortified it, and made it in forme of a Town: whilst he made his abode there, newes came unto him that the Army of the CARTHAGINIANS was divided into two, and that the one part of them went by land to CATANE with Himilco: and the other came towards him by sea, led by Mago. He hoping to make this Fleet as nothing, commanded his brother Leptines to make out with his shipping against Mago. But Leptines was put to flight, with the losse of twenty thousand men, and well neare an hundred of his ships. This losse drave Dionysius into such a feare, doubting besides lest Mago following his victory should draw towards SYRACUSA, which was easie to be wonne having no Garrison in it: he retired into his City, and from thence sent men into ITALY and into GREECE, to pray aide against the CARTHAGINIANS. Himilco knowing his retreat, brought all his forces immediately unto SYRACUSA, besieged it by land and by sea, wanne the suburbs of ACRADINE, and set up his pavilion in the Temple of Jupiter Olympian, all the other Temples of the Suburbs having been rifled by the fouliders. In the meane time Polyxenus brought to the aide of the Towne, thirty ships of their friends under the conduct of Pharasidas, a Capitaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS. With this aide, and all the ships of burthen, Dionysius put to the sea to get victuals. But now whilst he was at the sea in his voyage, the SYRACUSANS being careful to looke to their City, and spying out all occasions to mischiefe the besiegers: they descreyed a boate that brought Corne to the Campe of Himilco. Whereupon on the suddaine they armed all their Gallies, and fought so valiantly with the CARTHAGINIANS, that they rooke their Admirall with twenty others, and sunke foure of them, and followed the rest that fled, unto the very place where their ships lay at Anchor within the great haven, provoking them to battell. But the CARTHAGINIANS astonished with this overthrow, stirred not.

The Syracusans confound Dionysius.

Then the SYRACUSANS fastened the Gallies prisoners unto the poores of theirs, and brought them into the City. Whereupon they being courageous againe for this little advantage they had of their enemies: they beganne to take among themselves, how the Tyrant had been many times overcome, and that they to the contrary without him had overcome the CARTHAGINIANS. And thereupon gathering together by groopes, they went speaking one to another, that they were weary with serving a Tyrant, and now specially having meanes to put him downe for ever: For, before they were disarmed, but now by reason of the warres they had their Armes in their hands. Notwithstanding they daily held this talke, Dionysius made the people to assemble, and praised them highly for the good service they had done, persuading them furthermore to be of good courage, for within few dayes he would make an end of this warre. But as the assembly of the people was ready to go their way, Theodorus a SYRACUSAN, judged to be one of the best men of armes within the Towne, stepped up, and made a long Oration, in the which after he had by peece-meale laid open all the tyrannies, cowardlinesse, and wicked deeds of Dionysius, whom he called Grammarian, clerke, a carelesse man, ignorant of the affaires of warre, oppressor of all SICILIA, and favourer of all thieves and ill men of the world: he perswaded them by divers reasons to endeavour themselves to recover their liberty. And since that their allies of ITALY and GREECE were within the City, that they should bring backe againe the power and authority to create such Capitaines as they should thinke good, into the hands of the Citizens, according to the tenure of their ancient lawes, or else into the hands of their ancestors and first founders, which were the CORINTHIANS: or at the least into the LACEDÆMONIANS hands, who had then the seigniorie of all GREECE. The SYRACUSANS being marvellously moved with such a speech, beheld the countenance of their confederates assistants in this assembly: untill such a time as Pharasidas being gotten up into the Pulpit for Orations, made every man hearken, supposing it should be he that should begine first to stirre up and encourage others to the recovery of their liberty. But to the contrary, he being particularly friend to Dionysius, beganne to tell them, that his Lord had sent him to aide the SYRACUSANS and Dionysius against the CARTHAGINIANS, not to destroy them, nor to abolish his estate. This speech being cleane contrary to that the common people expected, the souldiers strangers ranne straight about him. Whereupon the SYRACUSANS stirred not, saying that to themselves they curied the LACEDÆMONIANS; because that heretofore they had sent them Arifus, who pretending he came to aide them for to recover their liberty, was a traitor and sold them: and now that this Pharasidas had broken the hearts of their courages, being well disposed to root out this tyranny. For Dionysius he spake smoothly for the time, being thoroughly afraid they would have set upon him, and so dismissed the assembly, using the most gracious words unto them he could possibly. To others he gave presents, he sent for others to come and eate with him at Table. In the meane time the plague strangely posselt the Campe of the CARTHAGINIANS, and in a short time killed well near a hundred and fifty thousand of them: whereupon the most part of them were forsaken alive and dead, the contagion was so horrible. Some imputed it partly to the discommodity of the place, and excessive number of men living as it were on heapes together: partly unto the vengeance of God punishing their pride, the insolencies, cruelties, and sacriledges of the CARTHAGINIANS. Dionysius understanding of this misery, would not vainly let slip such a fit occasion, but armed fourescore Gallies, under the conduct of Pharasidas and Leptines, and his troopes, with whom he assailed Himilco by sea

The Carthaginians plagued againe.

Sea and by Land, tooke his Forts, burnt and drowned the most part of his Ships, brake the rest, and gave his People of SYRACUSA meanes to set upon the little Barkes, and to shut them within the City. To be short, he brought them to such extremitie, that they sent secretly unto him to pray him to suffer that which was saved from the overthrow the day before, to passe the Sea, and to retire home to AFRICK with safety: promising to make him a Present of an hundred and fourescore thousand Crownes. His answer was, that it was not possible all should be saved, yet he was contented the naturall CARTHAGINIANS should passe. For he doubted much that the SYRACUSANS and their Friends would never suffer him to respite those other, if they once understood it. But he did it of purpose, being unwilling that the Army of CARTHAGE should be utterly destroyed, for feare that when the SYRACUSANS should see themselves free from this feare, they would remember the Oration of Theodorus, and put to all their force to recover their Liberty againe. The Money promised him being delivered, Himilco imbarqued by night all the naturall CARTHAGINIANS that were left into forty Gallies, and made Saile immediately towards AFRICK. Howbeit he was scant out of the Haven, but certaine CORINTHIANS perceived his stealing away, and suddenly came to tell it to Dionysius, who seeming to be very greatly busied, commanded to sound the Alarum, and that the Capitaines should prepare themselves to follow him. The CORINTHIANS seeing he went but faintly to worke, would tarry no longer, but even at the present houre imbarqued themselves, drew up their Ankers, and rowed hard after their Enemies: so that in a short space they overtooke the Reare of their Vessels, and so rudely hurt them, that they sunke some of them. Immediately after, Dionysius drew his Army into the Field: but the SICILIANS, friends unto the CARTHAGINIANS, had gotten the start before crossing the Countrey, inso much that the more part of them got home to their Houses. For this cause Dionysius having left a Guard to keepe the passages by the High waies, he brought his Army backe againe to the Enemies Campe. The barbarous People seeing themselves betrayed by the Generall, forsaken of the naturall CARTHAGINIANS and SICILIANS, their hearts were killed, and began to flie, stealing away, some this way, some that way: but all of them in manner fell into the hands of the Souldiers that guarded the High waies. Those that were left came before Dionysius, and casting downe their Armes, besought him to take pity of them, and to save their lives: the SPANIARDS onely excepted, who gathered themselves together with their Armes, and sent unto him to offer their Service, if it would please him to accept them: the which he did, and received them into pay among the Souldiers Strangers. For the rest, he tooke the other Prisoners, and gave their baggage in prey to his Souldiers. For Himilco, after he had lived ignominiously and poorly at CARTHAGE, he died distract of his wits. Some hold opinion, that immediately after he was arrived, not able to indure the shame he got in this Warre, he killed himselfe.

Himilco dieth.

Dionysius having driven the CARTHAGINIANS out of SICILIA, he built up MESSINA againe which they had ruined. Then he went to besiege TAUROMENION, fortified by the SICILIANS, who lustily gave him the repulse, and made a Salley upon him, and killed the most part of his men, having much ado to escape himself. On the other side, Mago chiefe of the AFRICANS in SICILIA, did courteously intreate his Allies, and received into his protection all those whom Dionysius oppressed. By which occasion having won the hearts of the most part of them, he became so strong in a short time, that he got a great Army againe on foote, marched with them to MESSINA, and over-ran all the plaine Countrey; where having gotten a great booty, he tooke upon him to besiege the ABACENIANS Confederates of Dionysius: who being bound to aide them, he went against the CARTHAGINIANS, beate Mago in a Conflict, and killed eight hundred of his men. So having brought his Troope to SYRACUSA and refreshed them, he armed a Fleete of an hundred Vessels, to go and make Warre with those of RHEGE, and coming to their Haven by night, at that instant time he did fiercely assaile them, set fire on their Gates, and set up scaling-Ladders in divers parts: nevertheless the RHEGIANS defended themselves so courageously, that he was forced to retire. And thereupon receiving certaine intelligence what great Preparations they made at CARTHAGE to begin the Warre againe: he left RHEGE, and returned againe to SYRACUSA. So the CARTHAGINIANS had gotten together againe fourescore thousand men, whom they sent into SICILIA under the conduct of Mago. But before they came to joyne with the Enemies, they concluded Peace with these Conditions, that every one should enjoy that they had gotten: That one of them should not quarrell with the other for any thing: That Dionysius might without breach of Peace make Warre with the TAUROMENIANS. These being thus agreed upon between them, Dionysius went and besieged TAUROMENION the second time, and did more furiously assault it then before: so that in the end, after long resistance of them that were besieged, he wanne the Towne, drave out the SICILIANS that dwelt there, and did replenish it with Strangers whom he kept in pay. Afterwards because his Army should not be idle and mutinous, he chose twenty thousand Footmen, and three thousand Horse, and went into ITALY with them, next adjoining unto SICILIA, to subdue those GREEKS which had dwelt there of long time. Newes being brought unto them of Dionysius intention, they assembled all the Estates of the Countrey of CROTONE, where they all resolved to joyne together to repulse this common Enemy; and making all the Forces they could, established Eloris a banished man of SYRACUSA their Chieftaine, they made their Army march against Dionysius, who camped before the City of CAULONE. He understanding of their coming, raised his Siege suddenly to go and meete with them: and the next morning after his departure, by breake of the day, he gave Charge upon the GREEKS with with his Troope well appointed, who marching disorderly, he killed their Chieftaine, and the valiantest men of their Army: and afterwards besieged the others that had saved themselves in a Towne, and compelled them to yeeld for that they had no water. Yet contrary to all mens expectation, he used them very courteously, and sent them home safe without Ransome. After he had wonne this goodly Victory, he led his Army into the Territory of the RHEGIANS, whom he hated to the death. They having no friends, and too weake of themselves to resist such a mighty Enemy, were constrained to make Peace with him with very hard Conditions. For he made them give him threescore Gallies, an hundred and fourscore thousand Crownes, and for hostage and observation of other Articles, an hundred of the chieft of the Towne. From thence he returned to besiege CAULONÆ, and held them so strait, that he won it by assault, destroyed it, and gave the Lands unto them of LOCRES.

But forasmuch as he could not forget the unreconcilable hatred he bare unto the RHEGIANS, he having demanded on a time one of their Daughters in marriage, they report, that the answer they made in an open Assembly of the Towne unto his Ambassadors, was, that they would give him none of them, unlesse he would marry the Hangmans Daughter of the Towne: this made him resolve that he would see the end of it. And where before he had made Peace with them, it was not for any good will he bare them, nor that he desired their friendship, but because he would take their Gallies from them, hoping that after he had left them bare at the Sea, he should come closer to them, and have them at his discretion. Therefore whilest he was in ITALY, he fought nothing else but to take an occasion to make Warre with them, so that he might not be charged, that contrary to his faith he had broken the Edict of Pacification. Having therefore led his Army unto the Straights, making as though he would passe into SICILIA, he sent unto the RHEGIANS to demand Victuals for his Army, promising to send them so much againe upon his returne to SYRACUSA. Which he did, to the end that if they refused, he might excuse himself well if he did set upon them: and if they did give him any, it should then turne to the hurt of the Towne, which if it came to be besieged, should be constrained for famine to hold up their hands to him. The RHEGIANS that least doubted his malice, furnished him with Victuals for certaine daies: but perceiving he tarried there too long, now counterfeiting he was sicke, then that he used other delays to prolong time, they began to see his fetches, and refused to victuall him any more. Thereupon he feigning to be much offended, sent them home their Hostages, and came to besiege the Towne: and coming hard to their Walls, made daily and continuall Assaults, beating upon the Walls with great Engines which he had made expressly of an incredible greatnesse. They having chosen a valiant man for their Captaine, called Phyton, and furnished all those that were able to beare Armes in the Towne, they defended themselves courageously, and did many waies hurt their Enemies: and specially in a Salley they made Dionysus was fore hurt with a Lance in the flanke, that he was like to have died; but being recovered and well againe, he pursued his purpose more obstinately then ever: whereby he tooke all hope of aide from them, and having continued Siege there eleven Moneths all together, in the end the RHEGIANS found themselves in great want of Victuals of all sorts: for a bushell of Wheate was at fifty Crownes. After that all kinde of Corne failed them, first they did eate up their Horses, and all kinde of Beasts of burthen. Then when they had no more to eate, they did teete all their Hides and Leather they could finde in the Towne, and so lived a while. And last of all, coming out of the Towne, they did eate and devour up such Hearbes and Rootes as they could finde by their Walls, even as wilde Beasts. Dionysus perceiving it, in stead of pitying of them (nay rather desiring they should eate one another of them) he caused the Grasse to be cut downe, and put his Beasts in the Campe into it, to feede of all that was along the Towne Walls and Ditches, to the end they should have nothing more to eate. So that in the end the poore RHEGIANS overcome by necessity, were constrained to yeeld themselves and their Towne to the discretion of the Tyrant. Who being entred into the Towne, found heapes of bodies dead of that Plague of Famine: and such as were yet alive, seemed rather ghosts then living persons. So he gathered together about fixe thousand Prisoners, whom he sent all to SYRACUSA, suffering notwithstanding all that could ransom themselves (paying a Talent) to be redeemed: and the rest to be sold by the Drumme to him that would give most. Amongst the Prisoners there was Phyton and his Sonne. Dionysus made his Sonne to be drowned first: and the next morning after, he made the Father to be tied to the highest Engine of Battery he had, and sent to tell him newes of the death of his Sonne. He was happier by a day then his Father, said Phyton: who was drawne all the Towne over, and whipped most shamefully: having a Serjeant at his backe that cried out aloud, that Dionysus made him be whipped thus, because he had made the RHEGIANS take Armes against him. But Phyton that had shewed himselfe like a valiant Captaine and worthy man in this Siege, and had lived honourably all his life time, did patiently indure the paine which the Tyrant made him suffer. For he remained constant, speaking out aloud that every body heard him: That he was put to death, because he would not betray his Country, and deliver it into the Tyrants hands; howbeit that within few daies the gods would be revenged of him for this outrage. His constancy was such, that it moved Dionysus Souldiers to compassion: who began already to murmur against him. Wherefore fearing lest they should be so bold to take him out of the Tyrant's hands, he made them leave whipping of him, and commanded that they should drowne him in the Sea with all his Kinned, which was done: for the rest, the City of RHEGIA was razed to the ground.

Thus

Thus have we made a large Discourse of the practises and Warres of Dionysus. Now let us speake something of his private Government. He had wit enough, but troubled with many vices: and the more he grew in yeares, the more it was corrupted. The Flatterers made an end of his destruction: for they called his cruelty, the hate of wicked men, and good justice; and made him believe that he was a most worthy man in all things: insomuch that he thought himselfe the onely man of the World, and would be so reputed. Being thus carried, and seeing himselfe at good leisure, he entred into a course which he had somewhat discontinued during the Warres, and therewith he was strangely taken: which was, to write Verses, and to make Tragedies. He fell to this study againe with more diligence then before, and sent for Poets out of all parts, whom he honoured, and gave Presents unto, because they should correct his Workes of Poetry. They seeking to gratifie him for their profit, said nothing but that which they thought should be most pleasing unto him: so that being puffed up with their flatteries, he gloried more in his Verses, then he did in his Warres. Now amongst other Poets that followed him, there was one they called Philoxenus, a learned man, and excellent to write Hymnes in praise of the gods. Dionysus one day gave him a Tragedie of his to peruse and correct; he crossed it all over from one end to the other: and one night being asked what he thought of certaine Poeties which the Tyrant made, he spake openly, that they were worth nothing. He answered so plainly, that Dionysus angrily said, it was of envie that he censured his Workes so, and sent him forthwith to dig in the Quarry-pit. The next morning his friends intreated Dionysus to pardon him, which he did: and would have him againe to Supper with many others of his sort. In the midst of this Feast, Dionysus that desired nothing more then to have his Verses heard, rehearsed some of them, and of those especially which he thought best done. Then turning himselfe to Philoxenus, he asked his opinion. But he answered him never a word, but looking about him, called one of Dionysus Guard, and said unto him: Carry me againe to the Quarry pit. Dionysus smiling at it, bare this nip well: and soone after taking Philoxenus apart, perswaded him not to be so sharpe. His friends also told him that he might easily forbear to speake so freely to no purpose. Then Philoxenus made him an answer all new, saying, that from thenceforth he would keepe such a weight on his words, that he would speake the truth, and keepe himselfe in Dionysus favour, as he did. For Dionysus having rehearsed certaine Verses full of great lamentations, to move the hearts of the hearers to pity, he prayed Philoxenus to say his minde of them: who answered him, that those Verses had filled him full of pity. It was a sharpe gird of mockery which Dionysus perceived not, no more then that which Melanthis spake of a Tragedie after the like sort, that he could not see it, it was so darke of speech. And so was Plato not much better used then Philoxenus. Dion his Disciple and Brother-in-law of Dionysus, had spoken so much good to this Tyrant, that being at leisure he was contented to see Plato, and to heare him. So they being together, their talke generally was all of Vertue: but chiefly they disputed, what was true force and prowesse? Where Plato proved unto him, that Tyrants were nothing lesse then valiant men. Out of that, turning his talke to speake of Justice: he shewed him that the life of the iust was very happy: and that to the contrary, the life of unjust men was most wicked. Insomuch that the Tyrant seeing himselfe convinced, could no longer endure talke with him: and was sorry to see those that were present so much to esteeme of him, and to take such singular pleasure to heare him speake. So at the last his choler being up, he asked him, what businesse had brought him into SICILIA? To seeke an honest man, said Plato. And how? (replied Dionysus) by the gods (to heare thee speake) it seemeth thou hast yet found none. Dion thought his choler should go no further, and so sent Plato away in a Galley, whom Pole Captaine of Lacedæmon brought backe againe into GREECE. But Dionysus prayed this Captaine secretly, that whatsoever he did he should kill Plato by the way, or at leastwise sell him: adding to this jest withall, He shall be never a whit the worse for that: for if he be a iust man, he shall be as happy being a Servant as otherwise. And so Plato was sold in the Isle of EGINA for the price of two hundred Crownes, and afterwards bought againe by Annicerius a Philosopher, and sent to ATHENS.

Dionysus gave himselfe to all Poesie, and sent for the best Singers he could recover in the Games Olympiall, to rehearse and sing his Verses before the People. The Singers at the beginning were heard with admiration of every body, for the goodnesse and finenesse of their voices: but when they came to examine their Songs, they were despised, mocked, and whistled at, which angered him extremely when he heard of it. So this passionned desire did so much increase in his head continually, that he became almost as a man beside himselfe: and said that his faithfull friends did envie him, and began to be at defiance with them, as if they had beene Traytors unto him. To conclude, this fury of his did so possesse him, that he did put many to death upon false occasions, and banished others, as Philissus, and Leptines his Brother, both of them valiant men, and that had done him great Service in his Warres. Howbeit afterwards he sent for them againe, and they were his friends as before. But since we are now to talke of his cruelties, let us say something as we passe by. One of his greatest friends called Marsyas, dreamed one night that he cut his throat. The Tyrant understanding of it, put this poore Dreamer to death: alleading that this Dreame could not have come to him at night, but that he had it settled in his minde to commit such an act in the day. Leptines being desirous one day to describe SICILIA in his presence, tooke a Halbard from one of the Souldiers of his Guard, and with the butt end of it drew on the ground that which he would: wherewith Dionysus was so angry, that he bitterly tooke up Leptines, and put the Souldier to death that had given him his Halbard. Dionysus one day being disposed to disport himselfe some way, gave his Bardasse his Sword and his Cloake to keepe: which one of his familiars perceiving, said: And what, do you trust this young Boy with your life? The Youth began to smile at it: but Dionysius made him be killed, because by smiling he seemed to allow of this word: and he also dispatched the other, because he had shewed him the means to kill him. He was determined to have put his Brother-in-law Polyxenus to death: but he having an inkling of it, fled out of SICILIA. Dionysius sent to Teschia his Sister, and chid with her, because she had kept his flying away close from him: But she answered him with a bold countenance: What thinkest thou, Dionysius, that I am a woman so cowardly and faint-hearted, that if I had known that my Husband would have gone, I would not have taken Sea with him, and have beene companion of his Fortune? I knew nothing before he was gone, for it had beene more honourable for me to have beene called the Wife of Polyxenus banished, then Sister to thee a Tyrant. Dionysius was blanke at this speech, and the SYRACUSANS wondered at the vertue of this woman: inso much that after the Tyranny was destroyed, they did not leave to do her all the honour that they could have done to a Queene: and when she was dead, all the Citizens by common consent went with her body to the Sepulture. A question being made one day, to wit: Which was the best Copper? Antiphon answering quickly, that it was that wherewith the ATHENIANS melted the Statues of Armodius and Aristogiton, Dionysius made him to be strangled, and die in great torment. They report of him that he spared not his owne Mother, but caused her to be strangled, though she was very old. And as for his Brother Lepines, he suffered him to be killed by his Enemies, albeit he might easily have saved and delivered him at that time. Some talked of his Tyranny in a Barbers Shop, and said it was well established, and also evill to be destroyed, as the Diamond to be broken. I marvel said the Barber, smiling, how you say that of him, upon whose throat I passe my Razour so often? These words being brought to Dionysius, he hanged the Barber. He had put to death at divers times ten thousand of his Citizens, and though he had written in one of his Tragedies, that Tyranny was the Mother of Injustice: notwithstanding he had oftentimes this word in his mouth: That children must be deceived with Playes, and men with faire promises. And he said that the greatest pleasure and contentment he found in all his Government, was, that what he would have done, was suddenly executed.

One day he would have had Money of the SYRACUSANS: they complained and lamented, beseeching him to hold them excused, telling him they had no Money. He to the contrary, made them to be asked by others: which he did twice or thrice one after another. And as he continued still urging of them yet further: it was told him they did nothing but laugh, as they walked in the Market-place. Then he commanded his Receivers to presse them no more: for it is a signe, said he, that they have no more, since they make no account of us. His Mother being past age to marry, would needs marry a young man. He answered her, that indeed it was in his power to breake the Lawes of SYRACUSA, but of Nature, not: He severely punishing all other Malefactors, pardoned Thieves that tooke away mens Gownes and Cloakes whom they met by night in the streets: to the end that for this cause the SYRACUSANS should leave to make Feasts and Assemblies, wherein they could not keepe themselves from speaking and plotting against him. On a time a Stranger promised him aloud to teach him secretly, how he should know those that did practise any thing against him. Dionysius prayed him very earnestly. So the other going to him, Give me said he, fixe hundred Crownes, that the SYRACUSANS may thinke thou hast learned of me the signes to discover the Conspirators. He gave them him, and feigned that he had learned these means of him: greatly commending the subtilt fashion to get Money which this man had invented. Having heard one day a man that played upon the Citherne passing well, he openly promised him the summe of fixe hundred Crownes. The next morning he came to demand this summe: Dionysius told him: thou gavest me great pleasure yesterday to heare thee play: and so did I thee in making thee this promise: and so thou wert paid in the Field for the pleasure thou gavest me, by that that thou receivedst. One asked him on a time, If he were not Idle. God forbid, said he, that that should ever happen to me. He being informed that two young men of the City drinking together, had spoken many evill words of him and his Tyranny at the Table: sent to invite them both to supper with him: and seeing that the one after he had drunke a little, said and did many foolish things: and that the other to the contrary was very sober, and dranke but feldome: he pardoned the one, as being a Drunkard and insolent of nature, and that through drunkenesse had spoken evill of him: but he put the other to death, as one that bare him evill will in his heart, and being Enemy unto him of set purpose. Some of his familiars reproved him, because he had honoured and advanced a wicked man, and evill beloved of the SYRACUSANS. And he answered them, I will that there shall be one in SYRACUSA, that shall yet be more hated then my self. Once he sent Presents unto certaine Ambassadors of CORINTH, which came unto him. They refused them, because they had a Statute in their Common-wealth, that did forbid Ambassadors to take or receive any Gifts of Presents or Lord or Prince whatsoever. He was discontented withall, and told them that they did evill to take away that onely good which is in Tyrannies, that is, to have power to give: but they taught men also, that to receive any good of Tyrants, is a thing one should feare and shun. Being informed that a Townesman of SYRACUSA had hidden a Treasure in the ground in his house, he commanded him to bring it him: the which he did, but not all for all that, for he reserved a part, with the which he went and dwelt in another Towne, and bought some Land there: which when he understood, he sent for him to come to him; and restored him all his Gold and Silver: Since thou knowest now, said he, how to use Riches, and not to make that unprofitable which is made for the use of man.

Now his cruelties and tyrannous behaviour made him marvellous odious to the World, by reason

reason whereof he entred into such a mistrust of every body, that he made a Trench he digged about his Lodging where he lay, and because he would lie safely, he drew up a Draw-bridge, and shut himselfe in with great feare, having a great Guard without round about him. His Wives durst not come into his Chamber before they had put off their Gownes, he was so afraid left they should bring a Dagger under their Gownes. Yea his Brother and his owne Sonne were faine to put off their Clothes, and the Guard of his Chamber should come naked whatsoever he was that put his foote into it: then there was another Garment cast upon him. He was afraid of his owne Sonne as much as of any other, doubting that when he felt his owne courage, and frequented men of understanding, he would make some complot against him, and in the end thrust him out of his Seate and Seigniory. He locked him up in a Chamber, and would suffer no man to come and speake with him: where for lacke of other occupations, this young man occupied himselfe to make little Coaches or Chariots, Candlesticks, Saddles, Stooles, and Tables of Wood. Nevertheless, after he had some more liberty, and that his Father began to let him come abroad: he straight grew to be proud and dissolute as might be. And they say, that when he had ravished a Townesmans Wife by force, his Father being angry with him, asked him: Whether ever he had seene him do any such thing or not? the Sonne answered him: No more had you a Father that was a Tyrant. But Dionysius replied upon him againe: So shalt thou never have a Sonne at all, if thou leavest not to play these wicked parts. Another time going to see his Sonne in his Lodging, and seeing there great store of Vessels of Gold and Silver, he told him: there is nothing in thee of a Lord or Prince, since I have given thee such a deale of Gold and Silver Plate, and yet thou knowest not how to get a Friend. It was an ordinary thing with Dionysius to tell wonders, and do little, being so exceeding timorous. But specially after the execution of his Barber, and that his Daughters were now waxen great, he would not abide that any should clip his haire with Sizers: but he made an Image-maker of Images of Earth to come to him, who with a burning coale burnt his glib round about his head. Now he made himselfe to be knowne by a memorable fact he did: which was this. A certaine Flatterer called Damocles, praising the Majesty and Riches of Dionysius, and the Magnificence of his Palace, maintained that the Sun never saw a more happy man. Dionysius to make him partaker of this felicity, made him sit downe upon a little Bed very sumptuous, and enriched with wonderful precious things. Then he caused them to set up Tables laden with Vessels of Gold and Silver, and covered with wonderful dainty Meates, a number of fine Pages attending on his Service, Perfumes passing rare and most excellent sweete for the Chamber, and dainty Musicke both with Voice and Instruments. To be short, all the Pleasures and Pastimes possible to be thought of, did compasse this Minion of Court round about. But in the midst of all his Magnificent Furniture, Dionysius caused a naked Sword, glittering, and sharpe pointed, to be fastened to a small haire of a Horse, and to be hanged right over Damocles head: who forgetting this felicity he had so much commended, besought Dionysius it might quickly be taken away. And like as he was cruell unto men, so did he shew himselfe a despiser of his proper gods, whereof we will alleadge some examples. Having sacked the Temple of Proserpine in the City of LOCRES, he tooke the Sea, and having a gale of winde at pleasure: You see, said he, how the immortall gods do favour Sacriledges. He tooke off a Cloake of fine Gold from Jupiter Olympian, in the Towne of SYRACUSA, which Cloake weighed fourscore and five Talents, which are more worth then fifty thousand Crownes, and gave him another of Woollen, saying: that the Cloake of Gold was too cold for Winter, and too heave for Summer: and that the Woollen Cloake would be more convenient in both seasons. He rounded also the Statue of Apollo, which had a glib of Gold. And finding that Money went low with him, by reason of his great expences in the Warres he had against the CARTHAGINIANS, he tooke the Sea with a Fleete of three score Gallies, with pretence to set upon Pirates, but indeed it was to spoile a Temple of great fame, full of goodly and rich Jewels that had bene offered up there, the which was seated upon the edge of the quarter of a City of THUSCAN, called AGYLLE. Being arrived there in the night, and having landed his men: in the morning by breake of day he suddenly and without any danger executed his Enterprize. For the place being guarded with some few men, he easily forced it, and afterward at his leisure sacked the Temple, where he got to the summe of six hundred thousand Crownes. Which the Townesmen understanding, came out upon him straight, to see if they could defend the Temple: but he overcame them in Battell, and having taken a great number of Prisoners, he spoiled all their Countrey, and then returned to SYRACUSA, where he sold his Prisoners and his Booty, for the which he had also three hundred thousand Crownes more.

So being now well stored againe, he began to set up an Army: and because he saw the Townes subject unto the CARTHAGINIANS willing to revolt, he did intice them, and used them very graciously that came and tooke his part. The CARTHAGINIANS hearing that, sent unto him to demand their Townes, otherwise they proclaimed Warre against him. So on both sides they came into the Field. For the CARTHAGINIANS, they dispatched Mago into SICILIA with a great Army. Dionysius being afraid of nothing, marched before with his Troops, and being camped neare to a place called CABALES: both the Armies fiercely gave Charge upon each other, and after a long Fight Mago was slain in the place with ten thousand of his men, and five thousand taken Prisoners. The CARTHAGINIANS were not discouraged for all this, but chose them againe the Sonne of Mago for their chief Captaine, a young Gentleman, wise, courageous, and valiant. So after they had stayed Dionysius by a Truce for a certaine time, the tearme being expired, they presented him a Battell, and fought it out so resolutely, that after they had slaine his Brother Lepines (whom he forooke at his neede)

and fourteene thousand of his men, with much ado he saved himselfe. But the Conquerours being never a whit prouder of such a Victory, they sent Ambassadors unto him that concluded a Peace for their advantage. For beside the Townes that remained unto them, Dionysius paid them fixe hundred thousand Crownes to defray their charges in the Wars. Also he kept not this Peace long, but brake it shortly after: for understanding that the Plague was not amongst the CARTHAGINIANS, and that they were fallen out amongst themselves, he tooke advantage of this occasion, and to give colour to his pretence, gave it out, that the AFRICANS Souldiers had foraged the Lands of his friends; whereupon he leaved an Army of thirty thousand Footmen, and three thousand Horse: with this Army he began to make Warre againe, and in the first imployment of his Forces he was SELENO-TE and ENTELLIS: and after that he marched to LILYBEE to besiege it: but seeing it well guarded, he returned backe againe. Hereupon newes was brought him, that fire had taken some of the Arsenals of the CARTHAGINIANS: wherefore supposing all their Ships of Warre had beene burnt, he began to scoffe at all their Forces. But they having armed upon a sudden a Fleete of two hundred Gallies, assailed unlooked for a hundred and thirty of Dionysius Gallies, which wintered in the Haven of ERIX, some of them he sunke, and brought away the others. After this losse Dionysius retired into SYRACUSA, and fell very sicke. The which Dion perceiving, entred into talke of his Children, and of his Sister Aristomache. But the Physicians to curry favour with young Dionysius, hindered him that he could have no fit time to say any thing to him. Or as Timaeus writeth, they gave him drinke (as he had commanded them) to make him sleepe, and by this meanes tooke from him his senses, joyning death with sleepe. Some others say, that he was killed by his Guard: others, that he was poisoned. But Diadornus the SICILIAN fettereth downe the cause after another sort: which is this. He caused, said he, a little before, a Tragedy of his intituled, THE LENEANS, to be plaid at ATHENS: and having gotten the Victory, one of the Musicians brought him word of it by Sea: the which did so please him, that after he had richly rewarded the Messenger, he made a great Sacrifice to the gods to give them thanks for his Prosperity, and sumptuous Feasts, unto the which he invited all his friends, and dranke so largely, that he fell into a great sicknesse whereof he died. Now he had in times past an Oracle, that had foretold he should die then, when he had overcome those that should be worthier then himselfe. He applied this Oracle to the CARTHAGINIANS, supposing it was meant by them, because they were stronger then he. This was the cause that oftentimes in the Battels he had won against them, he being Victor, fled, or willingly suffered himselfe to be overcome because of this Prediction. Howbeit he could not thum his destiny: for being an ill Poet, he was judged by the sentence of corrupt Judges, to have excelled all the other Poets better then ever he was: and then came he to end his daies, as the Oracle had foretold him. Now though he had reigned the space of thirty eight yeares full out, and had boasted many times that he would leave his Sonne a Principality chained with strong chaines of a Diamond: this young Dionysius ruled no long time, but being shortly after driven out of SYRACUSA by the Inhabitants themselves, secondly by Dion, and at the last by Timoleon, who overthrew him altogether: he was sent to CORINTH, where he ended the rest of his daies in misery. Afterwards the SYRACUSANS, maintaining their liberty for the space of twenty yeares: they fell into Agathocles hands, who also committed terrible cruelties. After his death, they being full of civill dissention, demanded aide of Pyrrhus King of EPHROS against the CARTHAGINIANS. He having made a Journey into SICILIA, was constrained to leave it, and had great Warre with the ROMANS. By reason whereof the SYRACUSANS willingly yeelded themselves unto Hieron the second of that name, under whom (a great friend of the ROMANS) they prospered the space of fifty yeares. But after his death, his little Sonne Hieronimus, a young Lord and unruly, tooke part with the CARTHAGINIANS: and having reigned onely fifteene Moneths, he was killed by his Guard. Now for that his death brought on great confusions, and that the SYRACUSANS enclined to the CARTHAGINIANS part: the Confull Marcellus went to besiege SYRACUSA, and tooke it in the second year of the one hundred forty and two Olympiade. So that afterwards it was governed by Prætors, and according to the ROMANS Law, even to the declination of their Empire.

THE LIFE OF OCTAVIUS CÆSAR AUGUSTUS.

*Thy Tenth Augustus, and thy tongues good gift, Thy Valour, Wisdom, and thy worthy Feats, Thy Countreys Love, thy Laws, and Statutes, list

Cicero, the Daughter of Accius Balbus and of Julia the Sister of Julius The descent of Augustus.
Caesar, was married unto the Father of this man, whose Life we write of now, and who was descended of the ancient Race of the Octavians, issued out of the Countrey of the Volscs, and knowne at ROME from the time of Tarquinius, and of Servius Tullus. Their Sonne Octavius was borne in the yeare of the Consulship of Cicero and of Caius Antonius, at that time when as the Conspiracy of Catiline was discovered, and suppressed. He was called Thurinus: but afterwards, according to the tenor of his Uncles Testament, who made him his Heire, he was called Caius Julius Caesar, and lastly Augustus, by the advice of Mnratius Plancus, and by the Decree of the Senate. He was but foure yeares old when his Father died, and at twelve yeares he made the Funerall Oration for his Grandmother Julia: foure yeares after that, he became a Gownman, though he were but young: yet his Uncle gave him a Present at his returne out of AFRICK, such as the Souldiers are accustomed to have of their Captaines. Shortly after he followed his Uncle into SPAIN, whither he was gone against the Children of Pompey, and passed through many great dangers to overtake him. This Warre being ended, because Caesar undertooke other longer Journeys, Octavius was sent into the City of APOLONIA: and there plied his Booke very diligently. And it chanced him, without having any minde to it, that being gone to see Theogenes a learned Astronomer, he cast his Nativity, and suddenly he leapt being amazed, and honoured him. The which made Octavius conceive great hope of himselfe, and in memory of this good hap, he caused certaine pieces of Money to be coined, and he himselfe told the opinion of Theogenes. Being returned from APOLONIA to ROME, after his Uncle was slain by Cassius, Brutus, and their Allies, he declared himselfe to be his Heire, though his Mother and Marcus Philippus were of another minde. And having put himselfe forward, he governed the Common-wealth of ROME, first with Antonius and Lepidus: afterwards with Antonius the space of twelve yeares: and lastly himselfe alone, the space of foure and forty yeares. But before we speake of his Government of common Affaires in time of Peace and Warre, let us say somewhat (after Suetonius) of his Family and his manners. Augustus ruled He married being yet very young the Daughter of Publius Servilius Isauricus: but having made foure yeares. and it would be very hard to describe the wickednesse of that time, the which like a furious stream carried away so many Citizens of ROME. In whose History do appeare most rare examples of all sorts of Vices and Vertues in all manner of persons: of whom we will make mention, after those that have written more at large: as amongst others, Appianus Alexandrinus: which will serve to shew, how much a man is a furious Beast, being lift up in Authority in the Common-wealth, and given to revenge. That there is nothing certaine nor sure in mans prosperity, which bringeth much envie to his Servants: as to the contrary, adversity maketh the afflicted contemptible, and every body ashamed of them. But they are wise men, that in such Tragick accidents do carry an invincible heart, resolutely obeying necessity, and a more high Providence then that of man. We must not call that intolérable which may happen to great or meane men: for all humane accidents are under the feete of Vertue. It chan- ceth often that force and wisdom do defend a man, as alwaies these two Vertues do preserve his Ho- nour. He is well advised that can finely pacifie and divert the fury of an Enemy: as to the contrary, shame and despair do gripe cowards, slothfull, and fearfull. But in fine, necessity presseth on the one side, and danger on the other.

So they did set up the names of the Proscriptors fastned in divers places of ROME, to the number of an hundred and thirty Senators for the first time, a hundred and fifty at the second time, and two thousand Knights. Then was the gate open to all villanies and cruelties, fought withall by patience and fidelity: but the examples will shew that better then all the discourse a man can make. Salvius Otho, Tribune of the People, was one of the first: who having invited his friends to his last Supper, a Centener came in, and in the presence of all his Guests, halfe dead for feare, strake off his head. Minutius the Prætor was also killed, sitting in his Seate of Judgement. L. Vilius Annalis, a man that had bene Confull, being escaped out of the hands of the murderers, saved himselfe in the Sub- burbes in a little house of one of his Clients: but his owne Sonne having no patience to stay for the Inheritance of his Father, bewrayed him unto the Souldiers, who went to kill him there. Shortly after, this Parricide being drunke had a quarrell with the selfe-same Souldiers, who stabbed him in with their Daggers. C. Toranius was betrayed in like manner by his owne Sonne, who having con- sumed in a few daies the Succession which he had so execrably pursued, and being condemned for theft, was banished into a place where he died for want and poverty. Now against these wicked, let us set some vertuous Children. Q. Cicero was hid by his Sonne, whom they could never make con- fesse (though he was tormented) where his Father was: who, not able any longer to endure they should afflict so vertuous a Sonne with so many evils for his fake, came and presented himselfe to the murderers. The Sonne began to intreate them to kill him before his Father: but they were both killed at one time. The Egnatius, Father and Sonne, one embracing the other, were both run through and slaine at one blow. C. Hosiidius Geta was buried for dead by his Sonne: who saved him, sustained and kept him till it was peace. Arruntius, after he had comforted and strengthened his Sonne, put himselfe to the Swords of the murderers. The Sonne died immediately after for griefe, and famine. Some other Children carefully saved and kept their Fathers, and hid them. Certaine Women also shewed themselves marvellous faithfull and loving to their Husbands: and so were there to the contrary, some unfaithfull, that discovered their wonderfull wickednesse. Tausia made such earnest suite, that she obtained grace of Cæsar for T. Junius her Husband, who was hidden by Philopemen his Bondman enfranchised: whom Cæsar Knighted for his fidelity to his Master. Q. Ligurius having bene kept by his Wife, was discovered by a Slave, and killed: wherefore his Wife killed her selfe with famine. Lucretius Vespillo, having erred and run in great danger here and there, not knowing whither to flie, came secretly to his Wife Thuria, and was hidden and kept close betwixt the feeling and the top of the House, untill she had obtained his grace of the Trium-viri. Apulcius was saved by his Wife, who fled with him. The Wife of Antius wrapped up her Husband in Coverlets, and made him be carried to the Sea as a Packet of Stuffe, where he imbarqued, and sailed into SICILIA. Coponius was saved by his Wife, who put her Honour aside in respect of her Husbands life: for she lent her body one night unto Antonius to preserve him (which she did by that meanes) whom she loved better then her selfe. Now to the contrary, some women unfaithfull to their Husbands, delivered them into the hands of the mur- derers, because they might marry againe. Amongst other, the Wife of Septimius having shame- fully given her body unto one of Antonius familiars, she caused her Husband to be put in the number of the Proscriptors, that she might more easily continue her adultery: and so was Septi- mius put to death. Q. Vestius Salassus, was hidden in a sure privie place, wherewith he acquaint- ed his Wife; but she straight revealed him to the murderers. The which he perceiving from a high place where he was, cast himselfe downe headlong, choosung rather to die so, then to make his cruell Wife parttime. Fulvius was discovered by a Slave of his, and his Concubine, jealous be- cause he had married a Wife, and had left her; although notwithstanding he had made her free, and had given her Goods to live withall. Now let us presently speake of the faithfulness and un- faithfulness of Slaves enfranchised. P. Naso was betrayed by his Slave freed, with whom he had bene too familiar. But he sold his death, for he killed the Traytor with his owne hands, and after- wards held out his necke to the Hangman. L. Luccius had put into the hands of two of his Slaves manumitted, as much as was necessary to have relieved him in his banishment: but they ran away with all, and he came and put himselfe to the slaughter. Haterius, that was in a secret place, was sold and discovered by a Slave of his. Cassius Varus being bewrayed by a Freeman that was his Slave, escaped nevertheless, and hid himselfe among Reedes: where being found by those of

MINURNES, theyooke him for a Thiefe, and would have wracked him to have bewrayed his companions: he discovered himselfe to be a Senator of ROME, but they would not believe him, be- cause he was in poore estate. But whilst they were reasoning of the matter, there cometh a Centener that strake off his head. C. Plotius was saved by his Slaves: but being a man given to perjure and rub himselfe with odoriferous Ointments, the scent and smell of them discovered him to the Souldiers who went ferriting up and downe in his House: yet could they not finde him, but cruelly tormented his Servants, to make them confesse where he was: which they would never do. But Plotius having compassion of the evils of his faithfull Slaves, came out of the place where he was hidden, and because he would prolong their life, he shortened his owne, and presented himselfe to the murderers. Ap- pianus Claudius, as he was neare to be had by the backe, changed his Gowne with his Slave, who went in that sort to present himselfe to the murderers: but theyooke off his head, and so he saved his Masters head. Another Slave of Menenius did the like: for he went into his Masters Litter, and offered his necke to the Sword of the murderers: who dispatched him whilst his Master got to the Port of the Sea, from whence he escaped into SICILIA. But the Slave of Virbinius Panopis is worthy of memory every where: for he hearing the murderers came to sacke his Master,ooke his Mas- ters Gowne from him and his Ring, gave him his owne, and put him out at the backe Gate. Then he goeth up into his Masters Chamber, and lay downe upon his Bed, where he boldly attended them that killed him for Panopis. Another shewed himselfe no lesse faithfull in the behalfe of Annius Refio: for although his Master had throughly thwacked him for his knavish trickes played a few daies before, and that then it seemeth he had opportunity to be revenged: he to the contrary im- ployed himselfe after a marvellous fashion to save his Master: for he meeting with an old man in his Journey, strake off his head, and shewing that with his whippings together to the murderers, he made them easily believe that he had bene well revenged of his Master, with whom immedi- ately after he saved himselfe in SICILIA. The Slaves of Martius Conserinus kept him a long time, and so well, that he had leisure to go to Sextus Pompeius. Q. Oppius an honourable old man, and being almost at the pits brinke, like to be killed, was rescued by his Sonne, who having finely gotten him out of ROME,ooke him upon his shoulders, and afterwards led him into SI- CILIA, where all the poore distressed ROMANES were gently received: for Pompeius had sent certain Ships to keepe upon the Coast of ITALY, and Pinnaces every where, to the end to receive all them that fled on that side: giving them double recompence that saved a Proscript, and hono- rable Offices to men that had bene Confuls and escaped, comforting and entertaining the others with a most singular courtesie. Many went into MACEDON to Brutus and Cassius: others into AFRICK to Cornificius. Some having escaped the tempest that was in the time of Sylla, were even gladd with this cruelty: as amongst others, M. Fidefius, and Lucius Philificius. T. Labie- nus was one of the number of the murderers in the Proscription of Sylla. Afterwards he did nothing else but goup and dowsne with a foule possessed with furies: so that being weary of his life at this time, he went and fate in a Chaire at his Gate, quietly attending that they should put him in the number of them that should be killed. Statius Samnis, an honourable Senator, being fourscore years old, because Thieves should have no part of his Goods, he left them in prey to whosoever would take them: and afterwards set his House on fire, and burnt himselfe within it. Aponius being kept a good while by his Slaves, was so weary to be shut up in a troublesome place, and where he lived very poorly, that he came out to the Market-place, and held out his throat to the murderers. Cestius being possessed with the like griefe, caused his Slaves to make a great fire, and then cast himselfe in it. Sulpitius Rufus, a man that had bene Confull, died because of an Ille of his the which he would not sell unto Fulvia: as also Ampius Balbus, for that he refused to give this wo- man a pleasant place of his. Balbus was betrayed by a Servant of his, that shortly after was hanged upon a Gibbet by Sentence of the People: and so had his reward for his villanous fact. Antonius did put in the number of the Proscriptors a Senator called Nonius Struma, and onely to get out of his hands an Emerod esteemed at fifty thousand Crownes. But Nonius found the meanes to escape with his Emerod, to the great despight of him that greedily desired this prey. Some valiantly defended themselves, as Atreus Capito, that killed many Souldiers running rudely upon him, thinking he would have suffered himselfe to be killed as others were. Howbeit after he had sold his flesh deare, he was overcome by multitude of Assailants. Vetulinus aided with his Sonne, having many times valiantly repulsed the murderers, he would have saved himselfe in SICILIA: but in the Straight he met with such a number of Enemies, that there he was killed. Sicilius Coranus a Senator, was put in the number of Proscriptors, and because he would not with others condemne Brutus and Cassius, devising how to escape, he put himselfe in ranke among those that carried a dead Corps to buriall: but he was discovered and put to death. The Trium-viri appointed such men as they liked of, to take charge of them that had bene killed. They sold the Goods of the Proscriptors by the Drumme, at such a price as the Souldiers would: and yet the most part of them were spoiled and given away. They promised the Widowes their Joynter, and to the Sonnes the tenth part of the Patrimony of their Fathers, and to the Daughters the twentieth part. How- beit there were few, and in manner none, that had any benefit by that: but to the contrary, Children they sacked many that demanded such Rights. On the other side, they did exact great summes of Money upon the City of ROME, and over all ITALY: the Owners were constrained to give the halfe of their yearly Revenue: the Tenants to furnish one yeares Rent of that they held of others: the Masters of Houses, the halfe of the Rent of their Houses, according to the Rent they went for.

To

To encourage the Souldiers, the Trium-viri gave unmeasurable Gifts, granted them daily new Pilgrage: the Legions wintered in the richest Townes, who were compelled to feede the Souldiers at their owne charge. Furthermore, all the rich men were constrained to pay in nature of a Tribute at one time, the tenth part of all that they were worth. To be short, so that they could finde out new inventions, it was enough to exact Money. For the feare and custome to indure all, had fashioned men to be more slaves, then the murderers and exactors would have had them. And to close up all, the Triumviri caused Money to be coyned, the which on the one side had the Image of Antonius with an Inscription in Latine, the effect whereof is this: M. Antonius Emperor, Augur, Triumvir, for the establishment of the Common-wealth. And on the other side there were three hands joynt together, with the markes of the Consulship, and had these words: Salus generis humani, that is to say: The health of mankind.

Now during the cruelties of this Triumvirate, Brutus and his Followers made themselves strong in MACEDON, and did divers exploits of Warre: and were afterwards overcome in the Fields PHILIPPANS, as hath bene said in the Life of Brutus, which we neede not rehearse againe, the principall being comprehended there. After this Victory, Antonius went into the East to dispose of his Affaires in ASIA, and to leave Money there to pay his Souldiers, having promised to every one of them five hundred Crownes. Cæsar returned into ITALY to refresh himselfe, to assigne Colonies to his Souldiers, to pacifie the troubles Lepidus had procured, and to set a Pike betwixt him and Pompey at a neede, if he were never so little in league with him. Cæsar fell grievously sicke at BRUNDISIUM: but being recovered againe, he entred into ROME, pacified all things, and kept Lepidus in his wonted degree. But when he came to bring his Souldiers into Colonies, then the storme began to rise: for the Owners cried out that they were tyrannized, being driven out of their Inheritances: the old Souldiers they complained that promise was not kept with them. Fulvia and some others practised to set them on, to the end to draw a Warre into ITALY, and by this meanes to make Antonius come againe, besetted by Cleopatra. These things proceeded so far that Fulvia tooke Armes, for she was then in the Campe, her Sword by her side, and commanded like a Capitaine. Cæsar on the other side being angry, sent her Daughter home to her, unto whom he was betrothed, and led his Army against the NURSINIANS and SENTINATES the Allies of Fulvia.

Augustus leadeth his Army against the Allies of Fulvia: and after driveth L. Antonius out of Rome.

In the meane space Lucius Antonius departed in the night with speede, and entred into ROME by Treason: used it as a City taken in Warre, and drave out Lepidus. Cæsar left Sulvidienus to besiege the SENTINATES, returned to ROME, and drave out Lucius, followed him and shortened his Journey as he was going to GAULE, shut him up, and besieged him a great time in PEROUSE, and compelled him through famine to yeeld himselfe, and to crave pardon, which he granted him. PEROUSE was burnt by a strange accident: for one of the chieftest of the City having set his House on fire, after he had wounded himselfe with his Dagger, a boisterous winde being risen upon it, so dispersed the flames abroad, that it burnt all the Houses besides. Cæsar caused some of his Capitaines to be killed that were against him. He condemned the NURSINIANS in a great summe of Money, and because they could not pay it, he drave them out of their City and Territory. Afterwards he suppressed some troubles raised in NAPLES by Tiberius Claudius Nero, Father of Tiberius Cæsar, and favourer of Fulvia: who seeing her selfe under foote, she fled unto ATHENS. But Cæsar to prevent a new Conspiracy, sent Lucius Antonius far from ROME, to command the Legions that were in SPAIN: he gave him also Commissioners to looke into him, and to observe his actions. He finely drave out Lepidus also into AFRICK with sixe Legions. On the other side Fulvia being dead, Cæsar and Antonius agreed being ready to fight: after that they made Peace with Pompey that governed SICILIA. Immediately after that he went into GAULE, to appease some troubles that happened there, and sent Agrippa before, who compelled the AQUITANS to submit themselves, and pacified all GAULE. On the other side Cneius Calpurnius subdued the CRETANIANS in SPAIN. And because the Legions had committed certaine insolencies, whereupon they fell together by the eares, and the Enemies had the better hand, after he had sharply reproved them, he tooke the tenth man of the two first Bands, and belaboured Jubellius with a cudgel. In the meane time Cæsar sent at times Troopes of men of Armes into DALMATIA and ILLYRIA, to the end to breathe them for other Warres that were a hatching, as that of SICILIA was the first. For Menas the Pirate, Sextus Pompeius Lieutenant, having for despight brought his Fleete unto Cæsar, and taken his part, unto whom also he delivered the Isles of SARDINIA and CORSICA, with three Legions, Cæsar did him great honours, and refused to deliver him againe unto Pompey, who asked him of him. Besides that, Pompey complained of Antonius, and pretending to have just occasions, he took Armes again. Wherefore Cæsar sent for Antonius and Lepidus out of GREECE and AFRICK, to come to aid him. Antonius came to the Haven of BRUNDISIUM: but upon the sudden, not known wherefore, he tooke Sea againe, and returned from whence he came. Lepidus came too late, which made Cæsar (seeing all the weight fall on his armes) that he sent his Lieutenants against Pompey: who fought with them by Sea and by Land, and had the better, and put Cæsar to great trouble, who had like to have been killed by a Slave also that would have revenged the death of his Masters Father, that was a Proscript. After that Antonius being come to TARENTUM, with intention to make Warre against Cæsar, Octavia Sister of the one and Wife of the other, agreed them, so that they did yet prolong with Lepidus their Triumvirate for five years more. Antonius went against the PARTHIANS, and Cæsar prepared to set upon Pompey againe. Hereupon Menas being angry for that he was not so well accounted of as he thought he deserved, he returned againe to joyne with Pompey with seven Gallies.

Cæsar's Fleet having sustained great hurt by tempest, was also beaten by Menas. Lepidus wan ILYRIE, and tooke certaine neighbour Villages. Cæsar having repaired his Ships and Army by Sea, and made it stronger then before, under the Conduct of Agrippa, who sailed unto LIPARE, he gave Battell by Sea unto Pompey's Lieutenants. But they being aided by Menas (that was returned the second time) he overcame and wan thirty Ships. But the other Fleet that Cæsar himselfe brought, was wholly overthrowne by Pompey, neare unto TAUROMENION, and Cæsar brought to that extremity, that he was ready to kill himselfe. But Cornificius ran to the shoare, who saved him, and brought him to the Campe: from whence he retired further off, and very quickly (but with great danger) unto MESSALA. After certaine encounters where Pompey ever had the better, inasmuch as Lepidus was suspected to leane on that side, Cæsar resolved to commit all to the hazard of a latter Battell: and to draw Pompey unto it, he cut him so short of Victuals, that he was constrained to come to blowes, and the Fight was very cruell: wherein Agrippa bestirred himselfe so valiantly, that he wan the Victory, funke twenty eight Ships, brake and spoiled the most part of the rest, and tooke two of the chieftest Capitaines Pompey had: one of the which called Demochares, killed himselfe with his own hands. Now for Pompey, who but a little before had about three hundred and fifty saile, he fled away with all speed onely with seventene, and went to MESSINA so discouraged, that leaving all hope and his Army he had by land, he went to the Isle of CEPHALONIE, where being somewhat come to himselfe, he determined to repaire to Antonius. But Tisennus a French-man (his Lieutenant of the Army by land) led all his Troopes unto Lepidus: some GREEK Historians report that it was to Cæsar. Pleminius was within MESSINA with eight Legions, and did capitulate with Lepidus to render up the Town to him. Whereupon Agrippa hapned to come thither: who maintained that they ought to regard Cæsar that was absent then. But that stood him in no stead: for Lepidus entered the Town, and gave the spoile of it as well to Pleminius Souldiers as to his. Thereupon Cæsar undertooke a thing worthy of memory, which was: that being unarmed he went into Lepidus Campe and turning by the blowes of the Darts that were thrown at him by some, which hit his Cloake and pierced it: he tooke hold of an Ensigne of a Legion. Then the Souldiers all of them armed followed him, and left Lepidus: who shortly after lost Empire and Army: he that with twenty Legions promised himselfe SICILIA and a great deale more, Cæsar gave him his life and the Office of soveraigne Bishop of ROME, whither he sent him. Some say he was banished: Upon these first there rose a sedition in Cæsar's Campe through the insolency of the Souldiers, that ran even to his Judgement Seate, using great Menaces. But he wisely appeased all, punished the Authours of the tumult, and did cassiere all the tenth Legion with great shame and ignominy, because the Souldiers of the same did overbrave him in words. He dispersed and sent some others to their houses, and gave unto them that had used themselves gently, two thousand Sesterces for every Souldier: which is thought to mount neare to fifty Crownes. He made them to be mustered, and found that they were five and forty Legions, five and twenty thousand Horsemen, and fix and thirty thousand lightly armed. Afterwards he did great honours unto his Lieutenant Agrippa for his notable service, and commanded Statilius Taurus to go into AFRICK to take possession of the Provinces of Lepidus. Whilest Antonius made Warre with the PARTHIANS, or rather unfortunately they made War with him to his great confusion: his Lieutenant Titius found the meanes to lay hands upon Sextus Pompeius that was fled in the Isle of SAMOS, and then forty years old: whom he put to death by Antonius commandement: for which fact he was so hated of the People of ROME, that though he had given them the pastime of certaine Plaies at his own cost and charges, they drave him out of the Theater.

The tenth Legion cassiere for their insolent words.

Sextus Pompeius put to death by the commandement of Antonius.

Augustus hurt in his thighs, armes, and one of his knees.

Moreover, Cæsar thinking to have sailed out of SICILIA into MAURITANIA, the Sea being rough, stayed him: which was the cause that he sent his Army into ILLYRIA, and set upon the JAPIDES, which did him much mischief, yet at the last he overcame them. Then he ranne upon the PANNONIANS, and the DALMATIANS, whom he made Tributaries; being hurt in his thighs, in his armes, and in one of his knees, in this Warre against the ILLYRIANS. On the other side, Messala his Lieutenant fought against the SALASSIANS, dwelling in a Valley environed with high Mouttaines of the Alpes: and after divers overthrowes, he made them subject to the Empire. And shortly after Cæsar was chosen Consul the second time: but he resigned the Office the same day unto Antonius Pater, being about to make himselfe friends against Antonius: who being stayed about Cleopatra, gave his Wife occasion to returne from ATHENS to ROME. Now after the fire of enmity betwixt these two Competitors had been a hatching a certaine time, it stood either of them both upon, to seeke all the meanes to overthrow his Companion. The strange proceedings of Antonius in favour of Cleopatra hastened the Warre, whereupon followed the Battell of ACTIUM, the flying of these wicked Lovers, and the beginning of the Monarchy of Cæsar, confirmed by the Conquest of EGYPT, and the Tragical death of Antonius and Cleopatra. The which we touch briefly, the whole being largely set down in the Life of Antonius. They did great honours unto Cæsar after these exploits. The memory of Antonius was condemned, and his Statues maimed and thrown down to the ground. A little before, M. Lepidus, Son of the Triumvir and of Junia Sister of Brutus, conspired against Cæsar. But after M. Lepidus they had discovered it, he was put to death by the wisdom of C. Mecenas a Knight, and Governor of ROME: his Wife Servilia killed her selfe, as Portia the Wife of Brutus. After the utter Overthrow of Antonius, Cæsar tooke order for the affaires of the East parts, he made alliance with Herodes King of JUDEA. He sent the King of the PARTHIANS Son in hostage to ROME, until they should should send all the Ensignes and Standards they had wonne of Crassus and Antonius. He governed the Affaires of ASIA, received into league and friendship with him the Kings of GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, and PAPHLAGONIA: and he punished some others by Fines, that were not his friends. He gave Priviledges to the Cities of EPHESUS, of NICÆ, PERGAME, and BYTHINIA, to build Temples in the honour of Julius Cæsar, of ROMÆ, and of himselfe. He set the SAMIANs at liberty, and after he had taken order for all the rest, he went towards ITALY: where after he was arrived it cannot be exprest with what great joy he was received of high and low, from BRUNDISIUM unto ROME. There he triumphed three daies together, for the ILLYRIANS, for Antonius and for Cleopatra. He gave great Presents unto Souldiers, and besides the Money that was made of the booty, and distributed by even Portions, he gave every one fifty Crowns apiece, the double to a Centener, and the treble to a Knight: and to every person among the People ten Crownes, even to little Children. He brought such store of Gold and Silver out of EGYPT (by him reduced into a Province, and condemned to pay twenty Millions of Gold to the People of ROMÆ for a Fine) that he brought down usury from twelve in the hundred, to foure: and made that Land and Houses were sold dear, where before the rich men had them almost for nothing. Furthermore, he brought in a marvelous change in all traffike: he also abolished all Taxes and Subsidies imposed by necessity of the civil Warres. He cried downe all strange Coines, which were at too high a price for their Law, and all through the iniquity of time. He lent out Money for a time without interest, unto those that had meanes to make double profit of it. He would not receive the Gold which the Cities of ITALY sent him to make him Crownes: but sent them it backe againe with his thanks for their good will. He gave the pastime for all manner of Games and magnificent sights unto the People, such as they had never seene before. He made goodly Feasts unto the Senators and Magistrates, and by a world of pleasures he appeased the sorrow of proscription, and of so many civil Warres. Being occupied in these matters, Letters came from Crassus, Cæsars Lieutenant, advertised that he had subdued the BASTARNES, divers People of MÆSIA, of DACIA, and of THRACIA: that he had won seven or eight Battels of them, that with his owne hands he had killed the King of the BASTARNES, and had brought the King of GETES to such extremity, that he killed himselfe. These newes did increase the joy, and the Triumph was granted to Crassus, and to Cæsar also: who by Decree of the Senate caused the Temple of Janus to be shut the third time, which had remained open the space of two hundred yeares. At this time Cæsar that was in his fift Consulship, numbred and mustered all the People of ROMÆ, reformed the Senate, the order of Knights, the distribution of Corne: and because of the great dearth that was then, he made Corne to be distributed to the People at a very meane price to some, and for gramericy to the poor. They that had been bound to the Common-wealth of too long a time, he discharged them, and burnt their Obligations. He confirmed the propriety of Houses in strife betwixt them and the Common-wealth, if they had been in quiet possession any convenient time. And to assure all those that had adhered unto Antonius, and to keep them that they should no more give eare to any new rumours, he sware unto them in good faith, that having taken Antonius Coffers he had burnt all the Letters he found in them, and read not one of them. He set down an Order for Custome, eased the Customers that had been too much oppressed: also he restored the Treasure againe, and the Augure of health. And by reason of that above named, he was called Father of the Countrey in open Senate: and at the same time he sent People to CARTHAGE, to set upon the Families of the Patricians, greatly diminished by the Proscriptions and civil Warres.

The next yeare following, which was the seven hundred twenty five of the Foundation of ROMÆ, and the sixt of his Consulship, seeing all the Warres appeased, Peace established, Armes laid down every where, the Common-wealth in good strength, the Lawes honoured, Justice in authority, the Senate in their ancient Glory, and the People restored by him to their rights of Assembly to choose their yearly Magistrates, and to give out their Commissions and Charges according to their old custome: he began to reason the matter with himselfe, which of the twaine was most profitable, either to keep (for the good of the State, and under the Title of a Prince) the Empire which he had in his hands: or whether he should render it up unto the People. He found himselfe grieved for that Antonius had oftentimes accused him of tyranny and unjust invasion: and on the other part also he apprehended the fury of the People, and the factions of ambitious men, which like the billowes of the Sea, would incontinently tosse in horrible fashion this unconstant Sea. Being thus perplexed, one day he tooke aside Agrippa and C. Maecenas, his two faithful friends, very wise men and of great experience above all others: and prayed them to tell him plainly without flattery, what they thought of it, being resolved to follow that which should be most expedient for the good of the Common-wealth. Agrippa by an ample discourse did counsell him to render up to the People his Principality and signiority. Maecenas was of the contrary opinion, and gave such counsell as Cæsar followed, tempering both opinions, and made himselfe Master in such sort that the People felt it not, but rather confessed that they needed such a Physician to raise them up againe from the incurable maladies they were fallen into. He thanked both his friends, gave his Niece Marcella to be the Wife of Agrippa, did him new honours, proceedeth to a new review of the Citizens of ROMÆ: and is chosen Prince of the Senate by Agrippa, who was then his Companion in the Consulship. Furthermore, assuring himselfe that so much good and honours as had been communicated to the small and great, would make them they would not much passe for their ancient Dignities and Liberty: and that the sweetness of the ease and rest they did enjoy, would make them forget all the good and evil past: he borrowed of his magnanimity the marvellous counsell that followeth. He resolved to discharge himselfe of the Principality into the hands of all the Senate, to render it unto the People: hoping that the Senate seeing his affection so to submit himselfe to the accustomed order, and not to seek a domination and Government ill-willed, they would thanke him the more: that all the great persons would lay aside the envy which they might beare unto him, and that the People would esteeme and love him so much the more. Upon this thought, and after he had acquainted some of the Senators withall that stood affected to him, to the end to win others by their meanes, he made an Oration in open Senate, well studied, and fit for the time. Having made a long discourse of the great extent of the Empire, and of his insufficiency, he added unto it, that this common burden could not be carried but by the immortal gods: that he had continued some yeares to manage a part of it, and that experience had made him know that his shoulders were too weake to beare such a burden as the Principality, subject to infinite changes, and exposed to a thousand ambushes. He therefore required, the City being furnished with so many Noble Persons, that the affaires might be managed by many men, who joyning themselves together, might more easily satisfie the charges, then one alone: that in a good houre, having set all things in good estate againe, he did put the Common-wealth into the hands of the Senate and People of ROMÆ. This Oration diversly moved the Senators. Some of them thought, that there was more Art then Truth in it. Others judged, that it was not expedient to put the estate into the power of many. The most of them enriched and made great by Cæsar, and that were risen up by the ruines of their Countrey, said: that they should preferre that which now they had in hand, before all the time past, beaten with so many Tempets. Many others inclined to that side, not that they were in good earnest of that minde, but for feare to be looked upon with an evil eye, if they did speake against their Companions. So then all of them with one consent unadvisedly, rather then of a common and ripe judgement, began to beseech and adure Cæsar, that it would please him to be chief and prefever of the Empire, of the which he had set down so many goodly and happy Foundations. Immediately they ordained that Cæsars Guard should have twice as much pay as they had before. Agrippa was of opinion, that they should cashier the SPANISH Guard; and Cæsar in their place should choose a Guard of ALBANES, knowing well that in those great bodies there was little malice hidden, and lesse subtilty: and that they were a People that tooke more pleasure to be commanded, then to command.

He being thus established in his Empire by the consent of the Senate and People, to the end they should not thinke he would lift himselfe up above measure, or to give sure footing to a perpetual Monarchy: he would not accept the charge to provide for the affaires of estate, and the Government of the Provinces, but for the space of ten yeares: with condition to give up his charge before this terme, if things were sooner settled in their full estate. First therefore, he left a part of the Provinces unto the Senate and People, to take care for the Government of the same: and for himselfe, he kept those that were not yet in order, and in the which he should be driven to make Warre. In those that were quiet, he established Pro-Consuls: and for others, he governed them by his Lieutenants, which had their lesson, according unto the which they were bound to be directed. Among other Lawes they were forbidden to leavy any Money, or to gather men of Warre together, or to assaile any Province, without the commandment of the Senate, or of Cæsar. That forthwith when they sent any Successours, they should leave their Government, and repaire to ROMÆ within three Moneths. He appointed also unto the Pro-Consuls a certaine somme of Money to beare their charges for their Horse and Carriage of the stuffe. Furthermore he established a Law, that the Pro-Consull or Governour should not go to his Province appointed him, till the end of five yeares after his Commission granted him: to the end that they which were convinced for taking of Money corruptly, should pay to the Provinces the Fine they should be condemned in: and he deprived them of all estates and honours which through their evil behaviours had been condemned in such Fines. And further, he would not that the Officers that had to deale in his affaires should have any Authority, but to demand their Stipends and Money which the Provinces were bound to furnish. And because he would beautifie and adorne ROMÆ, as Augustus the Majesty of the Empire required, he raised up many common buildings, and repaired many that had been left unfinished or ruined, leaving the Names of the Founders. His Buildings among other were the Temple of Apollo in the Palace, with the Porch, and a Library of Greeke and Latine Books. Also the Monuments, and the Parke, for the Walkes and Pleasure of the People of ROMÆ. In his seventh Consulship, certaine Senators propounded that they should call him Romulus, for that he having preserved the City of ROMÆ, it was as much bound unto him, as unto the first Founder. But he would not accept of that Name. Wherefore C. Munacius Plancus bethought himselfe of another, the which was given unto him by common consent of all, and he held it to be his death: as also we will call him from henceforth in all that remaineth to be set down of his deeds: to wit, Augustus. He not to seeme unworthy of this Name, and to carry himselfe so, that no man should repent his change of Government, began diligently to set his hand to these affairs. He wisely reformed the ancient Lawes, and made new that were very necessary. To make sure worke in these affaires, he chose from six Moneths to six Moneths fiftene Senators that had been Consuls, and did privately acquaint them withall that was requisite to be done for the preservation of the quietnesse of the Common-wealth, giving order that nothing should passe but Common should be searched and examined to the bottome: saying that he would give the People Lawes which

which they should all allow, and that he would not be his owne Judge alone. Afterwards he reformed the Assemblies of the City, where all things were carried by Suites, Presents, and Violence. He then restored the People their right, by Voices to choose the Magistrates. And to cut off all Suites, he forbade them to make any Rolle of Suites Names, but of those that had laid down great Summes of Money, to the end that being convinced of their Suites, they should be put to their Fines: adding also this ignominy, that such should be deprived of all Estates and Honours for the space of five yeares. And furthermore, he finely hindred the bad practises in Elections, giving order that none should be put in nomination but such as were vertuous and of good reputation. He left unto the Magistrates their charges whole, and did alwaies require in all his Consulships that they should give him two Companions: howbeit the Senate would never agree unto it. The yeare before, he had reduced the number of Senatours to six hundred, all honourable men. At that time also he re-established the ancient Order and Dignity: ordaining that the Senate should have the superintendency of the Treasure, and of all the revenues that belonged to the People of Rome. That all the expences for the Common-wealth should be made by their Ordinance. That the Senatours should have the hearing of all crimes of treason, conspiracy, ambushes, and offences to his Majesties Person: and that it should pertain to them to give entertainment and answer that should be fit, to Ambassadors of Nations. When in matters of importance he asked the advice of the Senate, instead of coming to the Prince of the Senate according to the accustomed manner, or to him that was appointed Consull, or to other Senatours by order: he made choice of any one of them which he thought good, to the end that every one should give attentive eare, and be ready to deliver his opinion: and not to hold his head down in his Rancke, and content himselfe to be of other mens minds. He ordained also, that the whole body of the Senate should not assemble but from fifteen dayes to fiftene daies: howbeit that in ordinary matters the Magistrates should thinke of that that were expedient. In the Moneth of September and October, the Senatours were not bound to meete, but only foure hundred drawne by Lot: who might establish any Decree. And as for himselfe, to honour this Company the more, the day of the Assembly he never saluted any of the Senatours apart, but all of them together in the Councell-Chamber when they were set, and all of them Name by Name, the one after the other. If he would go out, and that he said, he would detain the Company no longer, he bade them farewell in the same manner that he had saluted them at his coming in. He ruled justice also civil and criminal, and willed that amongst other things the Criminals accused by certaine Enemies, should be set at liberty: with condition notwithstanding that they should be brought to Prison againe, if the Accuser did submit himselfe to receive the like punishment as the offender, if it were found he had endangered him. Moreover, he made provision for common workes, and reparations of Bridges, Canseys, and High-waies: And because he was determined to make a Voyage into GAULE, he established Messala Governour of ITALY and of ROME, for feare left any trouble should happen in his absence. But this place being troublesome unto Messala, he besought Augustus he would discharge him: and therefore Agrippa was substituted, who rid all ITALY of a great number of Theeves and Robbers on high-waies, and stayed the Courses of many other troubles of the State.

The affaires of ROME and ITALY being in so quiet estate, understanding that ENGLAND was full of sedition, SPAIN next unto the Mountaines Pirenei in armes, and GAULE ready to rise: he opened the Temple of Janus, and tooke his journey to give order for all. But the Ambassadors of ENGLAND prevented him, and promised Tribute. Then he went to GAULE in NARBONE, to draw nearer to SPAIN. And so holding on his journey to NARBONE, he pacified the GAULES, he made an exact numbering of all the GAULES, of their Goddes, Possessions, and Slaves, and caused the Rolles to be brought unto him. He established Lawes and Customes in every place, and divided GAULE into foure parts: of the which the first part was called NARBONNE, which extendeth it selfe from the River of Var unto the Mountaines Pirenei; Aquitaine the second, unto the River of Garonne. The third, GAULE LYONNOISE, unto the River of Seine. Then GAULE BELGICA, bordered with the River of Rhin: and rated all the GAULES at ten Millions of Gold for a Tax. Now there remained no more for him to do, but to bring SPAIN to order: in the which the ROMANS had made continuall Wars the space of two hundred yeares together. Neverthelesse the CANTABRIANS and ASTURIANS (which are the BASQUES) and other People neighbours dwelling in the Mountaines, they neither cared for Augustus, nor for the Empire: for they were ever in armes, and made incursions upon the Allies of the People of ROME, and did them great mischief: who complaining unto Augustus of the great necessity they were brought unto, he being neare unto them, came to aide them: and found the CANTABRIANS besieging of a Fort, having taken the Town by it called SAGESAME. He charged them home with such fury that he left them dead in the place, after they had valiantly defended themselves. Afterwards he divided his Army into three parts, and environed the Countrey of the CANTABRIANS, who made head for the space of five yeares, and did marvellous great hurt to the ROMANS: and if the straights whereby they might easily enter into their Countrey, had not been discovered unto Augustus, they had sent him home againe to ROME with shame. But having found the way to surprize them on every side, he made a cruell Warre upon them, putting all to fire and bloud. They retired with speed to one of their highest Mountaines, with all that they could carry with them. The ROMANS perceiving that it was too hard a match for them, if they should go thither to set set upon so warlike a Nation, and that could not be subdued by force: they made Forts in the midst of the Mountaine, and placed a strong Guard there, to the end to famish the CANTABRIANS, and by that means to bring them to reason. But they on the other side, instead of yeelding themselves, did abide all the miseries that any man can possibly thinke of: and it came to that passe, that even to sustaine nature the strong Sonnes killed their old Fathers, the Mothers their Infants, and the young men did devour the old, eating up their Fieih. Upon this evil, there followed another, to wit, discord among them. Some would yeeld, others were of another minde. The former alledging, that they must needs submit themselves to the mercy of the ROMANS: the other, that they should make a desperate fallie upon the Enemies Campe, and so sell their lives. Their contention waxed so hot and violent, that the CANTABRIANS thrust out ten thousand of the ASTURIANS with their Wives and Children, and compelled them to defend along the Forts made by the ROMANS: whom they intreated with the teares in their eyes to make them Slaves, and to give them somewhat to eate. Tiberius then one of Caesar's Lieutenants, would not suffer them to be received, to the end to famish the one by the other, and to end this Warre without any bloodshed. This poore People being deprived of sustenance and hope, and being afraid they should yet endure greater evils, began to powne a venomous Hearbe like unto Smallage, and poysoned themselves. The young men killed themselves running one against another with their Swords in their hands. The others, to the number of three and twenty thousand, came downe in a most miserable estate from the top of the Mountaine, and yeelded themselves to the discretion of the ROMANS: who set aside ten thousand of the strongest of them, to serve them in the Warre which they intended to make against the ASTURIANS. The rest were sold by Troopes, with condition that they should be carried farre from their Countrey, and that they should not be made free, before they had served them as Slaves, the space of thirty yeares. They disarmed ten thousand of them: which they bare so patiently, that many killed themselves with their owne hands, esteeming their life nothing without Armes. They say, that a little Childe with a Dagger killed his Father and Brethren that were chained together, and that by the commandement of the Father: and that a Woman did the like to some of her kinsfolkes. And that many of these Mountainers accustomed to rob Passengers, being upon the gibbet, sang out Songs aloud, even at their death, shewing a joy and marvellous courage. Augustus being then in those parts, gave leave to the Souldiers of his Guard of SPANIARDS to depart into the Territory of the GASCONS with great Presents, and Priviledge to enter in rancke amongst the ROMANE Legions. He built SARAGOUSSE, and other Towns, which he replenished with Souldiers, to bridle the courses and tumults of the CELTIBERIANS: and afterwards made a stone Bridge over the famous River of Eber. Then having overthrowne the CONISCES, friends of the ASTURIANS, taken their head City, and put all the Inhabitants thereof to the Sword: he set upon the ASTURIANS, who being environed of all parts, and choosng rather to die then to be made Slaves: burnt, killed, and poysoned themselves, and with them many other of their neighbours. There were some of them yet left alive, with whom the CANTABRIANS joynd and other their neighbours, and that a long time. These People had this custome, that all goods were common amongst friends, and when one of them came to the other, he received and used him as himself: and so also in adverstity they ran one fortune, or else killed themselves immediatly after their friends were dead. Among them were certaine loose People gathered together out of divers parts, who resolved all together to go charge the ROMANS, and came to fight with such a fury, that nothing but the night could separate them, having lost many of both sides. The next morning they began to joyne againe with more violence then before, and the fight continued even till night, that the ROMANS obtained the Victory: but they confessed, that they never encountered with such cruell Enemies. They that were left alive fled into a Towne, in the defence whereof they made themselves all to be killed, rather then yeeld to themselves. Augustus built certaine places there in that Countrey, which afterwards by time were much enlarged. In this selfe same yeare of his ninth Consulship, Terentius Varro his Lieutenant subdued the SALASSIANS, which are those of the Vale of OSTRE: he disarmed them, sold the young men by the drum, gave part of the Territory unto the Souldiers Prætorians, and built there a City called AUGUSTA PRÆTORIA. Vincinius also appeased some troubles in GERMANY, and made Warre very fortunatly in divers places. By means of which Victories, Augustus was called the eight time Imperator, as much to say, as soveraigne Captaine: and they suffered him to wear from that time forth the first day of the yeare, a Hat of Lawrell, and a Robe of Triumph. At his returne he shut the Temple of Janus the fourth time, married Cleopatra (the Daughter of Antonius and Cleopatra) unto Juba the Story-writer, overthrowne by Julius Caesar in AFRICK, with a part of MAURITANIA, and of GETULIA, to reigne there. He reduced into a Province GALLOGRECIA and LYCAONIA, which made a Portion of a Kingdom: and by reason of his sicknesse not able to be present at the marriage of his Daughter Julia, whom Marcellus married, the Son of Octavia his Sister, he left all to the charge of Agrippa, and went to ROME. There being chosen Consull the tenth time, the Senate gave him absolute power over the Estate and Lawes, to make and undo them at his pleasure. They did him greater honours then before, and gave Marcellus his Nephew before his time great Offices in the Common-wealth; and to Tiberius his Wives Son. He in token of thankfulnessse, gave to every one of the People ten Crowns apiece. Whilest these matters were in hand, the CANTABRIANS and their neighbours revolted, by subtilty, caught some of the ROMANS and cut their throates. Ælius Lamia, Governour in those parts, to be revenged of this outrage, put all the whole Countrey to fire and bloud, destroyed some Townes, and sold their young men by the drum. To be short, he followed them so hard, that he brought them in subjection. Ælius Gallus Governour of Ægypt, almost about the same time being sent by Augustus commandment with ten thousand men, five hundred Souldiers of Hercules Guard, and fifteene hundred NABATEANS: under the Conduct of a Noble-man of ARABIA called Syllemus: he did nothing to be accounted of, but discover the Countrey. But having lost the most part of his men within the Defarts where this Syllemus brought them, and overcome the SABEANS in a Battell, he was enforced to retire. Afterwards this Syllemus, for that he killed his King Obodas by Treason, he was taken Prisoner, and beheaded by the Decree of the Senate.

Augustus being Consul for the eleventh time, the Plague was in ROME, and for himselfe he was grievously sicke, but restored againe to health by Antonius Musa his Physician. The People therefore caused a Statue to be set up to this Antonius, the Senate did him great honours, and in favour of his Profession, gave immunity to all others that from that time forth did practise Physick. Furthermore, by many Ceremonies they did shew the joy they had for the health of Augustus: and specially Fathers of households dying, expressly commanded their Children to bring their Sacrifices to the Capitoll with a Title in great Letters, saying: THAT AT THE DAY OF THEIR DEATH THEY LEFT AUGUSTUS IN GOOD HEALTH. It was also ordained that from that time forth they should never put any man to death, as often as Augustus entred into the City. Shortly after he did associate with himselfe Calpurnius Piso in the Consulship, who had followed the party of Pompey and of Brutus. Afterwards when he was gone from ROME into the Countrey, he made Lucius Cestius his Deputy for him, an inward friend of Brutus and of his memory. Whereat the Senate marvelling, by Decree made him perpetuall Pro-Consull of the ROMANE Empire, Tribune of the People, and gave him power to assemble the Senate as often, and when it pleased him. The People would have compelled him to have been Dictator: but he bowing a knee, casting down his long Robe, and shewing his breast, besought them to discharge him of so odious an estate. In the meane time he accepted the Decree of the Senate, and the charge to cause Corne to be brought in, because of the dearth that chanced in ROME. In the which he served his turne by Tiberius created Questor at the age of nineteene yeares. As for Marcellus his Nephew, he was chosen Ædilis Curiulus, who aided him to set forth all the magnificent pompe of Plaies, which he caused to be plaied before the People. Every man judged that he should be the Successour of all his power: but this young man of great hope, died shortly after, to the great griefe of every man: and no man can tell whether it was of naturall sicknesse, or of Poyson given him by the practises of Livia. A little before his death, Agrippa impatient to beare the rising of this Marcellus whom he despised, went into ASIA under colour of another Voyage. They say that Augustus much troubled with sicknesse, returned to his first consultation, to put the Common-wealth againe into the hands of the Senate and People: and for this cause he called for the Senators and all the other Magistrates: unto whom he gave an account of the Empire: and that was a little Booke containing the numbering of all the Riches, Towns, Provinces Allies, Legions, Armies by Sea and by Land, of all the Kingdomes and Countries tributary, of all the Customes of the Empire of ROME, that which was necessarily to be leaved or releafed. But being somewhat amended againe, he changed his minde. And furthermore, having given Audience to the Ambassadors of Phraartes King of the PARTHIANS, which demanded a Son of his brought by Tyridates unto Augustus, he sent backe the Child, and suffered Tyridates to remaine at ROME, where he sumptuously entertained him. By this means he kept himselfe in friendship with the one and the other, and held the PARTHIANS in suspence, to the end they should alter nothing. At the beginning of the next yeare following, under the Consulship of Marcus Claudius Marcellus, and of L. Arruntius, the Famine increasing at ROME, he wisely provided for it. And then the People would constrain him by force to accept the Dictatorship, and threatened to set the Palace on fire and to burne all the Senators in it, if they refused to allow this Decree. He would none of the Office of Dictatorship, and did refuse also to be Censor, although that Office had been voide the space of twenty eight yeares. But for as much as Munacius Plancus and Emilius Lepidus, who were chosen Censors, deserved themselves to be censured, because of their discords, Augustus without the Name tooke upon him to discharge it: and provided to reforme infinite disorders that were in ROME, in Apparell, Countenances, Companies, and in the Fight of Fencers at the Sharpe. At the same time Fannius Capio and L. Murana, having conspired against him, and being discovered by Castricius, were taken as they thought to have escaped, and put to death. In the meane time the ASTURIANS and CANTABRIANS still intreated by Carisus, they rebelled, but were overcome in a set Battell, and the prisoners sold. The CANTABRIANS preferring death before servitude, killed, burnt, and poisoned the one the other. The ASTURIANS being overcome the fourth time, did submit themselves, and their Armes were taken for them in the same time. Petrinus Governour of Ægypt, followed with ten thousand Footmen, and with eight hundred Horfe, went to make Warre with the ETHIOPIANS, which dwell under Ægypt, who had invaded and ruined certaine Towns, overthrowne and carried away the Statues of Augustus. Thereupon he pursued them, and made them flie before him: tooke certaine places upon them; and pierced far into their Countrey: so that he informed their Queene to send her Ambassadors unto Augustus (then wintering in the Isle of SAMOS) to pray Peace, which he granted them paying Tribute.

At the beginning of the Spring, he prepared himselfe to give order for the Affaires in the East: but because they that bent themselves for the Consulship had almost put the City in Alarme, and that in the end, notwithstanding the Order he had set down, the People had chosen men whom Augustus feared: through the advice of Mecenas, he made Agrippa come againe to governe ROME in his absence, and married unto him his Daughter Julia, Marcellus Widow. Now whilst Agrippa gave order for the Affaires of the City, Augustus tooke Sea, and having provided for the Affaires of SICILIA, he went into GREECE, did much good for the LACEDÆMONIANS, and to the contrary, repressed the pride of the ATHENIANS, from whom he tooke away the Tribute they had leaved of the Isles ÆGINA and EREYRIA. In the meane time, though he made little account of strangers ceremonies, yet he made himselfe to be received into the Fraternity of Mysteries: and the Ambassadors of PERSEA having caused the Temple of Jupiter Olympian to be finished, begun of long time at ATHEENS, they ordained that it should be dedicated to the Spirit of Augustus. Being passed from thence into ASIA, he gave order to his Provinces and those of the People of ROME: punished the CYZICIENS, that had killed the ROMANE Citizens in their Town. He imposed a Tribute upon those of TYRE and SIDON, who had dealt badly, and brought them into the forme of a Province. He did much good unto the Towns that had been faithfull unto the Common-wealth: to some of them he gave the right of Burgeship of ROME; and to others the same rights and Priviledges which the naturall Citizens of ROME had. He built up againe the Cities of LAODICEA, and of THIATIRA: he set them up of the Isle of CHIO againe, afflicted before by an Earth-quake; he did exempt them from all Subsidies for six yeares. He restored certaine Realmes unto their Kings whom he had subdued: or else he did establish others anew, who came to attend him at his Court as Subjects, without any signes or tokens of Royall Dignity. He sent Tiberius into ARMENIA, to install Tigranes unto his Royall Throne againe, having been driven out of it. Tiberius returned thither, and having fought with the ARMENIANS, he gave them Artauades to their King, who ruled not long. Phraartes King of the PARTHIANS being afraid they would set upon him, was very careful to get all the ROMANS together, which were taken after the overthrow of Crassus and Antonius; whom he sent every man of them unto Augustus, with all the Standards and Ensignes, and also his Son and Nephews for Pledges of his faithfull friendship unto the People of ROME. Augustus granted him Peace, and then he came into the Isle of SAMOS, comforted RHODES, replenished CORINTH and PATRAS with a great number of men enfranchised, whom he made Burgeses of ROME. In this place also there came unto him Ambassadors from Porum and Pandion, two of the mightiest Kings of the INDIANS, who prayed alliance and friendship with him, and brought him very rare Presents. There came with them a Philosopher of INDIA called Zarmanus: who being brought to the City of ATHEENS, burnt himselfe alive, as one Calanus did in the time of Alexander the Great.

In this meane space the City of ROME was full of great trouble by the practises of Egnatius Rufus, who by force would needs be chosen Consul in Augustus place being absent: who gave not him his voice, but named Lucretius Vespillo, escaped from the Proscription, as hath been spoken of before. But this put him in such a rage, that he conspired with M. Genucius, and Plautius Rufus to kill Augustus. But they being discovered betimes, were imprisoned and executed by Decree of the Senate: who made infinite numbers of honours unto Augustus at his returne: howbeit he would not accept them all, but carried himselfe very modestly in every place where he was. The People chose him Censor for five yeares, and perpetuall Consul: and at his request they granted Triumph unto Cornelius Balbus, although he were no ROMANE borne (for he was a SPANIARD) by reason of his notable Victories he had obtained, as Lieutenant of Augustus, upon the GARAMANTES. Agrippa on the other side was sent into GAULE troubled by the invasions of the GERMANS, whom he ordered well enough. Then he led his Army into SPAINE, troubled with the rebellion of the CANTABRIANS: the which came thus to passe. The Prisoners CANTABRIANS whom they had sold by the drum, by a complot they made together, cut their Masters Throates, and then fled into their Countrey, where they solicited others to take armes, got their Fortresses into their hands, and set upon the ROMANE Garrisons, Agrippa could by no means bring his Souldiers thither, whether that they desired to take rest, or that the resolution of the CANTABRIANS did astonish them. But after that he had brought them to his hand, he marched directly against the Enemies: who had the better at the first encounter, and the ROMANS were well-beaten. But they being rebuked and punished by Agrippa, who gave them Barley for Wheate, he returned again to fight. But then the CANTABRIANS that bare armes were all cut in pieces, the rest disarmed, and drawn from the Mountaine to dwell in the Plaine. Augustus was saluted Emperour or soveraigne Captain, because of this Victory: but Agrippa modestly refused Triumph, and within a while after he overcame the PANNONIANS also. The year following, the GETES and DACES being at civil Wars, Lentulus that had subdued them before, counselled Augustus not to lose this occasion: for he might easily subdue these barbarous People being thus divided. But Augustus not being of the minde to make any Wars at all with any Nation, without great and just cause, (although there were more hope of gaine, then appearance of losse,) he answered: There was no cause for him to do so: adding also, that those that fought a little gaine with great losse and danger, were like unto those that would angle with a golden Hooke, the which breaking and falling into the water, no Fish is worth the value of it. And therefore that the barbarous People were to be left to their own miseries: and that by their blood-shed, by their own Companions, they were more then enough punished for the ill they had done to the ROMANS, who ought not to begin first to do evil.

In the same yeare Augustus being very desirous to put his hand to the reformation of abuses in ROME, and that effectually, he joyned with him his Nephew Agrippa in the State of a Cenfor, and did establish him Tribune for five years. First of all he began to correct some disorders that were in the Senate, he reformed the Knights, Spectacles, and Plaies, and the manner of Suites for publique Offices. He set Fines upon thier heads that would not marry, and bestowed much upon them that had Wives and Children. He gave unto Horatius five and twenty thousand Crownes, to procure him to take a Wife, that he might raise up issue to that Noble house and Family of the Horatians. He ordained also that Maidens should be twelve yeares old at the least before they married, and suffered them to kill Adulterers taken with the fact, without punishment, condemning the Sodomites without remission. And for Military Discipline, he looked very carefully unto that. And because a Knight of ROME had cut off his owne Sonnes thombes, for that he should not go to the Warre, he made him to be sold by the drumme, and all his goods. But because the Regrators were greedy to size upon them, he made them cease the sale, and put the Knight into the hands of one of his bondmen enfranchised, and was contented to drive him out of ROME. Furthermore he procured that the Senate should not be kept but with great reverence: that the Senatours should come together as into a Temple of Devotion, and that no Decree should passe, but in the presence of foure hundred Senatours, if it might be: that no man should be made free of ROME, but upon great consideration. For the rest, he and Agrippa gave the People the pleasure of secular yearly Games, which had not been seene an hundred yeares before. But he took very great care that there should be no infolencies be committed. He punished the Players in divers sorts, that behaved themselves more licentiously then became them. And when one of them amongst them called him Lord, he shewed the People with his voice, his eyes, and his hand, that he was not well pleased withall: and the next morning he published a sharpe Edict, forbidding all Persons expressly to say so, and would never suffer that any of his should give him this Name. But these Playes being ended, he adopted Caius and Lucius the Sonnes of Agrippa. In all this great business, the SICAMBRIS, USIPITES, and TENCHTERES, People of GERMANIE, surpris'd certaine ROMANES in their Territory, hanged them up, passed over the Rhein, spoiled GAULE, overthrew certaine Horsmen, and following their purpose, overcame M. Lollius Pro-Consull of GAULE, and tooke away an Ensigne from him. Yet though he were a man of small action, and very covetous: nevertheless he was revenged of them, and coming upon the Invadors, fought with them, and drave them beyond the Rhein. On the other side, C. Lentulus made Warre with the DACES, and killed three of their chiefe Leaders with a great number of men: and afterwards he established a Garrison by the River of Danuby, to stop the incursions of this wilde Nation. Augustus seeing these troubles, disposed of the Affaires of ITALY to go into GAULE, to rid himselfe of these griefs, and by his absence to make his presence more honourable. At that same time, divers People inhabiting upon the River of Danuby, rebelled: but Augustus Lieutenants bestirred them so well, that they were all compelled to seeke Peace. At that time also all GAULE was in commotion, and that in divers forts. But the covetousnesse of Licinius Enceladus, made free, and sollicit of the affaires of Augustus, was cause of all this mischief. For he having commanded the People to furnish the Tribute for every Moneth, he had put fourteen Moneths in the yeare for twelve: So being accused to his Master for Money ill gotten, although all the world cried out of him, yet he found the meanes to escape well enough. For after he had gotten an infinite Masse of Gold and Silver together, he brought it to Augustus, saying, he had never other intention but to take from the GAULES the meanes to rebell. For all this Augustus withdrew him from thence, and sent Tiberius thither to settle all things in good estate againe. Almost during these commotions, and outrageous dissensions, the RHETIANS, neare unto the Lake of Comè, brake into GAULE CYSALPINE, and took out of ITALY store of booty. They were a People separated from all others, and so cruell, that having taken any place from the ROMANES, they killed all the Male Children, and further, did aske their Soothsayers of Women with childe: and if they said she was great with a Boy, they presently ran her through, and killed her and the fruite of her Wombe. Augustus would not endure these outrages, but sent Drusus the Sonne of Livia against them: who drave them out of ITALY, having overcome them in a set Battell, neare unto TRENT. They say that their Women shewed themselves so cruell in this Fight, that their Darts failing them, they rooke their little Children by their legges, and did most barbarously force themselves to smite their Enemies in the face. Those that were driven out of ITALY would have entred into GAULE, but they were repul'd by Tiberius. In the end, these People and their Allies were constrained to submit themselves.

Augustus sent a Colony unto NISMES in LANGUEDOQUE: and made them free Burgessees of ROME. It is thought that he sent another unto ARLES, of the sixt Legion: and one of the second unto ORANGE. Some make report of these Colonies in the time of Tiberius M. Agrippa on the other side, he gave order for the Affaires of ASIA, and of all the Orient, where he behaved himselfe so well, that all that were friends to the People of ROME, were of better courage then before, and all their Enemies so valiantly suppressed, that Augustus was saluted the tenth time soveraigne Capitaine. But Agrippa after his wonted manner, would have no Triumph: which was the cause of the losse of this custome, and others following his example, were contented from thenceforth with the Ornaments of Triumph. But of another side, the PANNONIANS, the GENOUSES, and those of PIEMONTE rebelling, they were subdued by the Lieutenants of Augustus: who builded two Cities in testimony of his Victory against these two last People: whereof TURIN (called Augusta Pretoria) toris) was one, and GENOA the other.

Augustus having pacified GAULE, stayed the invasions of the GERMANES, and quenched the rebellion of SPAIN: he left Drusus with authority and his Army upon the Rheine, and came to ROME as Agrippa did out of ASIA, and became extremely sicke of the Gowt. Lepidus died at the same time, to whom Augustus succeeded in the estate of chiefe Bishop, and made sumptuous Spectacles and fights unto the People. He burnt all the Bookes of Divination and Prophecy, except those of the Sibylles: and yet he kept them not all. He reformed the Kalender, and ordained that there should be no Leape yeares for twelve yeares following. He suffered that the sixt Moneth then called Sextilis, should be called Augustus after his Name. All that yeare was spent in Plaies and Pastimes, saving that Augustus (having been sicke) caused all that he had done in his Government to be rehearsed before the Senate. He tooke a review of the Senatours, and confirmed his Nephew Agrippa in the estate of a Tribune for five yeares more. But shortly after, this great person being returned from a Journey out of PANNONIA, whither he was gone to prevent disorders that were likely to be renewed, he fell sicke and died, before Augustus could come in time. That was a marvellous griefe unto him: and not knowing now on whom he should bestow his Daughter Julia, in the end he chose Tiberius his Wives Sonne, and married them together, but they continued not long in good termes together. From thenceforth Tiberius and Drusus dealt almost in all the Affaires of Warre, and Tiberius especially after the death of the other: of whom we shall speake to best purpose in the Life of Tiberius, yet we will briefly note it here: So then Tiberius went and made Warre in PANNONIA, risen by means of the death of Agrippa: yet he made an end of it, killed some of them, sold and subjected the rest: and compelled all that People to submit themselves unto the People of ROME. Drusus on the other side made Warre in High and Low ALMAINE, and brought the most part of these Nations unto some reason: and afterwards he returned to ROME: where Augustus held so straight a hand to bring the Senate to order, that there were few men desired to be of the Senate, and many to the contrary that gave up their Offices. But Augustus compelled those that were of age, of quality and sufficiency, and gave order also that the Dignity of the Tribunes of the People should remaine entire: suffering those notwithstanding which had this Office, their time expired, to be amongst the Senatours, or with Knights. As for the Towns of ASIA afflicted with the Earth-quake, he payed of his owne to the Common-wealth, the yearly Tribute which they ought. And for the regard of those which were of his Provinces, he freed them from all Imposts for six yeares, and gave them of PALESTINE a great quantity of Corne, which sustained great want and famine. In the meane time Drusus passed over the Rheine, made war with the USIPITES, SICAMBRIS, TENCHTERES, CATTIANS, CHERSIANS, and SVAUBIANS, whom he overthrew in divers encounters: and especially in a great Battell, where were killed a very great number. For these People were gathered together with such a confidence of Victory, that they had already made agreement among themselves for division of the booty. But specially at the last Battell, the CHERSIANS should have the Horse, the SVAUBIANS: they should have the baggage, and the SICAMBRIS the Prisoners. And yet to binde themselves more straightly together, they burnt twenty Centeniers of the ROMANES. And this was the cause that the Battell was so long and cruelly fought betwixt them: yet in the end the Victory remained to Drusus, who gave the Prisoners and all the booty to the Souldiers, making the Horse, baggage, and captives to be sold to them that would offer most. All the Field for a great league and a halfe of length was strewd with dead bodies, and they found in the Enemies Campe great store of Iron Chaines prepared by them for the ROMANES: howbeit they served for them. Drusus sent up a token of Triumph, and was called Imperator of his Troopes in the Field where the Battell was pitched. Afterwards he built above fifty Castles upon the Rivers of Meuse, Visurge, and of the Rheine. Tiberius on the other side was in DALMATIA, where he brought them under that role in armes against them. The Triumph of Oyatius was decreed to them both, and Augustus was saluted by the Senate Imperator or soveraigne Capitaine, and this for the twelfth time. But in these businesses, the Warre was hot in THRACIA, and more then ever before: all the Provinces being in rebellion under the Conduct of Bulgades, who had killed the King Rhacuspole, an Ally of the People of ROME, driven out his Uncle and Lieutenant Rhymetacles out of THRACIA into CHERONNE SUS. L. Piso Governour of PAPHLAGIA went against them, and at the first encounter had not the advantage, but in the second he overcame them utterly. Drusus having made a Voyage to ROME, to celebrate the birth day of Augustus in great magnificence, whilst his Troopes reposd themselves in their Garrisons, about the Spring he returned into GERMANIE: overcame the SVAUBIANS, gave them a King: then he invaded the Countrey of the MARCOMANNES, fought with them divers times, killed a great number of them, and made all the rest subject to the ROMANES. Because of this Victory, and of that of Piso, Augustus was called Imperator the thirteenth time. Almost in this time he put Procus to death in prison, one that he loved best of all his bondmen made free: being convinced of many Adulteries. He made the thighes of his Secretary Thallus to be broken, for the summe of an hundred Crowns which he took for shewing a secret Letter. In this meane time Tiberius continued War in DALMATIA and PANNONIA, moved through the great Imposts, whereof the People complained: but in the end he subdued them, and built many Castles upon the River of Danuby to stay the invasions of the Enemies. Piso ing secrets of also in THRACIA overcame the MASTIANS, and BASTARNES, and brought away a great State number of Prisoners, who bit their Iron Chaines for anger, and most impatiently did beare their servitude.

virtude. Drusus made the CATTIANS subject also, then he came to LEONS to meet with Augustus: from whence they both returned together into ITALIE. They had a custom also that yearly on the first day of January, (though Augustus were absent) all the Senatours: Officers of Justice, and others of meane estate, brought him New-yeares Gifts to the Capitoll: and also every one cast a piece of Gold or Silver into the Lake Curtius, for a Vow that they had made to his health. He did bestow all these New-yeares Gifts to buy many rich Statues of the gods, which he set up in all the crosse Streets.

In the five and thirtieth yeare of his Principality, under the Consulate of Drusus Nero, and of Quintus Crispinus, Drusus having subdued a great part of GERMANY, and preparing to go further, a Vision having the shape of a great Woman, that spake bigger and louder then a mans voice could do, said to him in Latine: Go no further: which was a signe of his death, the which followed incontinently after. This young Noble-man of an excellent hope, being but thirty-yeares old, Augustus had put him in the Rolle of his Heires, and made an Oration in his praise. Afterwards all the charge of the Warres of GERMANY was committed unto Tiberius. And for Augustus, he being the same yeare called for a Witnesse in certaine Causes, did patiently suffer any man to aske him, or refuse him, as he had oftentimes done before. One day as he spake in full Senate, one of the Senatours told him: I understood nothing: another, I would speake against it, if I might be heard. Another time being weary with the contestations of certaine Pleadings, he went in choler out of his Seate. But some began to say unto him, that it was lawfull for Senatours to speake freely to any matter that came before them: and that no man was ever offended for the Replies or contestations of any man.

Nanius Asprenas, one of his greatest friends, was accused by Cassius Severus to have poisoned an hundred and thirty bidden Guests at a Banquet. Augustus did not recommend him, but let the Senatours alone, who banished Cassius. An old Souldier upon complaint being brought before the Senatours, and in danger of his life, besought Augustus to helpe him. And when he had given him an Advocate to defend him, the Souldier opened his breast, and shewing him the markes of the wounds which he had received in the Battell of ACTIUM, said unto him: But I beseech thee Augustus consider that I have received these wounds here upon my body for to defend thee, and would put no other in my place. Augustus moved with these words, appeared in justice, and pleaded this mans Cause, the which he wanne. Sonne after he was saluted soveraigne Captaine for the fourteenth time; because of the Victories which Tiberius and Sextus Apuleius had obtained in GERMANY, and in ITALIE. And the authority which had been given him for ten yeares over the State of the Common-wealth being expired, was continued unto him for ten yeares following. Then he did greatly enlarge the bounds of the Territory of ROME, and having advanced Salustius Crispus (the Sonne of the Historian) unto the place which Mæcenus held, the ROMANS Knight, his faithfull friend and principall Counsellor, deceased in those daies: and by Tiberius continued to bring the GERMANS under: for the Victory of whom, and also for that he had subdued all the People inhabiting alongst the Alpes the Senate had set up a token of Triumph, and granted Triumph to Tiberius.

Under the second Consulate of Claudius Nero, and of Calpurnius Piso, Caius and Lucius the young Sonnes of Augustus, were called young Princes, and appointed Consuls, although they were but of tender yeares, and under fourteene yeares old. This pleased Augustus greatly, though he fained to take no pleasure in it. Furthermore, he then made an Edict touching slanderous ly-bels, declaring who should have the hearing of those crimes, and how they should be punished: although he himselfe cared not much, and patiently suffered they should gibe at him, contented to answer by open defence, unto the reproaches and mockeries they made of him. They scattered abroad one day in the Palace many bills of Paper of cruel injuries against him. This moved him not at all, neither did he trouble himselfe much to answer it: but instead of searching it out, he did advise that hereafter they should have an eye upon those, that by little Bookes or Epigrams published (under false Names) scandall against any man. Tiberius wrote a round Letter to him one day, to the end he should carry a straighter hand upon that: but he sent him these words, I pray thee my friend, let not thy youth over-rule thee in this matter, nor be not so hot, though I be evil spoken of by some. It is enough if we gaine this point, that no man can hurt us. Afterwards he divided the City of ROME into fourteene Regions, and two hundred and ten Streets, and in every of them he established Officers to see that all things should be maintained as they ought to be, and to report unto the Prince any memorable thing that should happen. He provided for the violence of fire, he built up the Temples that were burnt or ruined by time: and gave at one time unto the Temple of Jupiter Capitoline, for the renewing of the same, sixteene thousand Pounds of Gold, and of rich and costly Pearles, to the summe of twelve hundred thousand Crownes.

Now Caius and Lucius his young Sonnes growing apace, and Julia his Daughter beginning to be too well knowne for her wantonnesse: Tiberius that could no longer endure her, nor these two young Princes (and because he would have the ROMANS a little long for him) he demanded and obtained leave with extremity, threatening to kill himselfe with famine, if they did not grant him: and so went to study at RHODES. In the meane time Augustus provided for the Affaires of ISTRIA, divided ITALIE into eleven Provinces: and because he doubted they did envy his greatnesse, he chose nine Prætorian Cohorts for his Guard, of the which he kept three of them.

them in ROME, lodged here and there in houses, so long as they were in their quarter: and the six others were quartered in the next Villages unto it. He also erected new Offices, to impart to so many men more the honours and charges of the Common-wealth. At the same time when before the Senate they did object many crimes unto Amilius Ahiannus, and amongst other things that he spake ill of Augustus: he returning to the Accuser, said unto him as in choler: Augustus his patient forbearing of ill tongues. Prove me that, and I will make Ahiannus know that I have a tongue: for I will say more of him, then he hath spoken of me. He made no further inquiry afterwards, and shewed himselfe very gentle and courteous also unto Cassius of PADUA, a man of a meane estate: who having spoken openly at a Table, that he lacked no good will nor courage to kill Augustus: he contented himselfe to impose this onely punishment upon him, as to drive him out of ROME. From his eleventh Consulship unto the twelfth, there passed seventene yeares: all which time he divers times had refused his charge: but now he demanded it, and obtained it. His intention was to advance Caius his little Sonne to great Dignity, whom he caused to be proclaimed, young Prince, and sent him to see the Provinces and Armies, in the Title of a Pro-consull. Then he commanded him to go into ASIA, having given him for Governours Lollius and Sulpicius Quirinus. He himselfe in the meane time remained at ROME, where he established extraordinary Guards, under colour to keepe Theeves and masterlesse men from offering violence, whilest the Armies abroad were farre off. The yeare following, Caius having travelled in divers parts of the Orient, made Peace with Ptraeus King of the PARTHIANS, and brought away hostages for assurance thereof, the Kings three Brethren, and all the Princes of the blood. The which was practised by the means of the Queene Termoda, borne in ITALIE, who being sent by Augustus for a Gift unto Ptraeus, he fell so in love with her, and held her in such high estimation, that after she had brought him a Sonne called Ptraeus, he received her for his lawfull Wife. She being desirous her Sonne should possesse the Crown, drave the right Heires farre off by means of this Peace. And at the end of certaine yeares, Ptraeus who entertained it, killed his Father, and possessed the Kingdom. But he was not long in quiet possession, for the great Lords conspired against him, and tooke from him his life justly punished. He sent him Pro consull into SPAIN, but he fell sicke by the way, and stayed almost a yeare at MARSEILLES. Though these two Brethren were farre enough off Tiberius, who kept himselfe as a simple Scholar at RHODES, yet they loved not him greatly, nor he them: for which purpose, the proesse served not much against their Mother Julia, banished because of her adulteries into the Isle of PANDATARIE. Shortly after, her Daughter also called Julia, married unto Lucius Paulus, was also convinced of the same crime that her Mother was: and was banished unto another Isle of the Sea Adriaticke, called TREMER. This affliction so neare unto him, marvellously grieved Augustus, who could not beare it but in mourning, and pining himselfe with sorrow. Then all the Provinces of the ROMANE Empire being in Peace, Augustus shut up the third time the Temple of JANUS: and the King of Kings, the Saviour of the World, being borne of a Virgin in JUDEA, appearing amongst them, shut up the Oracles of all the Painim gods, as the Oracle of DELPHES a Christ Warre astonished, caused a great Altar to be set up in the Capitoll with an inscription, signifying that it was, The Altar of the God first borne. The yeare following, to stay the violent course of great usuries, and to raise up againe many Families decayed, he put into the Exchange two Millions and a halfe of Gold: that is to say, five and twenty hundred thousand Crownes, and suffered private men to take of it for three yeares without Interest, putting in pawne into the Exchequer Lands and Possessions being twice as much worth as the Principall: and condemned the Usurers that had taken Interest more then Julius Cesar had ordained, to pay foure times as much: and deducting out of the Principall that which had been paid over and above the Tax of the Law, he gave the Debtors three yeares space to pay it, at three equall times from year to year. He made provision also for distributing of Corne, and brought it to twenty hundred thousand heads of those that should come to have any of it: and did wisely remedy divers discontentments of the People. Shortly after, Lucius Cesar being sixteene yeares of age, died at MARSEILLES: which was the cause that Tiberius being reconciled for some other occasion with Caius, he obtained leave to returne from RHODES to ROME, with condition (for so Caius will) that he should meddle with no affaires of estate, that he should remaine yet the rest of the yeare at RHODES. As touching Augustus, he laboured to recreate himselfe with his friends, and did willingly see Learned-men, and amongst others, Titus Livius that renowned Historian; the Poets, Virgil and Horace, but especially Virgil, who was one of his most familiar friends. Which Augustus visit maketh men thinke that Ovid committed some great fault, since he was a banished man so long, and that he could obtaine no grace, though the greatest men were Suiters for him. And yet the Historians say, Augustus was not angry, as appeareth by the fact of Timagines the Historian, having dispersed abroad some pleasant by-Names against Augustus, Livia, and their familiars, wherest every one of them laughed, it was so pleasant an encounter, Augustus was contented to advise him to moderate his tongue from thenceforth, and did onely forbid him his house and familiarity, suffering him to waxe old in the company of Afinius Pollio. He did greatly support some also that were accused to have sealed a false Will, and mingled with the markes of condemnation and absolution a third, pardoning all those that it should seeme had through ignorance sined in this fact. One being evidently convinced to have killed his Father, was even at the point to be sewed up in a Leather Sacke, according to the custome, and throwne into the Sea: but Augustus desirous this curst wretch should not be thus handled, put the answer in his mouth, in saying unto him: Surely I beleve thou hast not killed thy Father. The Sonne of Tarius being charged to have conspired against the life of his Father, Augustus was sent for into Tarius house, to counsell him what were best to be done: he gave the Father counsell to banish him farre off from all knowledge. And when Tarius would have made Augustus his Heire, he refused it, and ordained that the Son should be banished unto MARSILLIS, and that during his Fathers life he should have a Pension to maintaine him withall.

Tiberius returned to Rome, and came dieth.

In the foure and forty yeare of the Monarchy of Augustus, Tiberius having been absent the space of eight yeares, he came againe to ROME, where he lived, and medled with no matters. But that held not long: for in the same yeare Caius, upon whom Augustus principally looked, died in LYCIA: and some say, that Livia knew well enough of what death: for the greatly desired the advancement of her Son Tiberius, knowing that Augustus did not greatly love the last Son of Agrippa and Julia, by reason of the rudenesse of his nature. Augustus tooke the death of his Son Caius very unpactly. He made his Schoole-master and domestick Servants to be drowned: and furthermore, he disposed all the Forces of the Empire and the Legions amongst the Provinces in commodious places as well by Sea as by Land. Afterwards he obtained the Tribuneship for Tiberius more through the procurement of Livia then otherwise: although in the end he was content to advance him, to make his memory to be so much the more desired, when they had made proofe of his Successour, whom he knew better then any other, and never spake any thing well, but he spied alwaies some croffe thing in him of a dangerous nature he had. And yet some judge, that Augustus did repute the Vertues in Tiberius to be greater then his Imperfections, considering also that in the Oration he made, his words tended to this end, that he adopted Tiberius in favour of the Common-wealth. But before he would declare this adoption, he compelled Tiberius to adopt his Nephew Germanicus the Son of Drusus, and he adopted with Tiberius Agrippa Posthumus, the Son of M. Agrippa. Then to prevent the plots of some of the chieft of ROME, he made Tiberius to be chosen Tribune for ten yeares following. That was the cause that in ROME they began to speake well of Tiberius, whom they saw by that meanes somewhat stepped into Augustus place so soone as he should happen to die. Furthermore, at the instance of the People of ROME and Tiberius himselfe, Augustus tolerated the banishment of his Daughter Julia: howbeit for no intreaty he would ever revoke her againe. So after the decease of Augustus, she was destitute of all helpe, and Tiberius made her die for want in an unknown place.

Julia an Adultress, through want dieth in banishment.

The yeare following, Valerius Messala, and C. Cinna Grand-child of the Great Pompey, were elected Consuls. Cinna that tooke part with his Cousins, was taken prisoner, and brought to Augustus, who gave him life and advanced him. This notwithstanding, he was afterwards attainted and convinced to have conspired against the life of Augustus, whom through the counsell of Livia he sent for into his Chamber, and gently rebuked him for all the good deeds he had done to him: pardoned him this last offence, and afterwards raised him to the Dignity of a Consul, being sorry that he durst not demand it. After that, Cinna became his faithfull friend and servant, and bequeathed all his goods by Will unto Augustus, against whom never any man conspired more. His Lieutenants in AFRICK obtained some Victories, and Tiberius continued the War, in GERMANY, from whence he oftentimes returned to ROME to keepe himselfe in Augustus good favour. Who having limited the pay, recompence, commodity, and time that the Souldiers should have, he procured for some time the good of the Common-wealth, which had continued longer in prosperity, if his Successours had better entertained Military Discipline. Afterwards to resist the mutinies of the People by reason of famine, he established Corps de guard in all the places of ROME, and drove out a multitude of unprofitable mouthes. And when Corne came againe to the ordinary price, he was about to abolish the distribution of Corne which the Common-wealth made: because that the People trusting unto that, made no reckoning to plow their Land. At the same time many Towns in divers Provinces were inclined to rebell, which caused the Senate to make a Decree, that the Governours of Provinces should command two yeares one after another, and should not depart thence till their Successour were arrived. The ILLYRIANS also began to rise, but they were suppressed immediately by Valerius Messalinus. For GERMANY, all the while he was subject under the name of the ROMANES, except the MARCOMANNES, and their King Maroboduus, a valiant and wise man, that kept himselfe and his People in good Discipline, having alwaies an Army ready of threethou and ten thousand Footmen, and foure thousand Horse, all the which he trained and put in readinesse against his neighbours, to defend him the better against the ROMANES, if they came to assaile him. Tiberius prepared himselfe with twelve Legions to make Warre with him, but being constrained to go against the ILLYRIANS, he made a agreement with Maroboduus, that sought peace and quietnesse, and so marched where necessity called him. For the ILLYRIANS, to the number of eight hundred thousand men and upwards, rose in manner all at an instant; and mustered up in short time, with such order in their affaires and Warlike exploits, that they posselt and brought in subjection almost all MACEDON, and put Augustus into a marvellous perplexity, because they prepared themselves to come into ITALIE. Hereupon Tiberius is chosen to go against them, the which he did with so good direction and Warlike judgement, that he dispersed their Army. But now concerning the Countrey of THRACIA, there the Army of the ROMANES was put to flight: yet taking heart againe, they returned to meet with their Enemies, and obtained an honourable Victory. For which cause they called Augustus Imperator or soveraigne Capitaine the sixteenth time. The ILLYRIANS made head againe againe better then before under the conduct of Bato Desfidates, they made violent and strange invasions, and Tiberius never came against them. Whereupon Augustus conceiving an evil opinion, dispatched Germanicus the sonne of Drusus, to go into ILLYRIA with a compleate Army. On the other side Agrippa Posthumus shewed himselfe so insolent, and committed so many follies, that Augustus could no longer endure them, and therefore he disavowed and disinherited him, confiscated his goods, and confined him to SURRENTUM: where being more audacious then before, he banished him into the Isle of PLANASIA, near unto CORSICA: and caused the Senate to make an ordinance that he should remaine there till his death. By this means every man began to regard Tiberius, who was also declared the son and colleague of Augustus by decree of the Senate, who committed unto him all the Armies and Provinces of the Empire. Livia his mother did helpe him greatly in all these affaires. Furthermore he would not stir out of ILLYRIA untill he had made an end of this war, which continued three whole yeares.

Agrippa Posthumus for his follies and insolencies banished.

Now at the arrival of Germanicus, the chieftains of the ILLYRIANS came suddainly to assaile the Campe of the ROMANES: who faining to be afraid, staid till the enemy came to charge them in disorder. Then they came out with fury against them, killed a great number of them, and made the rest to flie. Germanicus wan another battell against the DALMATIANS, and pursuing his victory, he followed them so near at the heels, that they submitted themselves and demanded peace. By reason whereof they gave Augustus the name of Imperator the eighteenth time. Bato Desfidates came to salute Tiberius set in his tribunal chair, without holding down his head, or any imbasing himselfe: and being asked why after so many battels lost, he did yet rebel againe? he answered boldly againe, that the ROMANES were the cause of it: who instead of shepherds had sent them Wolves to keepe their flock. Peace was granted unto the DALMATIANS upon certain conditions. And as for the BREUCIANS which continued their war, they were overthrowne in many encounters, and at the length brought to subjection by Plantius Silvanus, who triumphed. Their King Bato Bencus had betrayed and delivered unto the ROMANES another great Capitaine of the ILLYRIANS called Pinnetes: and afterwards he was delivered himselfe by his owne men unto Bato Desfidates, who killed him with his own hand: and then fortified himself in DALMATIA, where having made head almost a year and a half against the Armies of Tiberius and Germanicus, he won and lost many battels: at the last, being able to hold out no longer, he sent his son to demand peace of Tiberius, promising to yeeld himself and his into the hands of Augustus. He obtained safe conduct, and came by night unto Tiberius Campe: who gave him very gracious entertainment, and many rich presents. Afterwards he made him be brought to RAVENNA, and was also gently used, because that in an encounter where he was inclosed, and in danger of his life, he had given him means to escape and save himself. And because of the divers victories obtained by Germanicus and Tiberius, Augustus was saluted for the nineteenth and twentieth time Imperator or soveraigne Capitaine. And for the PANNONIANS, their young men that had so many times threatned ITALIE, were constrained to bring all their Armes together on a heap, as they were commanded, and to fall on their knees before Tiberius to demand peace of him. He received them into grace, and sent them home to their houses, disposing his Garrisons in strong places, under the charge of Marcus Lepidus. The glory of Tiberius was yet more noble, and the anguish of Augustus increased by the overthrow of Quintilius Varus: who being gone to assaile Arminius Prince of the CHERSSIANS, was inclosed in Marishes, and utterly overthrowne with three ROMAN Legions that were slaine in the place: and for himselfe, fearing to fall alive into the hands of the CHERSSIANS, he killed himself with his own hand. The victors did never so cruelly handle the ROMANES as those whom they might know were common counsellors and pleaders. For at the beginning when Varus came to command their Countrey: where they knew not what proceesse meant, he perswaded himselfe he should tame them well enough, using the same forme and order of proceffe there amongst them, as they did at ROME. So he had a judgement feat, and all matters were pleaded before him. Some of them amongst the rest very subtil, seemed to esteem much this pleading; and to bring him asleepe, they of purpose moved occasion of proceffe and suite one against the other: and then they went before him, and by the ROMANES themselves whose tongues they borrowed, they demanded justice. Then they rejoiced not a little when they could catch any of these Counsellors: for they put out the eyes of some of them, cut off the hands of others of them; and they say, that they cut out the tongue of one, and afterwards sewed up his mouth: and he that held the tongue in his hand, said unto him: O viper, at the last yet thou wilt leave whistling. Augustus was so astonied at this losse, that at times he would beat his head against the wall, crying out, Varus, give me my Legions. Certaine yeares after, Germanicus buried the bones of the ROMANES that were killed in this overthrow. The yeare following Tiberius returned into GERMANY, and to keepe the passages of the Rhein, Augustus served his turne with the slaves enfranchised, which caused afterwards great confusions and seditions in the ROMAN army. In all these stirs, two men of no worth, called Andasius and Epicadus, conspired to take away Julia the daughter of Augustus, and Agrippa Posthumus from the places where they were, and to bring them to some Legions, to alter the estate. But they were soon discovered, and punished for their rashnesse. Some others also committed the like fond enterprises, but they vanished away without any effect.

Furthermore, Augustus being now old and broken, beganne to leave all great companies, cashiered his Guards, and sent them to Garrisons far off, to the end they should not go about to make change. He gave commandment that the GAULES and GERMANES should depart the City by a day prefixed. In the mean time Tiberius having divided his Army into four parts, entred into GERMANY, about five and twenty leagues into the Country beyond the Rhein, and put all to fire and blood: then he retired fearing some encounter of Varus. Touching Augustus, he qualified some strict Laws against the unmarried, the gifts of husband to the wife, the banquets and suits: he did forbid the Divines to answer the vain question of those, that would know how long they should live: and he suffered the Knights (if they were challenged) to fight at the sharp. Germanicus being returned to ROME, obtained the Consulship, and Tiberius triumphed of the ILLYRIANS, PANNONIANS, DALMATIANS, and GERMANES: followed with his Lieutenant Germanicus, Vibius Posthumus, Plantius Silvanus, and Marcus Lepidus, with triumphing robes. But before he went up to the Capitol, he went out of his Chariot, and fell down on his knees before Augustus. Then he made a dinner for all the people, and had a thousand tables set up for them, and gave to every one of them seven crowns and a half. Under the Consulship of C. Silius, and of Munatius Plancus, Augustus having obtained ten years with Tiberius to provide for the affairs of the Commonwealth: to the end to quench many false rumors, about sixteen moneths before his death, he made his Will, and gave it to the Vestal Virgins to keep. Because his sickness kept him from coming to the Senate, he prayed the Senators to thinke of some means to entertain the men of war. Which they having well considered, found no better means then that which he himself had found out, to wit, of the twentieth part of the inheritances: and they all agreed unto it. The next year following, he went (as they say) to see Agrippa in his Isle of PLANASIA, the which troubled Livia much for she knew what was past. At the same time he and Tiberius tooke muster of the ROMANE Citizens, and shortly after he fell sicke, whereof they recite many causes. But thereupon he went into the Country unto some places of pleasure, where he mended a little, and passed the time away pretily merry, carrying Tiberius with him, whom he would have brought on his way to BENEVENT, from whence he went into ILLYRIA. At his returne his sickness increased, that he was faine to stay at NOLA, and sent for Tiberius and talked with him a long time very privately, and after that did never any thing of importance: although the Historians do not agree whether Tiberius was come before his departure or not. For Livia had set spies in the house he lay sick in, and on the high wayes, giving it out abroad that Augustus was well: and on the other side sending messages upon messages unto Tiberius, same spreading it abroad that Augustus was dead, and that Tiberius held his place. Augustus being at the point to give up the Ghost, made himself to be combed, and speaking to his friends, asked if no body made any noise without. So he exhorted them to rejoyce with him, for that he had so happily played the Comedy of this humane life. Then having sent them all out of his chamber, he asked if Livia Drusina daughter were in health: and so embracing his wife, said these words unto her: Farewel Livia, behave thy self well, and remember our marriage: and suddainly went away, making a sweet end, which he alwayes desired as often as he heard talke of those that died quietly. He died in the same Town, and in the same chamber that his father Octavianus died in, and lived near unto the age of threescore and sixteen years. His corps being brought to ROME, the Vestal Virgins brought out his Will and Testament, by the which he appointed Tiberius his heire, and gave him three parts of his goods, and his wife Livia the fourth part. Furthermore he gave to the people of ROME twelve hundred and fifty thousand crowns: to the five and thirty Tribes, thirteen hundred, seven and thirty thousand, five hundred crowns: to every one of the Pretorian souldiers twenty five crownes, to those of the Town twelve crowns and a half. There were other legacies to be paid within a year, and he said, that all his legacies performed, he left his heirs four millions of gold. Within twenty yeares before his death, he did inherit of his friends goods which had made him their heir, about thirty five millions of gold: howbeit that he had spent all that, with two patrimonies of his owne, for maintenance of the Common-wealth. With his testament there were three little libels or edicils, the one shewing what he would have done at his funerals. The second was a brief of all his actions, which he commanded should be graven in copper tables before his tombe. The third contained the state of his revenew, and of the principall affaires of the Empire. He had added to them also the names of the enfranchised bondmen and of the slaves, whom they might bring to account, and therewith he advised them to keep the limits of the Empire which they had at that time. They carried him with great pomp into the field of Mars, where he was reduced into ashes, which they closed up in his Sepulcher built in his sixt Consulship, after all these ceremonies the Senate appointed him a temple and divine honours, and he was placed in ranke with the gods. To make his honor yet greater, one Numerius Atticus that had been Prætor, a man of great authority in ROME, was enticed by Livia, who gave him five and twenty thousand crownes, to swear before all the people, that he saw Augustus carried up into heaven. After his death, many speeches were diversly spoken of his life: some reproving him, as much as others commended him. But his successor made him oftentimes to be lamented. And so he was wont to say of Tiberius, that he should leave to the ROMANS in succession of the Empire, a successor that never consulted twice of one thing. And as he was a happy Prince in all his enterprises, and that by his Lieutenants had done an infinite number of worthy exploits against the enemies of the Empire: so in his life amongst his friends he shewed himself very gracious, pleasant, and well disposed in company: being learned, eloquent, and sententious in all his talke. And to conclude, such as the Empire of ROME had never any Augustus but him alone.

THE LIFE OF PLUTARCH.

Ann. Mund.
4053.

Post. Christ.
104.

Thy precepts are a Crown of purest gold
To Trajan deem'd the glory of mankind.
In hands, and hearts, if great men would thee bold, Vertue should rule, and vice should go behind.

Having undertaken to gather the Lives of Plutarch, and of Seneca, as they themselves are amply shewed in their Workes, the which in despite of the fury of an infinite of strange accidents have yet remained whole and in reputation until this present time: first, this thought hath possessed me before, that some man marvell, how, and wherefore I do joyne Philosophers, quiet men, and friends of Solitarinesse, unto so many Noble and Worthy Warriors. Wherein it seemeth I wander too farre off from the principall intention of Plutarch, who was so willing to honour the Muses, joyning into one body so many members and parts of Histories offered unto the posterity, that in the meane time he hath accompanied, and as it were environed them.

With Darts, and Targets of Mars redoubtable.

But I hope, that if those (which thinke strange of my doings) will but at leisure, with a reposed eye, looke upon the Lives before: they shall find that I have not gone so farre from the right meaning, as at the first might be judged. For, besides that the Lives of some Orators; especially of Demosthenes and of Cicero, are seen amongst the others: you shall finde few Noblemen represented by our Author, but that they have as carefully handled bookes, as their swords. And if some seem to be so much given to Armes; that they have left the study of learning behind them, yet we may see that they have loved Philosophers; and that they themselves have earnestly and effectually reasoned of Philosophy, in time of warre and peace. And whereas Plutarch hath mingled some with virtuous men, some (I say) which have done infinite hurt to themselves, and to all the world, during their lives, and whose names are detested at this day by those themselves which follow their execrable doings: his intention was not to place them in the Theater of Vertue, as if they had deserved it; but as Learned Painters finely apply cloudy and dark colours in their tables, to the end that the lively and fresh colours should appeare more beautifull, and as it were imbossed; so in intermingling the strange excesses of some GREEKS and ROMANS amongst so worthy Acts of others, he hath so fitly mingled the sweete and profitable together, that it is not possible to be better. But if my two Philosophers (since I have begunne to qualifie them thus) were contented to shut up themselves in some Schoole or Study; and to do nothing else but declaime and fashion some Scholars.

The reason why the Lives of Philosophers are joynt with the Lives of Warriors. Why Plutarch wrote the lives of some vicious men amongst the virtuous.

it may be indeed I should better have left this enterprise unto some follower of Diogenes Laertius, that would describe the Sects of Philosophy, and the principal founders of the same. Now there are here two personages, which (as the soule within the body) have through their notable counsels given motions unto great and mean men in their time, and by other mens eyes and hands have done infinite things in the society of mans life, unto the which they serve at this day with their precepts and goodly instructions, without the which the exploits of others should be partly buried and abolished, as those have been of so many other men that came before and after. They be the two Schoole masters and counsellors of two Emperours. They be men that beside their study have borne great and honorable Offices, in the which they have so carried themselves, that by their actions a man may gather, that knowledge is a great prop and stay to a vertuous man. If they have not worn Armour and commanded Armies: if a man see them in a long Gowne, and their bookes in their hands, they lose not therefore their glory which so many wayes recommendeth them at this present, having lift up learning in honour, and furnished strong Armes, by means whereof all Princes may wisely and happily maintaine their estates against the fury of warres, and under the quiet government of peace. As to the contrary, when violence alone would rule, and that men thought there was no need that our spirits should be kept in and directed by the exhortations of Philosophy, confusions came on in heapes, which ruined and overthrew that which they thought had been suret set in the ground. Moreover, I did not beare my selfe in hand that I could attaine to that, as to represent Plutarch and Seneca in their becoming comeliness. They themselves could have done that, and in their writings there are draughts very agreeable to their gravity. But as we do not willingly take the Penfill to paint our selves, but to please our selves, the discourse of our thought sufficeth. In like manner also these goodly spirits, being contented to be knowne by the glasse of their vertue which followeth them, they leave every body to thinke of their deeds and words that which is meet. Amongst all the books that serve for the use of mans life, next unto that which concerneth the Sovereigne good we hope for in a better place then this world, I thinke there are none more profitable nor necessary to all sorts of men, then Histories. And amongst Histories, those of men which have been brought to honour and place of Government in the Common-wealth: and among such men, those that have brought their deeds and sayings to some commendable end. Wherefore I will not enter into disputation nor conference of stories, nor mingle the Scriptures with the prophane, or confound the discourse representing men destitute of the knowledge of the true God, with the holy and admirable considerations of the life of them which have been lightned with the happy and supernatural light. That requireth a whole booke, and separated from this present worke; our purpose being otherwise bent. But as in the former lives I was desirous to waken the good spirits of our Nation, and by the interjection of some of my concepts to induce them to do better, I do the like also in these two, attending the commodity to set forth others, if the Author of life do permit me.

Michiefes that follow the want of instruction by Philosophy.

The profit of Histories.

Why Plutarch life is set before Seneca.

The end or scope of the doctrine of Plutarch and Seneca.

Now before we proceed any further, for as much as Seneca was long time before Plutarch, some might also require another order in my discourse. Notwithstanding, as Plutarch doth ordinarily place the Graeces before the Romans, and that for the matter of their lives there is no need otherwise for a man to trouble himselfe much about the disposing of them; and that those which be dead do not quarrel together to know who shall go before or behind. I have thought with my selfe, that I might beginne this worke where I thought good, without binding my selfe too curiously, either to the order of time, or to such other circumstances. For if any man be offended, I will alledge that unto him which was spoken unto one displeased because his horse was painted standing on his feet, which he would have had lying on his backe and his feet upward: Turne the other side upward, and you shall be pleased. Even so is it in his choice to reade such a Life first as he thinketh good, and to turne the table at his pleasure, no man being constrained to come into the closet of the Muses, but at his owne will, and by the gate which pleaseth him best. It could have been contented to have offered Plutarch onely, or left him hidden in his workes, the true and durable treasures of his glory: but having been solicited to shew some patternes, I was unwilling to let him go alone. Now, I cannot cast mine eye upon that personage, but Seneca doth also present himself unto me, for many reports and agreements that are between them. For, besides that nature hath brought them into the world in the revolution of one Age, both came out of a strange Countrey to Rome: both of them were rich and of great power, Masters and Teachers of two Emperours, which did enrich and advance them to honour, and great Offices in the Common-wealth. In regard of their Learning, although the one of them was a Sect impugned by the other in divers respects, yet they both tended to one end, although it was by divers wayes, to wit, to drive away vice and vanity out of the hearts of their disciples, and to plant in them the love of Vertue, the contempt of death, and of the world, with so sound reasons, and so well combined the one to the other, that it is impossible to enter into a Schoole of the Heathen better ordered then that of these two, to learne (as we ought) to be athamed of dishonest things, and to exercise those that be honest and vertuous. But as touching other agreements and dissimilances which may be noted as well in their life and behaviour as in their doctrine, peradventure it shall be better to reserve it to fitter place, or to leave the discourse unto the studious Readers, who advisedly considering this little which we presently present unto them, and joyning thereto the writings of the one and the other, shall know what Authority and Art these two wise men have to draw the most ignorant and foolish to the love of Vertue. Also that their stile, with their pertinent and plaine manner of discourse, is accompanied with with great gravity and forcible reasons, to make men confident to believe them. If the one flow sweetly, and almost alwayes maintaineth himselfe in the same: the other in his wanderings and rollings about can well reforme his errors, and come to it againe in time, and then go on better then when he first beganne. Plutarch useth a world of reproaches and hookes to pull downe vice. Seneca seemeth to provoke him to the combat, and when he ferreth upon him, it is by taking him by the choller and shaking him in all parts. The one seemeth to be a company of light horsemen charging very swiftly, and at divers wheelings and returns: the other, to a battallion of footemen well set in order, affailing resolutely, and not removing out of the place before he hath wont the victory. The opinions of Plutarch are handled with Platonick inductions, enriched with examples, with similitudes, with quicke sentences, and gracious recitals, which force the reader to yeeld. Seneca drawing that which is praise-worthy from the Stoicks, and from Epictetus also goodly instructions, as the Bee finely draweth from the herbe of bitter juyce that which maketh sweet hony, differing somewhat from the common use, he maketh a very profitable and sure harbor wherein a heart ill settled may repose it selfe. The one speaketh as a friend, the other as a master: and both with such a grace, that whether they give good counsell, or that they command, the eares and hearts do bow at their voices. Infomuch that the wicked are constrained in reading of these Philosophers to acknowledge, and plainly to heare within this grave Schoole, a million of truths which condemneth them: and I cannot tell with what hidden force (as the Adamant draweth iron) they feel themselves to be carried that way, unto the which the learned instructions of these two Philosophers do direct them, to delight in them even with mourning, and to confesse, that these be the persons of whom men may learne to be lesse vicious, and more vertuous. Good men also they gather there as sweet fruite as possible may be, for remedy against so many cruelties of this present life. And although they find their true and perfect contentment in a far better Schoole without comparison, yet so it is, that in this Schoole here they understand things which afterwards makes the other more acceptable and more honourable. Now for as much as afterwards we have mixed the memories of their lives with divers particularities, which will make us see a part of the comparisons that may be noted betweene them, let us beginne with Plutarch, and consider his Life principally by the instructions which he himselfe hath left, and namely in many places of his Morall and mingled workes.

The forcible effects of them, in vicious and vertuous men.

Pausanias, in the ninth booke of his description of Greece, saith, that there ran a common rumor abroad among the Thebans, that Cadmus the sonne of Agenor coming from Delphes into Phocide, was guided by a Cow marked in both her flanks with white spots in forme of a full Moone: and that the Oracle commanded him to stay with his Troopes in that place where the Cow should lye downe. Which came to passe in the territory afterwards called Boeotia, because of this Cow. At the beginning of the same booke he saith, that Boeotia tooke the same name of Boeotus the sonne of Iron, and of the Nymph Menalippe: which should seeme repugnant. But the one and the other opinion may well agree, if we say that Cadmus being come into that part of the Countrey, Boeotus that had a charge in these Troopes, and remaining there after the others, left his name to all the territory which is neare neighbour to Attica, but in a thicker aire because it standeth betwixt two mountaines, and that the Countrey is more Northwards. So that the Athenians were ever thinner in body, and of livelier spirit: and the Boeotians to the contrary, fuller of flesh, and duller of wit also. From whence came many flements of laughter against the masse and weight of their understandings, and they made Proverbs dispersed in Greeke and Latine bookes. Yea the Poets themselves, and Eubulus among others, do flout the Boeotians, that they are great feeders, and love to speake much: which agreeth very well with the rest of their manners. Plutarch also himselfe in his first treaty of eating of flesh, noteth somewhat of that. Nevertheless, of such a Countrey came Pelopidas, and other excellent men, but namely him of whom we are now presently to speak of, no simple nor sottish man: but as

Even so out of a Countrey accustomed to bring forth fat men, as they say, and fitter for war then learning, came Plutarch, borne in the City of Cheronea, near unto Lebadia. In old time (as Pausanias saith) it was called Arne, because of Arne the daughter of Eolus. But afterwards because it flood evil, and looked towards the West, Cheron the son of Apello, and of Thero the daughter of Phylas, caused it to be new built, and turned to the East, to make it more wholesome and habitable. Upon which occasion, in token of thankfulness for the good act of the founder, it was ever after called Cheronea. And although for many memorable accidents this Towne is noted in Histories, yet do I not know any thing that hath so much kept up the memory of it untill this present, as the name of Plutarch, whose ancestors, men of a noble race, maintained themselves from father to the son in honourable office and place of charge in their little Common-wealth, untill the time of Nicarchus his great Grandfather, who lived in the time of Augustus Caesar, as Plutarch reporteth in the life of Antonius: where he saith also, that all the Citizens of Cheronea, not one excepted, were compelled themselves to carry upon their shouldiers, a certaine measure of Corne to the sea coast, which is before the Isle of Anticyra: and yet they were driven forward, whipped with many a sore lash. Again, as they were preparing for a secon journey, and that every man had his burthen ready, newes came that Antonius had lost the battell before Actium, which saved Cheronea. For Antonius commissioners and soldiers fled immediately, and the Citizens divided divided the Corne amongst them. Nicarchus, amongst other children had Lamprias, a learned man amongst those of his time, and of whom Plutarch maketh often mention in his books, where he speaketh of talke at the table: how that he had been in company with other learned men at many feasts, where there was no talke but of learning and matters of Philosophy. He speaketh also of his father, the sonne of Lamprias, now expressing his name although he representeth him discoursing of many points of Philosophy, and namely in the bookes above mentioned. Of this Philosopher then the sonne of Lamprias were borne many children, and amongst others Plutarch, Timon, and Lamprias: all which three were very carefully brought up and instructed in the liberal sciences, and in all the parts of Philosophy: unto the which, they shall ever see an humble reverence towards their grandfather and father joyntogether, and amongst themselves a fast and pleasant friendship, as may be gathered in many places out of their table talke. Whereupon in respect of the grandfather and father, I remembered that Plutarch in those bookes speaking of his grandfather, he makes alwayes honourable mention of him. And as for his father, in the instruction of those that deale in affaires of the estate, he reporteth that he being young was sent with another in embassage to the Pro-consull, and his companion remaining upon some occasion behind, he went thither alone: and executed the commission. And at his returne, as he would have given the Common-wealth account openly, and have made report of his charge and Embassage, his father rising up alone, forbade him to say, I went, but we went; and I spake, but we spake: and so commanded him to make his report, alwayes joyning his companion with that he had done. We see in the treaty of brotherly love, how heartily he loved his brother Timon, when he said in these words: For my selfe, although fortune hath shewed me many favours, which deserve that I should be thankfull to her for them, yet there is none that maketh me so much bound to her, as the love and good will my brother Timon hath borne, and doth beare unto me in all things: the which no man can deny to be true, that hath but a little frequented our company. And in his talke at the table, bringing in his father and brethren with many others, or together, resolving divers questions of Philosophy, he representeth men that with a grounded knowledge had joynt a sweet behaviour, and a wonderful good understanding, and namely the young Lamprias, who was of a pleasant nature, and loved to be merry. Plutarch then having a father that loved learning and vertue, was in a good houre put out to learning, whereunto he was wholly inclined. And amongst other good masters, he met with Ammonius, an EGYPTIAN born, faith Eunapius, who having with great praise taught in ALEXANDRIA, he did also visit the Cities of GREECE wherein learning did yet flourish, and tarried a great time in ATHENS, respected and well beloved of every man. In the latter end of Themistocles life, Plutarch sheweth that he was a boarder and lying in Ammonius house, and in talke at the table he brought him in, either disputing, or teaching his Scholars. So the custome to teach the youth at that time was very fine and easie, to give children a tast and learning of vertue: for as the Tutors employed part of their time to discourse in the presence of their disciples, they occupied them in the same exercise afterwards, and made them declare, and say their opinion of divers matters: so that in few weekes, by way of sport and recreation, they had runne through the secrets of Philosophy. Unto the which they joynt also, besides their compositions and particular exercises, their familiar talke and recreative disputations in their walkes, at their suppers and feasts, where nothing else could be heard but that which made the young men wise and vertuous in a short space. That may be gathered out of Plutarch's writings, and out of those especially where he speaketh how children should be taught, of the lecture of the Poets, how they should heare, his talke at the table, and a good number of declamations dispersed in the midst of his Morall workes. In this place I remember that which he himselfe spake in discourse, how a man should know a flatterer from a friend, touching the direction of this his Tutor. Our master Ammonius, faith he, perceiving in his lecture he made after dinner, that some of his disciples and familiars had made a larger dinner then was fit for Students, he commanded one of his servants, a freeman to beate his owne sonne: he could not (faith he) dine without vinegar. When he had spoken that, he cast his eyes upon us: so that they which were indeed culpable, found that he meant it by them. We may see also in the first and second question of his third booke of talke at the table, how ready this Philosopher was to sharpen the spirits of young men that frequented him. Thus therefore Plutarch having so good a helpe, in few yeares he profited greatly in the knowledge of all the parts of Philosophy, and never went out of his Country, nor travelled to understand strange languages, although the Latine tongue was common in ROME, and in divers places of the ROMAN Empire: which extended it selfe into GREECE, and beyond, as Plutarch noteth in the end of his Platonickall questions. Without notwithstanding that he ever profited much in the knowledge of any other tongue, saving in the knowledge of the GREEKS: the which also hath a taste of his Philosophy of BOETIA. He doth also confesse in the beginning of the life of Demosthenes, that whilest he was in ITALIE and in ROME, he had no leisure to study, nor to exercise the Latine tongue, as well for the businesse he had then in hand, as to satisfie those that frequented him to learne Philosophy of him. So that very late, being well stepped on in yeares, he began to take Latine bookes in hand, wherein there happened a strange thing unto him, but yet true notwithstanding: that is, that he did not learne nor understand things so much by the words, as by a certaine use and knowledge he had of things, he attained to the understanding of the words. But furthermore (they are his owne words) to know how to judge well, wherein consisteth the beauty of the Latine tongue, or to speak it readily, or to understand the figures, translations, and the fine knitting of simple sayings one with the other, which do adorne and beautifie the tongue, I thinke well (said he) that it is a goodly thing and

and pleasant: but withall it requireth a long and labourfome exercise, fit for those that be at better leisure then I am, and that be yet able for age to attend such finenesse. That which is above spoken of, sheweth that in that time they learned Sciences in their Mother Tongue, so that even from their Cradle children beganne to enter into the Schoole of the Muses, and pierced into the goodliest secrets of the same, having in their owne Tongue the Arts and goodly disciplines discovered even to the bottom: whereas presently the best of our age stealeth away in learning of words, and when we should enter into the knowledge of things, our memory is over-wheled, and judgement altered with an infinity of objects, which (like divers sawces) have most times altered our right taste. In somuch that almost commonly we see, that we delight for the most part to heape together letters upon letters, and after a great provision of strange words, we find our selves children, and void of the true knowledge of things. But now to come againe to Plutarch, as touching his sufficiency and his advancement in Sciences, we need not speak of them in particular, considering that his writings doe sufficiently prove them, and that we have also spoken something in the preface of his Morall workes.

Now, as his good fortune made him meet with excellent masters, and men very careful to manure so noble a spirit: so he for his part answered their hope very sufficiently, shewing himselfe even from his infancy to the end of his life wholly given to study, with an earnest desire (but well governed) to keepe his body in health, to content his mind, and to make himselfe profitable along time to himselfe, and to others also. Which was no hard matter for him, having been carefully brought up, even from his cradle, and so well governed, as was requisite to maintaine himselfe long in strength: his fathers house and table being a Schoole of temperance and of frugality. Considering furthermore that talke with learned men was very necessary for him to attaine to that which he pretended: and having a mind desirous to excell in all things, he travelled into EGYPT, and talked there of all the ancient doctrine with the wisest men, whereof afterwards he made a collection and intialed it, of Isis, and Osiris: which is yet left unto us, where he sheweth himselfe to be well studied in the divinity and Philosophy of the EGYPTIANS. From thence he returned againe into GREECE, and visited the Townes and Universities where there were any Philosophers, and frequented them all, to gather together the goodly instructions which he hath left us. Moreover he began to make collections, and culled out remembrances not onely out of the bookes already published, but also of the notable talke and discourse which he understood of the one and the other: also of Registers and Authentickall instruments kept the Townes where he came, whereof afterwards he did most artificially frame the most part of his workes. And pretending such a laudable end, the better to establish his contents, and to speake with a more commendable authority and good manner: he made a journey unto the City of SPARTA, of purpose to see the papers and memories of all the government of this goodly Common-wealth, and of their Law-makers, Kings, and Ephores; and gathered together all their notable deeds and sayings so carefully as could be possible even to the least words of the simple souldiers and women of SPARTA, together with all their customes, ordinances, ceremonies, and fashions: to live in common, and particularly, in war and in peace. He did the like in divers other Common-wealths, as his lives, and the demands of things pertaining to the GREEKS and ROMANS doth amply prove it: without which collections also it was impossible for him to have left in writing such particularities, and he could not but of necessity have had communication with a great number of men lovers of Antiquities. Unto that he joynt a courious search of Statues, Mettals, Inscriptions, Paintings, Tables: also of Proverbs, Epigrammes, Epitaphs, Apophthegms, and other ornaments of History, to leave nothing behind him. And being continually almost in the company of learned men in all professions, it seemeth his memory was alwayes bent to gather, and his judgement occupied to discerne that which was to be rejected or retained. By which meanes he saw himselfe in a short time advanced to the knowledge of all things: moreover he had in his hand goodly briefes and collections, with the which he finely holpe himselfe, and afterwards made a good part unto his friends and posterity. He himselfe at the beginning of his booke treating of the contentment and quietnesse of the mind, makes mention of the memories which he had of long time made for his own use. So that out of this rich closet he hath drawne the excellent peeces which have remained unto us, and which shew how much we have lost being deprived of them that are no more to be found, and the which time hath dispersed, or utterly consumed.

Now though that in generally it may be said, that this man was ignorant in no Learning, nor of the goodly secrets of Nature: yet this word we must adde to it, that whosoever shall duly consider the entrance, continuance, composition, binding and inclosing of his Discourse, be it that he Write an History, or that he by any Treaty apart will put backe vice, and make Vertue to be beloved: be it that he sport himselfe in clearing the difficulties of naturall Philosophy, or of the Mathematickes: be it that he beginneth to confute some disputation against those whose opinions he disproveth: we shall find in his writings an exact and easie method both together, his proofes sound, and his inductions pleasant and agreeable to all sorts of wits, and of such pithy discourses, so that of force we must confesse, that this person had been most excellently directed in his studies, considering that in speaking after such an easie manner, he presenteth so profound instructions, and I cannot tell what, where there is alwayes somewhat to be learned. Furthermore, seeing divers Sects in credit in his time, it seemeth he had a good will to sound into the depth of the value and error of them. Then reaching higher yet, he hath searched out the opinions of the first Sages. So that the Pythagoreans, Platonians, Epicureans, Stoicks, and Peripateticians, with their precepts have been very familiar with with him. But being not content with turning over the leaves of their Writings, and seeing to the end all that which the natural Philosophers have thought of the secrets of the world: yet would he familiarly frequent those whom he understood to be practised in Sciences, and confer with them, understand their reasons, and be thoroughly resolved of them: and at the length obtained his desire, as his bookes make mention. That was accompanied with a continuall reading of all sorts of good Authors, as well to amplify his collections, as still more and more to enrich his memory, and to polish his judgement; as may be noted in his Workes three severall Excellencies of his spirit. For some of them are certaine declamations made in the Schoole, and by way of exercise, as we have shewed them, placed at the beginning of the same: to that if he would have taken the paines to have reviewed and smoothened those peeces there, they would have seemed to be other then they were. But we perceive that he left some imperfect, not thinking that that (which served not but for a prooffe of some thing better laboured) deserved to come to light. There are also some other discourses better polished, yet in such sort notwithstanding, that it plainly appeareth, he might have amplified them and made them better. And there be other peeces, unto the which it may be said, he hath put his last hand: as are his Lives, and the most part of his Morall workes, written at leisure, very advisedly, considered in all understanding and to divers recreations. He could have done the like in all, and with the like stile have raised his Writings to their perfection: but having as it were more exprefly stayed himself upon some, he hath shewed therein the disposition of his studies, and with what discretion he spent his time.

Now, though he had tasted of all the Sects of the Philosophers, yet you may perceive that inclining to the Platonians (for he greatly revered Socrates and Plato, whose birth-dayes he did yearly celebrate) he neverthelesse shut himselfe within the bounds of modesty of certaine Academicks, being content simply to propound the things, but to leave them to the judgement of the Readers, forcing no man. Furthermore, we see with what diligence he had turned over the leaves of the Writings of the Epicureans, and of the Stoicks; against whom he stoutly opposed himselfe. But Morall Philosophy was his chiefe end: for the Rationall, the Naturall, and Mathematicks (the which he had greatly studied) they were but simple pastimes in comparison of the other. Whereupon may be discerned, that having received in himselfe a singular pleasure of such study, he alwayes sought to print the same desire and contentment in the thought of all men, leaving the speculations and pricking questions: onely tending to this good, to bring wisdom into the houses, to establish it in the Thrones of Kings, to make it go in the streets, to lodge it in the eyes and eares, upon the tongues, and in the bottome of the hearts of all men. See here what his thoughts have been, which he could well digest afterwards: so that it seemeth he was altogether given to that. Now though he was occupied in meditations and so excellent workes, he forgot not therefore any thing that was requisite for the exercises of his body, such as men used at that time, to keep their spirits in strength, as also more joyfully to passe over so many other crosses as our life is assailed withall. And we may see also in the precepts he hath written of health, that albeit Physicke was not his profession, neverthelesse he learned that which was the principall for his owne private good. For in that booke of his, he speaketh reasonably of the use of meats, and sheweth from what meates we should abstaine. Afterwards having declared in what sort one should use his appetite and the pleasures of the body, he condemneth the excessse of drinking and eating, he teacheth how to prevent sickness, setteth downe remedies, Treatch of Diet, and of signes of sickness, and of the true wayes how to keep health. And thereupon he commeth to reason of the exercises and diet of Students, laying that open which we should most carefully observe therein: which maketh me beleieve, that he having knowne so well what was fit for the preservation of the body, he did wisely helpe himselfe: as also even to very old age he hath borne Office in the Common-wealth, and alwayes carried a body and minde lusty and ready to take paines, having had this wisdom, to consider well his nature and disposition: also to take such meates and drinckes as were good for his stomacke, and to use them soberly, and keeping his body in good state by commendable exercises and nouriture, to make himselfe profitable a long time for humane society. It is true, that he being a grave man, raised to honours, and a Philosopher by profession, his chiefe exercises of body were to walke with other learned men, where without contention of words, he alwayes decided some points of Philosophy. Furthermore he loved to talke at the table, and to mingle pleasant grave matters with some new device: so wittily and sweetly to entangle and divide the course of his life, being no crabbed nor sullen person, but pleasant, and whose company was troublesome to none: and otherwise as sober and discreet in his talke, as he was in drinking and eating.

So then his manners, as well alone, as with his friends and openly, do shew, that truly he had a good soule within a body well tempered. Now I do not enter here into the examination of the ridiculous opinions of Plutarch in matter of Religion, being sorry that so rare a spirit hath been so miserably environed with the darknesse which was at that time in the most part of the Towns and men of Greece, and especially among so many wise men, strangely ignorant and dull in respect of the knowledge of the true God. If we had not been warned betimes by the true and onely wise men taught in the Schoole of eternall wisdom, of such a judgement of God upon the wise men of the world, who have been confounded in their discourse, when there hath been question of the honour due to our soveraigne Lord: then we might have been affronted, and remained as men cast away. And whereas so many great wise men have erred in their wayes, that will not excuse them before their Judge, as if he had kept the light from them. For, since that which may be known of his eternitie and omnipotent power, hath been revealed unto them in nature and in Philosophy: staying a man upon upon himselfe, or upon other creatures, and forsaking the only Creator, they condemne themselves by their own words and writings. Now to come againe to Plutarch. He having been Apollos Priest, as himselfe confesseth, and from his youth suckled with the foolish dorings of the Greeks: I do not finde it strange, that many absurd opinions and without good ground (yea wicked and pernicious) are scattered in his disputationes, touching the default of Oracles, of the Religion of the Jews, of the inscription of the letter E in the Temple of Delfus: why the Pythia doth no more give her Oracles in verse; and in many places of the Lives and workes, in the which he openly inclineth to the superstitions and Atheismes of the Pagans. There he sheweth a conscience evil informed, and a man running very swiftly out of the right way. By the same meane a man may plainly note that in matter of supernatural and divine Philosophy, another manner of light then that of our corrupt understanding is wholly required, not being possible that a man left to his own wit can comprehend the things which are of God: because they are discerned after a fashion meerly unknown unto him, and of the which he cannot be partaker but by a speciall grace, and which nature doth not bestow upon him, but he which hath made and reformed nature. It is no marvel then if Plutarch should be misled, that hath had so many instructions and masters strayed from the way of Eternal Truth, and whose predecessours were drowned in the bottomlesse pit of ignorance. Yet notwithstanding, in the midst of that darknesse he hath had so much light, that he seemeth, at times, to note and condemne the Labyrinth of error, as a man that hath lost his way in an horrible darke night, should from one time to another be directed rightly by the light of the flashings of lightning. For some do gather by his discourse of the Cessation of the Oracles, and by other places, that he did acknowledge one God, and very liberally condemned many old and new superstitions, unto the which both himself, and others his like, did cleave, rather by custome for fashions sake, and to please the people, then for any opinion they had that they were ought worth. But as I have said, my intention is not to judge this person nor his deeds: considering that besides the matter I touch (every where, where he goeth out of the way) he confuteth himself sufficiently: wipeth his discourse of superstition, and the seventh Chapter of his first booke touching the opinions of the Philosophers, where he will dispute of the Eternal Providence: and the third question of the second booke at talke of the table, making mention of the egge: and the last question of the fourth booke, where he medleth with speaking of God, and of the ceremonies of the Jews. In the mean time, and in the midst of this great blindness, they see in Plutarch a heart that is enemy unto vice, and a friend of good manners. Let a man see him in his Family, in the Schoole, in Banquets, with his friends, and openly: behold, there is a grave man modest in behaviour, sharpe, learned and pleasant in his discourses, offending not hurting no man. If he spake of vice, he letteth out the filthinesse, and seantly maketh the patient cry. If he spake for vertue, it is with such efficacy, that every man may know he spake of the abundance of his heart. He is a good father of a house, a wise Schoole-master, a grave Historian, a brave Politician, an excellent Philosopher, a good Writer to imitate: and furthermore, a faithful, profitable, true, and a joyfull counsellor and friend. His plainnesse, simplicity, and grave modesty shineth in all his writings: his vertue, accompanied almost ordinarily with all other things, which we need not speak of particularly, neither to unfold the life of our Philosopher from one part to another to see his uprightness, integrity, gravity, sweetnesse, constancy, force, prudence, temperancy, and liberality: that may be truly spoken of him, which had been long time before applied in the Theaters unto Amphiarau, and to Aristides:

Plutarch wherein he is commendable.

He little cares to seeme upright, but Striveth so to be,
In deepest thoughts preferring vertue still:
Whence day by day, proceeding we do see
Wise counsels, that without respect, true honours Lawes fulfill.

In testimony of his sweete Gravity, and of part of his thoughts, I will alledge some words couched in his owne discourse against Choler. As for me, said he, If I have done well or evil I know not, not by that meane I have rid my selfe of Choler. As the Lacedaemonians did in old time, who to learne their children not to be drunke at all, shewed them their slaves being drunke: so do I consider the effects of Choler in others. And afterwards he addeth more, that a man should accustome himselfe to bear many of his wives words, and of his familiars and friends, which do reprove us for that we are too gentle and soft. And this was the chiefe cause (said he) why I was so often angry with my servants, fearing they would waxe worse for want of reproofe and correction. But I observed my selfe at the last, though late, that first I were better by patience and pardoning them, make my servants worse, then to hurt my selfe by sharpnesse and choler, seeking to reforme others. I considered also with my selfe, and remembered (said he) that as he which teacheth us to shoote in a Bow, doth not forbid us to draw, but to faile in drawing: so he that teacheth us to punish in time and place, moderately, profitably, and as we should: doth not let us but that we may punish, I do labour all I can to withdraw, and utterly to banish all choler: principally because I would not take from them that are punished, the mean to justifie themselves, and to hearte them. For time bringeth, in the interim to the passionate mind, a delay and forgetfulnesse, which dissolveth it: in which space the judgement of reason findeth both the meane and the measure to give reasonable correction. And besides that, they give the party punished no place to resist the punishment, if he be not corrected in anger and choler, but convinced for that he had well deserved it. And (which were speeches a-

were yet more unseemly) they shall not finde that the servant punished speaketh more justly then his master that punisheth him. Touching this purpose, I will remember the pleasant report which the Philosopher Taurus made of Plutarch, as Gellius reciteth it in the sixe and twentieth Chapter of the first booke of his Nights Attiques, as some man hath heretofore expressed it in our language. A slave, a vile and vicious man (but yet that had his eares somewhat instructed with bookes and disputations of Philosophy) having been stripped naked for some fault he had done, by the commandement of his Master Plutarch, whilst they were whipping of him, he grumbled at the first, that it was without reason, and that he had done nothing: but in the end crying out amaine; and injuring his Master, he told him that he was no Philosopher as he bragged himselfe to be: and that he often heard him say it was a fowle thing to be angry, yea that he made a booke of it: and that now (overcome with Choler) in making him be beaten so cruelly, he utterly belied all his Writings. Thereupon Plutarch coldly and quietly answered: Why, how now Roister, said he? whereby doest thou thinke that I am angry at this present? My countenance, my voice, my colour, my words, do they give thee any signe that I am angry? I do not thinke I have cruell eyes, nor a troubled face, nor any fearful crie. Do I blush? do I fume? doth any thing escape me that I should repent me? do I stampe? do I rage? For to tell thee truly, these be the shewes of Choler. Afterwards he turned to him that whipped him: saying, Forward with your businesse, whilst he and I do reason the matter. Furthermore, we may easily gather what Plutarch was amongst his friends, from the nine bookes containing the questions decided at the table. And for his disputations against the EPICUREANS and STOICKES, they shew that this person for the regard of his actions concerning the Common-wealth, having respect unto those whom at that time he made his Judges, and to the posterity into whose hands his writings might come hereafter, he alwayes carried himself in such a modest gravity, that they could require no more of him. And if sometime he did feelingly touch some, as Colotes, and Herodotus, it was not in vain. Also he alwayes used termes which witnessed that he had an upright soule. To be short, it appeareth every where that his passions were marvellous well stayed. And if any of them were furious or violent, he could tell in time and place how to reforme them by the precepts of Philosophy, leading (as is said) a life without blame of men. But above all the rest, when any discourse or disputation drew him into it, to speake of shamefull or dishonest things, he did convey it with such discretion as it cannot be amended: whereof we need not to bring forth examples dispersed in his writings, and especially in the Dialogue of Love, seeing that being concealed it doth no hurt, as also remembered or too expressly revealed, it cannot but hurt the eyes, and an honest thought.

Furthermore, Plutarch's study of Philosophy tooke not away the care he had to live with some profit amongst men, nor made him to disdain the meanes which his predecessors had left him. But as he came of a noble house, and with time being advanced unto office and charge in the Common-wealth, greatly esteemed of Trajan the Emperor, and of the Noble men of ROME, he saw he had goods enough to live at ease: whereof notwithstanding he never made such account as that he would forget study, and intangle himselfe in the snare of the love of riches, in the which so many miserable foules have been engaged unto death. His meanes served his turne to maintaine himselfe among his friends, and to bring up his children: for he had many of an honourable Lady which he married, and loved most dearly. Amongst his other sons, himselfe maketh mention of Autobulus, of Plutarchus, and of Charon, who died a young infant, and some others whom he nameth not at all. Also of daughters, two of the which were married to Firmus, and unto Craton, learned Philosophers: and Timoxene, who died very young. As for Autobulus, he married in his fathers life time, and it is not well knowne, whether Senius of CHERONEA, a Philosopher of the Sceptes, who lived in great honour in the Empire of Antonius, was his sonne, or the sonne of Plutarchus. That which I am now about to speak of, may be gathered out of divers places in the workes of Plutarch, and specially of the discourse at the table. And in the consolation which he wrote to his wife upon the death of their daughter, they may note that she was an honourable Lady, modest, and vertuous, well attended on with women and servants, and otherwise loving to her children, and bearing great reverence unto her husband. That the house of Plutarch was very well governed: that he had a great number of kinsfolkes and friends. And in other places of his booke intituled Symposium, and other Treaties, we may know that his Sonnes and Nephews were studious and learned, and specially in the sixt question of his eight booke of talke at the table, speaking of his youngest children: who because they tarried somewhat longer at the Theater then they should have done, to see and heare the pastimes they made there, came by that means late to supper: is shewed sufficiently that they now began to follow the fathers steps. And there appeared in no part any evil touch amongst these persons, but as Plutarch did converse in a singular reverence, friendship and gentleness with his Grandfather, his Father and his brethren, we are to judge the like conversation with his Wife, his Children, and his Nephews: as also they being in so good a Schoole, could not fail but every day to go forward in the knowledge and practise of vertue.

But as a fontaine hidden serveth to no use, so it had little prevailed Plutarch to have seen, read, and gathered so much together, unlesse he had made little streames run from such a lively and goodly fontaine, unto such places where his vertue might shine more then in any other parts of the world. That was ITALIE, and the City of ROME, the seate of the Empire, and where (notwithstanding the disorders brought in by former warres, and by the dissolutions and tyrannies of some Emperours) there were many learned men, and in the Emperours Court also some counsellors, and other persons of authority which loved vertue. Now Plutarch having begun to advance himselfe in GREECE, about the time of Vespasian and Titus, it seemeth he came to ROME immediately after the death of Titus, under Dominian, as well to make profession there of Philosophy, as also that he might more nearly know the ancient government of the Common-wealth, and to increase his collections, from the which proceeded afterwards infinite particularities inclosed in his works: but especially the Lives of the noble ROMANS compared with the GREEKS. For my part, I thinke Plutarch was drawn to ROME by meanes of some friends he had there, especially by Sossius Senecio, that had been a Consul, who was of great estimation at that time, and namely under the Empire of TRAIAN. And that which maketh me thinke so, is because of Plutarch's own words, who saith in the beginning of his first booke of his discourse at the table, that he gathered together all his reasons and discourses made here and there, as well in ROME with Senecio, as in GREECE with Plutarch and others. Not being likely that he would have taken the pains to have made so long a voyage, and to have come to such a City where he understood not their vulgar tongue, if he had not been drawne thither by Senecio, and such other men: as also in acknowledgement of the good turnes and honour he had received by such men, he dedicated divers of his books unto them, and among others, the Lives unto Senecio, and the nine volumes of his discourse at the table; with the treaty, How a man may know, that he profiteth in vertue. Now for the time, considering what he saith in the end of his booke against curiosity, I suppose that he taught in ROME in the time of Titus and of Dominian: for touching that point, he maketh mention of a noble man called Rusticus, who being one day at his lecture, would not open a letter which was brought him from the Emperour, nor interrupt Plutarch, but attended the end of his declamation, and untill all the hearers were gone away: and addeth also, that Rusticus was afterwards put to death by the commandement of Dominian. Furthermore, about the beginning of the life of Demosthenes, Plutarch saith, that whilst he remained in ITALY and at ROME, he had no leisure to study the Latine Tongue: as well for that he was busied at that time with matters he had in hand, as also to satisfie those that were his followers to learn Philosophy of him. He doth not tell what matters he had in hand besides his profession: but following that which Swidas and others spake of him, that he was near to the person of Trajan, and had the honour and place to be his Schoole-master and Teacher, or, at the leastwise, one of so many learned men as this Prince made much of, as some story writers do testifie, he was honoured and advanced to some charge or government: which, I thinke, is that he speaketh of in this place. Now furthermore, his chiefest labour was publickly to teach all the parts of Philosophy, mingling in his declamations and lectures a diligent and curious search of all that the ancient Philosophers, reasonable, naturall, or morall, of what sect soever they were, had treated of: as appeareth by the writings, which are as summaries of his lessons and Orations he made with his owne voice. His speech doth not flow so as that of many other Philosophers, Orators, and Greeke Historians, but being come later, and in a more rude and harsh world, his style also is more hard, briefe, enforced, and Philosopher like: ayming at this marke to instruct the minde first, not tarrying to tickle the eares much, though he did fill and content them learnedly. But the flowing sweetnesse we taste in Plato, in Xenophon, in Herodotus, and in some other, wanting indeed in Plutarch, is supplied and recompensed in him by infinite stories, sentences, similitudes, and notable particulars which he borroweth of others, and whereof he composeth a worke so well divided, so rich, and so pleasant, by reason of his variety, that it is not possible to read bookes of a more gentle and profitable reading, amongst all the Historians, and Philosophers, GREEKS or ROMANS. If Plutarch then doth at this present content all sorts of men, what may we thinke he did with his lively voice? but after the example of this Hercules of GAULE, which held his auditors eares fast chained to his tongue: so hath he by his goodly documents, moved an infinite number of men, to leave vice, and to cloath them with the love of vertue.

So he having continued these exercises for some years, being heard and visited of all sorts of men, grew to be of such reputation, that the greatest persons began to seek him and to make much of him, yea to thinke themselves honoured by his friendship: as his books dedicated unto some of them do sufficiently testifie it. And touching the access he had about the person of Trajan himselfe, it may be gathered from the beginning of this goodly collection of Apophthegmes, which he dedicated to this great Emperor, what was his intention: that is to wit, to serve for the good of all the ROMAN Empire, giving wholesome instructions unto the head thereof. For he wisely judged, that in ruling the thoughts of that man, it was to give Physicke at once unto all the subjects of that great Monarchy. The same being a common thing, that

Subjects and Kingdoms commonly do chuse
The manners that their Princes daily use.

It is true that such instructions, in respect of Trajan, do onely concerne his person and Politicke affaires. For as touching the onely true Religion, it was meere unknown of Plutarch; and rudely persecuted under the Empire of Trajan: who notwithstanding in the end being softened by the precepts of morall Philosophy, and through the advertisements his deputy governors gave him, and namely Plinius secundus governor of BITUNIA, of the innocency of the Christians: or rather restrained by the secret providence of our sovereign Lord (who excellently strengthened his, put the Oracles of the lying spirit to silence, and overthrew Idolatry in most places) he carried himselfe more gently, and did forbid to vex and trouble then any more, whom before they had pursued with all sorts of cruelties. Furthermore, I thinke that it was in favour of Trajan chiefly, that Plutarch made

Trajan forbade the persecuting of Christians.

So could he well acknowledge the good he had received of Plutarch, being a noble and bountifull Prince, as hath bene said here-before. For, besides the great honour he had done him at Rome, by having made him a Confull, he commanded (as saith Suidas) that all the Magistrates and Officers which were in the Province of SLAVONY, should do nothing but under his Authority. If we had the Bookes of Marius Maximus, of Fabius Marcellinus, of Aurelius Verus, and of Statius Valens, which have written the Life of Traian: we might easily draw on this matter further, the which Suidas (according to his stile) is contented to touch in one word. And Dion who was a GREEKE, a man very forgetfull for an Historian, and that in some places shewed he had no great judgement: he seemeth to have suppressed the name of Plutarch, as though he had bene offended with the same obtained by this man. Or else, if one will take things in good part, as I incline unto it, it may be he thought he needed make no mention of one whose Writings made him to be knowne sufficiently. Yet furthermore, I do not finde that Plutarch was in SLAVONY at all, and if so be that he made any Journey thither, I thinke he tarried not long there: because it appeareth in divers places of his Workes, that his abode was most in ITALY and in GREECE. And for his honourable charges committed unto him, that should not be thought very strange, if we consider the merits of Plutarch, the names of Traian, and the good will that Sossius Senecio (one of the principall men of Rome, and of the chiefest favourites of Traian) bare unto Plutarch. For he that was in so great credit with his Master, would not forget him whom he loved above all other men: wherein he lost not his time, forasmuch as the Statue that was set up for him, and that which Dion and some others do briefly paffe over, do not commend Sossius, as do the Prefaces of Honour, and the Bookes which Plutarch dedicated unto him. The which we neede no more rehearse, then to write over againe the Epistle of Plutarch unto Traian, the which is written in Latine, as Amyot sheweth in his Preface of the Lives: where he hath inserted the Epistle at length, because he thought it wisely and gravely written, a Briefe worthy of such a Philosopher as Plutarch. That which Cuspinianus saith in the latter end of the Life of Traian, seemeth to touch this: speaking also, as if it had bene exprest out of Greeke into Latine. But time hath deprived us of that, and of many other goodly pieces of the self-same, as we have somewhat spoken of it before in the beginning of the Morall Workes. Now he hath written nothing touching his behaviour in his publicke Charge, but contenteth himselfe to speake a word sometime passing by, because he made no account of any thing but of Philosophy, through the helpe whereof he assayed to make himselfe and others wiser, and more vertuous every day then other. Being a thing very likely, that such a man as had so painfully considered of the state of the World, and of all sorts of publicke Governments, and had joyned his studies with so great experience: that he hath happily managed the charges that were committed unto him. To conclude, to live as we should amongst men, the speculation and knowledge of things being joyned with the practice of the same, do bring forth excellent effects: whereas those that do content themselves with the simple Theoretike, and others that follow Exercise, contemning the true understanding of the Causes and Grounds of Affaires, as Philosophy doth shew them, they oftentimes fall into wonderful difficulties.

For Plutarch, though he tarried a long time in ITALY, and in Rome, yet that tooke not away the remembrance of the sweete aire of GREECE, and of the little Towne where he was borne: but being touched from time to time with a Sentence of an ancient Poet, who said, that

*In whatsoever Country men are bred, (I know not by what sweetnesse of it led)
They nourish in their mindes a glad desire Unto their native homes for to retire:*

Plutarch returneth into Greece his Country.

The end and scope of Plutarch's Lives.

He resolved to go backe into GREECE againe, there to end the rest of his daies in rest and honour amongst his Citizens, of whom he was honourably welcomed home. Some judge that he left Rome after the death of Traian, being then of great yeares, to leade a more quiet life. So being then at rest, he earnestly tooke in hand that which he had long thought of before, to wit, the Lives: and tooke great paines in it, until he had brought his Worke to perfection, as we have done at this present: although that some Lives, as those of Scipio Africanus, of Metellus Numidicus, and some other are not to be found. Now himselfe confesseth in some place, that when he began this Worke, at the first it was but to profit others: but that afterwards it was to profit himselfe, looking upon those Histories, as if he had looked in a glasse, and seeking to reforme his life in some sort, and to forme it in the mould of the vertues of these great men: taking this fashion of searching their manners, and writing the Lives of these Noblemen, to be a familiar haunting and frequenting of them. Also he thought (said he himselfe) that he lodged these men one after another in his house, entering into consideration of their qualities, and that which was great in either of them, choosing and principally taking that which was to be noted: and most worthy to be knowne in their sayings and deedes. In summe, he declared that by continuance of reading ancient Histories, and in drawing out the Lives which he hath written, and retaining daily in his understanding the memorable things of the most honest and vertuous men of times past, he instructed himselfe, and prepared him to lay aside all evill, foolish, dishonest, or spitefull conditions, if by chance, by often frequenting their company he must of necessity keepe, he learned any evill touch: the which he did reforme, turning his quiet thought, not stirred with any passion at all, to the consideration of so many goodly examples. Now because that some might object unto him, that for the finishing of so great a piece of worke, he could not have made choice of a fitter place then Rome: or rather that being a man given to his

Booke as he was, he should have left that Worke unto some other that had seene more. This objection being of some weight, he answereth it at the beginning of the Life of Demosthenes, and saith: That to attaine to true felicity, (whereof the greatest part consisteth in the manners, qualities, and condition of the soule): it maketh no matter whether a man be borne in an obscure Towne and of small name, no more then if he were borne of a foule or little Mother. For it were a mockery to thinke that some small Townes or little Islands could notwithstanding bring forth good Poets and excellent Players of Comedies: and that they could not in like sort bring out an honest, just, constant, wife, and noble or worthy man. And although we have reason to thinke, that Arts and Sciences invented to make things necessary for the use of men, or else to win a name and reputation, are made and counterfeited in poore little Townes: so we must also thinke that Vertue, none otherwise then a strange Plant, can take soote and roote in any place, where it meeteth with a good nature, gentle and patient to endure paines. Wherefore if we come to commit an error, or that we live otherwise then becometh us, we must not accuse or blame the meannesse of our Countrey, but justly attribute the fault to our selves. It is true (saith he) that he that hath undertaken to frame a piece of Worke, or to write any History, in the which many things should be put, not familiar in his Countrey, and that they finde notwaies at their hand every where, but strange for the most part, dispersed here and there, and that must be gathered from many places and divers Authours: in truth he must first and before all other things dwell in a great and noble City, full of People, and a great number of men loving goodly and honest things, to the end there may be store of Bookes, and that in searching up and downe, and hearing them tell with lively voice many things, which other Story-writers peradventure have left unwritten; and that shall beare so much more credit, because they are fresh in memory of the living: he may make his Worke compleat and perfect in all things, and not wanting many things that should be necessary for it. Having made this Preface, he excuseth himselfe, that he could not profit so much in knowledge of the Latine Tongue, as he desired, and sheweth how he did helpe himselfe. But forasmuch as it is in this Worke of his Lives that Plutarch hath most shewed his sufficiency, whether you consider the length of the Worke, or try with what judgement he hath proceeded: peradventure it will not be hurtfull to speake somewhat of it, beside that which hath bene spoken by this Translator in the Preface. I do not enter here into commendation of History in generall, nor we neede not apply that unto Plutarch, which Cicero and many others have spoken. For if ever there were of the noble GREEKS and ROMANS, is an assured testimony of many hundreds of yeares, a Sunne of Verity, a Life of Memory, a true Mistresse of Life, and an excellent Messenger of Antiquity. And as the Stone called the Opall, sheweth many orient colours above all other precious Stones: so do the Lives of Plutarch make an abridgement of all the best things contained in the Greeke and Latine Histories. For there are seene worthy examples of Vices and Vertues, and infinite number of Maximes, and notable Precepts touching the duties of every one: their Vertues and Vices. Now although Plutarch in the ignorance and blindness of the true God, could not (no more then other prophane Historians) touch the true end of History: yet we may note some admirable thing in him in that respect. Since History (which containeth in it an infinite number of particular deedes and honourable actions, as the Collection of the Lives of Plutarch) is a goodly glittering Glasse or Table, within the which may be discerned the wonders and admirable working of Divine Providence. For to comprehend that well which God and men do, there are three things to be considered in every History: to wit, the men whereof there is question, the things worthy of memory, and the circumstances; keeping this ground against the Epicureans and Enemies of mans life: That there is a God-head and Supernaturall Power which governeth and maintaineth the World, wherein nothing happeneth by chance, but all is guided by a most wise disposition of the same, for the preservation of Families, of Civill Policy, and of a Company, and happy Congregation that shall be taken out of this World into a better. A wife and learned Historian must have an eye upon these three things, for to apply them unto three other Vertues that ought to shine in him: Verity, Moderation, and Eloquence. Forasmuch as if he set out Fables, or if he talke to no purpose, and make Discourses at pleasure, or if he be troublesome in a Speech not coherent and hanging well together: then he deserveth no more the name of an Historian. As for these Vertues, I do assure my selfe that every man of judgement will agree, that they are readily to be found in Plutarch, accompanied with a sweete gravity that alwaies pleaseth the Reader, and giveth him at a hundred times reading as good a favour and taste of him as at the first. Let a man looke upon Stories that have nothing in them but the Name, and upon so many Bookes ill composed, of the which Europe is full: they finde that the parts necessary to be observed in the persons, is nothing at all regarded: that those which thinke to represent others, they do fable them after a strange fashion. Thereupon the affections and passions, the hatred, the envie, evill speaking, false reports, flatteries and lies, present themselves so untowardly, that they marre all. To the contrary, we see Plutarch very exact in that respect. It sufficeth me to touch the things passing by: whether he shew the vices or vertues of great or meane persons, he doth it in good termes, without aggravating or making it lesse. He taketh no manner of pleasure to speake evill of any, but wisely hideth that whereof we ought not to speake but with shame and compassion of mans infirmity. And he is more inclined to commend the good in vicious persons, then too much to set open the shops of their wickednesse. But if necessity enforce him unto it, it is with such manifest proofes, that others which are wicked, seeing him wash the head of their Companions,

these words: I answer them that reprove me when they finde me present in our Towne, to see them measure, and tell bricke, and tile, stones, sand, and lime which they bring: that it is not for my selfe that I build, but for the Common-wealth. And in this Treatise, Whether an old man should yet deale in the Affaires of Estate. Thou knowest (saide he, writing unto Euphanes) that there are many Pythiades, that is to say, many tearmes of five yeares that I do exercise the Priesthood of Apollo Pythian: yet I thinke thou wouldest not say to me, Plutarch, thou hast sacrificed enough, thou hast made Processions enow, thou hast led many Dances: and now that thou art old and ancient, it is time thou leave thy Crowne off thy head, and abandon the Oracle, because of thy age. At the beginning of the eighth Question of the Sixth Booke of his Discourse at the Table, he mentioneth his Office of being Mayor of the Towne of CHERONEA. To conclude, even to the end of his life he shewed in his deeds, that which he excellently handled in his Writings: which is, that there is nothing letteth old men to serve and profit their Common-wealth in divers sorts of Government, whether it be with good words, with good counsell, with liberty and authority to speake boldly, and with grave respect, as the Poets say. For they are not the feeble, nor the hands, nor all the strength of the body onely, which are the parts and good of the Common-wealth: but they are first of all and principally the Soule, and the beauties thereof: as Justice, Temperance, and Wisdome; the which coming late to their perfection, it were to no purpose they should enjoy a House, Land, and all other Inheritances of his Citizens, and that it could receive no more any profit by them for the good of the Common-wealth, because of their long time, the which doth not so much deprive them of strength & ability to do service, as it doth increase them with sufficiency and knowledge of faculties requisite to command and governe. Furthermore Plutarch having lived alwaies honourably even to old age, he died quietly among his children and friends in the City of CHERONEA, leaving in his Writings an immortall favour of his Name unto Posterity. Besides the honour his Citizens did him, there was a Statue set up for him by Ordinance of the People of ROME, in memory of his Vertues. Now furthermore, though time hath devoured some part of the Writings of this great man, and diminished some other: nevertheless those which remaine being a great number, have excellent use to this day among us. Howbeit, having met with some fragments in Stobaeus, of some Treaties which are not to be found any more, I thought it would not mislike the Reader to cull out some pieces to present them unto him, to shut up all this Discourse. Wisdome, saith he, (in the Booke of the profit which knowledge of the time to come bringeth) consisteth not in shew, but in affaires, before a man setteth to his hand: and sheweth how he should come before them, and receive them when they be offered him: for it considereth the things to come. The body hath no eyes but before, the backe seeth nothing at all: but wisdome by helpe of memory, seeth even the things that are past and gone. It is the Secretary which alwaies remaineth and abideth within, as Plato saith. It is the part or instrument of the Soule which taketh hold of things past, keepeth them, and layeth them up safe, making a circle, within the which that that is past joyneth with the thing present, and will not suffer it to extend it selfe beyond compass, and to passe the bounds of Nature and knowledge. Of the Booke against pleasure. Pleasure undoeth the body, and daily maketh it tender by deliciouseffe, the common use whereof cutteth downe the lustinesse and consumeth the strength, so that weaknesse and sicknesse do abound, and in youth they begin to waxe old. Voluptuousnesse is a Beast that maketh men Slaves, but yet no savage Beast: for if he did openly assaile any body, there would soone be an end: but she is so much more dangerous, because she hideth her ill courage, and taketh upon her the habit of good will. We must shun her therefore for two causes, the one, that she should not hurt us, the other, that she should not seduce us. Let us no more call voluptuousnesse honest pleasures, but rather acknowledge that they be troubles, services, and duties: and esteeme the rest as shamefull and violent things, which by their diversity flatter us, and in the meane time finely hurt us. Now our selves and affaires ought to be subject to the same Law that the brute Beasts are, to the end that when we have satisfied our desire, we have no new minde to covet further, but that our moderate pleasures be contented when they have things necessary. Is there any man that will commend Traytors? Now pleasure is even such a one; for she betrayeth all that dependeth upon Vertue. Doth any body esteeme Hangmen much? See notwithstanding what it is to follow sensuality, which tormenteth and renteth asunder all moderate things. Will any man commend avarice? Voluptuousnesse is as unsatiable as the love of Money. What pleasure can we take of a Beast that destroyeth us by flattery? I aske, why dost thou not play the foole and knave in the presence of all men? To the contrary, thou fliest, and bearest reverence to thy selfe, abusing thy selfe in the night and darknesse which cannot depose against thee. No man seeketh to hide him that doth well, nor is afraid of the light that is round about him: but rather to the contrary, he would all the World were become a bright Sunne, to give light to all the parts of the good Works he doth. But if he happen to commit any fault, he doth all his possible endeavour to hide it, and blameth his passion. Now let us take away the veile, and openly muse upon these pleasures. They make us drunke, even to lose our senses: they continually make knaves and drowfie lubbers to follow Harlots when they should labour: Enemies of mans life, neither caring for Father nor Mother, voide of all reverence unto the Lawes. In the Booke that treateth, how Women should be taught and learned. It is no easie thing to hide this ignorance, saith Heraclitus: and much lesse then when he hath drunke more then ordinary. Plato saith also, that the thought is discovered by Wine: as much as to say, after a man hath drunke too much. Sophocles blamed Aeschylus, because he wrote his Tragedies when he had drunke out of measure: for, saith he, though Aeschylus doth well, yet he knoweth not what he doth. Pythagoras being asked how it could be brought to passe, that a Drunkard should abstaine from being drunke? If he remembered, said he, oftentimes what he did when he was drunke. It is a common saying in every mans mouth, Let not the childe have a knife. And I say, Keepe riches from a childe, and ignorance from a man. Of the Booke of accusation. Hippias said, there was nothing so intolerable as accusation, because there was no punishment ordained by Law for Accusers, as there was for Thieves: although they stole friendship from men, which is the goodliest Riches a man can have. So that an outrage of fact, though it be great, is lesse then accusation, which doth much more hurt because it is hidden. Of the Discourse or Epistle of friendship. He is a true witness of the truth, that is not bound by benefit unto him that bringeth him forth, and that speaketh before the Judges without exception of person. We must win love by gentleness and bounty, rather then by meanes: and for the Common-wealth, wisdom and gentleness should be joyned together. Agrippinus in his Government, attempted to perswade them whom he condemned to lose goods and life, that it was expedient for them they should be condemned. For, said he, I do not pronounce sentence against you, as a Thiefe passing by should say, Deliver thy purse, or thou art dead: but I do that as your Tutor, and one that hath a care of you: like unto the Physician that comforteth his Patient from whom he would cut some member, and perswadeth him to be ruled. Cottus King of THRACIA was very cruell unto his Subjects: and when one of his familiars told him, That is called fury not Kingly Government. But so it is, answered the King, that this fury of mine maketh my Subjects wise and quiet. Of the Booke against the strength of the body. Dost thou thinke the strength of the body to be so great a happinesse, that thou wilt conclude that Nature which hath given more strength to Beasts then to men, should be Mother to them, and Step-mother to the other? Dost thou thinke it is by reason of the massiveness or weight, or by the swiftnesse, or strength of the eyes? The true strength of men consisteth in discourse of the soule, by meanes whereof he hunteth in the Forests, and taketh the Elephants in a snare: he rideth Horse and breaketh them, he bringeth Oxen subject to the yoke, he beateh downe Birds with bolts, and catcheth with angles Fish that lie hidden in the bottome of waters. There is his strength which is seene much better, when he considereth at his ease, the roundnesse of the Earth, the breadth of the Elements, and the revolutions of the Stars. Such were the worthy Exercises of Hercules, and who had not rather be Ulysses, then Polyphemus the CYCLOPIAN? Also when one spake much in commendation of a venturous and hardy man, as if he had bene some brave Souldier: There is great difference, said Aratus the SICONTIAN, betwixt esteeming vertue, and regarding life nothing. Of the Booke of Divination. It is most apparent that from the beginning Necessity invented and polished certaine Arts, which she doth keepe even till this present. It is she that hath taught all things. For, is there any thing that necessity hath not thought of? she hath brought forth the occupation of weaving, of building, the art of Physick, tilling of the ground, and all that belongs unto it. There be other crafts also found out, I cannot tell by what pleasure: as Perfumers, Apothecaries, Cookes, and others that serve for ornaments of the body: also Painters. Againe, there are Sciences which men seeke, learne, and teach, because of the probable and apparent reason which they discover, and for the beauty of them: as Arithmetick, Geometry, and all others consisting in measures and proportions, then Astrologie. And yet though we contemne them, nevertheless because of their excellency, we are constrained in some sort to know them, said Plato. Of the Treaty, That Love and Judgement are divers things. Some say, that Love is the faculty of the soule, which we call understanding: others, that it is a concupiscence or voluptuousnesse: others, that it is a madnesse: and there are that thinke it is, I cannot tell what divine agitation of the soule: and others that make it a god. This disputation hath made that some have judged, and rightly, that from the beginning, Love is a simple desire or lust: but if it exceed, it is fury. Also that friendship doth resemble it. If Love be despised, it begetteth melancholy: if it increase as wished, he that is possessed withall, hath a thousand conceits and fantastickall imaginations, and doth imagine all the greatnesse and favours of Heaven and Earth. And this is the reason why the Poets say, that Love is a Torch: and the Painters, Potters, and Statuaries do represent it in that estate. For that part of the fire which doth give light, is very pleasing, profitable and commodious: but that which burneth, bringeth nothing but trouble and sorrow. Like as it is a good thing to reprove and admonish our friends, and such as belong unto us, whilst they be in their right wits, and capable of judgement and understanding: so to the contrary, if they be light-headed and distraught of their wits, we do not use then to reason and conteit with them, but we rather do yield to that they say. So must we freely and lively reprove them, that commit a fault through choler or covetousnesse: but as for Lovers, they must be excused because they be sicke. And therefore from the beginning, it were the best way not to suffer Love to take roote in them: if it do, repaire then to the Altars of the gods that give remedie, as Plato saith, that is to say, keepe company with wife men. Drive this Beast far from thee, before his teeth and nailes do grow: if not, thou must fight with the evil when it is great and full grown, the which thou didst imbrace in thine infancy and youth. But which are these teeth and nailes of Love? Suspition and Jealousie. Now some will say to me, that there is also I know not what, a thing that draweth, and is pleasant. So had this famous Sphinx wings of divers colours, very pleasant to behold: for when he turned them to the beames of the Sunne, they shined like Gold: and when he was against the clouds, one would have said it had bene azure mingled with yellow and red, like the Rainbow in the Element. Love after the same sort hath in it (I know not how) a gracious, gentle, and faire shew. But it destroyeth men, overthroweth houses, dissolveth marriages, and confoundeth great Capitaines, without propounding of hard Enigmas or Questions to

to be resolved: but himselfe being so taken that he cannot be freed. For example. If one asked: What is that which at one instant loveth and hateth, flieth and pursueth, threatneth and prayeth, angreth and flattereth, taketh and leaveth, laugheth and weepeth with a breath? it is a knot which one cannot easily undo. Furthermore, the Sphinx had many things devised for pleasure, mingled in the midst of his Enigma. For though an old man go with a staffe, yet he hath not three feet: and the little childe is not a beast with foure feet, although he creepe of all foure, helping his weake legs with his two hands. But there be no such Enigmas in the passions of Lovers. They love and hate; desire the thing absent, and feare the thing present: they flatter, and do injury: they die, and kill themselves for the thing they love: they desire not to love, and yet will not leave to love: they repent them, and waxe blinde: they become wife, and yet cast themselves away: they will command, and yet yeeld themselves slaves. And therefore it is that such a passion is holden for a pure rage: as also Euripides doth confesse it. Now Love is not begotten upon a sudden, nor doth not invade all the person, as choler doth: but it kindleth by little and little, as a little fire. It slip-peth in softly, and when it hath possessed the soule, it dislodgeth not easily: but we see it sometimes lusty and fresh even in old men that have white haire. If it cease, and begin to coole by succession of time, or that it be dead by some accident, it doth not altogether leave the soule, or the substance of his fire consumed: where the markes of his heate passed are to be seene, as if lightning had passed thorow there. As for the sorrow past, and the choler after it is quenched, there is no sparke left in the soule, but they perceive that the inflammation of the passion which made a great noise is quiet: but the bitings of Love, albeit the Beast be gone, do not therefore lose their venom, but the inward wounds do renew and refresh themselves againe. To be short, no man knoweth what such a passion meaneth, nor how it cometh, nor from whence it slipped into the heart. In the Booke where he disputeth for beauty. Are not men compounded of body and soule? Is the one enough for us without the other? How could that be? For if the body were not governed by the soule, it would not live, and the soule had neede of a place to be kept and lodged in. Since then both the one, and the other are adorned with gifts proper unto them; the soule with justice, temperance, and wisdom: and the body with force, beauty and health: were it not to be wondered at, if one despised that which concerneth the body, and that he made no reckoning but of the goods of the soule? Corporall beauty is a worke of the soule, which maketh a present of this gift to the body. For when the soule is gone, there remaineth nothing good in the body. The strength, the colour, the sight, and the voice do vanish. To conclude, the body being abandoned of his ancient inhabitant, there is nothing left that is amiable. Thou therefore that accusest Beauty, unawares thou speakest outrage to the soule, which is cause of this beauty. Aristotle to one that asked him, why a man did love faire things, answered: It is for a blinde man to aske such a question. Diogenes called faire Curtizans, Queenes, because many do execute that which they command. Of the Booke against Nobility. What do we thinke that Nobility is, but Riches gathered together by Ancestors, or some Honour attained unto long time before? whereof the one nor the other proceedeth not of our will: but the one cometh by unconstant Fortune, the other proceedeth from the disorders of the World. So then this proud name of Nobility floweth from two strange springs. Now Riches maketh not those that are borne like unto them: but Vertue proceeding from the sincere habitude of the Spirit, is planted in the Race of the vertuous, and doth make them truly noble. In this is true Nobility, to wit: the conformity unto vertuous manners. But I pray you, King Midus Riches, were they more rich then the poverty of Aristides? although he left not wherewithall to defray his charges of Funerall. To the contrary, King Midus Tombe passed for magnificence all the Riches of the World: but Nobility is not inclosed in Gold nor Silver. Vice is rightly compared unto fire: for when either the one or the other wanteth nouriture, it goeth out. But the basenesse of the Race of Socrates the Philosopher, the Sonne of an Image-graver, and of a Midwife, is it not more noble then the glory of Sardanapalus? Thou shouldest not thinke Xerxes more noble then Cynegyrus, who had one of his hands cut off fighting for his Countrey: since the other fled to save his life, being a King environed with cowardinesse. Of the Treaty against riches. Hunger never gave any man cause to be an adulterer: nor want of Money hath made any man dissolute. Poverty is a kinde of temperance, and neede may be called a summary observation of the Lawes. Arceflanus said, poverty was rude, no lesse then the Isle of Itinaca: but furthermore, a good nurse for children: because it did use them to frugality and abstinence: and at one word, it is the healthfull Schoole of Vertue. Thus have you some fragments of our Philosopher, of the which as of the rest of his Workes, we desire that all may learne to be vertuous.

THE LIFE OF SENECA.

A knowledge that dash many errors flie,
A life resisting vices payes our breath:
A death, in death, that conquer'd death by death,
O Seneca, are fruites of thy Philosophy.

Spain is divided by the Geographers into three severall parts, of the which one of them abutting upon the Straights of GIBRALTAR and the Mediterranean Sea, called by Strabo TURDITANIA, was in old time the best inhabited. And albeit he doth confine it into two thousand furlongs in compass, yet he saith that in his time they made account of two hundred Townes within that circuit, which at this day is called ANDALYZIA, having taken the name of the VANDALS, which have dwelt there since the ruine of the ROMANE Empire. In this part of SPAIN was (and yet is) situated upon the River called of the Ancients Bætis, and at this day Guadalquivir, (that is to say, the great River, by reason of his long course) the City of CORDUBA, or CORDOVA, which was in old time one of the most famous Cities of SPAIN, built by Marcellus, and inhabited with noble ROMANS, as Plinius and Strabo do witness. This place amongst others was a feed-plot or garden of good spirits, and men given to study. Among other honourable Families of that time, was that of the Annæans, which besides their Nobility loved Learning, specially since the Father of Seneca, whose life now we write. He was a simple Gentleman bearing no charge in the Commonwealth, for that he had no spirit in him to embrace such burdens, and gave himselfe most to Learning, although otherwise he left not his Sword, being a Knight as many other PATRICIANS in the Province where he was. With his Armes he joynd the Profession of Learning, but specially of Eloquence, in the which he excelled the most in his time. He married a Lady called Elbia, of whom he had three Sonnes, the eldest bearing the name of the Father, to wit, Lucius Annæus Seneca. The second, Annæus Nonatus, afterwards called Julius Gallio. The third, Annæus Mella, Father of Lucan the Poet. The Father was very carefull to have his Children well taught and brought up, but the eldest especially, who with time gave himselfe wholly unto Philosophy. For Gallio, besides his Learning, he was raised up to some publicke Dignities at Rome. Mella on the other side, he cared not for advancement, and therein he followed his Father, as we will shew hereafter more at large. Seneca, of whom we have presently to speake, was borne as it should seeme, a little before the death of Augustus Cæsar. For himselfe writeth in the hundred and ninth Epistle unto Lucilius, that he was a young man when by the commandement of Tiberius the Ceremonies of the Strangers Religions were driven out of ROME: the which Cornelius Tacitus in the second Booke of his Annals laid to have happened in the fifth yeare of Tiberius. But of this we will speake more hereafter, treating of the Writings of Seneca. Furthermore, the occasion why himselfe and his Brethren came out of SPAIN to ROME, was this. About the tenth yeare of the Reigne of Tiberius Empire, matters began to be troublesome in divers parts of the Dominion of ROME, by reason of the cruelties and infolencies of this Prince: who having about him Sejanus, and some other dangerous Counsellors, he shewed his disposition more then before. The sicknesse of the head floweth into all the principall members: so that the Provinces were left without Governours, or else were tyrannized by Prætors: whereupon followed great alterations. SPAIN amongst others, in many places lived as they listed: it was managed at that time by Exactors, which caused People to rebell and enter into Factions. It chanced amongst others, that L. Piso Prætor, was killed by a TERRESTIAN, because he carried himselfe tyrannously amongst the People. This TERRESTIAN being caught by the backe, and cruelly tortured, he shewed himselfe so stout notwithstanding, that they could not possibly make him confesse any of his Associates. But being quickly dispatched by the hands of the Hangman, who would have put him to a new torture, he knocked his head against a stone with such force, that he died presently in the Field. Shortly after the Cities began to be weary of their yoke, and CORDOVA specially amongst others, which being of the principallest and of great importance, an Army was sent thither under the conduct of Cneus Domitius Anobarbus, who having subdued CORDOVA, tooke amongst others Seneca, his two Brethren, and Lucan his Nephew, their Father being dead some yeares before. Domitius knowing what men they were, he set them at liberty, and did so much that he perswaded them to leave SPAIN and go to ROME, as well to continue and to advance their studies well begun, as to be knowne and honoured with publicke Office. Now the state of SPAIN was such at that time, that Seneca and his were easily perswaded and won by him that had Authority over them, and at the last they went into ITALY. Some thinke that Annas Mellæ remained still in SPAIN, being a man that loved to live privately, and that made no account of the honour and vanity of the World. For his Sonne Lucan, he was brought very young after his two Uncles, who did heare at ROME Pomponius Mævidius, Julius Higinus, Celsius and Africanus Gallus in Rhetoricke: and in Philosophy, Socio Alexandrinus, and Photinus a Stoicke, very famous. Under which they all profited, and Seneca specially, who joyning to the gravity of the Doctrine of the Stoickes, a compendious and sententious speech, in short time made himselfe to be knowne.

Caligula a contempter of Arts

Domitius in danger by his eloquentnesse.

Now having remained a space shut up in Schooles, or hidden in the company of some learned men, whom he hearkened unto, and familiarly frequented, he was put forward at the beginning of the Empire of Caligula, by Cneus Domitius (who had married Agrippina the Daughter of Germanicus, and little Daughter of Tiberius, of whom Nero was borne, nine Moneths before the death of Tiberius) and began to shew himselfe openly, pleading before the Senate with great grace: for from that time forth he was esteemed for one of the wisest and most eloquent men of ROME. By means whereof his credit increased from day to day. But as prickles be hidden under Roses, and where men thinke to win Honour, oftentimes they get repulse and contempt: the revolution of mens Affaires flourishing, yet marvellous brittle and subject to fall: So Seneca proved that his eloquence profited others more then himselfe: and that as sometimes it is a wiser paye to keepe the Sword in the scaberd, then in the hand: even so

The Emperour Caligula was a Prince that cared little for Liberrall Sciences, yet he was very curious to speake well, having words at commandement, and esteemed eloquent among others: specially if sometime he disposed himselfe to speake against any man, the words and whole sentences did increase in his mouth, with such an accent and gesture, that they heard him and knew him afar off, and sometimes he threatened men with the force of his tongue. This quicknesse and vaine eloquence of his, made him (besides that he had an ill shaped head) wonderfull presumptuous. For there was never a learned man and eloquent in all the ROMAN Empire, but he would prefer himselfe before him. And those that directly or indirectly went about to crosse him, they put themselves in manifest danger: witness that which happened to the Oratour Domitius Afer, and unto Seneca. Caligula bearing ill will a long time unto Domitius for some light flight he had unto him, Domitius was accused before the Senate: where Caligula made a long Oration written, and therein laid open all his sufficiency, to shew himselfe better able then Domitius, esteemed one of the best spoken men at that time. Now his purpose was to put Domitius to death, if he had studied to answer eloquently. But Domitius easily discovering this dangerous resolution, made no reply, nor excused himselfe, but said he was astonished at the Oration of the Emperour: and feigning that the babbling of Caligula had ravished him, he made a briefe repetition, as if he had come thither to hearken. Then having magnified his Discourses, and being commanded to defend himselfe, he began to lament, and to crave grace, and kneeling downe besought Caligula, being more afraid of his word then of his hand. Caligula wonderfull joyfull of this honour, and thinking to be Eloquence it selfe, received Domitius into grace. Seneca taking no heede otherwise to that matter, and having at that time the free spirit of the Stoickes, within few daies after he fell almost into the like perill or greater danger then Domitius: he knew that Caligula did beare him ill will, and did also speake evill of him amongst his friends: and did compare him in his talke to gravell or sand without lime, as if he would have said, that there was neither good band or consequence

in Seneca's Discourse. And to conclude, that he was but a jangler. But Seneca being carried away with the glory he had wonne, which pleased him well, continued notwithstanding to be in the Senate. Inomuch that one day having a Cause to pleade before Caligula, he behaved himselfe with such a grace and vehemency, that all that heard him esteemed him more then they did before, Caligula onely excepted: who being vexed, and as it were pierced through with eloquent words of Seneca, (he having in the meane time let fall no word to offend Caligula, but went on roundly with his matter) he was even at the point to put him to death, and then had executed his thought, had it not bene for a woman he kept, who perswaded him not to do it, assuring him that Seneca had a disease that would soone dispatch him out of the World. But after that, Seneca forbore, knowing with whom he had to deale. And soone after Caligula being slaine by Chærea, and Julius Sabinus his Uncle (Sonne of Drusus and of Livia) called Claudius, was chosen Emperour, at the beginning Seneca came againe into his former credit and fame, and continued it for some yeares: but at the last he was banished ROME for this cause. Claudius was a Prince of small judgement, and carried by certaine Minions and Parasites of the Court, and by his Wife Messalina, one of the most shamelesse women that ever was. This woman wholly possessing Claudius, caused men and women of all qualities to be put to death and banished, as the thought good: and those above all others that went about to hinder the course of her strange waies. Among others she did beare Julia the Daughter of Germanicus ill will (as Dion reporteth) because Julia did not regard nor flatter her. Furthermore Julia was a very faire Lady, which made Messalina jealous, who by little and little, found the means to accuse this Lady of many crimes, and specially of adultery: and made her be banished, then put to death immediately after. Seneca was carried away with this tempest, as culpable of the faults pretended against Julia. Some thinke that Julia is this Agrippina Mother of Nero, whom Claudius married after the death of Messalina, and that she was banished from the Court but for a time onely. The which is very likely, as also Cornelius Tacitus seemeth to incline to that opinion. But for Seneca, it is hot onely in one place, but in many, that Dion and others do accuse him, that he had bene somewhat bold with Agrippina, as if the credit he had in the House of the late deceased Cneus Domitius, had given him the boldnesse to defile the bed of his Benefactor, dead a little before Tiberius. Furthermore, he was banished into the Isle of CORSE, where he remained about two yeares: during which time he earnestly disposed himselfe to the study of Philosophy, with singular contentment and quietnesse of minde, as may be gathered out of the goodly Discourse he wrote, and sent unto his Mother Helbia, who did hardly beare this banishment of his. But he did comfort her, and by lively Reasons shewed her, that his entertainment was not grievous unto him, but that Philosophy had strengthened him after an excellent fashion, against all the assaults of Fortune. Whilest he was in this profitable solitarinesse, Messalina continued in her wantonnesse with such an impudent and hot fury, that without the testimony of so many worthy Historians, it were impossible to believe that the Wife of an Emperour durst once have thought to have committed the thousand part of the villanies unto the which she had given her selfe over to the sight and knowledge of all the World. Inomuch as in the end in the day time, within ROME, in presence of many persons of quality, and in the sight of all the People, Claudius being no further off then HOSTIA, the married with great pompe an Adulterer called Silius, a Gentleman of ROME, with all accustomed Ceremonies and Solemnities. She made a Feast, and held Silius for her Husband. Tacitus in his Annals reporteth these things at large. Now though Claudius was so foolish before, and then too, that he perceived not that which all others saw so openly: in the end being wakened by Narcissus one of his Minions, he put Silius to death, and some others culpable of this strange excess. And for Messalina, she had almost come againe into grace, but in the end she was killed by the commandement of Narcissus. After Messalina was executed, the three Minions of Claudius, to wit, Narcissus, Calistus, and Pallas, they layed their heads together to give their Master a Wife. But in the end Pallas, that pleaded for Agrippina the Widow of Cneus Domitius, little Daughter of Tiberius, the Daughter of Germanicus, and Niece of Claudius, carried it from them; the reasons he propounded had so much more force, being accompanied with dainty sugred words: who under the colour of a Kinwoman, came often to visit her Uncle, and she flattered him so bravely, that she being preferred before others, and not yet married, she did already use the authority and power of a Wife. And out of hand, immediately after the Marriage was solemnized with her Uncle Claudius, she advanced Domitius Nero her Sonne, and the Sonne of Cneus Domitius. Furthermore by her practises, Othavia the Daughter of Claudius, and of Messalina, betrothed unto Sillanus, was promised and afterwards given unto Nero for his Wife. Who being yet very young when his Mother married Claudius (and but eleven yeares old onely) it was in question to get him a good Master and Tutor to teach him his Booke betimes, and to traine him up in Affaires of Estate. Agrippina, a woman of a marvellous spirit, and that plotted great things, as the effect shewed afterwards, as Tacitus hath wisely noted: she resolved to have Seneca called backe againe, and immediately obtained his grace of the Emperour. She did this to divers ends, the one was to have a man of great authority and bringing up about her Sonne, to the end to maintaine Nero under the shadow of so great an appearance, untill the time of his advancement were come. The other, to make the remembrance of Messalina the more odious, who had bene the cause of the banishment of Seneca to put backe Britannicus, the Sonne of her, and Brother of Othavia, and by that means to have men at her commandement, little affected unto Claudius. So then Agrippina over-ruling Claudius at her pleasure, she did not onely obtaine the repeal;

covetous, so ambitious.

Immediately after he was arrived, Claudius received him graciously, made him a Senator, and installed him in his Charge. Afterwards being called into the Palace of the Emperor, Domitianus Nero is given him in charge, with great promises of Agrippina, who had two vices common to such persons. The one was, that she was set on fire with extreme covetousness to get Money, under colour that she layed a foundation in store to helpe to maintaine her Estate. The other, that she gave largely unto those whom she knew meete for the advancement of her Sonne, whom she would raise up to be Emperor whatsoever it cost her, yea were it her owne life: as appeared by her answer to a wife man whom she had asked what should become of the future Greatness of her Sonne Nero. For that he having answered her, that he might be Emperor, but it should be to her undoing: Let me die then, said she, so he may reigne. Tacitus writeth that Agrippina thought the People would rejoyce at the returne of Seneca, because of the great fame of his Knowledge: and also procured this good, to the end that the infancy of Domitianus might grow untill his adolescence under such a Master, and she to use his counsell, to attaine to the greatness of command which she hoped for. Seneca, instead of continuing in his solitarieffe, and not remembering that

Who entrest Tyrants House, doth become A Slave, though he thither a Freeman come.

He to the contrary, thinking he had found the meanes to shew the effects of a Philosopher (the wit of man, yea of the wisest, is so snared in darknesse upon darknesse, when there is question of the troubles of this life) went and engaged himselfe in the service of Agrippina. And although for a time he bridled the youth of Nero, and did withstand certaine disorders, yet in the end he was constrained to leave all, and suffer the fierce streame to run, having desired (but too late) solitarieffe: and with lesse Goods and Honours of the World, more Liberty, and quietnesse of minde. Now, as he himselfe knew very well, and did excellently teach it unto others, that so as Megrimms and paines in the head are not healed by a Crowne or Royall Band, neither to the contrary, is good health, nor the good state of a man lost, though he be not a great Lord: so this greatness in the which he saw himselfe highly lift up in a short time, did nothing else but increase his cares, wherewith he found himselfe bound, as with strong chaines to the end of his life. And though he did shake them, and at times had proved to breake them, yet he could not possibly unloose them: and in the end there was no way but he must perish under the weight

nesse brought

*Of masse chaines, that of no iron were,

in his youth.*

It is true, that at the first his Charge and Government seemed light unto him. For Nero was a young Prince of great hope, and in youth he shewed himselfe gentle, tractable, obeying his Schoolemasters instructions, who delighted to manure this Plant, hoping all the World should have joy of him. But as the Emperours that were before, even in their young age, had made some shew of that which might be expected of them in time to come: Seneca also perceived through the goodly appearance of his Scholar, some part of his wilde, naughty, and untoward nature, which he shewed within few years after. Also Cælius Domitianus his Father, as some came to gratifie him for that Agrippina his Wife had brought him a Sonne: he holding downe his head, answered, that they should not thinke that of him and of such a woman should be borne an infant, but to the ruine and confusion of the Empire. This Prediction was not noted, but when Agrippina her selfe felt by the losse of her life, what a childe she had brought into the World, and advanced by so many strange practises, and by the degrees of incest, of blood, and filthinesse, unto the Imperiall Dignity. Now whilest Seneca employed himselfe to polish the spirit of Nero, and sought to print in his heart the love of Vertue, Agrippina carefull of the worldly greatnesse of her Sonne, she followed her purpose, cunningly helping her selfe (as much as she thought fit, to serve her turne) with the counsell of Seneca, whom she acquainted not but with the least part of the corruption of her intentions: for she being a cruell woman, and that never received those into favour whom she hated, caused Lolia Paulina to be put to death, that had reasoned against her for the marriage of Claudius. She caused Calpurnia to be banished out of ITALY. And having through Pallas credit, who privately governed her, and also kept her, made her Sonne Nero to be adopted, who was preferred before Britannicus, the right Successor unto the Empire: to the end she would have her Power and Authority to be knowne to the Friends and Allies of the Empire, she caused a number of Souldiers of the old Bands and People to be carried to the place where she was borne, a Towne of the UBIANS, at this day called CULLEN, upon the Rheine. So that this City was afterwards, and is at this present called COLONIA AGRIPPINA. Afterwards, for a new testimony of this Authority, Caracallus King of ENGLAND, was led Prisoner unto ROME, and presented with his Wife and Brethren unto Claudius: who in presence of the People and of his Guards pardoned them. This King and his Traine went the same time before Agrippina (who was set upon a scaffold joyning unto that of her Husbands:) they did her reverence, and thanked her with the same praises they gave the Emperor. Which was found very strange and new, against the custome and fashion of the doing of the Ancients: to see a woman set amongst the Standards and Ensignes of the ROMANS. But she maintained that she was a companion of the Empire obtained by her Predecessors. Now those were but slight approaches in comparison of this that followeth. For having caused her her sonne to be declared to be of sufficient Age, in testimony whereof he tooke the Robe due unto those that were come to mans estate, and obtained that he might receive the Consulship at twenty years of Age: she made him have the power of Pro-consull out of the City, and the name of Prince of the youth. Besides all this, there was great largesse made unto the people in his name, and a summe of money given to every souldier. Also Nero himselfe passing to go to the Playes of Circus, went apparelled with an Imperiall Robe, and Britannicus as he was wont: who remembering so many outrages as they had done unto him, could not containe but must shew some discontentment. And this served Agrippina her intention: for she prevailed so much with Claudius, that she procured him to banish or put to death all the Governours of his sonne Britannicus. And worie yet: he committed him unto men suborned by Agrippina; who passing further yet, discharged Lucius Geta of his Captaineship of the Guard, Rafus Crispinus, servants of the house of Messalina, and placed in their roomes, Burrus Afranius, a man greatly esteemed for a Warriour, but who knew well enough by whose favour he was advanced. Such was the boldnesse of this Agrippina, a great Lady in truth (for she was the Daughter, Sister, Wife, and Mother of an Emperor) but of a spirit compounded of all sorts of mischiefs. We have touched these things passing by, upon the occasion of Seneca: who being occupied about his Pupil, was constrained to be partaker of many counsels, of the which he understood not the depth alwayes. But so it is, that Agrippina served her turne much by his authority, to advance her business: the which Seneca perceived well, but he could not remedy it, for he thought it of too late. Now touching Nero, although the free admonitions of his master were barres to keepe him in order, yet the corruptions of that time, and the working of his mother also, begonne by little and little to appeare in him: so that by time he made it manifest, that the good instructions had beaten his cares a little, and troubled his braine somewhat: but that evil had taken too deepe roote in his heart. Furthermore, whilest Nero remained so as under the rod, openly there could be noted in Agrippina nothing but severity and gravity, no insolencies in her house, otherwise then she thought might serve for the advancement of her affaires: for then, her selfe, as also all her traine, gave themselves over to all dissolution. Now after she had advanced a part of her intentions, Nero being sixteen years old, married Odravia the daughter of Claudius: and to shew that he had learned under Seneca, he pleaded many causes of importance unto the Senate, with the praise of all men. Immediately after, a matter happened, that compelled Agrippina to looke advisedly unto her affaires. Claudius having drunke well at a feast, let these words escape him, that his destiny was first to endure all the mischiefs of his wives, and afterwards to punish them. She being afraid to be prevented, determined to make haste, after she had first destroyed Lepida her Cozen Germane, Lepida made who wanne the heart of Nero by her kindnesse and liberality. These troubles of Agrippina gave away. Narcissus the alarme, and made him joyne with Britannicus. But in these stirres Claudius was poisoned by a woman, an Eunuke of his, and his Physician, practised of long time by Agrippina, who having disdained Britannicus and his sisters a long time, suddenly the Gates of the Palace were opened, and Nero accompanied with Burrus presented himselfe to the souldiers PRÆTORIANS, of whom being saluted Emperor, he was confirmed by decree of the Senate, and afterwards allowed by the Provinces. Then Nero made divers Orations penned by Seneca, who besides the contentment he had of the high dignity of his Pupil, wrote a pleasant discourse upon the death of Claudius, and did intitle it, Apocolokyntosis, that is to say, immortality gotten by Mushrommes: because the meate was sprinkled all over with Mushrommes; whereof Claudius was poisoned. The which Nero afterwards called the meate of the gods, seeing that by that meanes his Father in law was scraped out of the world, and made one of the gods after the fashion of the ROMANS. Also Gallio Senecaes brother gave Claudius a mocke, saying that he was drawne up to heaven with a hooke, slenting at the custome in practise at that time, to draw the bodies of malefactors put to death in prison, with an iron hooke into the River. Such was the end of Claudius, rewarded for his incest, and for the injury he did unto his sonne Britannicus, to advance a son in law, for to please an ambitious woman, to wit, Agrippina. Nero being thus raised up, his mother set upon Julius Silanus Pro-consul in ASIA, who was poisoned because she feared him, for Julius Silanus that being the last son of Augustus, the people did greatly honour him, and said he should be preferred before Nero. On the other side Narcissus was hastily compelled to die, although Nero was very angry withall. To be short, the knives were drawne, and this woman had shed much blood, if Burrus and Seneca had not beaten downe the blowes. They being Neroes Governours, and agreeing well together in this equall and common greatnesse, they had both alike power and authority, but by divers meanes, Burrus, he disposed of all matters military, and was a grave man, but had foure manners. Seneca with a pleasant and comely fashion taught this young Prince eloquence. They did carefully helpe one another, and often conferred together what meanes they should use to make Nero love Vertue, whereof he seemed to have great beginnings. To hold him in more easily, they let him have his owne will in exercises and honest pleasures, and left him to his disposition to do as he thought good. This young man from his infancy used his wit, which was quick to divers things, peradventure better for a man of some other quality; to wit: to grave, to paint, to sing, to play on the Citherne, to ride horses, and to make verses. That a Prince have all the parts in him, and be furnished with others, is not a thing in it selfe to be blamed, so that the principal do alwayes go before, and that nothing be forgotten requisite for discharge of his Government received of God. Otherwise, as he was justly reproved, that of a wise Physician was become an evil Poet: and sometime a great Lord was blamed for that he was too good a Musician; also it was said to a King, that would contest against a player on the Flute; that it was not his craft: so they may answer him that would describe the praises of a Prince: He was a good player at a Tennis, a cunning Workman, a brave Fencer, a fine Dancer, a great Talker: My faire friend, thou dost as if one being about to speak of a man and his contentment, came to tell us that he handleth his feete and his hands finely, and that he hath fine shooes on, and weareth his Hat gallantly: and thou forgett bodies without a soule, and men without vocation, and vocations ridiculous. Agrippina hearing one call the King of Persia, a great King: Why, said he, is he greater then my self, unless it be that he is juster then I am? Nothing surely maketh Kings and Princes truly great but justice. Other things how exact soever they are found, they shall oftentimes meete with more excellent in a poore crafts mans hand, hidden amongst the refuse of the people. The Prince therefore is not desirous of true honour, nor a man that deserveth praise, that is careful to cloath his body sumptuously, and that glorieth to be a Painter, a Graver, a cunning Workman, a Singer, a player at Tennis, a Hunter, a Dancer, and that his house be richly furnished with household stuffe, and himselfe daintily served: and all this while he giveth no order for his speech, his company, and conversation, that therein he be Graver and Wiser then a base and common person, making no account to have the Palace of his Soule Royally appparelled and set forth, as appertaineth to a royal magnificence. But how can a Prince be great, what power of authority soever he have, if he be given to vile things: unworthy of his true greatnesse? and worse then that, if he joyne vice unto these ridiculous things in him? Away with this trash, and take vertue from a great man in the world, you shall see him little in all other things. Little in his gifts and presents: because he will not, or knoweth not how to dispose them. Little in paines, because of his delicatenesse: little towards God, because of his superstition: little unto the good, because of his envy: little unto men, because of his cowardlinesse: little among women, because he is subiect unto voluptuousnesse. For like as evil Workmen, which set up little statues upon great and large bases, do by measure shew the smallnesse of their statues: even so when Fortune lieth up to high estate a man of a weake and little heart, where he is to be seene of all the world; and in the place of the Robe and Staffe of Justice, he is seen appparelled like a crafts man, or an enterlude player: the doth discover, defcry, and dishonour him, making it appeare how he reeleth and stumblith for his lightnesse. Let this be spoken to the purpose of Neroes pastimes, who shortly after left all such Comedies, to play terrible Tragedies. And for his small pleasures, although at the first Burrus and Seneca were weary that this young Prince lived modestly enough: yet we must confesse that some time they gave him liberty to entertaine women, which the estate of his Court of Rome did offer him at pleasure. But that which most troubled them, was the boldnesse of Agrippina: who being set on fire with all the passions that may be found in a wicked Governement, had neare about her Palace an arrogant man, and that having forgotten with what condition he came to mount so high, braved all the world, and Nero himselfe: who notwithstanding his youth, did very impatiently beare the infolency of this Minion. And yet he bare it, because he would not anger his mother, to whom he spared no reverence, honour, and kindness amongst his Lords: also he called her his good mother, even to give this name otherwise for a watch-word unto the Capitaine. In these beginnings Nero made many goodly and well penned Orations, after the manner of Seneca, who had a gentle spirit, and meete for the cares of the time. These exercises fashioned Nero, kept under his wilde nature, and framed it to the affaires of estate: in such sort, that the first five years of his Empire, he was so finely handled by Seneca, seconded with Burrus, that the affaires of peace and warre prospered, every man having great hope of Nero, who shewed himselfe lowly, and given to vertue. Seneca reporteth wondrous in his booke he did dedicate unto him, where he treated of clemency, singularly of this gentlenesse of his. For at the beginning of the second booke he saith, that Burrus desirous to hang two Theeves, sued to the Emperour to set to his hand, against whom, and for what causes this execution should be done. This being put off divers times, Burrus solicited the dispatch, and being angry, presented the paper unto Nero: who with a discontented countenance, and doing it as against his will, he cried out: By my will, I would I could neither write nor reade. See to what end the instructions of Seneca served: where I will tell you another story, although it chanced a long time after the first, to shew the credite of the master towards his Scholar. Nero having made a pavillion with eight panes wonderfull sumptuous, Seneca told him: Thou hast shewed thy selfe in this pavillion that thou art poore: For if thou lose it, thou shalt never have the like againe. As it came to passe: for the ship wherein his pavillion was, was cast away; and Nero remembering Seneca's words, did bear the losse of it more patiently. Furthermore Seneca accompanied Nero in the assemblies of Councell, and oftentimes told him in the field what he should do, according to the occurrences: and in divers Orations he procured that Nero made protestation of his gentlenesse before the Senate. The which turned to the praise of Seneca, in such sort notwithstanding that the people perceived it, and rejoiced at it. So they report that the Emperour Trajan was wont to say, that all the other Princes were farre from the first five years of the Empire of Nero: as Tacitus and others do testifie. In the mean time Nero shewed himselfe very liberal unto Seneca, and did esteem him as much, or more, then any man in Rome at that time: for he made him a present of great summes of money, unto three thousand Sesterium, which some thinke do amount unto seven millions and fifty thousand Crownes; of the which, part of it yielded him him great profit at usury: the other part was bestowed upon sumptuous Gardens, houses of pleasure, lands and possessions far off and near Rome: and furthermore a Palace in the City, full of all sorts of precious moveables. For all this Seneca waxed nothing the prouder, but fearing fortune, and remembering his old state and condition, sought to keep himselfe upright in the middle of the great combats which were like to come, having upon his armes the unconfort youth of Nero, the which in sight began to run to his destruction: on the other side, the ambition of Agrippina to fight with all and beat down: this woman being of such a spirit, that she could tarry in no place, but set her self and others on worke. But this credite of Burrus and Seneca, and their great riches also, especially of Seneca, made them to be envied of many, that did blame and accuse them openly. Whereupon Seneca opposed the gravity of his manners, and sought by divers writings to strengthen himself more and more: as some of his works, especially the discourse of a happy life, seemeth to be done by him during these alarmes.

Now the beginning of these griefes of Seneca, came partly for that he perceived Nero's minde so corrupted, that he began to be very dissolute: and partly also for that he discovered that Agrippina and her Minions would set upon him and Burrus also, which with time would bring them into many dangers. And though for his owne part he was resolute against all accidents, nevertheless the charge and care he had of the affaires of the Empire, and the love which he bare unto Nero his Scholar, troubled him exceedingly. Nevertheless as hope entertaineth us in all dangers, attending better, he determined to keepe himselfe upright as long as he could possible, and to expect some other issue in the affaires. Nero was enamoured on a bond-woman called Acte, which his familiars did endure, alledging they must suffer one evil, for feare a worse should happen: and that so long as he should satisfie himselfe with her, he should not runne after the Ladies of Rome. But Agrippina that could not beare with this infolency, beganne to take up her Sonne roundly, thinking she could by her magistrality remedy this well enough. To the contrary, this was to kindle the fire, and to embrace it altogether in this Gille. Nero being waxen great, and counsell'd by Otho and Claudius Senecio, who made the messages of Love, he snuffed at these reprehensions, and beganne to despise his mother, who on the suddain came to change her subtilties. And she had not been so sharpe before in rebuking, but she was now as gentle in yielding, and offered her closet to her sonne for the accomplishing of his desires. This suddaine change made Nero and his Minions thinke much of it, inso much as they prayed him to beware of the deceits of this woman, that practised in her heart some villany, Nero counterminding her; presenteth his mother with many rich jewels and apparell of great price. But she being suspicious as could be possible, gave them injurious words that brought them. Wherewith Nero being offended, and knowing that Pallas was the chiefe counsellor of Agrippina, tooke his offices from him; which were committed to him by the Emperour Claudius. Agrippina began then to diminish in reputation, and to slee off the hookes: and coming to Nero himselfe, threatned him to take his Empire from him, and to establish Britannicus, the lawfull successeur of Claudius: and hereupon detested in expresse tearmes the wickednesse she had committed, to bring up a sonne that was so unthankfull unto her: adding moreover, that she would go finde out the Armies with Britannicus, so long as they could flee on the other side, this baggage fellow Burrus, and this banished pedanticall companion Seneca (so did she qualifie him) barking after the government of the world. These threatnings were accompanied with such strange countenances and imprecations, that they troubled Nero; besides that Britannicus came now to be fourteen years old: and that one day playing, he could say aloud before Nero himselfe, that they had taken his Empire from him. Shortly after Britannicus was poisoned, and died suddenly, to the great astonishment of Agrippina and of Octavia also. Afterwards, Nero desired to converse so privately with his mother as he did at other times: and began to give ear unto her that would set them further at odds: so that a certaine foole, called Paris, having told Nero one night that Agrippina conspired against him, he was resolved to make his mother to be put to death, and to take from Burrus the charge of Capitaine of the Guards. But Seneca kept him from that, and after some reasons passed between them, Burrus being sent for, to put Nero by his choler, he besought him to let him have the charge of this businesse, assuring him that he would put Agrippina to death, if she were convinced of any villany. Notwithstanding that every body should be heard speake in their defence, and above all, a mother: adding also that the accusers were not present, and that there was but one accuser suspected. And that he could not justifie, that such an important deliberation should be made by night, and at the Table: and that all that would shew his rashnesse and folly more then any other thing. Nero being somewhat pacified, they tarried till day, that they might go to the mother, to know how these accusations fell out. Burrus was there by expresse Commission with Seneca, and some others, to marke what should be said. But Agrippina could so well justifie her selfe, that her accusers were punished: for one of them was put to death, and the rest banished. From that time forward Nero beganne to runne riot, as is described by Suetonius, Tacitus and Dion. But the beginning of new and horrible miseries (the other that went before being but light in respect of them) was the falling in love with Sabina Popea, the wife of Otho, who had taken her away from her first husband Rufus Crispinus, a Knight of Rome. Nero did the like unto this Otho, and tooke from him this Minx that knew the trickes of the occupation. She having gained Nero in a little space, prevailed so much with him, that he determined to put his mother Agrippina to death.

Who hearing of the ill will her Sonnedid beare her, fought by all meanes to get into his favour againe: even to present her selfe so shamefully unto him, that I shame to be the reporter of that which the Historians speake of her. This notwithstanding he preserved in his determination, and commanded Anicetus General of the Gallies of Misene, to see her drowned: the which was executed in some sort, yet Agrippina for that time escaped being hurt, and got to a house of pleasure of hers. Nero hearing these newes, more dead then alive, thinking he was undone, sent presently for Burrus and Seneca to have their advice: and we cannot tell (saith Tacitus) whether they were of counsell and privy to this fact, or not. Both of them therefore were a great while and spake not a word, being afraid they should lose time, if they should go about to dissuade Nero from that which he was purposed to redouble upon her: and they knew well that the day was come, that Nero must needs die, if Agrippina were not prevented. Seneca, who untill this present time was ever ready to speake, looked upon Burrus, as to know of him if he thought good to command the men of warre to do this murder. Burrus answered, that the Pretorian souldiers were so affectioned to the house of the Cæsars, and did so much reverence the memory of Germanicus, that they would never enterprise any thing against the life of his children: and that Anicetus was to performe his promise, Who without any further thought, demanded and excepted the Commission, which was forthwith executed, and Agrippina put to death in her house; where she thrusting out her body to the Centener, who tooke his sword in his hand to kill her, she crieth out: Ventre miseri, desiring that the wombe which had borne such a fruite as Nero, should be first stricken, and runne through. Nero defiled with this execrable murder, added thereto other infinite abominations, especially the putting away and doing his wife Octavia to death, a vertuous Princeesse, and that deserved better. Now this is enough that we have touched these things by the way, because they specially concerne the life of Nero, who payed his master with an evill reward, entangling him in such wicked counsells. On the other side also it cannot be denied, that Burrus and Seneca yielded too much to the cruell will of this Paricide. And as for the extremity they feared, there were meanes enough to have holpen it: and we must never do evill, that good may come of it. And what good could come of such an execrable abomination? For though Agrippina deserved such a cruell punishment, for so many wicked deeds as she had done, yet should not her Son have had his hand in it; and his counsellors should not have consented unto it, nor Anicetus have executed it. As all were much to be blamed for this deed, yet some more then other; so they had all their turne, as Tacitus and Suetonius do shew particularly.

Burrus dislodged the first, and as least to be blamed for so many disorders, he was spared, in that he saw not the other incredible confusions that fell out afterwards. His throat swelling within, by little and little, he died, his pipes being stopped that he could fetch no wind. Many affirmed, saith Tacitus, that by the commandement of Nero, making as though they would helpe him, the palate of his mouth was rubbed with poison and that Burrus perceived that wickednesse, and when Nero came to see him, he would not vouchsafe to looke on him, but turned on the other side. And Nero asking him how he did, he answered onely, I am well. This man was wonderfully lamented of the ROMANES, because of his vertue, and of the foolishnesse of one of his successours, and of the notable villanies of the other called Tigellinus, who was the utter ruine of Nero. The death of Burrus much impaired the power and authority of Seneca: for that the meanes to do good were weake, as having lost the halfe part of their life: and because that Nero inclined unto those which held him up in his wickednesse, against the which Seneca opposed himselfe as time and occasion would suffer him. But his enemies having the Princes eare, they failed not to set upon this honourable person, because of his age and the services he had done to Nero. They did falsly accuse him, saith Tacitus, for that he having great riches, and more then was fit for a private man, he did still increase them, and grew greater: and besides did gaine and draw the good will of the people too much unto him. That he had goodlier gardens and more sumptuous houses of pleasure, then the Emperor himselfe. Furthermore, that he imputed all the honour to himselfe for knowing how to speake excellently well: and that he made verses oftner then he was wont, after that he perceived Nero tooke pleasure to make them himselfe. That flatly condemning Nero his exercises, he mocked him, seeing him ride and mannage horses, and laughed at him hearing him sing. And all this was but to make men believe that nothing was well done in the affaires of the estate, that proceeded not from his invention. Now that Nero was come out of his infancy, and in the flower of his youth, that he should leave his master, considering that his ancefours should serve him well enough for great and good tutors: Seneca understanding by the report of those that yet somewhat regarded vertue and honour, how these lewd incensers did accuse him, perceiving also that Nero withdrew himselfe more and more from his familiarity, which he had shewed in times past, he besought him to heare him, the which having obtained, he said thus unto him, My Lord, it is now fourteen yeeres since I was first called to accompany the great hope that was had of your infancy, and eight eight yeeres since you have been Emperor: during which time you have heaped so much goods and honour upon me, that nothing wanteth to my felicity, but to know how to use them well. To this purpose I will lay before you notable examples practised by men of your quality, not of mine. Augustus great father of your grandfathers father, licenced M. Agrippa to withdraw himselfe unto MYTILENE, to lead a private life: and to C. Mæcenus to live at his ease within ROMA it selfe, as in some pleasant remote place farther off. The one of them had accompanied him in his Warres, and the other having been beaten and tormented with great Tempests in ROMA, had been both, to speake the truth, amply recompenced, as also the great service they had done well deserved it. As for my selfe, I brought nothing that deserved you should be so noble and liberrall unto me, but onely my Studies aourished (if I may be so bold to speake it) in the shadow, and covertly, from whence notwithstanding all my reputation is proceeded, for as much as it seemeth I have been in your Apprentiships: which truly is to me a great reward and rich recompence. But besides all this, you have infinitely favoured me, and presented me with innumerable Goods. Insomuch that I often reason thus with my selfe: It is possible, that I that am but of a simple House of Knights (also dwelling without ROMA) should hold the place of one of the chiefeft Lords of ROMA? and amongst the most Noble, and those that are noted to be of so great Antiquity; that a new come man as my selfe, hath dared to shew himselfe in place? Where is that Spirit that contented it selfe with Mediocrity? What meaneth he to have so fine and goodly Gardens? What? he walketh by such and such Houses of Pleasures, neare unto the City. His Lands and Possessions are of so great an extent, and his Money bringeth him in such a commodity many waies, that he is full to the throate. For the which there is nothing to be offered, but a defence for my selfe: That I could not refuse your Presents. Now we have, both the one and the other, performed our duty: you, in giving so much as a Prince could give to him that he loveth, and I, in receiving that which a man in great favour might have and take of his Prince. As for my Honours and Estates, envy looketh awry upon me: howbeit (as all other things of the World) she is under the feet of your greatnesse. Yet in the mean time she lighteth upon me, and therefore I have need of helpe. And as in Warre, or otherwise in travelling abroad, if I were weary I would require rest: so finding my selfe in the Travell of this Life now old, and very unmeet for the least Office, since I can no longer support the burthen of my Riches, I do desire to be discharged. Command therefore that your Receivers henceforth do take them and put them into your Treasure. I shall not therefore become poore, but when I shall be rid of those things which blind fold me with their brightnesse, I shall bestow my time in study, which I was wont to employ in my Gardens and Possessions. You are young and lusty, and time hath established you in the greatnesse of your Estate: but we that are your ancient Servants have leave as it were to repose our selves. It shall be also a great honour for you to have raised those to great Office, to whom meane things had sufficed. Unto this Nero made answer, in manner as followeth: For that on the suddain I do answer your premeditate Oration, it is because I have learned it of you, that have taught me how I should deale, not onely in things seene farre off, but also in those which are presented upon the suddain unto me. Augustus my Grand-father suffered Agrippa and Mæcenus to repose themselves after their Travels: but it was in such an age, that his authority might maintaine that, and any thing else by him granted: and yet he did not take from the one nor the other any goods that he had given unto them. They got it in the Warres, and with danger of their lives: For Augustus spent his youth in Wars: I doe assure my selfe that your armes nor hands would have failed me; if I had gone to the Warres: but as the Estate of my affaires did beare, you have by reason, by counsell, and by instructions raised up my infaney and youth. So will I remember all the daies of my life the good service I have received at your hands. That which you hold of me, your Gardens, Money in banke, Houses in the Countrey abroad, all that is subject unto divers Accidents. And though all together seeme much, yet is it so, that many farre short of your deserts have possessed more. I am ashamed to name bondmen made free, whom men see richer then you: and the cause that maketh me ashamed is, that you whom I should cherish above all others, doe not passe them in Riches and humane greatnesse. Furthermore, you are yet in good age, to governe your Lands and Revenues, and we doe but now enter into managing the affaires of the Empire: but it may be that you esteeme your selfe lesse then Vitellius, three times Consul: and commend Claudius above me, as if I could not by my liberality give you as much goods as Volusius by long sparing hath gotten. Moreover, if our slipperly and unconstant youth sway on one side more then it ought, you reforme it, guiding by your aide and vigilancy that small direction we have. If you bring your Money into my Coffers, if you forsake the Prince, they will not say it is because you are content with little, and seeke your ease: but their talke shall be none other, but of my covetousnesse, and my cruelty. And although they should much praise your moderation in this action, yet it becometh not an old man to seeke honour by doing any thing that should dishonour his friend. Nero added to this fine speech, many embracements and kisses, being made by nature, and brought by custome to cover his malice with false and counterfeit kindnesse. Seneca (as it is the conclusion of a speech holden with him that commandeth) thanked him: yet he immediately changed his accustomed manner he was wont to use during his former greatnesse: gave them leave to depart that came every morning in Troopes to salute him: turned away from others that offered to follow and accompany him: very seldome times he went into the City, and stirred not out of his house, as if he had been sicke, or troubled after his study of Philosophy. This was the talke betwixt Nero and Seneca, who having leisure to bethinke himselfe better of the answer of Nero, knew very well that his fortune was changed, and that the Disciple was become the Master: yea and that so much more dangerous, for that his cruell courage was wrapped up in so gracious words and countenances, the which a man was constrained to trust; or at the least to make shew of it.

after. He counterfeited the Player, always intermixing some new variety with his pastimes.
Afterwards he being present at a Banquet made by Tigellinus, in the which were committed all sorts of villainies, and he himself being defiled with naturall and unnaturall whoredomes and abominations, within few daies after (a matter incredible, if so many grave Historians, amongst others Tacitus did not assure us of it) he married one Pythagoras, as his Husband, which was of the company of these Villains, and was solemnly married according to the Custome of other Marriages. The yellow Veile of the married couple covered Neroes head. Soothsayers were sent for, the Joynter was assigned, the Bed of the Spouse prepared, the wedding Torches were lighted: and to be short, they saw that openly which the night hideth, when the question of Marriage is in hand with a Woman. Thirdly he set fire on a great number of houses in ROME, so as the most part were burnt.
And to cleare himselfe of this wickednesse, he falsly laied it upon the Christians, (being a great number at that time in ROME) that they were the authour of this disorder: inasmuch that they were set upon with a strange cruelty. And yet as they put them to death, they did a thousand mockeries unto them, putting Beasts Skins upon them to be torne in pieces with Dogges, or else they were hanged upon the Crosse, or burnt with a little fire: their Wood-houses, or Stacks of Wood served to give light in the night. Now though the People of ROME were bloudily bent against these innocents, yet there were many that had pity of them, seeing honest men tormented, to satisfie the cruell infolency of Nero: who appparelled like a Coach-man, and driving the Horse himselfe in the midst of these confusions, made the People pastime. Besides all this he forraged and ranfacked all ITALIE with Impositions and excessive Lones, ruining the Towns, and not sparing also the Temples of ROME, of ASIA, nor of GREECE. It was given out abroad, saith Tacitus, that Seneca (whom Nero went oftentimes to visite, to keepe him in breath, and gently to lull him asleepe) to avoide the suspition that he had been of counsell in this sacrilege, had asked leave to go to some House of his farre into the Countrey. Which being denied him, he kept his Camber fasting to be sicke of the Goute. Some have writtten that a bondman of his enfranchised, called Cleonicus, did prepare to poyson him by the commandement of Nero: the which he avoided upon warning given him by him, or for that he feared such a thing, living meanely, eating such Fruits as were brought him out of the Countrey, and being contented to drinke cleare running Water if he were athirst. Such detestable wickednesse of Nero having of long time offended many honourable Persons, which could no longer endure such a Master, they resolved to set themselves at liberty, and conspired to kill him one day, when they saw opportunity. The day being come, one called Millicus, an enfranchised bondman of one of the principall Conspiratours, went to discover to Nero what they had comploted against him. This gave a strange Alarme unto the Emperour, who caused them to lay hands of one and other, amongst which number there was Lucan the Nephew of Seneca, that was a party in this conspiracy, for anger against Nero: who was the cause that his Verses were not had in that estimation they deserved, and commanded him not to publish them, thinking (but in vaine) that he could make as good. From that time forth they could see nothing in ROME but imprisoning of men of quality, and preparation for execution which followed.

Pompeia Paulina the Wife of Seneca.

Seneca, that stirred not out of the Countrey, was not forgotten of Popaea, nor of Tigellinus, which were the secret counsellors of Nero in his cruelties. And Nero also failed not to take hold of this occasion to make away his Schoole-master, whose shadow did torment him. It was not for that Seneca was partaker of the counsell with the Conspiratours, but Nero was glad to finde the meane to dispatch him with a Sword, since he could not do it by poyson. For one of the Conspiratours called Natalis (whom Nero had pardoned) said nothing else of him, but that he was sent to visite Seneca being sicke, and to complaine because he thought not good that Piso (being the head of this enterprise, and should be created Emperour after the murder of Nero) should come to see him, and that he would confirme their friendship, frequenting familiarly together: but that Seneca had answered, that their talke and meeting would neither be profitable for the one, nor for the other: and moreover, that his life depended upon that of Piso. Gravins Silvianus Captaine of a Band of Guards, was commanded to go to Seneca, to know if he would take any knowledge to have spoken the words confessed by Natalis, and the answer that he made at that time. By chance, or witting-ly, Seneca was come home that very day, and remained in a house of his two small Miles from ROME.
The Captaine came thither about night, and placed his Souldiers round about the house: and afterwards came in, and found Seneca at supper with his Wife Pompeia Paulina, and two of his friends.
So having delivered his message unto him, Seneca answered straight being nothing moved; that Natalis was indeed sent unto him to complaine in the Name of Piso. For that Seneca would not suffer him to come and see him: and that for his sake, he did excuse himselfe as well by reason of his sick-nesse, as for the desire he had to take his ease. And for those words: that his life depended upon that of Piso, he said he had no occasion to preferre the preservation of another private mans life before his own. And that furthermore, he gave not his minde to flatteries, whereof he would have no better testimony then Nero himselfe, who had oftner known that Seneca was a Free-man, then a Slave or a Bondman. Silvanus returned unto Nero, and made report in the presence of Popaea and Tigelli-

Tigellinus, who were very desirous to hear his answer: which being heard, Nero asked him, if Seneca made any show to be willing to die. The Captaine assured him that he perceived no signe of fearre nor of sorrow, in the words, nor countenance of Seneca. Thereupon Nero commanded this Captaine to returne to Seneca againe, and to command him to die. (Some thinke that this Executioner returned in that way he was come, but went another way, to finde out Femius Captaine of the Guards, whom after he had acquainted with Neroes commandement, he asked him if he would execute this Commission. Femius that was of the number of the Conspiratours, nevertheless advised him to obey the Emperours commandement, by a fatal cowardinesse of as many as were of them. For Silvanus that had this commission to go to Seneca, was also one of the conspiracy, and yet his hand was ready to increase the wickednesse of Nero, of the which before he was desirous and protured to see the punishment. To hide his offence in some sort, he would not, or durst not returne into the presence of Seneca, nor speake to him: but made one of his Centeniers go into the house to declare the Emperours commandement, which was, that Seneca must die. At that time it was halfe a favour unto those that were condemned to lose their lives, to suffer them to be put to death, either by themselves, or by any of their acquaintance: which was done in divers sorts. Some pricked their Veines, and let themselves blood, and then went into a hot-house where they ended. Others swallowed down poyson: Others stabbed themselves in with their Daggers, or their Swords. It is judged this was done: that they should not fall into the hands of the Hang-man: for when it happened so, the bodies of the condemned were not buried and their Goods were forfeited: whereas if they put themselves to death (of the which the most part following the Doctrine of the STOICKS were nothing afraid) their bodies should be buried, and their Wills and Testaments good. Sometimes this choice did cut off the griefs of a more ignominious and cruell punishment.

Now to returne to Seneca. Having heard the Message of the Centener, without changing countenance, and wholly resolved, he called for his Book of Tables, in the which was writtten his will:
which being denied him by the Centener, turning to his friends, he protested, that since he was let to acknowledge their merits, that he would leave one onely thing (and notwithstanding the best) yet his, to wit, the Image of the example of his life, the which if they remembered, they would carry a commendable reputation of honest and vertuous men, for a worthy reward of so constant a friendship. And seeing them weepe, he sought to appease them, or to stay their teares, now with sweet words, by and by with vehemency, as if he would have reproved them. To conclude, he did encourage them to re-maine firme and constant, asking them where was the resolution they had learned so many yeares in the Schooles and Studies of Philofophy, against all the chances of the world. He added further, that every one knew well what Nero was, what cruelties he had committed: and after that he had so wickedly behaved himselfe to his Father-in-law, to his Mother, to his Brother, and to his Wife, there was nothing left behind for the accomplishment of his cruelties, but to adde to the murder of his Schoolemaster. After he had discoursed such or the like words before them all, and as in generally, he embraced his Wife, and having a little emboldened her against this blow, he instantly prayed her to moderate her griefe, and exhorted her to remember how vertuously he had passed his life, and gently to beare (and with a heart worthy her selfe) the sorrow of the death of her Husband. She for her part assured him that she was resolved to die, and bad one of them give her the blow. Then Seneca, not to deprive himselfe of that honour, and being touched with the love he did beare her, was contented not to leave to the mercy of the dissolution that then reigned, her whom he had most dearly loved. I did set before you (said he) the sweetnesse of life: but since your selfe have chosen rather an honourable death, for my part, I shall not be sorry if you shew me the way. Let the constancy therefore of so couragious a death as ours, be alike to us both: although the end of your life shall be more famous. Immediately thereupon, they caused the Veines of their armes to be opened: but because that Seneca had an old body, and thin by eating little, there would no blood come out but drop by drop, he made the Veines of his legges and hams to be cut. Then weary of such a cruell butchery, being afraid that his paines would make his Wives heart faile her, or that he himselfe should grow impatient for so many torments as he endured; he perswaded her to withdraw herselfe into another Chamber: and for himselfe, having to his last gaspe his words at commandement, he caused his Secretaries that were wont to write under him, to come unto him, and told them there many notable things in fine termes, the which were published after his death: but time hath taken them from us for want of Story-writers: although some thinke that that might be kept as well as other Writings of Seneca. Others carrying some envy to the Vertue of this man, have kept it backe, being loath that the Posterity should enjoy a Table, where the Village of Seneca might be better knowne, then in other places of his Workes. Nero that had men coming and going every minute of an house from Seneca's house to ROME, understanding how every thing passed, and bearing no particular hatred to Paulina, fearing also he should increase the blame of his cruelty:
he commanded they should keepe Paulina from dying. Wherefore his Slaves and freed bond-men, warned by the Souldiers themselves, bound up her armes, and staunched the blood, not knowing whether she felt any thing or not. For as there are alwaies among the People that take things at the worst, there wanted not men which thought that so long as Paulina stood in feare of Neroes anger, she desired to have the report that she was a companion of the death of her Husband. But afterwards when there was a better hope offered her, she was contented to be won with the flatteries of life, unto the which she added some few yeares with commendable memory, and sorrow

sorrow for her Husband: being otherwise so pale of countenance, that she shewed to have lost a great deale of bloud and her strength. On the other side Seneca seeing his death prolonged, he prayed Statius Annuus (whom he esteemed much for his faithfull friendship he had borne him a long time, and for his skill in Physicke) to bring him of the like poyson to that which they keepe by publique Ordinance in ATHENS to put offenders to death, whereof he had of long time made provision. So when it was brought him, he swallowed it downe without regard, his members being cold, and his body constant against the force of the Poyson. In the end, he entred into a bathing Tub of HORWATER, with the which sprinkling his slaves that were about him, he added to it, that he offered this liquor unto Aspiter the deliverer. After that being carried into a Stove, and having through the heate thereof yeelded up the ghost, his body was buried without any solemnity of Obsequies. He had so appointed by his Will made at that time when he was very rich, and of great credit. It was reported that Subrinus Flavimus one of the chiefest Conspiratours, had secretly determined with the Centeniers (yet not without the privy of Seneca) that after they had killed Nero by the means of Piso, they should also dispatch Piso himselfe, to the end to make Seneca Emperour, as an honest man, onely elect and chosen to that greatnesse for the fame of his Vertues. Such was the end of Seneca, that had lived in honourable and publique charges, of Prator, Questor and Consul under two Emperours, and was long in credit with the last: who seeing himselfe covertly despised of his Master, that could no longer endure such wickednesse, sought the occasion before mentioned, but with extreme injustice, to rid him out of the way. Furthermore, Dion thinketh that Seneca's two Brethren were likewise put to death. But because he is contented to touch it but in a Line, and that which Tacitus saith is to be marked, set downe in particular, and with most likely circumstances: we will speake one word more. Shortly after the death of Seneca, he commanded they should put Annius Lucanus to death, the Sonne of Mela: who feeling his feet and his hands cold whilst the bloud ranne downe, and that by little and little his spirit parted from the extremities of his body, his heart being yet lively, and his understanding good, calling certaine Verses of Poetry to minde, in the which was presented a Souldier hurt, dying of the same death, he recited the same Verses, which were the last words he spake. Alitius Lucanus Mother was left alive, neither being pardoned nor punished. For Junius Gallio, who was a Senator, was so astonished at the death of his Brother, that before all the Senate he fell downe at Nero's feet, beseeching him to give him his life. Whereupon another Senator called Alitius Clemens, set upon him with injurious words, calling him Traitor and parricide. But the other Senators with own consent made Clemens hold his peace, telling him that he should not seeke common adversities for to revenge his private quarrell, or to draw on the Prince to a new cruelty, who had now by his clemency quieted and forgotten all. Within a few moneths after Annius Mela was dispatched: he was a Knight of ROME, but of the Dignity of a Senator. And although Seneca and Gallio his Brethren were advanced to greater honour, yet he would never purchase it by extremity of ambition: but being come out of SPAINA to ROME, more for the love of his Brethren and of his Sonne then for himselfe, he was contented to have this honour, that a Knight was ever equal in power and credit with a Consul. The Name of his Sonne Lucanus greatly esteemed of every body, and specially of Learned-men, had gotten him great reputation. Immediately after his Sonnes death, he seeking somewhat too eagerly after his Sonnes goods, raised against him an Accuser called Fabius Romanus, one of Lucanus chiefest friends. This man shewed counterfeit Letters as done by Lucanus, which charged Mela that he was partaker with his Son of the complor against Nero. Though this Accusation was utterly false and fained, yet Nero that thirsted after the riches of Mela, commanded those Letters should be carried to Mela: that was as much to say, he must die. The which Mela knowing well enough, made his Veines to be opened, and followed the way of others. Seneca in his Writings yeeldeth great testimony of the constancy and Vertue of his Brethren: and I thinke he was a man that was not given to speak lightly. Notwithstanding, I have simply recited that which Tacitus saith, who sufficiently sheweth in the example of divers others that it is not to be marvelled at if the cruelties of Nero, who lesse spared the great then the small, made the boldest hearts of them all quake sometimes.

The Philosophy and Writings of Seneca.

Seneca's life and death declare him to have been a Philosopher
in deed.

Now there remaineth to tell you something of the Philosophy and Writings of Seneca: for it is in those Tables that we must looke to see him lively, and speaking with that selfe vehemency of spirit that followed him even to the last gaspe of his life. It is true that the insolencies of Nero had oftentimes as it were stopped his mouth, and hindered that good Soule to give free passage to his discourses, yea and in some places they made him stumble. Yet he called himselfe backe againe to his first thoughts, and remained constant in the midst of the cruell raging stormes of his time. Now as it is easie for men that be on the Land where they do idly behold some Master Pilot striving with the force and fury of the winde and billowes, to say: That man there should guide his Ship after another fashion: who if they were in his place, should without all comparison finde themselves more troubled, or at the least would make a sorrowfull wracke. Even so it hapneth, that Seneca's Philosophy is despised of many, that thinke he could speake Philosophy but by his Booke, and that when he should come to shew it in deed, men would say he doth like the Masters of Fence, who being in a Schoole of Fence, with young Youths, they do wonders, and give mortall Vennies at pleasure: but if they come to any private Fight at the Sharpe, where it standeth them upon for their lives, as soone as they see the glittering of the naked Sword, you may perceive all their flourishes and trickes are gone, or changed into flat running away. I will say at one word, that I thinke Seneca as much and more a Philosopher in in deed then in name. His life and his death can say it, and in the last Chapter hereafter we must speake more at large. For this present let us a little consider his tongue. Life is a sweet thing, and all desire to live, yea the beasts themselves seem to have a singular contentment, for that they have a being and life. If life be a pleasant thing, yet it is much more pleasing and acceptable when it is well governed, and tendeth to a good end. So then a quiet and contented life is much better, sweeter, and more excellent, then a life full of troubles and passions. This quietnesse is none other but felicity and good fortune. Furthermore, all men do not aspire to this end, but onely wise men, and the true friends of widome. For the most part of men whom the earth sustaineth, do runne a strange course when they should set a foote forward to betake them to some course of life: and all in manner erre, when they should Judge what happy life is. Those that delight in money and to gaine, seeke felicity in riches. The idle and slouthful thinke, that to make great cheere, to live (as the say) in the shadow of Tables, of Pots, of Curtaines, and at the ease of their bodies, is the onely soveraigne good. There are another sort of men greedy of worldly honour, which establish an unspeakable happinesse to command many (in what manner, or how deare soever it be) taking themselves to be halfe gods, if they may see many men, or two or three go under their feet. But wise men establish soveraigne good in vertue. And if they be asked, what is a happy life? they answer, That it consisteth in living vertuously and serving God. This was the Philosophy of Seneca in generall. But because there are certaine clouds of opinions which darken humane felicity, it is good we looke to examine them briefly. Nature hath dispersed in us some seeds of vertue, and hath given us some graines of knowledge and widome, which are borne with us and take roote (if we may say so) in our hearts. This notwithstanding, we must manure it, and vertue hath her precepts which openeth the way to attaine the soveraigne good, whereunto the Philosophie of the Stoickes doth summon us. Four things are enemies to that good, yea they obscure it, they corrupt and abolish it in an evil disposed heart. The first cause is death, that is to say, the feare and imagination to lose this earthly and corruptible life. For where there is feare, it cannot be said there is contentment and felicity, but misery: it is not a pleasant life, but a sorrowfull life, and a torment of the mind. The second is the bodily griefes, lingering diseases, the torments and tortures cruell and sharpe in a thousand kinds: and briefly a thousand evils which hurt the contentment of the soule. For no man will say, that to be troubled in his mind with a burning Feaver, to cry out night and day because of the Goute, or for paine of his Teeth and the Reins, or to be brought to any extraordinary torment, and to be dismembred by the hangman, is a thing where there is no apprehension that moveth the spirit. Besides all this, there are the griefes of the soule: mourning, losse of children, of kinsfolks and dear friends: for that afflicteth and eateth our thoughts without ceasing, and giveth Tragical Poets ample arguments to write upon. If the griefe of the body affecteth the rest and contentment of the mind, much more doth the inward griefe and anguish. And finally there are passions, as joy and pleasure, which hinder and abolish the feeling of a happy life. Those that are possessed with an extraordinary joy, oftentimes both do and say many fond things and jestures, in words and workes. As if a man be told that land is fallen to him, or that he is raised to wished dignity not looked for, yeshall see him play the foole and wanton like a childe. There are some whose manners honour changeth in such sort, that from the day till the next morning you shall not know them by their face, by the countenances, by their words, nor by their apparell: they will straight disdaine them that they called before servants or loving friends. Now this vaine pride and foolishnesse are in manner one selfe thing: and it may be said, that all ambitious men are altogether befuddled, or doubtlesse they will be so. If thou wilt make me see a proud man, one that presumeth to know much, and that looketh upon his feathers, as they say, I will presently shew thee a foole furnished at all peeces. There is no surer signe of foolishnesse then pride: and who will say then that the life of such a one is happy? And as for pleasures, we see how a man is carried away, who then is no more himselfe: but to the contrary, thinketh that the destruction of body and soule is his soveraigne good. Now amongst all the Philosophers which have tried to remedy these troubles of the minde, and to maintaine a man in this contentment which they call soveraigne, it may be said the Stoickes were the chiefe, and among the Stoickes Seneca. I will not here enter into examination of the doctrine of this Sect, nor declare that which Zeno and Chrysippus have written, as may be gathered of Laertius and of Plutarch; but simply to stay my selfe upon my principall purpose, which is of Seneca; and in this place to follow that which many learned men have gathered of his workes, to shew what was his Philosophy: unto the which we will adde some Summary of reasons with the which he helpeth himselfe, to fight with those passions, and to make the soule at peace, inmuch as he himselfe could apprehend it. This is out of all question, that Seneca was one of the first and principall Philosophers of the Stoickes among the Latines, as he himselfe doth boast in his owne writings. Furthermore, he exalteth this Sect above all others, and saith, that the Stoickes do make profession of a Philosophy worthy of men: forasmuch as there is difference betwixt them and others, as betwixt males and females. That the other kinds of Philosophy are made, to heare and to obey: but that the Stoicke is borne to teach, and command. He being desirous to present some perfect Idea of a wise man, bringeth forth Caro: and in the Treary where he will shew that the wise man cannot be offended nor outraged, he listeth up this man out of the rancke of all other men, and specially commendeth him in his death. If he spake of the Stoickes, he calleth them his; and doth make open profession of their instructions. Now in many places he distinguisheth Philosophy into three parts, which which he calleth Rationall, Morall, and naturall. But after the fashion of the Stoickes, he rested more upon the Morall, albeit that all his discourses shew that he had a marvellous veine in the rationall. And the bookes of naturall questions shew that he had a deep insight in the secrets of Nature. So then his principal end was to frame good manners, and to bring men to the knowledge of the contentment of the mind, to desire and apprehend it. They saw him oftentimes exhort Lucilius to the study of Morall Philosophy, as in the end of his 89. Epistle: So set down these things, saith he, to others, that thou thy selfe maist take pleasure to comprehend them. Write, to read afterwards thy writing, referring all things to the reformation of life, and to the meanes of appeasing the fury of passions. Study, not to be wiser then others, but to be better. On the other side, he turned the same Lucilius from the study of Logicke, and from the subtile disputations, in the which they please themselves that do but linger after syllables and words. Leave (said he to him in the 71. Epistle) this occupation and sifting of letters, to those masters that shut up a thing so magnificent as Philosophy is, in syllables: and do imbrace, yea bring to nothing, and utterly destroy the mind, in teaching things that are not worth the labour and study. I am content that thou resemble wise men that have invented letters, but not those that teach them. In some other places he laugheth at the subtleties of these Schoole disputers, namely, where he setteth down one of their fashions of speech, to wit, in the forty eight, which is the forty ninth in the Editions not well corrected, upon these words: Mus (that is to say, a Mouse) is a syllable: a Mouse eateth Cheese, therefore it followeth that a syllable eateth Cheese. But it is not onely that he setteth upon Logicke, or rational Philosophy, but also on Sciences commonly called the liberall Sciences, and especially when there is question of the Philosophy of manners. Witnesse that which he writeth in the foureth and eighth Epistle worthy to be diligently read of all, but specially of them whom such sciences do puffe up, and who for the rest do little care to rule their life within the compasse of vertue. In summe, he declareth in a great number of places, that Philosophy consisteth not in the knowledge of those things but that the end thereof is, to give counsell against all the accidents of this life: and that men were wont to repaire unto Philosophers, who do shew them in the midst of darkenesse (wherewith humane society is shrouded) the way they must follow not to erre, shewing what things are necessary and profitable: how easie the Lawes of Nature are: how joyfully we live, and at our ease, following of the same. And to the contrary, that there can be nothing but misery in the condition of those, which suffer themselves to wander rather by opinion, then by Nature and Reason. I thinke therefore that all the Philosophy of Seneca looketh unto that, to establish the mind all that may be: to attain to the which, it speaketh of the soveraigne good, to the end to draw us to aspire unto it. And because the accidents of this life, namely the causes before mentioned, do observe this happinesse, he striveth with infinit discourses and reasons against them. Now it were to make a great volume, if all were put together that he speaketh, and it were better to leave it to their liberty that shall reade the works of this Philosopher, of the which I will note here some heads or rules, on the which he reasoneth very amply to remedy the griefes before named. The intention therefore of Seneca above all in matters most important, is to beat down first, all corporall and spirituall passions: to wit, opinion and apprehension. He discovereth the vanity, sheweth the wrong which men of understanding do, and the error of their judgement, who see things as in the water, and with a corrupt eye. Which done, he goeth further, and seeketh to shew, that when that which is called evil is arrived, the wise man feeleth it not: as also it is as little trouble to him when one thinketh to touch him, as it is then when one threatned him afar off. For proove of this, he sheweth that they cannot hurt a wife man any manner of way: and that no man is injured or hurt but by himself. That the wise man bending all his thoughts unto vertue, cannot be offended, but rather overcometh all humane accidents, as well for respect of himselfe, as for all others. Hereupon he cometh to this point, to maintaine, that that which they call evil, is good to the wife man: who like a good husband maketh his profit of all in such sort, that there is nothing in the world but serveth his turne, and whereof he is not master with a singular contentment. Of these rules and maxims, there rise many Paradoxes dispersed in his bookes, the which if a man consider apart, are very strange and ridiculous with all: but being brought to their originals, they may receive some exposition. Furthermore to frame a perfect wife man, he will have nothing pleasant unto him but vertue, which consisteth in contentment all that the world acquireth: and a love of beautifull things which give contentment to the soule. That all that which is earthly and corruptible, should be esteemed as much as nothing: that the wife man in folding himselfe in his vertue, seeth all the greatnesse of this world very low under him, and as it were troden under the feete of his heart. And that in the midst of all dangers, yea even in the most fiercest death of all, and when heaven should fall upon him, he remaineth merry and pleased with the felicity which his vertue bringeth unto him. Afterwards he reasoneth particularly against the apprehension of death: and sheweth that it is as inevitable, as it is also good and necessary. That the greatest contentment of a wife man is, that he can breake in funder the Iron Chaine that holdeth him, as often and when he thinketh good: and upon this occasion treateth in some places of the immortality of the soule, as in the end of the seven and fiftieth Epistle, in the threecore and fiftieth, threecore and sixteenth, and the hundred and seventeenth, in his comfortable discourse unto Marcus, and elswhere. Touching these corporall paines, he sheweth that they cannot turn a man out of the path-way of Vertue, nor from the profession of constancy and truth, nor from the resolution to maintaine a just cause. That there is no paine or griefe so sharpe that can let a wife man to think of his duty, and to acquaint himself so far as his hands may reach. That these corporall griefes cannot not eclipse the least of the beams of vertue, and the hope of the immortality of our souls, for the which we exchange in the day that our paines come, as it were to have greatest strength, all the discomforts we apprehend in this transitory life. Furthermore, that the troubles which the estate of this world doth spread as a veile before our mindes, cannot blindfold them to see the perfect beauty of vertue, and to hear the excellent comforts which she propoeth. Also that the wife man sufficiently defended not to be overcome by passions, which have no power on him that is in the ordinary safegard and protection of vertue, in possession whereof he is already entered, that he still goeth forward every day more then other, shortly to enjoy her with perfection. To conclude, that there is hindrance at all for him whom vertue pleaseth, and whom she bringeth to immortality. And this is a little touch (me thinketh) which may be particularly noted in Seneca: in the beauty whereof, as in faces better formed, there are some spots discovered as in other Philosophers, namely the Stoicks. Above all, in his portraiture of this wife man, he imagineth in this life a thing that is not to be found in a corrupt man given over to sensuality; which is, vertue and perfection. But let us referre that to the ignorance of true Religion, and consider this Philosopher in the limits of his sect. For other Paradoxes, as of the world, of the spirit, of passions and affections of vertue, and some others borrowed of the Schoole of his Masters, that Plutarch hath examined in his booke of Common conceptions, and in that which he entitleth, The contradiction of the Stoicks: that which is evil doth condemne it selfe, or excuseth it selfe under the questions and disputations, which permit a man to say somewhat. And for the other, forasmuch as Seneca made profession to forme manners, he seemeth therein to have given way and free passage to some of his conceptions, and after the example of Painters, to give some shadows unto his Tables, the better to retaine the judgement of the Reader. That which I least allow in him, or rather which I cannot approve, is the excessive praise he giveth to his wife man, lifting him up, yea above the gods. And afterwards in divers places he would have this wife man put himselfe to death, and of his authority and power dissolve the bands of this life, without leave of the soveraigne Capitaine, and with a testimony of a strange cowardinesse and distrust of the doctrine of the eternal Providence: the which would have us keep a steadfast hope and confidence, yea even when things seeme to be most desperate. And that which he often applieth unto the death of Cato, whom he infinitely commendeth, hath been by us examined in the comparifon of Cato and Phocion. Furthermore, Seneca stayed not upon one or two in his discourses he hath left unto us, but hath culled out all the Philosophers, Greekes and Latines which were before him, all that he thought good to set downe for the rule and government of our life, according to the end he looked unto. And as for his writings, all that we have left concerning morall and naturall Philosophy, with the pleasant discourse upon the death of Claudius, is out of all disputation until this present: as the stile that is hard, short, sententious, and in apt tearmes for that time, and after the manner of teaching of the Stoicks; doth shew it. But for the bookes entituled, Controversia & Suasoria, that is to say, pleadings and orations, or declamations, I am of the same opinion that divers learned men of our time are, to wit, that these bookes are not of Seneca, but of the father of Seneca. And because many other learned men ancient and moderne have thought the contrary, we must needs say somewhat for proof of the opinion which we follow. The author of these collections saith, that he heard Ovid and Cicero declaim, and that he was familiar with Portius Latro, Valerius Messala, and with others that were in the time of Augustus. When he heard Cicero, he could be no lesse then fifteen years old: how can that be attributed unto Seneca, dead in the end of the Empire of Nero, well-near six-score yeares after that time? Now, that which Tacitus speaketh in divers places of the age of Seneca, reacheth not so farre: and Nero speaking to Seneca a little before his death, said, that he had yet strength enough to use his goods and governe his possessions: that could not be spoken of an old man of a hundred and twelve yeares old. Also Seneca speaketh otherwife of his age in one of his Epistles noted here before, where he telleth, that about the fifth year of the Empire of Tiberius, he came out of his infancy, of the age of eighteen yeares. Furthermore, Seneca was Praetor, Quaestor, and Consul, as in his discourse to his mother Elbia, the Chronicles, and the Lawyers bookes do make mention. And to the contrary, his father dedicating his bookes above named unto Seneca, Junius, and Mela, his three sons: and speaking to Mela in the Preface of his second booke of pleadings, he exhorteth him to follow the inclination of his minde, and contenting himselfe with the state of a private Gentleman, and a Romane Knight as his father, the better to warrant his life in the hazards and accidents of this world. That which made Seneca to be esteemed the Authour of those bookes there, is, for that his father did beare that name: and that these three, Seneca, Novatus (surnamed Junius Gallo) and Mela be brethren, and the sons of one selfe father and mother, it appeareth by the History of Tacitus, in the fifteenth booke of his Annals, and by the writings of Seneca himselfe, especially by the discourse to Elbia, where he saith amongst other things: Consider my brethren, that being safe, you have not cause to accuse Fortune: you have in them cause to rejoyce in a divers kinde. For the one, through his good wit hath attained to honour, and the other hath wisely despised it. Tacitus plainly shewed that, as we have seen here before. And whereas commonly they alledge the age of Seneca to be sixe score yeares and above, to give the more authority to the pleadings and Orations of his father, that is to say, to the fragments which he seemeth to have set forth in the favour of his children, to frame them betimes one day to practise that whereof he made profession, to wit, eloquence: there cannot be shewed any sufficient or authentick testimony of that which is alledged, that Seneca had three sonnes called, called, Novatus, Seneca and Mela. Touching the true bookes of Seneca, the diligent reading and consideration of them will continently shew the profit that may be gathered by them. For a man to stand resolved against the divers and troublesome events of this life, to repose himselfe sweetly upon the divine providence, to contemne death, and to desire the blessed immortality, for to repress the insolvency of strange passions which do often carry us too high, and too farre, and for to enjoy a great rest amongst so many Tempests and wrackes as happen daily, I know not an Historian among the Painims, Philosopher, Oratour, or Author whatsoever, that would I preferre before Seneca: yea, there are few to be compared to him, and the most part do follow him farre off.

Against those

This bringeth us to the consideration of some censures made of Seneca by divers learned men, as well ancient, as those of this latter age, to the end to induce them that behold Seneca, to look nearly into him: for if there be any thing wherein humane wit doth give scope and licence, let another judge that. But that specially is as an ordinary thing unto them that make profession studiously to thrust their noses into bookes, to marke presently, and sometime too suddenly, that which is before them, to bear others in hand afterwards, that things are such as they did imagine them to be. And although I do not acknowledge myselfe to be one of the number of them that read and know passably something: yet for all that ere I beware, I am too often attainted with this disease, which possesseth those that make many bookes, reproving and judging others. But as I do not commend them in any wise unto whom the bookes of sound erudition are not pleasing (like to weak stomachs, unto whom meates evil dressed and also hurtful, seem to be the most favoury) but feed themselves with their follies, vaine fancies and abominations, wherewith this latter age is miserably defiled: so would I wish that the excellent wits which are yet in EUROPE, were on the one side better advised in many respects, and on the other more carefull to discern that which is commendable and blameable, certaine or uncertaine in good authors: to note them particularly unto posterity, with two conditions: the one, that it should be done by the sufficientest men, and as it were of purpose appointed to that end, by consent of fame and truth: the other, that all scoffs, spitefull and sinister passions, should be farre from such censurers. To come againe to Seneca: I see that some have too much exalted him, as I thinke: and others have imbased him more then needed. Which being particularly considered, peradventure it will not mislike: and if it profit not, I hope it will move the Reader to some thought higher then mine, both to search matters more exactly, as also to settle his opinion upon mine with the compasse of truth, of mildnesse, and of vertue. Because of a Pagan.

Seneca speaketh amply in some places of the providence and majesty of God, before whom he exhortheth us to walke, and sometimes prayeth Lucilius to live with men as if God saw him, and to speake with God, as if men heard him; also that he died in the end of the Empire of Nero, at which time Saint Paul the Apostle was prisoner at ROME: some have thought that Seneca of long time had leaned unto Christian Religion, by reason whereof his writings were read as proceeding from a man advanced in the knowledge of the true God. And otherwise he was contented to speake in generall and as under a veile, of the ignorance of his time, and because he would have them no more envied whom the world did already hate. Briefly, that he was a secret disciple of Christ, in the Schoole of his Apostle. In confirmation whereof, they shew certaine letters of Seneca unto Paul, with mutuall answers: and they do add also the testimony of a great Christian Doctor, who hath placed Seneca in the Catalogue of Saints, whose souls we believe are in glory with their Saviour. Howbeit certaine learned men of our time have spoken their opinion touching all that, to whom I do agree: to wit, that whether Seneca saw the Apostle, and spake with him, whether he disdained to see him, or that he cared not, nor did enquire after him, as I thinke that he thought then of any thing else rather then of the doctrine taught by Saint Paul: there is nothing in his Life, in his Writings, nor in his Death, that cometh near to the Christian belief and profession. But if we should call all those Christians, in whose Writings we do read goodly and true sentences of Wisdom, Justice, and the Providence of God, it would make a strange mingling of Scripture with prophane bookes: and further, they would dispute if the one should be put in the place of the other. As we see that in the bodies of the bookes, which for excellency we call the Bible, there are two, in the which name of God is never exprest, which notwithstanding are holy, and do containe infinite instructions and singular consolations. Seneca having written in some place, The Godhead is I know what great thing, yea so great, that it passeth all mans understanding: our life is dedicated to his service: let us take order to be approved of the same: for a hidden conscience is good for nothing: God seeth us: an ancient Doctor said thereupon; Any man that should know God, could he set forth any more certaine verity, then that which is spoken here by the mouth of a man that knew not what true Religion meant? For he representeth the Majesty of God, saying that it is so great, that mans understanding cannot measure it: and plainly, the Fountaine of verity: shewing that the Life of men is not unprofitable (as some Epicureans thinke) since it is referred to the glory of the Creator, when they follow Justice and Piety. Other discourses of Seneca might be alledged touching the Providence of God, against idolatry, superstition, and impiety: but the consequence is not stable, that he hath therefore knowne anything of the doctrine of the Gospel; you shall not finde one discourse in all his Writings, and the doctrine of the Stoicks doth in nothing agree with that, which neither flesh nor blood can reveale: and whereof it is not our purpose to speake in this place, which requireth not that we should discover the holy things, and much lesse that we should mingle them with the prophane.

As

As for the letters published under the name of Seneca and of Paul, both the stile and the matter shew at the first sight, that it is the work of some idle man that thought himself very wise, if he dissembled with those which did not sift it so narrowly. And we shall not need here to make a recapitulation of the just and Learned censures that have been made: where you shall see the madnesse, repugnancies, and falsehoods hidden in those letters, if they be conferred with the life and doctrine of them unto whom they were attributed. We do not meet with any thing so much in the writings of Seneca, as the constancy and contempt of death: how cometh it then that you shall not finde one word that sheweth him to be a Christian? that Nero had not discovered or perceived any thing to charge Seneca with, when he commanded him to die? For that had been an ample discharge before the people that extremely hated the Christians. Suetonius and Tacitus, little favouring our Religion, would not have forgotten it. But how chanceth it that in his death he remembered Jupiter, and not Christ? Now in regard of the Catalogue which is alledged for a Buckler, I desire that learned men do consider, if they have not wronged the person to whom it is attributed, mingling amongst his workes this scoffe, and others which are no better, forged upon the like Anvile, and with the selfe same Hammer, which the letters were before mentioned. Now, I thinke (these are the words of a learned man that had well read Seneca) that it is best for the Reader to take Seneca's Bookes, as proceeding from a man ignorant of true Religion. For if you read them as a Pagan, he hath written like a Christian: but if you take him for a Christian, know that it is a Pagan that speaketh. There are many things that may inflame us with the love of vertue: they will prick us more nearly, if we remember from whom they come. If we meet with any sentences that seem to be drawn out of our fountaines, they will be so much the sweeter unto us: and as for uncertaine and false opinions, they will offend us lesse, when we shall say, that it is a Pagan that hath set them out. Let us come to the other point, and consider those that have too much imbased him, either in respect of his life, or because of his writings. For his life, some (and Dion amongst others) have accused him of avarice, of ambition, of dissolution, of adultery, and other such like vices: unto the which I will not vouchsafe to make answer, since so many learned men, ancient and modern, and the life and death of Seneca doe say the contrary. And it were an easie thing for one that would cut Dion a Gown of his own cloth, to discover in him many things impertinent, and evil becoming the name whereof he maketh profession. But it is better to confute evident slanders by silence, then with long discourse. Some other speak not so plainly, but say that Seneca lived not after his own precepts. On the contrary, the honour which he maketh often to Epicurus, seemeth to shew that he hath mingled the wickednesse of the Epicureans with the austerity of the Stoicks. I grant that Seneca hath not in all the parts of his life shewed this constancy which he requirerh of a wise man, and I perceive well that he hath dissembled too many things in the Government of Nero: the which the wife Thrasca would never have allowed of the presence, nor of the word, nor of the deed. But mans infirmity is such, that that which the minde seeth plainly enough, it cannot or dare not effect it, because of the resistance of reason and passions: or if it dare, it is stayed with the least object through this naturall faintnesse that keepeth us backe, when we should resolutely follow vertue. Now of this censure there followeth no more, but that the eternal wisdom doth give us knowledge of many notable things uttered by the mouth and testimony of this stranger: and in the meane time doth admonish us in no wise to stay our selves upon him that speaketh: which she doth well in her proper house, where she understandeth that we lend our eares unto those which go with other feet then they should, so that they keep within the bounds of their commission. And as a Sergeant or Herauld that had but one eye, or were lame, could notwithstanding deliver a message of importance in the name of the Prince, and must be heard: even so, whatsoever he be that cometh to us with the notes of chaff and fair Verity, he ought to have audience, to be believed and followed, so long as he containeth himselfe neare to her, and rejecteth all that is contrary, be it in words or in fact. For Epicurus, Seneca alledgeth some notable matters of him, whereof it followeth not that he doth allow of his faults, nor of his sect, as is also to be acknowledged in many places. And there can be nothing observed in the life of Seneca, that shewed him to be an Epicurean or a Libertine. For even in the midst of the abundance and of the great riches he possessed by the liberality of Nero, they saw a great moderation, witnessed also in his death: not being forbidden to Noblemen to possesse gold, silver, earthly goods, and moveables of great value, so that such prosperity do not make them drunke, to cause them despise God and man. As for the last, be they ancient or modern, whose names I am not content to expresse, which very boldly do censure the writings of Seneca: and in agreeing to him in some excellent thing, they afterwards take licence to thinke him rude in his stile, too rigorous a Judge of other mens labours, a foolish jeaster, affected in his discourses, troublesome by reason of his repetitions, without Art, of small judgement, forgetfull, trusting to his own wit, curious of light things, and seeking I know not how to be particular, because he would not seem to have borrowed any thing of any man: these be accusers in the most part of such Articles, and no competent Judges, saving the honour due to their erudition. For proove whereof we do exhort the Reader to take one whole booke of Seneca which he liketh of best, and then to examine it all, If I their adversaries, durst not make head, but went straight from thence. So all things prospering according to his desire, he brought all the other Isles called the Cyclades, to be subject to the Athenians.

Miltiades counsell for the freeing of Greece, is frustrate by Istians.

At the same time Darius King of Persia having passed all his Army out of Asia into Europe, determined to make warre with the Scythians, and made a bridge over Danuby to passe over his Troops: the Guard of the which in his absence, was committed unto the Lords which he had brought with him out of Jonias and Asia, unto every one of the which he had given perpetuall power and Government over their Townes. Supposing by this policy, easily to bring into subjection all the Greekes that dwelt in Asia, if he gave the Guard of the Townes unto their friends and confederates, that could not escape by any means if he were oppressed. Miltiades was of the number of the Guards of this Bridge. Newes being brought by divers messagers that Darius had but ill successe, and that the Scythians held him hard to it, he perswaded the other Guards not to lose the occasion that was offered to set Greece at liberty, considering that if Darius and his forces he brought with him were overthrown, all Europe should be in peace, and the natural Greekes remaining in Asia should see themselves out of danger, and freed from the domination of the Persians. And this might easily be done, since that by cutting off the Bridge, Darius should in few dayes be cut in pieces by the enemies, or should die for penury with all his Army. Many agreed unto it: but Istians Miltiades brake the necke of it, saying, that the Kingdome of Darius upon whom their authority depended, made difference betwixt the good of the affaires of them that commanded, and the people that was under subjection and Government. That if Darius should happen to die, they should be driven out and punished by their Citizens: and therefore that he was of a contrary minde to all the rest, thinking nothing more profitable, then to see the Kingdome of the Persians established. The greater part of them being of his minde, Miltiades was afraid, for that there were so many witnesses, that the King should soon be advertised of that which was propounded: wherefore he left Cherronesus, and returned againe to Athens. Now though his counsell took no place, yet he was highly commended, having shewed more regard to the good and liberty of all, then to his own particular advancement.

Darius maketh warre against Greece.

For Darius, he being returned out of Europe into Asia, his friends counsell him to set upon Greece. Whereupon he armed a Fleet of five hundred Gallies under the charge of Datis and Artafernes, giving them two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand horse, saying, that he would be even with the Athenians, because that the Jonians had in favour of the Athenians forced the City of Sardis, and killed his Garrisons. These two Lieutenants of Darius being arrived in Euboea with their Gallies, they presently wanne Eretria, tooke all the inhabitants of the Country prisoners, and sent them to the King in Asia. From thence they went into Attica, and camped in the plaine of Marathon, which is within five leagues or thereabouts from Athens. The Athenians astonished at so great a number of enemies, and so near unto them, knew not of whom to demand aid, but of the Lacedemonians, unto whom they dispatched a very swift footman, a foot Post called Philippides, to advertise them that they had need to send them aid, and that presently. In the meane time they chose tenne Captaines to command and governe their Troopes: Miltiades was one of them. So there was a great disputation among, to wit, whether they should keepe the Wallies of their City, or they should go to meete with their enemies to bid them Battell. There was none but Miltiades that reasoned, that there was no delaying or protracting of time, but they must make a Campe: and that that would lift up the hearts of the Athenians, when they should see and behold, that they had a good opinion of their Vertue and Valiantnesse: and that the enemies heartes would faile them, when they should understand that so few men came resolutely to fight with them. At that time the Athenians had no aide from any City but from Plataea, which sent them a thousand men: who being come, the Army of the Greekes was compounded but of tenne thousand men in all, who desired nothing but to fight. That was the cause that Miltiades counsell was preferred above all the other Captaines. For the Athenians respecting his valour, caused their Troopes to march into the Field, and they Camped in a place of advantage. Then the next morning having disposed their footmen at the foot of the mountaine, which they had in flanke, they gave charge upon their enemies couragiously, with a new and sure fashion of fight. For there were Trees growing here and there, by meanes whereof they were under covert of the Rockes, and the Trees kept them from being enclosed by the multitude of the enemies Horsemen. Now although Datis saw that the place did not favour and affect him, yet because he had so many men, all his desire was to fight, thinking he should winne and obtaine much, if he could joyne before the aide of the Lacedemonians came to them. And therefore he made an hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand horse to march against them. Then he went to charge the Athenians, who made excellent proof of their valiantnesse, considering that they having to fight one against ten, they made the Persians flee for life, and so astonished them, that in stead of turning backe to their Campe, they saved themselves in their ships. See, here was one of the bravest battells that a man can speak of: for never such a handfull of men overcame so great forces. Peradventure it will not be impertinent to shew what reward Miltiades had for obtaining of so noble a Victory, to the end that all men may know the better, that all Common-weals have one disposition. As the honours of the people of Rome were in times past rare and simple, and by consequent more glorious and to be desired: and now to the contrary more disordered and lesse esteemed: the very same we finde to have been practised among the Athenians. For all the honour they did unto this Miltiades, the

The Athenians under the conduct of Miltiades, set upon their enemies.

Ten thousand Athenians put to flight an hundred thousand Persians.

the saviour of Athens and of all Greece, was, that the battell of Marathon having been painted over the Porch called Pocile, his image was set up the first in ranke of all the Captaines, with the countenance of a man speaking to his souldiers, and going first to fight. The same people of Athens being come to be of greater power, and corrupted by the gifts of those which sued for charge and Office in the Common-wealth, caused three hundred statues to be set up for Demetrius the Phalerian.

Miltiades rewarded with honors for this victory.

After this battell, the Athenians gave a Fleet of threescore and ten Gallies unto Miltiades, to make war upon the Isles which had aided the Persians. He compelled some by simple commandments, others by force of armes to yeeld themselves. And not being able by any persuasions to bring the Isle men of Paros to reason (proud, because of their riches) he landed his forces, enclosed the Towne with Trenches, and tooke from the besieged all meanes either to come by victuals or munition of warre: then having set up his Gabions and Mantelets, he came near the walls. He was at the point to winne the Town, when one night (not known by what mischance) there was a great fire seen upon firm land in a wood, which they saw from the Isle. This flame made those that were besieged, and them that lay at the siege thinke that it was a signe of the Fleet of the Persians, to encourage the Parians, and to keep them from yeelding up their Town. Hereupon Miltiades fearing that Darius Army by sea was at hand, he set fire of his Mantelets and Gabions, and hoised saile towards Athens, where he arrived with all the Gallies he carried out: wherewith the people were marvellously offended. They accused him of treason, that when he might have wonne Paros by assault, he had taken money of the King, and was returned without fighting, or doing any memorable act. At that time he was sick of the wounds he had received at the siege of Paros: wherefore not being able to defend himself in person, his brother Stesagoras pleaded his cause, the which having been debated, he was quit from death, yet condemned to pay a fine of thirty thousand crownes, to the which they valued the charge of the Army in that journey. And being unable to pay so great a sum, he was committed to the common prison, and there died. Now this matter of Paros was but a cloake; and they spake of it thus for another reason. For the tyranny of Pisistratus, who had altered the estate some yeares before, was the cause that the Athenians were afraid of their Citizens that were in any credit. Miltiades, that had had many great and honourable charges, seemed that he could no more be brought to live as a private person, considering also that he was given to this desire to command alwayes. For all the time of his abode in Cherronesus there was no other Lord but he, and also they called him Tyrant: but just, because he had not gotten this authority by force of Armes, but with the consent of his Citizens, and carried himself very modestly. Now they take and call them Tyrants, which have a perpetuall power in a Common-wealth that was free before. Furthermore, Miltiades was a very gentle person, wonderful affable, and there was not so meane a man, but might easily come and speake with him. All the Townes respected him, he was very famous, and they reputed him for one of the bravest Captaines of Greece. The people of Athens considering these things, had rather condemne this innocent man in a fine, then to be longer in pain to take heed of him.

The people of Athens unthankful and unkinde unto Miltiades.

Pausanias gives the Persians the overthrow.

Pausanias Lacedemonian was a great man, but unconstant in all the parts of his life, furnished with virtues, but overwhelmed with vices. It was he that wanne that so famous victorie of the Platees. For he being Generall of the Greeke Army, this great Lord Mardonius, a Mede by Nation, and sonne in law of the King of Persia, the most wise and valiant Capitaine among all the Persians, followed with two hundred thousand chosen footmen, and twenty thousand horse: he was overcome, the rest of all his Troopes driven out of Greece, and himselfe slaine in the field. This victory raised up Pausanias heart to such a height, that he beganne to confound the affaires, and to devise great change in his braine. The first shame he received was, that he having offered a Trivet of gold unto the temple of Delphes, of the booty he had gotten upon the enemies, with an Epigram containing in substance, that under his conduct the barbarous people had bene overthrowne before Platees, and that acknowledging this victory, he made this present unto Apollo: the Lacedemonians razed out these verses, and wrote no other thing but the names of the Towns, through whose aid the Persians had been overcome. After this battell they sent him again with an Army of the allies by sea into Cyprus and Hellespont, to expulse the Garrisons of the barbarous people thence. The which he having fortunately executed, he then grew to be more insolent and ambitious then ever.

For, having taken the City of Byzance by force, and made a great number of Gentlemen of Persia prisoners, among which were many kinsmen of Xerxes, he secretly sent them to him, and gave it out that they escaped out of prison. Gongylus Eretrian did accompany them carrying letters to the King, the effect thereof was this, as Thucydides saith: Pausanias, Captain of Sparta, knowing that the prisoners of Byzance are thy kinsmen, he sendeth them unto thee for a present, and desireth to be of alliance with thee, and prayeth thee to give him thy daughter in marriage. If thou do it, he promiseth that by his meanes Sparta and all Greece shall be brought under thy power. Therefore if it please thee to give ear unto it, send him a man expressly with whom he may conferre. The King very joyfull and glad for the delivery of so many friends of his, sent Artabazus presently to Pausanias with letters, in the which he commendeth him, and prayeth him to spare for nothing to bring his promise to passe. If he do, that all shall be granted which he demandeth. Pausanias understanding Xerxes minde, resolved resolutely to put his hand to this work: which the Lacedemonians mistrusting, having sent for him home, they accused him of treason: whereof he was quit, and yet condemned to pay a fine. This was the cause that they sent him not againe to the Army: but shortly after he returned of his own minde, and by a rash and evil grounded Oracion, he easily discovered the thoughts of his heart. Furthermore, he did not onely change his fashion of living after the Laconian manner, but also of his diet and apparel. For he had a royall pomp, training a long Gowne, after the fashion of the Medes, followed with a Troope of the Medes and Egyptians for Archers of his guard. His table did so abound in all kinds of dainties, after the manner of the Persians that no man could away withall. He gave no accessse unto him but very seldom: to them that would speake with him he answered very proudly: and commanded with all cruelty, refusing to returne any more to Sparta.

Pausanias accused of treason

He went to Colones, which is a place in the Countrey of Troue, and there plotted all his dangerous practises against his Countrey and himselfe. When the Lacedemonians had understanding of it, they sent Ambassadors unto him with the Scytala, in the which was written, after their accustomed manner, that if he came not into the City, they would condemne him to death. This Letter astounded him, yet hoping to escape this imminent danger by force of Presents, and by reason of his credit, he went home into his Countrey, where being, the Ephores made him to be apprehended, and cast into Prison: for it is lawfull for one of the Ephores to take the King, and use him so. Neverthelesse Pausanias loved himselfe, being notwithstanding suspected of every man: for they had alwaies this opinion of him, that he had intelligence with Xerxes. There are certaine People there called Ilotes, and they are a great number of them, and they plow the Lands of the Lacedemonians, whom they serve as Slaves. It was supposed he did practise with them, under promise to make make them free-men. But because they had no pregnant witness to convince him, they thought they must not condemne so noble a Person as he by bare conjectures, but rather to carry till time did reveale it of itselfe. In these busineses, a young man called Argilius, who in his fancy had served Pausanias for a Page, having received Letters of him to carry to Artabazus, he doubting lest there were somewhat therein that might hurt him, for of all those that went into Persia about these affaires, not one of them came backe againe: he brake open the Seale, and knew by the Contents thereof that if he had carried them, he had died for it: also the Letter mentioned matters whereof Pausanias and Xerxes were agreed. Argilius carried these Letters, and put them into the hands of the Ephores. Here is to be noted the moderation and gravity of the Lacedemonians, that would not yet take vantage of this detection, to lay hold upon Pausanias: and resolved not to proceed with rigour, till he first discovered it himselfe. And therefore they taught Argilius what they would have him to do.

Argilius discovered Pausanias treason.

At Tenare, there is a Temple of Neptune, the priviledge whereof the Greekes hold for sacred and inviolable. Argilius fled thither, and fate him downe upon the Altar: near unto the which the Ephores made a cave under the ground, from whence one might understand all that any body would say unto Argilius. Some of the Ephores hid themselves within it. Pausanias understanding that his man was in the priviledge of the Temple, went thither marvellously troubled, and beganne to aske him how this chance happened. Argilius confessed he had opened the letters, and seen the contents of them. Wherewith Pausanias more troubled then before, beganne to pray him to say never a word, and not to betray him who had done him so much good: that if he would do him that favour to helpe him out of this trouble, he would make him a great man. The Ephores having heard all this talke, they judged that the surest way was to take him in the City. Whither they being gone, Pausanias thinking he had appeased Argilius, and thereby assured his affaires, he returned home to his house: and as they were ready to catch him by the chollar, he perceived by the countenance of one of the Ephores that called him as if he would have spoken with him, that they went about to intrap him. Wherefore doubling his pace somewhat faster then those that followed him, he saved himselfe within the Temple of Minerva, called Chalcidæon. But because he should not come out, the Ephores caused the Church doores presently to mured up, and the roofof the Temple to be pulled downe, that he might die the sooner with aire. It is reported that Pausanias mother being a very old woman, lived at that time: and that she understanding of the wickednesse of her sonne, her selfe brought the first stone to mure him in there. Behold, how Pausanias stained with a shamefull death the great glory he had obtained in the warres. Being brought halfe dead out of the Temple, he died immediately. Some would have had his body carried to the Gibbit: others liked not the opinion, and buried him far from the place where he died: from whence he was digged up againe, by commandment of an Oracle of Delphes, and put in the same place where he died.

Pausanias took sanctuary in the Temple of Minerva, and died.

by my meanes; as well as by thine own mouth. As for me, answered Conon, it shall be no troublesome thing to me, to do the King that honour that shall please thee: but I am afraid to do my City dishonour, if I do a thing proper to the barbarous people, and unfit for that City which was wont to command other Nations. So then he delivered his message in writing: which when the King had seen, he was so moved with the report of so great a person, that he judged Tissaphernes his enemy, decreed war against the Lacedemonians, and suffered Conon to make choice of such a man as he would, to distribute the money necessary to defray the charge of this war. Conon made this answer, that this election pertained nothing to him, but to the King that knew his servants best: yet in his opinion, this charge should be best bestowed upon Pharnabazus. He was sent back with great presents to the maritime Townes, to command the Cypriots, Phenicians, and others dwelling upon this coast to put Gallies in readinesse, and to Arme a Fleet that might keep the Seas next Summer, under the conduct of Pharnabazus and of Conon, who had so required it.

the Spartans.

The Lacedemonians being advertised thereof, were amazed, perceiving well that they were to make another manner of war then with the barbarous people. For they saw that they must needs come to fight against a valiant and wise Captaine, having the Kings treasure in his hands, and that had as much and better direction and forces then they. With this thought they gathered together great store of shipping, and embarked themselves under the conduct of Pisander. Conon met with him near unto Cnidus, gave them battell, made them flee, took store of Gallies, and sunk a great number of them. By meanes of this victory, Athens and all Greece, subject to the dominion of the Lacedemonians, were set at liberty. Conon returned againe to his Country with part of these Gallies, built up againe the walls of Athens, and of the haven of Piræa, which had beene overthrowen by Lysander, and presented his Citizens with thirty thousand crownes which Pharnabazus had given him. But that which happeneth oftentimes unto other men chanced also unto Conon, that is, to have lesse courage in prosperity, then in adversity. For now that he had overcome the Fleet of the Peloponnesians, thinking he had taken sufficient revenge of the wrongs received by his Country, he began to embrace in his minde imaginations too high for his carriage: although this was good and commendable in his enterprise, that he had rather make his own Country great and rich, then the King of Persia. Therefore he being now grown into wonderfull credit, not onely amongst the barbarous people, but also amongst all the Cities of Greece, after this battell of Cnidus, he began underhand to practise the meanes to restore Jonas and Eolia to be subject againe to the Common-wealth of the Athenians. His practices being discovered, Tiribazus Governor of Sardis, sent to pray him to come to him, to be sent in Ambassage to the King. Conon straight obeying his commandment, he was no sooner arrived, but he was straight clapt up in prison, where he remained some time. Some write that he was carried to the King, and died in Persia. But Dion the Historian, to whom we give great credit in that he treateth of the affaires of Persia, reporteth, that Conon saved himselfe, leaving it in doubt whether Tiribazus was privy to it, or that he knew not of it.

Iphicrates the Athenian was famous, not so much for his divers exploits, or for the greatnesse of them, as for his Military Discipline: for he was such a Chieftaine of Warre, that they compared him unto the bravest men of his time, and they did not set him behinde any of those that had gone before him. He had been in many Warres, had commanded Armies oftentimes, he never had misfortune by his own fault, he ever overcame by Wisdome: his Understanding reaching so farre, that he brought in many good things never seen before in the Art Military: and made some of them better that were in use. He altered the Armes of Footmen: and where before him the Captaines did use great Targets, short Partisans, and little Swords: he to the contrary brought light bucklers, to the end his men should be lighter to remove, and to runne to give charge. He made the Partisans greater by halfe, and the Swords longer. He changed also the Corsets, and in stead of Iron and Copper, he made them of Canvass well wrought together, which made the Souldiers much lighter; for being eased of that weight, they had meanes to defend themselves nimble against blowes, and were ready besides to give charge upon the Enemy. He made Warre with the Thracians, and re-established Seuthes againe in his Kingdome, an Ally of the Athenians. Being at Corinth, he observed so good Discipline in his Army, that they never saw any Souldiers in Greece, better disposed, nor more obedient to their Colonell then they were. To be short, he did use them to ranke themselves so well in Battell, without helpe of the Captain, so soon as ever the Generall had given them the signe to fight, that it seemed expressly as if the most expert Chieftaine of War had imbattelled them.

Iphicrates skill in military affaires.

With such an Army he assailed the Lacedemonians, which was a most famous act through all Greece: and in this Warre he put all their Forces to flight, which wanne him great honour. And as Artaxerxes was ready to set upon the King of Egypt, he demanded of the Athenians Captaine Iphicrates, to be the chiefe Leader of all the strangers Troops, to the number of twelve thousand men. Whom he so well trained and disciplined, that as the Fabian Souldiers had been famous among the Romans, so in Greece they spake of none but of Iphicration Souldiers. Afterwards being gone to aid the Spartans, he stayed Epaminondas roundly: and not he come, the Thebans would never have returned backe before they had taken and burnt the City of Sparta. He was a man of a stout heart, and of a high stature, having the report and countenance of a Sovereign Captaine, so that he made all men wonder at him that saw him: but he was slothfull and impatient, as Theopompus saith, but otherwise a good and faithfull Citizen, whereof he made prooffe among others, especially in keeping Perdiccas and Philip the Sonnes of Amyntas Macedonian safe. For Euridice their Mother coming with them for refuge unto Iphicrates, after the death of Amyntas, he spared no meanes of his own to defend them. He lived a long time, being in good credit with his Citizens, saving that on a time during the Warres of the Allies he was criminally accused with Timotheus; howbeit he cleared himselfe, and was quit by judgement. His Wife was Thressa, Daughter of King Cotyrs: and of her he had a Son called Menestheus; who being asked which he loved best, either his Father, or his Mother? My Mother, said he. Whereat every man musing: Marvell not, answered he, I have reason to say so. For my Father, as much as was in him, begat me a Thracian: and Mother to the contrary, she made me an Athenian.

stratagem.

Chabrias was an Athenian, and was placed in ranke of excellent Captains. So hath he done many things worthy of memory. Amongst others, the stratageme he shewed at the battel of Thebes is famous, where he was to aide the Boetians. For, that great Capitaine Agesilaus rejoycing becaufe of his victory, and that he had made all the Troopes in the Thebans pay run away, Chabrias stood still with them that were left of his battalion, teaching the souldiers to resist the rage of the enemies, casting down their Pikes, and covering themselves with their bucklers upon one knee. Agesilaus moved with this novelty, durst not run in to them, but founded the retreat, to keep his men that they should passe no further. This act was so renowned thorow Greece, that Chabrias caused a statue to be made of him in the state above mentioned, the which the Athenians set up for him in the great Market-place. Afterwards the wrestlers, and other such kinde of people followed this fashion of erection of statues, which they deserved for their victories. To come againe to Chabrias, he made many wars in Europe, in the quality of General of the Athenians, and went also of his voluntary will to make warre in Egypt, in the service of Nectanebos whom he set againe into his Kingdome. He did the like in Cyprus, whither the Athenians sent him of purpose to helpe Evagoras, and would not depart thence before he had first subdued all the Isle, for the which the Athenians wan great honour. In these busineses, war fell out betwixt the Persians and Egyptians. They of Athens were allies of Artaxerxes, and the Spartans tooke part with Egypt. King Agesilaus did greatly invade the Persians, and carried great booties away. Chabrias considering that, and giving no place to Agesilaus, went of his owne head to aide the Egyptians, who made him their Admirall, and gave the charge of the Army by land unto Agesilaus. Then the Lieutenants of the King of Persia sent unto Athens, to complain that Chabrias made warre with the Egyptians against their King. The Athenians sent for Chabrias immediately to appear in person, threatening him to condemne him to death, if he were not there by the day appointed. The message made him to come againe to Athens, where he carried no longer then needs he must. For the Citizens bare him no great good will, because he carried himself so stately, and would be so merry, that the people envied him. This vice reigneth commonly in those great and free Townes, that glory is ever accompanied with envy, and they willingly speak ill of them whom they see to be great: and to be short, the poor cannot abide wealthy and rich men. Therefore Chabrias did absent himself out of the City as much as he could possible, and he was not alone in that, for almost all the chiefeest of the City did the like: thinking themselves safe from the teeth of the envious, so long as they were far off from the sight of their Citizens. Therefore Conon lived for the most part of his time in the Isle of Cyprus, Iphicrates in Thracia, Timotheus in Lesbos, Cares in Sygcea. As for Cares, he was not to be likened in any respect unto the others, in exploits, nor in manner of life: and yet he was honoured in the City of Athens, and had great meanes.

Chabrias envied for his statelinesse.

The manner of Chabrias death.

As for Chabrias, he died in the war of the allies in this manner. The Athenians made war with the Islanders of Chio, at which time Chabrias had no charge in the Army by sea. Notwithstanding he had more authority then all the Captaines, and the souldiers esteemed him more then any other of the commanders: which was the cause of his death. For striving to enter the first into the haven, and commanding the Pilote to row right thither, it was his destruction: for being moored there within, the other ships followed him not. Whereupon the enemies compassed him in: but as he fought valiantly, his Galley being beaten by the spur of another vessel, began to leak, and to sinke to the bottom. He seeing there was no way for him to escape, because the Fleet of the Athenians was too far off to receive him in, if he should have attempted to have swum, he had rather die then leave his Armes, and forsake the Galley which carried him. The others, they took another course, and saved themselves by strength of their Armes. But he esteeming an honest death to be more excellent then a shamefull life, fighting very near, was killed by the enemies with Darts.

THE LIFE OF TIMOTHEUS.

An. Mund.

Ant. Christ.

Timotheus the Sonne of Conon, a Capitaine of Athens, did by many Vertues amplifie the glory received of his Father. For he was an eloquent man, diligent, painfull, expert in Military Discipline, and a great Politician. He had executed great things, whereof the most notable are these, to wit: he subdued the Olynthians and Byzantines: he wanne the City of Samos, the siege whereof in the former Wars had stood the Athenians in the summe of twelve hundred talents. He delivered it unto the people freely without any charge to them. He made warre with King Corys, and brought of the booty he had gotten there unto the Treasury, the like summe of twelve hundred talents. He also raised the siege that was before Cyfca, and went with Agesilaus to the aide of Ariobarzanes, of whom having received money, he had rather his Citizens should buy Townes and Lands, then to carry it home to his lodging. Therefore he joyned Ericrhone and Sestos to the Signiory of Athens. Afterwards having charge of the Army by Sea, he invaded Peloponnesus, spoiled all the territory of Sparta, and had all their Ships in chafe. He brought the Corcyreans under the subjection of the Athenians, and drew into their alliance the Epirots, Athamans, and Chaonians, and all the people upon that Sea coast. The which made the Lacedaemonians leave their so long old quarrell, and of their own good wills let the Athenians have the principality of the Sea: treating peace with these conditions, that the Athenians should be Generals upon the Sea.

This victory did so please the Athenians, that there was then first of all an Altar built to the common Peace, and they did ordain a Pillow should be made for that goddesse. Furthermore, that such a glorious Act should remaine for perpetuity, they raised up a Statue unto Timotheus in the Market-place, by ordinance of the people, which was an honour that never man received before, to wit, that the people having granted a Statue for the father, they should also give one to the Sonne. By this meanes the Statue of the Sonne so freshly set up, renewed the memory of the Father. Now Timotheus, being very old, dealing no more in affaires of the Common-wealth, they beganne afresh to torment the Athenians of all sides. Samos and Hellsfont shrunk back and revolted. Philip King of Macedon, who began to waxe great, plotted wonderful things in his head. Chares was sent against him to make head. But they thinking him not sufficient to repulse Philip, they therefore sent Menestheus the Sonne of Iphicrates, Sonne in law to Timotheus, and made him Colonel, gave him the charge of the affaires of the wars, having for his Counsellours, his Father, and Father in law, brave Captaines, wise and expert men to direct him with their counsel: their authority being so great, that every man hoped that all that was lost should be recovered again by their meanes. They pointing for Samos, Chares that had heard news of it, sailed up and down that coast, to the end nothing should be done in his absence. Drawing near to the Isle, a storme arose, and to defend themselves against it, the two old Captains strake sail, and hulled, going on further into the Sea. Chares to the contrary upon a head, not respecting them that had seen more then he, held on his course, thinking to have found an occasion as he wished, and sent as well to Timotheus as to Iphicrates, that they should follow him. But having had evil successe, and lost many of his Ships, he fell backe againe to that very place from whence he came, and sent letters to the people of Athens of this effect, that he had easily taken Samos, if Timotheus and Iphicrates had not forsaken him at his need. Upon this accusation they were summoned to appear in person by this bold people, suspicious, unconstant, enemy and envious of another mans greatnesse, and are charged to be Traitors to the Common-wealth. Timotheus was condemned, and a fine set upon his head of sixty thousand Crownes.

Iphicrates constrained by the importunity of his unthankfull Citizens, went for a time to Chalcis. After Timotheus death, the People repenting their Sentence, abated nine parts of the summe above named, and commanded Conon, the Sonne of the deceased, to furnish six thousand Crownes for the reparation of a pane of the Wall. Here is to be noted a wonderfull revolution of the Affaires of this World: for the young Sonne was constrained at his owne charges (to the great dishonour of his House) to repaire the Walls, the which his Grandfather Conon had made up with the Booty gotten of the Enemies. We could alleadge many examples of the modesty and wisdom of Timotheus: but we will adde for the end a matter, whereby may be easily conjectured, how much he was esteemed of the Greekes. Being young he was accused, and brought before the Judge, whereupon his friends and familiars came out of all parts into Athens to defend him, and amongst others the Tyrant Jason, who was at that time the mightiest Lord of all Greece. This Tyrant was never assured in his owne Countrey without his Guard, and yet he came without any Train to Athens, esteeming so much his Host Timotheus, that he had rather hazard his life, then faile his friend in time of necessity. Notwithstanding this, shortly after Timotheus made Warre with Jason, by the commandement of the People, thinking that to obey his Countrey, and to maintaine the right of the same, is a more devout thing, then to favour a private friend. After this last Age, which tooke away Iphicrates, Chabrias, and Timotheus, Captaines of Athens, they could never finde in the Commonwealth after their death, any Chieftaine of Warre, that deserveth any memory of them.

Timotheus preferreth the common profit before private friendship.

THE LIFE OF D A T A M E S.

Datames a wife and valiant Captaine.

Presently enter into the Life of a most valiant and wise Captaine, among all the barbarous; Hamilear and Hannibal of Carthage excepted. We will speake somewhat more amply of this man, for that the most part of his Exploits are little knowne, and also because he had obtained his Victories not so much by force of Armes, as by his wisdom: a vertue in the which he did surpass all the men of his time. But this cannot be judged, unlesse we make him knowne in all particulars. Datames the Sonne of Camissares a Carian, and of a Scythian, was at the beginning a Souldier of the Guard of the Palace of Artaxerxes. His Father Camissares, because of his valiantnesse and direction in the Warres, and for that he had done many good Services unto the King, was made Governour of Cilicia, neare unto Cappadocia, where the Leucosyrans dwell. As for Datames, following the Warres, he made prooffe of his valour in the Warre which Artaxerxes had against the Caducians: where many men being slaine on both sides, he fought so valiantly, that his Father being killed, he had his Authority and place of Governour of Cilicia. He shewed himselfe no lesse valiant in Warre, then Antrophodates did by the Kings commandement unto those that had rebelled. For, by the direction of Datames, the Enemies that were now entred into the Persians Campe, were repulsd, and all the Army of the Kings in safety: the which was the cause of his calling and advancement unto higher Charges. There was at that time in Paphlagonia a Governour called Thymus, defended of an ancient Race of one Pylamenes; whom Homer saith, was slaine by Patroclus in the Warre of Troia. He not regarding the Kings will and commandement, who therefore resolved to make Warre with him, and gave the charge of it unto Datames, Cousin-germane to Thymus. By reason of Kinred, Datames would prove by all meanes he could to draw his Kinman to some conformity before he tooke Armes: he went unto him without any Train, little thinking that his friend would have laid any Ambush for him, but he had almost bene taken tardie, for Thymus fought to surpris him, and to cut his throat. Datames Mother, Aunt unto Thymus, being told what was practised against her Sonne, she did advertise him in so good time, that he escaped with speede, and proclaimed Warre against his Adversary. And although that in the pursuit of this Warre, he was forsaken of Artibazanes Governour of Lydia, of Ionis, and of all Phrygia, yet he lett not to go further: he tooke Thymus Prisoner with his Wife and Children, and then very carefully tooke order that no man but himselfe should carry newes of it to the King. So following that purpose, without any mans privy he arrived at the Court, and the next morning apparelled Thymus (a tall man and of a terrible grim looke, being blacke haired, and wearing his haire long) with a great Robe, such as great Lords use to wear. He apparelled himselfe like a Countrey man, in a Lion-tawny Coate, with a Cloake of divers colours, and an Hunters Hat, having in his right hand a Club, and in his left hand a Leace, unto the which Thymus was tied, who went before, as if he had led some savage Beast he had taken in the Chase a hunting. They all ran to see this new Monster thus disguised, and those which knew Thymus went presently and told the King of it, who at the first would believe nothing, but sent Pharnabazus to see what it was: So when he had told him what had happened, he made this pompe come in presently, and the King tooke great pleasure to see it, but specially to see so mighty a Prince beyond all hope so subdued.

Therefore after he had given sumptuous Presents unto Datames, he sent him unto the Army that was leaved under the conduct of Pharnabazus and Tithraustes, to make Warre in Egypt, and ordained that he should have as much Authority as they. Now after that the King had sent for Pharnabazus, all the charge of the Warres was committed to Datames. Who being greatly occupied about Leavies of men to go into Egypt, he received Letters from the King, commanding him to invade a Lord called Aspis, who held Cataonia, a Province joyning neare to Cappadocia beyond Cilicia, a Mountaine-Countrey, well furnished with Fortresses, that despised the King, and made Invasions upon the Provinces thereof, spoiling Victuals and all things else that were carried to the King. Though Datames was far from that place, and had other Affaires of great importance in hand, yet he determined to obey the King, and suddenly imbarqued himselfe with a small number of resolute men, thinkink (that which came to passe) that with a few men he should sooner surprize a man not dreaming of any such matter, then with a great Army to go and assaile him. He being arrived in Cilicia, landed then marcht day and night over Mount Taurus, and came to the place where he would be: he enquireth for Aspis, and understandeth that he was not far off a hunting. But as he stayed for his coming, Aspis knew that he was come, and immediately disposed of his Pisidians and others of his Train to make head. Datames knowing this resolution, takes his Armes, made his men march, and galloped to the place where Aspis was, who seeing him come with such a fury, he lost his courage to defend himselfe, and presently yeilded. Datames made him to be bound, and sent him by Mithridates to the King. Hereupon Artaxerxes considering better what he had done, drawing his Lieutenant far from his Army, to send him in Commission about a matter of lesse consequence, being angry with himselfe, sent a Messenger to the Campe, thinking Datames was not yet gone from thence, to tell him that he should not go. But before this Messenger came to the Army, he met them by the way that brought Aspis. This so sudden execution won Datames the Kings good favour, but made him very much hated of the Courtiers, seeing one onely man more made of then all the rest, which was the cause that they all joynd together to destroy him.

Datames overcometh Thymus, and leadeth him Prisoner to the Court.

Datames taketh Aspis, and sendeth him Prisoner to the King.

Pandates Treasures of the Spare, and Datames friend, did advertise him by expresse Letters, that he stood in great danger, if any sinister Fortune happened whilst he should command the Army in Egypt: that it is the custome of Kings to impute all misfortunes to their Servants that chance in their Affaires, and to attribute the good successe unto themselves: and this makes them very easily incline to the extermination of them, of whom report is made, that they have not done that which was committed to their charge: and as for him, that he should so much the more stand in feare, because those which could do most with the King, were his greatest Enemies. Datames having received these Letters in his Campe, and knowing that they carried truth with them, he resolved to forsake the King: which doing, notwithstanding he committed no breach of his fidelity. For he left Androcles Magnesian Generall of the Army, and for himselfe he went with his men into Cappadocia; afterwards he wan Paphlagonia which was hard by it, without shewing himselfe either friend or enemy of the King. He feerely contracted friendship with Ariobarzanes, assembled Forces, and gave the guard of the Townes of Warre unto those he trusted best, but the Winter did lett him that his Affaires went not forward. He understandeth that the Pisidians did leavie some Troopes to set upon him, which caused him to send his Sonne Arideus before with an Army. The young man being slaine at an Encounter, the Father marcht right thither with his men, hiding his griefe as much as he could possible, because he desired to meete with his Enemies, before those that followed him should heare of his losse, being afraid lest the newes of the death of this young Lord should kill their hearts. So being come to the place where he pretended, he camped in such sort, that the multitude of his Enemies could not inclose him, nor keepe him from coming to fight when he thought good. He brought with him Mithridates his Father-in-Law, who was Colonell of the Horsemen. He perceiving the Affaires of his Son-in-law in so poore an estate, forsooke him to go yeeld himselfe to the Enemies.

A fine Stratageme.

Datames being told of it, judged that his Souldiers, if they once perceived that his Father-in-law had forsaken him, they would also follow his example: wherefore to prevent all, he gave it out that Mithrobarzanes was gone by his commandement, pretending to yield themselves to the Enemies, to the end with more ease and advantage to cut them in pieces: and therefore that there was no reason to leave such a man so far from them, but they must needs follow him with speede. So that they standing to it lustily, the Enemies could not resist, considering they should be charged within and without their Campe. So having thought that the best way in the World, he marched into the Field with his Troopes, and followeth Mithrobarzanes, who did but newly yield themselves to the Enemies, when Datames appeared, who put out the signall of Battell. The Pisidians troubled with this strange sight, did suspect that Mithrobarzanes and his would betray them, and that they were come of purpose to do them some mischief. Thereupon they vehemently gave Charge upon these Traytors, who not knowing what to thinke of such a Charge, were constrained to fight against them unto whom they had yielded themselves, and to returne unto them whom they had forsaken. But the one and the other not knowing them any whit, in a short time these wicked men were cut in pieces. So withall Datames setteth upon the Pisidians who made head against him, passed thorow them, and brake them at the first Charge, pursued them that fled, slew a great number of them, and was master of their Campe. Note here how wisely (and all done at one time) he punished the Traytors, and put his Enemies to flight, turning that to good, which was devised for the overthrow of him and his. This is the most brave and most speedy executed Stratageme of a Chieftaine in Warres, that can be found in Histories.

The Sonne betrays the Father.

Notwithstanding that, this great Person was forsaken of his eldest Sonne Scismas, who went to the King to advertise him that his Father was revolted. This troubled Artaxerxes greatly, knowing that he had to deale with a valiant and a wife Captaine, who boldly did set upon any Enterprize with discretion. Thereupon he sent Antophradates into Capadocia, whom Datames tooke paines to go and meete, so prevent him that he should not winne the Straight of Cilicia. But being long assembling his Forces, and that hope being frustrate, he chose with those few men that followed him such a place, that his Enemies could not inclose him, nor passe, but that he should shut them up in very unwholsome places, nor hurt him when he listed to joyne in fight. Now though Antophradates understood somewhat of that, yet he made account that it was more expedient for him to joyne then to flee from the List, having so great Forces. He had twenty thousand Horse, and an hundred thousand Footmen, which they call Gardates, with three thousand Slings of the same name. Furthermore, he had eight thousand Cappadocians, ten thousand Armenians, five thousand Paphlagonians, ten thousand Phrygians, five thousand Lydi-ans, and about three thousand Assendians and Pisidians, two thousand Cilicians, as many Captains, and three thousand Greekes in pay, besides a great number of light armed men. Against this world of Forces, Datames could hope no more but in his direction, and in the commodity of the place where he camped, for he had not the twentieth part so many men. Yet trusting to himselfe, to the place, and to the valour of his men, he came to fight, and put to the Sword many thousands of his Enemies, having lost of his side but one thousand of his men. For this cause he set up the next day in the Field a signe of triumph where the Battell was fought. So being removed from thence, as he was the weaker in number of men, he to the contrary remained Victour in all Skirmishes and Fights, and never came to hands but he put his Enemy to the worfe: in the which he had oftentimes very good success, because he knew all the waies, and did wisely consider his Affaires. Antophradates seeing the King lost more in these Warres, then he got, he perswaded Datames to fall to agreement, and to make his peace with the King. Though Datames had no great trust in that, yet he accepted the condition, and said he would send Ambassadors unto Artaxerxes. And thus the Warre of the King ended against Datames; and for Antophradates, he retired into Phrygia.

Datames wary against Treason.

But the King being vexed to the heart against Datames, considering that he could not prevaile against him by Armes, sought to make him away by Treason. Datames looked warily to his waies, and avoided many Ambushes. As on a time, having understanding that some pretending to be his friends, had laid a plot for him, although his Enemies had given him intelligence of it, yet he thought, that as it was not a thing lightly to be believed, so was it not altogether to be discredited: whereupon he resolved to try whether the report was true or false. Therefore he set forward to the place where it was told him this Ambush was laid: but he chose amongst his men one that was of his height, he gave him his Furniture, and made him march in the Ranke which he was wont to hold. He on the other side apparelled like a Souldier, went with the Archers of the Guard. Those which lay in Ambush, deceived by the order and Furniture, as soon as they saw their time, began to set upon the supposed Datames. But the right Datames had warned them before with whom he marched, to be ready to do all as he did. He seeing then these Traytors running, he threw Darts at them, and so did all those that were in his Company, so that the other fell to the ground before they could come neare him whom they would surprize. Now notwithstanding all this, this so wary and subtil Captaine was in the end betrayed by the deceit of Mithridates the Sonne of Aricbarzanes, who promised the King to do the deede, so that he would afterwards suffer him to do what he thought good, without being called in question any manner of way.

Mithridates Stratagem against Datames.

The

The King consented unto it, and gave his hand upon it after the custome of the Persians, to make him more assured. Mithridates having the Kings word, made shew to be sworn Enemy unto Artaxerxes, he gathered Troopes together, and by meanes treateth friendship with Datames, he entred with a maine Army into the Kings Countrey, besiegeth and taketh Fortrefes, carrieth away great Booty, he giveth part of it to his Souldiers, he sendeth the rest unto Datames, and delivereth many Fortresses and Holds into his hands. So having continued this course a reasonable time, Datames began wholly to believe that Mithridates had undertaken a Warre which he would never leave, and this Traytor gave him great occasion to thinke so. For fearing lest Datames would mistrust some Ambush, he sought not to speake with him, nor went about to meete together, but without interview he entertained his Alliance so finely, that these two men seemed both one, not so much for mutuall benefit, as for a common hatred conceived against the King. When he saw his Snare well laid, he wrote to Datames, that time required they should assemble great Forces to make Warre against the King, and if he thought good, he would appoint a place where they might one see another, and confer together. Datames found this advice good, and so they appointed a day to meete together, and place where they might speake personally one with the other. Some daies before Mithridates came to the place, seconded with another in whom he put great trust, he hid Poignards separated in divers places, and did carefully marke the places where they were laid. The day being come of their talking together, both of them sent men to discover the place, and to search one the other, because they should be without Weapons. That being done, they enter into talke, and after they had spoken some time together, they departed: so that Datames was gone a good way off. And as for Mithridates, because he went to his men (to give no occasion of ill thought) he cometh to the same place againe where they had spoken together, and fate him downe in a place where there was a Poignard hidden, feigning to be weary and to refresh himselfe a little. Then he sent for Datames under colour that he had forgotten to tell him something. In the meane time he tooke the Poignard out of the place where it was hidden, drew it, and put it naked under his Robe. And seeing Datames, told him they must go a little aside, and that he had discovered a place directly over against them very fit to campe in. He began to shew him the place with his finger: and as Datames turned to see what it was, this Traytor stabbed him with his Poignard, and made an end of killing of him before any of his men could come to helpe him. See here how through pretence of friendship he was surprized, who had entrapped so many others by his valiant Direction, but none by Treason.

THE LIFE OF HAMILCAR.

Ann. Mund.
3700.

Ant. Christ.
248.

Hamilcar a
Leader.

Hamilcar the Sonne of Hannibal, surnamed Barcas, a Carthaginian Captaine, being very young, began to command an Army that was in Sicilia, in the end of the first Warre of Africke. Before his coming thither the Carthaginians had very ill successe both by Sea and Land; but so soone as he led the Army, he never gave place to the Enemy, and gave him no advantage to hurt him, but to the contrary, he found many an occasion to draw them to fight, wherein he had the vantage. Which being done, although the Carthaginians had well-neare lost all that they held in Sicilia, yet he kept the City of Erix so well, as it seemed that there had never beene Warre made in that Quarter. In the meane time the Carthaginians having lost a Battell at Sea neare unto the Illes Agates, against Catulus Lullatius a Romane Consull, they determined to leave Armes, and gave all the charge unto Hamilcar to treat of Peace. For his part he desired nothing but Warre: yet seeing his Towne in want of Money and Meanes, and in danger to sinke under their burthen, he concluded that they must make Peace. Yet so notwithstanding he resolved with himselfe, that as soone as all matters were pacified, he would make Warre againe, and set upon the Romanes, either to make them Lords of all, or else to compell them to be subject. With this minde he entred into Parley of Peace, where he shewed himselfe so stout, that as Catulus declared he would agree to nothing, before Hamilcar and his Souldiers which had kept Erix, had layed downe their Armes, and were gone out of Sicilia; he made answer, that he would rather die in the ruines of his Countrey, then to returne home with such shame; and that Honour would not suffer him to yeeld up his Armes to his Enemies, which his Countrey had put into his hands to be employed against them. So Catulus let him go with this obstinate resolution.

Hamilcar refused to yeeld unto dishonourable Conditions of Peace.

But when Hamilcar was arrived at Carthage, he saw matters go farre otherwise then he hoped for. For during the long Warres against the Enemies abroad, there was mischief sprung up among them within: which went on so fiercely, that Carthage was never in so great danger but when it was altogether destroyed. First of all, the mercenary Souldiers that had beene in the Warres against the Romanes, to the number of twenty thousand: they rebelling, made all Africke rise, and they besieged Carthage. The Carthaginians being greatly afraid of so many evils, they demanded aide of the Romanes, which they granted. But in the end, when all was thought to be in a desperate case; they chose Hamilcar their Captaine-Generall, who did not onely drive the Enemies farre from the Towne, which were in number above an hundred thousand fighting men, but he did also shut them up in such Straights, that the most part of them died of famine, and the rest were slaine. Furthermore, he brought the Cities which had revolted, under the obedience againe of Carthage, and amongst others Utica and Hippona, two of the strongest Cities of Africke. But not staying there, he extended the limits of the Seigniorie of Carthage, and pacified all Africke in such sort, that it seemed there had beene no Warre of long time.

Hamilcar overthrew the Enemies of his Countrey.

Hamilcar chosen Generall against the Romanes, and sent into Spain.

Now having done all things according to his minde, he bearing ill will to the Romanes, and hoping to be revenged; to finde a more easie way to draw them to Warre, he practised so well that he was chosen Generall, and they sent him with an Army into Spain, whither he carried with him his Sonne Hannibal nine yeares old, and another faire young Gentleman called Hafdrubal, whom many judge to be loved of Hamilcar otherwise then was fit for honest men. For there were many alwaies that could not containe themselves from speaking evill of this great Captaine. Which was the cause that the Governour of Hafdrubal did forbid him to come any more to Hamilcar, who afterwards gave him his Daughter in Marriage, so that they began againe to meete together. For by the custome of the Countrey they could not forbid a Sonne-in-law in-law, to frequent with his Father-in-law. We have made mention of Hafdrubal, because that after Hamilcar was slaine, he was made chiefe of the Army, which did great Exploits under his Conduct. Even so he was the first, that by Presents and Gifts corrupted the ancient Manners of the Carthaginians. After his death, Hannibal had the charge of the Army, with the consent of all the men of Warre. As for Hamilcar, he having passed the Sea, entred into Spain, and did great things there with good successe. He subdued many warlike Nations, enriched all Africke with Horses, with Armes, with men, and with Money. As he had thought to have transported the Warre from thence into Italy, nine yeares after his coming into Spain, he was slaine in a Battell against the Vellons. The deadly hate he bare unto the Romanes, seemeth to have kindled the second Warre with Africke. For his Sonne Hannibal was brought to this passe, by the continuall adjurations of his Father, that he had rather destroy himselfe, then to faile his helpe against the Romanes.

The End and Use of the following T A B L E.

The use of this Plutarch's Work (Gentle Reader) is so manifest in its Matter, and universall in respect of the persons who have occasion to peruse it: that upon advice from the judicious and illustrious Mr. Selden, of ever famous memory, and others, I have therein (for the helpe and furtherance of Student's in History and Chronologie) caused all the Lives (by him collected, and in the last Edition added, and in this continued) to be set, and ranked according to their Synchronism's, with the choicest of their Contemporaries: viz. the most famous in sacred and profane Story, for Piety, Power, Dignity, or Learning, &c. that lived either parallel, or in the same Age with them; and all this in that series and order of time wherein they fell, according to the best Account, which is this: From

The Creation to the Flood,	1656
Thence to the Promise,	363
Thence to the giving of the Law	430
Thence to the building of the Temple,	480
Thence to the end of the Captivity,	494
Thence to the beginning of Daniels seventy weekes,	78
Thence to the Passion of our Saviour,	490

All which amount unto 4001 yeares: from which substraet 34, the current yeare of our Saviours age at his Passion, and the remainder will demonstrate, that the 3967th yeare of the World, was the first yeare of our Lord; upon which Basis the following Supputation is made, without respect to any mistake in the Dionysian Era, or others; as not considerable in this businessse. In which Table observe, that there are foure Columnes; in the first whereof there is the yeare of the World, wherein those Worthies lived, mark't with A.M. for Anno Mundi, in the head thereof. In the second there is the yeare before, or after the birth of Christ, notica with C.N. for Anno ante Christum natum, the yeare before Christ was borne, or A.D. for Anno Domini, the yeare after Christ was borne. In the third there is the Names of all the Grecians and Romanes, or other famous men, whose Lives Plutarch or others have herein writ, distinguished with this Title, Romanes and Grecians. In the fourth there are the Names of the most remarkable then, or neare then living, viz. Kings, Emperours, Priests, Prophets, Apostles, Evangelists, Bishops, Philosophers, Oratours, Historians, Poets, Mathematicians, &c.

^{48. 45.} By means of Lyfander. In the Original it is, Alexander, or rather Lyfander. Who this Alexander should be, the Interpreters know not. Cruferius and Xylander think it should rather be Cleander, that suffered himself to be corrupted by Pericles, and persuaded Plifonax to remove his Army out of Attica.

NUMA, Cotemporary with Hezekiah King of Juda, and Nahum the Prophet.

^{51. 33.} The Senators one hundred and fifty. This is a mistake by all Stories, there being before the accession of the Sabines one hundred Senators, and after one hundred more, never an hundred and fifty.

^{51. 42.} Interregnum. The manner of this Interregnum differs from the relation of it elsewhere; thus the Interpreters think the words are depraved.

^{51. 62.} Sonne of Pomponius. He is elsewhere called sonne of Pompilium Pomponius.

^{54. 54.} Lady Silence. Here should be added (being in the Original) or Mute; not young man; as some have it, out of the corruption of the Greek Copies; which stands not with sense.

^{55. 29.} Martius, Numa's Nephew. That is Anens Martius fourth King of the Romans; and Nephew to Numa by his Daughter.

^{56. 55.} The Feciales. The reason of this Name is much desired; and different opinions are thereof amongst Authors. Most Latine Authors write it with a diphthong.

SOLOON, Cotemporary with Zedekiah K. of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar K. of Babylon; Jeremiah the Prophet, and Croesus.

^{57. 17.} He which built Marfilia. His Name was Marfilias, the builder of that City, Strabo in his fourth Book sets forth the Original of Marfilia.

Notes and Explications upon cially, but necessarily, as doubting; for Livy confesseth, that he doubts whether Tarquinius Superbus was the Cousen or Nephew of Priscus; he seems to incline to the latter. Dionysius Halicarnassensis shews by many reasons, that he was Nephew, lib. 4.

Called Pentlike Marble. Pausanias lib. 1. saies, there is a mountain by Athens called Pentlike, where are Marble quarries.

He began to build a City called Sigiluria. 'Tis thought this is a mistake, and that it should be Sigina, a Colony of Tarquinius.

Herminius and Lucretius. Livy and Halicarnassensis call him Lartius, not Lucretius.

Posthumus Balbus. Albus was the surname of the Posthumians; and therefore more likely the Greek, which hath Balbus, is wrong.

THEMISTOCLES, Cotemporary with Xerxes K. of Persia, Miltiades of Athens, and Eschylus the Tragician.

Abretonon I am. Emilius Probus saies, Themistocles father was a Gent. and his mother of Acarnania.

A place called Melita. A place in Athens inhabited by the Tribe of Cecrops.

Before the Altar in his Chapell. In the Greek it is only, he went to the harth of the fire, no mention of Chapell or Altar: and that is most likely; the Religion given to harths being very notorious, and equivalent to Altars, pro Aris & Focis, for Altars and harths, is trite.

And spake with his sonne there. That is Artaxerxes Longimanus.

CAMILLOUS, Cotemporary with Esdras, Artaxerxes K. of Persia, Amyntas K. of Macedonia, Isocrates the Orator, Conon D. of Athens, Lysander D. of Sparta.

PERICLES, Cotemporary with Zorobabel, who brought the Captive Jews from Babylon, Darius, His father King of Persia, Miltiades of Athens.

The Tenth book. This place sheweth, that Plutarch used to call every Greek and Roman compared, a book: so by that reason this is not the tenth but the fifth book: by which it appeareth that we lost much of Plutarch.

Zeno who was born in the City of Elea. Elea is in Lucania a City in great Greece.

As Plato said. In his book of the Common-wealth.

By Demonides Counsel or procurement. In the Greek it is Demonides of Pa, some Tribe or Village about Athens.

Thucydides of the Town of Alopecia. This Alopecia is of the Tribe of Aniob, and this Thucydides is not the Historian, but another, as by comparing of times appears.

As Plato saith. In Phaedro and Gorgias.

That he did not believe in the Gods. The Greek hath it so, but onely thus; He was accused of irreligiosity.

Cylon's Rebellion. This you may read of in the Life of Solon.

Were sold for slaves. It seemeth rather that they were onely disfranchised, not sold.

They call heaven. The place is in the sixth of Homers Odysses.

Being a man of very ill disposition in nature. The Greek hath it, being of a prodigal nature, and this is more congruous, for that it followes he grudged at his father's hardiness.

FABIUS MAXIMUS, Cotemporary with Alexander the Great. Fergus first King of Scotland.

That which they took for dulness in him. The Greek seems to be mistaken, the word there which signifies good activeness, should rather be (and so some have corrected it) unactiveness.

So soon as the Prætor Pomponius had received the news, he called the people to Council. Both the Consuls being absent, the Prætors supplied the Consuls place, as anciently, so several Authors have it, and amongst the rest Cicero in his tenth Epistle to Plancus.

Lucius Minutius General of the Horse. Livy constantly calls him Marcus Minutius.

He vowed. That he would sacrifice all the profits and fruits that should fall the next year of sheep, &c. it is in the Original what the spring should bring forth; and this by Livy is called the holy spring.

spring, lib. 22. c. 34, &c. and that was called the holy spring, which was brought forth betwixt the Gelds of Marah, and the day before the Calends of May.

154. 8.

He slapped his hand on his thigh. A gesture of sorrow and indignation. So in the life of Pompey, when he received the news of the passing of the Manilian Law, he slapped his hand on his thigh.
Cicero in his first book to Atticus, seems to bring in striking of the forehead in stead thereof, or rather both, in his Oration for Q. Gallus, where he reproves M. Calpurnius for reproaching him; there was sayes he, no trouble of minde or body, no striking of the forehead or thigh, &c.

156. 60.

Barca a Carthaginian. Livy calls him Maherbal.

161. 35.

Fabius his great Grandfather. Fabius Rullus

162. 57.

A little Iron-Spit. It is more likely to be a little peice of money of Iron, such as was then used, for the same word here, obolisum, in the life of Lyfander, taken for such a peice of iron money, and that he had nothing in his house but an iron spit, is improbable.

164. 28.

And yet Fabius might spend no great revenue, for his whole receipt came onely to six Talents. This is mistranslated, for in the Greek it runs thus, Fabius redeemed prisoners with his own money, yet it was no great sum, it amounted onely to six Talents. These Prisoners were in number (as Plutarch above sayes) 240. Livy adds seven more. It was agreed they should pay a 50. pence for each prisoner, so according to Plutarch's number, there were precisely ten Talents paid for them, not onely six which perhaps is a mistake, because sixty pound, that is six thousand pence, make one Talent.

164. 28.

ALCIBIADES, Was Cotemporary with Haggai, and Zacharias the Prophets, Darius Nothus

fetch home persons abroad, that were Delinquents, to be brought in judgement.

In the fight of the Dictator. He was A. Postumius Albus. So Livy hath it in his second book.

Called eaters of Acornes. The Oracle is cited amongst many Authors, and Herodotus hath it in his first book. Dionysius in his first book of Romane Antiquities, sayes, that the Aborigines or Natives, from whom the Romanes descended, and were encreased, came out of Arcadia into Italy; so that the Romanes seem to take that custom from the Arcadians.

There were three voices odd that condemned him. In the original it is, three Tribes giving their votes, they were three that condemned him. At that time there were in Rome twenty one Tribes, as it appears out of Dionysius and Livy, saying that in Livy, in the second book (a little before the History of Coriolanus) thirty is erroneously set down for twenty. Now if the greater part absolved him, which must be, if three Tribes onely condemned him: surely then he had not been condemned.
Therefore tis to be understood, that Coriolanus was absolved onely by nine Tribes, and condemned by twelve, that is, by three more then those, by which he was absolved. So Dionysius hath it in his seventh book.

194. 27.

As many footmen to them, who alwayes join'd with them in battel. The Greek word signifieth foot-horseman fell, mounted his horse. So Livy hath it, lib 44.

Mountaine.

After these words, viz. in an Oration Cato made before the people of Rome, should follow these words as it is in Greek Original. Livy saith, he that was killed was a Gall, that had run away, and that Lucius did not cause the man to be killed by the Executioner, but he killed him with his own hand; now Lucius being thus shamefully, &c. in the life of Flaminius this is more fully set down.

This only man, &c. It is in Homers Odyssey, tenth book, speaking of Tyresias, the only wife ghost amongst all the ghosts in hell.

Cato the Philosopher. That was Cato Uticensis, or Cato Minor; whose life follows afterwards.

Hesiod the Poet, that commendeth justice so much. This is in his work of husbandry. Homers Verses in the fourth of his Odysseys.

Itanus the Historiographer. Gnaivius calls him Hyrranus, and more likely, the name of Itanus not known.

Terentius Culeo. It is Leo in the Greek, but Culeo is more likely, so Livy hath it, and one Culeo is mentioned in Pompeys life, that persuaded him to put away Julia.

When he was General he did drive Nabis. It is so in the Greek, but questionless mistaken, for so should Plato directly contradict himself, in the life of Philopomen, where he saies, that Philopomen being then not in authority, drove out Nabu. So the Negative doubtless is left out in the Greek corrupted by some transcribers, it should be, he not being a General, drove out Nabu; and this agrees too with the purpose and nature of this discourse.

PYRRHUS, Cotemporary with Seleucus King of Syria, Demetrius King of Asia, Ptolemy Philadelphus King of Egypt, Menander the Poet. Manius son of Fergusius King of Scotland. Pyrrhus descended from Pyrrhus the son of Achilles.

He had no teeth in his upper jaw. Pliny writes that Prusias King of Bythinia had the like.

Let them for me divide. It is in Euripides in the beginning of the Phœnissæ.

His horse Nisæra. It should be his Nisæan horse, and not the name of his horse. Nisæa is a Country of Parthines, near the Caspian mountains, which breeds most excellent horses, which the Kings themselves used. So saies Strabo lib. 11. and Plin. lib. 6. c. 25.

Desired the watchword of him. The Greek word signifies rather a truce or league, then a watchword; and so it seems rather by the sense.

Wickedness of their Governors. Demagogus in the Greek. See above, the notes upon Themistocles.

Now the Cimbrians came out of the North, there indeed was their habitation; but they having been overthrown in Gallia, by Mallius and Cepio went into Spain and returned into Gallia, and joyned with the Teutons or Germans, so they were truly said to come from the west.

Ambrons, Ambrons. And a little after it followes, and the Lyguriars answered them, with the like noise and cry, Lyguriars, &c. The Greek hath it not so, but that the Lyguriars answered them with the like noise and cry, and no more; and likely it is, they cryed also Ambrons, Ambrons, &c. for Sextus Pompeius Festus, saies the Ambrons were a Gallick people; and Strabo in his fourth book, speaks of a victory, the Marfilians had of our Ambrons, and the Marfilians are next neighbors, and so the Lyguriars. The Lyguriars affirmed, the Ambrons was their ancient name.

Durst not once see your backs, nor you them in the faces. The Greek word signifies the hinder part of the head; so that rather it is, they were both alike Cowards, and fled from one another, at one and the same time.

That Ulysses was not subtle alone. Because Ulysses, who had the fame of so wise and subtle a man, yet was over-reached and discovered by Palamedes, when he (Ulysses) feigned himself mad to avoide going to the Trojan war. So subtle Lysander was over-reachd by the more subtle Pharnabazus.

CIMON, Cotemporary with Xerxes, in Scripture, Ahasuerus husband of Esther, Thrasibulus King of Sicily.

411. 32.

Elpinice did not secretly company with her brother Cimon, but lived with him openly as his lawful married wife. The Author of the book of Illustrious persons, which some say, is, Emilius Probus, writes that it was lawful for the Athenians to marry their sisters, begotten of the same father, but of another mother, and the fault in Cimon was, that he lay with her, not having married her. Plutarch in the life of Themistocles says, that his son Arsechtole married his sister Antistiolema, born to Themistocles by another mother.

It bringeth forth. Homer in his fourth book of Odysses.

559. 12.

Ephipolis. 'Tis a part of Syracusa, some Greek copies have Epistola, for Epipola, which brought Gnarinus into an error, talking of Epistles or letters about Nicias his coming. Taphus is a little Peninsule near Syracusa reaching to the Sea.

MARCELLUS CRASSUS, Cotemporary with Hyrcanus King of the Jews, Pompey, Ptolemy Antiochus King of Egypt, Julius Caesar.

In the beginning 'tis said of Crassus, that one of his brethren being dead, he married his wife by whom he had children. The Greek word signifieth living together, nor marrying, neither did ever the Romans use to marry their brothers wives. He kept her and his children in his house in meer humanity, had it been otherwise, how could Plutarch have so commended his temperance continency and modesty.

467. 46.

One Alexander did read to him. This is supposed to be Alexander the Milesian, who is called Polyhistor and Cornelius, who, as Suidas says, lived in Sylla's dayes.

472. 12.

Onatius Aurelius. It is Ornatius in the Greek, but in the life of Pompey, where the same story is told he is called Caius Aurelius.

474. 16.

To call him Imperator, that is, sovereign Captain. Appian says it was unusual to be so called till they had killed ten thousand of the enemies; and never given but upon some great victory and therefore Crassus is justly taxed of pusillanimity and vain-glory.

474. 35.

So the goddess Hierapolis. The goddess of Hierapolis, that is Juno of the Assyrians.

475. 20.

Upon the Bridge he had made over the River Euphrates. In the Greek it is only thus, As he passed his Army over the Zengma, &c. this is a City standing upon Euphrates, much spoken of by Historians, for the bridge of chains made there over Euphrates, by Alexander the great.

475. 52.

Came one Arimenes to him. Appian calls him Ascharus, and Dio. lib. 40. Anragus.

482. 15.

Aesop. Stobaeus hath this saying of Aesop.

SERTORIUS, Cotemporary, as in the next precedent.

486. 13.

The other by his lovers. Apothrinus in his fourth book, § 75. speaks of this.

489. 21.

The Isle of Pituisa. In the Balearick Seas, are two little Islands, called Pituisa, whereof the greater is Ebysus, and the lesser Ophiusa. So Ptolemy in his discription of Spain.

492. 23.

A custome at that time in Spaine. Dio. in his fifty fifth book, speaketh of such a custome, says one Pacuvius had so devoted himself to Augustus, and persuaded others to do the like. Caesar in the third book of his Commentaries, of the Gallicks war, writes the like of the soldiery, as he calls them, of the Galli Sentiates.

494. 20.

By the City of Tutua. 'Tis supposed to be Duria. So in Pompey's Epistle to the Senates, which is extant among the tables of shipwrack. Salust says the enemies Tents were taken at Sacro and the battel at Duria. Tully in the beginning of his Oration for Cornelius Balbus, mentions this battel at Duria.

EUMENES, Cotemporary with the next president.

501. 40.

A troop of three thousand men at Armes. It seemeth by the Original, he put them into several Troops, making up a Regiment, as we call it.

504. 44.

A City of Cyndes. It is Quinda, a Castle of Cicilia above Anchiala, where the Macedonians kept their treasure. Strabo. lib. 24. So in the life of Demetrius.

640. 8.

Which he did not by fear and terror. The Greek hath it, He did not take from them the fear of his power. He mixed his power with the reasons he gave them, to satisfy them in the Justice of his commands.

640. 52.

Silver that was molten there. Next after these words follow thus, viz. But such think that their writings should be as farre from contrallment, as their doings: None of this is in the Greek. But this follows next, So he thought that he might do what he list, without punishment, not only with his sword, but his pen too. Here is something amiss: 'tis to be supposed, as is noted in the Margin, this is to be referred to Caesar, that wrote the Anti-Cato.

650. 31.

They gave Cato an extraordinary Prætorship. That was in regard of his age: He was but 38 years of age, and it was not to be conferr'd on any under 40.

651. 18.

Should presently go to their charge. For some, after they were design'd, were put out again for corruption or other crimes. So were P. Antonius, and P. Sylla, saith Dio in his 30th Book. Catiline saith Salust. Julius saith Suetonius.

655. 7.

Unlikelihoode first I disprove. It is in Euripides his Hercules Furens. It is Amphitrno his answer to Lycas, who said Hercules was fearfull; all one, as one should call Bellerophon justfull, Lucretia immodest, or Ulysses foolish.

AGIS, Cotemporary with Aratus of Lycia, Antigonus King of Macedonia, Marcellus the Roman.

663. 17.

Agis was of the House of the Eurionides. There were two Royall families of the Lacedæmonians, one of the Eurionides or Euripentides, and the other of the Agids.

663. 20.

At Mundanum. This name is not mentioned in other Histories. Diodorus Siculus in his sixteenth Book mentions this History, and saies, it hapned the same day that Philip overcame the Greeks at Chæronia. Pausanias mentions the same.

665. 8.

For otherwise Terpander, Thales. This is Thales of Crete spoken of in the Life of Lysurgus.

668. 14.

Into that place called the Decade. Most Interpreters conceive it should be Caiade, which the Greek Lexicon saies, was a Prison of the Kings. So call it Thucydides and others.

668. 42.

Since the Durians. These were of the posterity of Hercules, of whom there is much mention in Pausanias in his Argolicks, and by Diodorus in his fourth Book.

CLEOMENES, Cotemporary as Agis next before.

669. 50.

The City of Belvina. This is in Laconia, there is an Island also of that name near Ægina.

670. 32.

Called Leuctra. Polybius in his second Book, writing this story, calls it not Leuctra, but Laodicea; and every where, where it is Lydiadas, it should be Lydiadas.

670. near the bottom.

Alsea. It seems to be some City of Arcadia; but it is more likely the name is Alas, mentioned by Pliny, lib. 4. and others.

671. Verses.

That fear cannot be without shamefastness. Out of what Poet it is taken appears not: But it is very antient, because Platon in his Euthyphron, disputes of it. The other first place of Homer, Of truth I do confess in the third of his Iliads, and the next verse in the fourth.

A little lower.

In the suburbs called Cyllabaris. In the Greek Cyllarabis. It was an Academy about 300 paces from Argos; So Livy in his 34th Book, and Pausanias in his 2^d Book. So called of Cyllarabus the sonne of Schenelus.

679. 50.

Old K. Ptolomy deceasing. That is Ptolomy Evergates, to whom succeeded Philopater. So Polybius lib. 5.

The Verses there.

It irks the Nobles hearts. It is in the first of the Iliads.

TIBERIUS, and CAIUS GRACCHI, Cotemporaries with the same as Agis and Cleomenes.

688. 8.

A like number of the Roman Knights. Livy saies a double number.

688. 33.

Blossius the Philosopher. It is Blossius in the Greek.

688. 47.

Flavius Flaccus. 'Tis most probable this is M. Fulvius Flaccus, who joining himself with Caius Gracchus in making these pernicious Laws, was slain with him.

689. 33.

And what if he had commanded. Cicero, and Valerius Maximus say, Lelius askt this question.

The Verses there.

Such end upon him ever light. First Book of the Odysses, they are the words of Minerva at the death of Ægiffhus slain by Orestes for adultery, and the death of Agamemnon.

690. 21.

Cicero the Orator saith. In his first Book of Divination.

690. 50.

The space of three years. Gellius saith two years.

690. 54.

A Conspiracy in the City of Iregelles. See Livy in his 60th Book.

693. 26.

Lucius Hostilius. Arstin and Sigonius call him Opimius, he who the year after being Consul, kill'd the Gracchi.

694. 18.

Antyllus. Appian calls him Attilius, and tells the story otherwise.

698. 2.

As Plato said. In the fourth Book of his Commonwealth.

DEMOSTHENES, Cotemporary with Nehemiah, Artaxerxes K. of Persia, Manlius Torquatus, Philip K. of Macedon, Diogenes the Cynick, Plato.

700. the Verses

In this behalf a man. It is a Proverb, the Dolphin is strong at Sea, nothing at Land, meant of such as undertake things above their strength, out of their sphere.

701. 16.

Demosthenes had been Plato's Scholar. So Cicero in many places affirms.

709. 51.

Calauria. In the Greek it is Calabria, but in Latine properly pronounced Calauria.

MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO, Cotemporary with Aristobulus K. of Judea, Ptolomy Auletes K. of Ægypt, Pompey, Caesar.

711. 5.

Tullus Appius. It should be Tullus Attius K. of the Volces, to whom Coriolanus, when banished, fled, so Livy in his 2^d Book. Dionysius in his 8th Book in the beginning, and in the Life of Coriolanus.

711. 32.

Plato thought not. In the beginning of his 6th Book of a Commonwealth, he disputes hereof.

713. 31.

There happened a pretty jest. He speaks of this in his Oration for Plancus, but tells it different from this.

714. 16.

Within the confines of the City of Arpes. Arpinum in Campania, this Pliny witnesseth in his third Book, 5. Arpes is a City in Apulia, in another part of Italy.

714. 35.

Licinius Macer. This is C. Macer, whom he mentions in his first Book, and third Epistle to Atticus. Valerius Maximus lib. 9. c. 13. tells the story otherwise.

714. 49.

No more have I, said he, such a swollen neck as thou hast. In the Greek it is such a neck, or so great a neck, which some think was spoken of his too much confidence or impudence, as it is used to be said of such men, they are of a strong or stiff neck. So Marcius, as Plutarch saies, answered in the Senate, speaking of the Saturnian Law, that he had not so broad a neck, as he durst offer in any thing of so weighty a matter. Others say, that here Tully eloquently twisted Vatinius with the disease of kernels in his neck, which we call Struma, the Kings Evil.

715. 36.

Deposed from their Dignities and Offices in Rome. That is the sons of such as were proscribed by Sylla.

Notes and Explications upon

716. 6.
M. Otis. None were to be accounted Knights, except they were worth 4000 Sesteria, as Jun-venal, Horace, and Suetonius have it.

720. 50.
Atticus. Cicero in his first Epistle of his first Book to Atticus, speaks of one Atticus an Usurer.

721. 23.
Adraffus. Married his two daughters to Tydenus and Polynisus, two banished men.
The Verses there.

This man hath gotten children in despite of Phcebus. This Verse was made of Lains.

727. 7.
In Lentulus house, whose second wife she was. Lentulus is here for Dolabella.

729. 47.

DEMETRIUS, Cotemporary with Pyrrhus, Ptolomy Lagus K. of Egypt, Quintus Fabius Maximus.

738. near the bottom.
But was it of Thafos or Chios, that rheume. So the Germans usually, when a man excuses his long Ray by reason of floods and inundations; they will say the waters have bodied, but wine none.

741. in the bottom.
Called Demetrius a Fable. In places usually Lamia, Fairies or Hobgoblins were brought in.

743. 13.
But how should they know me. The Greek hath it, what other mark have they to shew at but me? and this agrees best with the sense, being left destitute of all his friends.

745. 51.
At a place called Deion. The name is Dium a City in Macedonia, below the City Pydna, on the Sea coast in the Bay of Therma.

746. 42.
Erasistratus the Physician. Galen reports such another story of himself.

746. 50.

MARCUS ANTONIUS, Cotemporary with Herod King of the Jews, Julius Caesar, Augustus, Tully.

757. 24.
Antonius General of the horsemen, and sent him to Rome. In the Greek it is Tribune of the people; and here are some lines wanting, as 'tis supposed.

760. 41.
Munatius Plancus. This is Lucius Munatius Plancus, of whom Cicero often speaks in his tenth Book of his familiar Epistles.

760. 46.
Surnamed Corylon. Tully calls him Lucius Varius Coryla. Called Corylo, of a measure of drink so called.

761. 35.
Because of a dream one of his friends had. This was Artorius his Physician, as Dio in his 47th Book. Valerius lib. 1. c. 7. and others.

762. 58.
He did her great honour, and persuaded her. In the Greek next after it follows (as Homer saith) which is here left out. Plutarch alludes to the place in the 12th of the Odyssey, which speaks of Circe meeting of Ulysses returning out of hell.

765. in the bottom.
Water of the Fountain Clepsydra. A Fountain so called in the Tower of Athens, that takes in and lets out water (like a water Diall or Clepsydra) being fill'd when the North-winde blows, and empties with the contrary as Nilus doth.

765. 15.
Called before Bombyci. It is Borbace in the Text; but Appian, and Strabo in his 16th Book, and Pliny in his 5th and 23th Book, calls it Bambyce a City in Syria.

783. 1.
To many Caesars. Alluding to that of Homer, in the second of his Iliads.

786. 6.
As Paris found. Alluding to that of Homer in the 3^d of his Iliads towards the end.

ARTAXERXES, Cotemporary with Camillus the Roman, Lyfander the Graecian, Malachias the Prophet, Aristophanes.

PLUTARCH'S Lives.

792. 2.
To fight they seemed to be no less then twenty thousand. It appears not of which side those were slain. Diodorus Siculus saies there were slain of Artaxerxes men more then fifteen thousand, of Cyrus his men about three thousand.

793. 52.
Praised him to help him to a comb. This is set down by Plutarch, to shew Ctesias his babling, and impertinent talk.

793. 55.
The Dance of Coryatides. A kinde of Dance, which Cassor and Pollux taught the Lacedemonians at Caria a Town of Sparta.

796. 31.
He began to make warre also With the Egyptians. Diodorus Siculus in his 20th Book, describeth this warre elegantly.

799. 1.
The great Oromazes. He was God of the Persians, the same which we call the Sunne. This is plain out of Plutarch's Book of Isis and Osiris, and others.

DION, Cotemporary with Artaxerxes K. of Persia, Esdras, Camillus the Roman, Isocrates, Lyfander the Spartan, Plato, Dionysius the Tyrant of Sicily.

798. 1.
Like to Simonides. This Verse is mentioned by Aristotle, in the first Volume of his Rhetoricks. c. 6.

800. 6.
Arete was married to his brother Theurides. In the Greek it appears not whether she were married to Dionysius her brother, or to her own. 'Tis more likely 'twas to Dionysius his brother. For Emilius Probus, who passeth by this marriage, calls Hypparinus and Nyssem brothers to Arete.

807. 15.
Beating them to death With slaves. The Greek hath it they were sorely punished. 'Tis the same word in the Greek; which we in the 11th of the Hebrews, ver. 35. translate tortured.

815. 20.
As Plato saith. In the eighth Book of his Commonwealth.

815. near the bottom.
Howbeit shortly after his f-ine. Emilius Probus relates this after another manner; That this son having lived riotously, and his Father urging him to temperance, he would not endure it.

MARCUS BRUTUS, Cotemporary with Julius Caesar, Augustus, Cicero, &c.

817. 16.
Of the blood of Servilius Hala. Ala is the name, so called axilla contracted, the arm-pit; and 'tis not unlikely of that carrying the sword under his arm, as follows, he got that name of Axilla, contracted to Ala. The Romans have taken names upon as small occasions. That sometimes he was called Axilla, appears by Tullies Book to Brutus, called the Orator; where he calls him Servilius Axilla.

819. 59.
Think ye that Brutus will not tarry till this body die? The Greek rather renders it, Doth it not seem to you that Brutus expects this body? that is, his death.

824. 19.
But there was a Poet called Cinna. The Greek rather renders it, an Active man, conversant in matters of State: So was C. Helius Cinna Tribune of the people, as Dion. lib. 44. Appian lib. 2. Valerius Maximus l. 9. c. 9. Yet some think this was that Poet Cinna that made the Poem called Smyrna, which Catullus commends.

826. 12.
Hereof we have spoken at large in other places. In his Book De Convivialibus, Quest. 6. c. 8.

829. the Verses.
My Lords I pray you. First of the Iliads, about the appeasing the dissention twixt Achilles and Agamemnon.

930. 40.
Another place called Symbolon. It is an hill at Philippi, meeting with the hill Pangaum. Dion relates this story in his 47th Book.

931. 34.
'Because it was his Birth-day. This seems as though it was Cassius his birth-day; but it is rather to be supposed that it was Messala's birth-day; and that Messala invited Cassius to supper, as on his, that is, Messala's birth-day: If it were Cassius his birth-day, then he died on his birth-day, as Pompey and Attalus did; which examples Plutarch mentioning in the Life of Camillus: 'tis not likely he would have omitted it here.

Notes and Explications upon

833. 27.

The soldiers slaves, whom Brutus called Brigæ. Eustathius on the first Book of Homers Odysses, saies the Barbarians were so called, they seem to be slaves set free to bear Arms; unless rather skulldions or herdsmen, for in the Greek they are called, Household-people.

835. the Verses.

Let not the wight It is a curse upon Antonius, for not joining with him to assert the Liberty of his Country as he might have done. Brutus for that purpose sparing him when he might have killed him, at that time when he slew Julius Cæsar. The Verses are in Euripides, Medea that cursed Jas-son, by whom she was betrayed.

836. 22.

Valerius Maximus he writes. Lib. 4. c. 6.

ARATVS, Cotemporary with Antiochus Soter K. of Syria, Antigonus Gonatus K. of Macedonia, Ptolemy Philadelphus K. of Egypt, Papyrius Cursor the Roman, Fergusius K. of Scotland.

To get in but that way. After these words in the Greek, follows, viz. The ladders were loose not fastened together: these they threw into baskets, wherein they measure corn. All this is left out.

852. 21.

Like to Æsops Hunter that bridled his horse. That of bridling the horse is not in the Greek: but Æsops Fable is common of him, that Hunter that bridled the Horse, and hunted the Stag.

853. 13.

So K. Cleomenes joyning unto him all the people dwelling along the Sea-coast, commonly called the River of Corinth. In the Greek 'tis, But Cleomenes, when the people that dwell about Acte came to him, &c. Now this Acte is a Country of Peloponnese, on the Sea-coast toward Corinth.

GALBA, Cotemporary with Clemens Bishop of Rome, Ebion the Heretique, Dardanus K. of Scotland, Josephus, Solinus.

861. 10.

Together with Tigellinus. Here should follow [as is afore said] so is the Greek; which shews that Plutarch writ the Life of Nero, and probably of the rest of the Emperors to Trajan: Great is the loss of these.

861. 40.

The wretched Officers of Nero. The Greek word signifies Procurators Proctors, whose Office was principally to look after the Treasury of the Provinces, to which they were sent. Augustus was the first that sent them, as Dio in his 53^d Book hath it: Afterwards their power and extortion grew very great, as Suetonius hath it; and Tacitus specially in his 16th Book. Pontius Pilate was Procurator of Judea, as Tacitus hath it.

868. 10.

Patrobius and Vitellius. Tacitus and Suetonius never mentioning any Vitellius, but only Patrobius.

The Value of the Greek and Roman Monies.

Where Monies are mentioned to be paid by the Greeks, 'tis doubtless with Greek Coin: So the Reader is to consult the value of the Greek Monies. And so of the contrary, the Romans.

STATIONER
Courteous READER.

Having been desired, and encouraged, by several Persons of Honor, to venture upon a new and fifth Impression of Plutarchs Noble Grecians and Romanes Lives, and considering with my self in which way I might render this worke both ^{useful} ~~useful~~ able to the present Age, and famous to Posterity. I pitched upon an Additional Select Collection of some choice Portraitures and Lives, both of Grecian, Latine, and Pagan, Illustrious Personages; Memorable for their Actions, Sentences, and Writings, which I have hereunto annexed. The work it self was Originally written in French by Andr. Thevet Cosmographer to Henry the third the French King at his Masters request. And being it is the very marrow of his Observations during his twenty three yeers travails and Peregrinations, throughout the chiefeest and remotest parts in the world, whereby he procured unto himself an Intrinsicke experience, both of Men and Places. I deemed that this Additional extract (never as yet extant nor seen in English) would not in the least detract from Plutarchs Famous Worthies, but to the contray add more lustre to their Memories; by evidencing to the world, that after Ages were not barren in producing as rare and Heroick Spirits as the former, and as able Pen Men (in imitation of Plutarch) to remit unto Posterity their immortal renowns. I have also caused their Effigies, or Sculptures to be inserted, exquisitely cut in Copper Plates, conformable unto those which our French Author had prefixed to his (which by repute are at present esteemed by all the Artists of our Nation to equal all others of that kinde: and they are only added in this our Translation for the Illustration of the Worke and Satisfaction of of the Readers curiosity

My only drift by this my Additional Collection, is, thereby to stir up our English Worthies to follow the footsteps of several of their Country men (whose Lives are hereunto annexed, as well as divers others who have excelled amidst other Nations, in their several professions and eminent conditions) that so they may acquire unto themselves an equal glory to theirs. Finally least I should seem too much to dote upon this my undertaking, I will forbear to enlarge on the benefit and advantage which may accrew by my presenting you with this pretious Record; so accounted of by all the best Wits and Learned Men in France, both by Reason of its impartial relations, ample and copious deductions, spaciousness, antiquity and scarcity; as also in regard of its excellent Plates (as aforesaid) all which hath rendred it so considerable in France it self, as that it is hardly to be compassed there under the sum of four or five pounds. In regard whereof, I deemed it could not chuse, but be a Worke very acceptable to present you with the better part of it; the whole being of too great a bulcke to be here inserted, and the choice Lives and Pourtraitures which you will hereunto finde annexed having been adjudged to be the very quintessence of Andrew Thevet's labors: in confidence they will please, I shall commit you to the Almightyes Protection, &c.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE the Great, THE FIRST Christian Emperour of ROME.

Ann. Mund.
4255.

Post Christ.
306.

Has Mortal can sufficiently respect and honour the memory of this most Valiant Emperour Constantine? who for his Rare and Eminent Vertues, was surnamed the Great, as the sole person, who being the first supporter of Christianity, and the most happy and wise enlarger of the Empire, hath deserved solely, and primarily amongst all the Romana Emperours, to be accounted of and received as a God, even by the Infidels and Barbarians who were not subject unto his power, nor as then acquainted with the knowledge of a true God. So likewise on the other side the Christians themselves, the Grecians, and the other Easterne Nations, by an excess of admiration of his Praise-worthy and Heroicall Acts, have worthily placed him in the ranke of the Blessed. He was the Sonne of Constantius, and of a certaine Matron called Hellen, not unlawfully begotten, as some have pretended; for she was his first legitimate wife, a most

most Devoute and Christian-like Lady, who did carefully and diligently instruct him, her Son, in the true Belief in so much that by the great hopes which his Father conceived of the singular good Nature, and the sweet and Docile behaviour of his Son Constantine, he preferred him to his Wives Theodora children. And amongst the rest of Constantines Vertues and Graces (for he possessed many) his Liberality and Magnificence whereby he got his first footing into the Empire, and acquired unto himself the Love and Affection of the most noblest Princes, were not the least observable. For succeeding his Father in the Government of the Gauls or French, and of England, then called Great Britain, of which he was the fourth King; being requested by the Romans to ingage in their relief against the cruelties of the haughty Tyrant Maxentius; he undertooke that expedition in the year three hundred and nine, in the which year he was chosen and created the four and fortieth Emperor, by the general consent of all the People, for to deliver and avenge them from the injuries which they did receive by the said Tyrant; and having finally gained the Victory, Maxentius being also slain, he was received Victorious and Triumphant into Rome, where he was no sooner arrived, but he caused an Edict to be published, that from thence forwards no search or inquiry should be made after Christians, nor any punishment should be inflicted on them. But as he was deliberating how to resist the oppositions and stratagems of Maximinus, he became on a sudden infected with a Leprosie; and whereas no cure could be found, some Physicians perswading him to wash himself in a Bath made of young Childrens blood, he being moved unto compassion by the Parents tears and moans, would not suffer them to be killed; but in the ensuing night a holy Vision appeared unto him; and wished him to address himself unto Silvester Bishop of Rome, who would discover unto him a Salutary Bath; by the washing whereof he should recover his health, which he accordingly did, and by the receiving of Baptism was cured of his Leprosie. After which time being fervent and zealous in the Love of God and his Cause, he instituted and ordained severall good Laws to the advantage and repose of the Christians: he caused the Idols to be demolished and cast down, and rooted out their Temples and Groves, forbad them to be any longer worshipped or called Gods: caused a Church to be built in his Palace, invited all men to receive Baptism, and conferred on godly and salutary Ordinances, together with Silvester and the other Bishops, which being understood by Maximinus, his Co-partner in the Empire, he was sore displeased, and raised an Army to expell him, but Constantine having gotten the start of him, bearing the signe of the Cross in his Ensignes, encountred him, and overcame him in two Battels. By this means the Christians being settled in Peace again, the Church began to sprout out and flourish anew, Constantine endowing it with several Immunities, Privileges, Rents, Donations, Magnificences, Liberalities and Possessions. And whereas there happened some discords and divisions between the Churches concerning their Ceremonies, he ordained and proclaimed two Synods or Assemblies of Bishops and Priests, in which the controversies and points of Religion should be determined. Much about this time Licinius, unto whom Constantine had given his Sister in Marriage, and had made him his Consort or Companion in the Empire, rebelled against him, and endeavored to thrust him out; but Constantine being advertised of his enterprise, drew forth his Army, defeated him in Hungary, pursued him into Macedonia, where he was recruiting his Forces, drove him out of Asia, and pursued him so close at the heels, that at length he was forced to surrender himself, finding that he was overcome both by Sea and Land: he was sent into Thessalony, in a kinde of exile, there to lead a private life, however at length he could not avoide the due vengeance of his audacious attempt, cruelty, and disloyalty, for he was slain by Constantines Guards about the three hundred and four and twentieth year of our Lord. Moreover Constantine took Bizantium a City in Greece, which had been formerly destroyed by Galiennus and Pertinax, and causing it to be built up anew, he called it by his own name Constantinople, erecting many Trophies of the Cross in it, and consecrating severall Churches in it, to the honour of God, of the Apostles, and of the glorious Martyrs. And it is a wonderful and most observable thing, that this most flourishing City, thus enriched, re-edified, and embellished, even from the very foundation by the aforesaid Constantine, Son of that Saint-like Hellen, was by a fatal destiny, during the Reigne of another Constantine, whose Mothers name was also Hellen taken and conquered by Mahomet (the first of that Name) Emperor of the Turkes, in the year one thousand four hundred fifty and two, under whose power and subjection (as also of his successors) it hath remained ever since that time to this very day. This said Emperor Constantine did transport the Imperiall Seat out of Italy in the year three hundred and thirty, unto Constantinople the aforesaid City of Greece, where it remained for the space of almost four hundred years, before the Imperiall Eagle bore two heads, that is to say, before the Romane Empire was divided into two, which happened in the year after the birth of the Saviour and Redeemer of all the world, seven hundred threescore and sixteen; at which time Charles surnamed also the Great, did likewise obtaine the Imperiall dignity in the Western Churches, leaving the Eastern Empire unto the Greeks (by the partition which was made between himself and Heraclius. And although before this said division, the aforesaid Emperors did reside at Constantinople; yet however they had the administration of the Eastern Empire, which they did Govern either by themselves, or by some other Deputy who was of kin or alliance unto them by some other way of affinity, whom they also created Cæsars. And this kinde of Government did last, until the time of Valentinian the third.

And again, its very observable in this place, that the Romane Empire, having been transported into Greece by an Emperor surnamed the Great, hath also been brought backe again into the West by another Emperor, also surnamed the Great. But to return to our Constantine, as the whole Empire did only during during Constantine the Greats Reigne, enjoy, and reap an entire Peace, and incomparable Glory, and that the Christian Church was mainly increased in number, perfection, and honor. So the enemy of mankind not being able to brook such a tranquillity, did solicitate and stir up the Heretick Arius, who for so many Ages together hath poysoned all the parts of the earth with his blasphemies and false erroneous opinions, sowing a division betwixt the Bishops and the Churches; some adhering unto his doctrine, others detesting the same, whereby there grew a great commotion and confusion in the Church, which coming to Constantines ears, he was much grieved thereat, and thought it was his duty to rectifie the same; and therefore caused some Synods and Assemblies to meet, for to dive into the questions and dissensions of Arius; the Emperor himself writing to the Prelates, beseeching and admonishing them to maintain the truth, however the gaffe grew wider and wider, parties becoming daily more bitter and envenomed against each other, which to prevent in a more ample manner, the Emperor sent his Letters Pattents throughout the whole Empire, and commanded all the Bishops and Learned Persons to Assemble at Nicea, a City in Bithinia in Asia; at which Synod there appeared three hundred and eighteen Bishops, with as many, if not more, Deacons and Doctors, which was the first Council held in the Greek and Latine Church. It would be a matter of too much prolixity, to run over all the memorable sayings and speeches uttered by Constantine himself in this universal Council touching Peace, Concord, Amity, the comportments of Christians, and the duties to be performed by them. I will onely mention that worthy sentence which he preferred when some Bishops did present unto him certaine injurious, slanderous, and libellous writings, concerning the vices and dealings of others their fellow Bishops; when as taking the Papers, and flinging them into the fire (being unwilling to read them) he made answer, That God alone being the sole Judge, seer and searcher of all mens thoughts, and chiefly of the Priests, he would not in any wise undertake to intermeddle in their affaires or questions, nor prie into their manner of Lives. The Heretick Arius and his complices were condemned in this Council of Nicea (and not in the Council of Nice, a City in Europe, as some Authors have very impertinently written). But afterwards the Emperor being seduced and abused by the subtilties of a Priest, and by the false and feigned confession of Arius, received him into favour again, whence some did take an occasion to say, that Constantine had suffered himself to be tainted and misled with Arianism; but at length this Monster Arius, condemned by the just judgement both of God and Men, ended his dayes most miserably, his guts bursting forth, and his bowels issuing out at his fundament.

And returning to our Constantine, we shall let you see how great a lover of Justice, and punisher of crimes he was; for at the infliction and accusation of Fausta his wife, it is believed he caused his Son Crispus to be put to death, accused by her that he would have ravished her; but afterwards, being assured of the falseness of his said wives accusation, he caused her also to be slain, a severity which by some was imputed to a cruelty in him, though not degenerating from Piety, wherewithall he was endowed, for at that time he was not regenerated by Baptism. To recount and set down the other Graces and Vertues which this Emperor did possess, would be superfluous: As touching his Piety, Humanity, Liberality, Learning, and rare Perfections: nor was he to seek, or ignorant in the least in any Arts or Sciences, for himselfe did compound several Books both in Greek and in Latin, as shall be hereafter mentioned. He so highly esteemed Learned men, as that his Court abounded with them, with whom he gladly and assiduously conferred, especially about the understanding of the Scriptures, with Eusebius and Lactantius who were two of those with whom he was most familiar. The Books which as aforesaid he composed, both in Latine and in Greek, were concerning the Nicenean Synod, touching the Divine Providence to the Senate of Rome, to the Judges of the Eastern Provinces, of Christian Laws, against the superstitions of the Gentiles, to Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea, to the Provinces of Palestine, against Alexander and Arius; and such others as were plunged in his Heresie: unto the inhabitants of Nicomedia a City in Asia, unto Sapor King of Persia, to all the Eastern Churches, to the Bishops and Doctors who assisted at the Council, to the Judges and Citizens of Athens and Antioch, to the Bishop Macharius, to the Bishops of Palestine, to the good Fathers who assisted at the Synod of Tyrrus, to Athanasius the Patriarch of Alexandria; besides divers others, which I shall omit, to avoide prolixity. He bore such an ardent affection to his new Rome, that the better to beautifie and adorne her with precious rarities and Antiquities; he scrupled not to bereave (according unto Saint Jeroms report) all his Cities and leave them naked, for to imbellish and compleat his City of Constantinople. To which purpose he carried out of the Cattle that was at Ilion, the chief City of Troy, the Palladium of Troas, and the Statue of Apollo which was made of Brasse of an almost incredible bigness. From Rome he carried away a Colunne of Porphyre called Colo, which he caused to be environed with several Meddals, and placed in the Market-place which is paved with Frise-stone, upon the top of which he caused his own Statue of Brasse to be placed, holding in his right hand a golden Globe, upon which the signe of the Cross was fixed; which is yet standing upon the top of the second Mountaine, or Eminence in the City, but the said Statue is somewhat impaired, not so much by length of time (although tis a very Antick one) as by reason of the great Fires and Earthquakes wherewithall the City hath been overwhelmed; before which time (according to what some Historians have written) he maintained harsh Wars against the inhabitants of Bizantium, because they would not be obliged to pay him any Tribute, or be subjected to obey him; and coming to fight them in a pitch Field, at first they killed him abundance of his men, but at length not without a great deal of difficulty he conquered them, and did there build the City which is honoured by his name, and the which he did the better love by how much the ruder and adverse its habi-

tants had shewn themselves to the ancient seat of his Dominions. And finally he became so enamoured with this new City, as that he conceived it was impossible for him to be glutted in the adorning of it. Afterwards he peopled it with such Christians as he could assemble out of Armenia, Georgia, Palestine, and Egypt, and who were fled into those parts, to avoid the sad persecutions by Dioclesian, and the which were renewed by Licinius, Constantines brother in Law. Moreover, as he had found the Empire divided; so did he again divide it, as a Paternal inheritance, and bestowed it upon his three Sons, whom he created all three of them Caesars, during his lifetime, the one after the other, viz. Constantine his eldest Son in the tenth year of his Reign, Constantius his second Son in the twentieth year, and Constans the youngest of his Sons in the thirtieth year. The Reigns of these his said Sons proved very turbulent and troublesome, and lasted not above four and twenty years five moneths and twelve dayes. As for this our Constantine, he dyed at Nicomedia on the one and twentieth day of the month of May, during the Consulship of Felicianus, and Tatianus, which was in the second year of the two hundred fourscore and seventh Olympiad; and in the year of the Salvation of all mankind, three hundred thirty and nine, after he had lived threescore and six years, and had Reigned thirty and one. Some will needs have us believe, that he was poisoned in his Country or Garden-house hard by Nicomedia; however it was, his death was foretold two years before by the appearance of a Comet of an unusual bigness, lying on his death bed, he ordained and commanded that Athanasius should be recalled from his banishment, whom himself (being deceived and induced thereunto by the Arians who bore Athanasius a grudge) had banished; so that he returned again to his Bishoprick of Alexandria; Eusebius and all his other adversaries being present. He disposed of his last Will and Testament, into the hands of that same Priest, who had so much stickled for Arians; and who so as so much recommended unto him by his Sister Constance (who had been Licinius his wife) as she lay a dying, assuring that he was a very honest man, whom Constantine caused to swear, that he would not deliver the said Will to any other, save unto Constantine when he should be returned from the East; for none of his children were present at his death. After his decease, his body was laid on a Golden Bier, or Bed of Honour, and was conducted by his Captains, Lieutenants, and by the Officers of his household, into the City of Constantinople; and was there placed in an eminent and high place to be viewed of all Men. And those of his Court did continue to perform unto his dead body the same services and honors, as they had done whilst he was alive, untill such time as his children, or at least one of them was returned for to cause him to be interred. The whole City lamenting and bewailing in a high degree, the loss of their Great Emperor, and mourning and weeping bitterly for him as Orphans bereaved of the presence of their dear and tender Father, all of them having often tasted and had the experience of his Graces and Benignity. And as I have afore mentioned he left the Empire unto three of his Sons, who in stead of maintaining themselves therein by Union, Peace, Concord, and Amity; fell foule together, and tore each other asunder. By the division which Constantine the Great did make of the Empire, Constantine who was the elder brother enjoyed Gaul, or France, Spain, and England. Constans the younger brother, had all Italy, Slavonia and Greece. And Constantius the second brother possessed Constantinople, and all the East. But this repertition not pleasing Constantine, he commenced a quarrel with his brother Constantius, waging a cruel and deadly war with the Gauls or French, with whom furiously, but fighting more greedily then providently, he was way-laid, beset and overwhelmed with Ambushes, near unto Aquile, and being wounded in divers places, he there died, and was cast into the River called Alse.

Finally I cannot here omit to set down the incredulity of some persons, who suspect that which we have here related concerning this Emperors Baptisme, and do not stick to deny that he was Baptized by Pope Silvester. Grounding this their allegation, on what Eusebius of Cæsarea doth Write, that Constantine was Baptized at Nicomedia in his latter dayes, having continued a long while in his devotions in a Church which had been there built by his Mother Hellen; not by the Bishop of Nicomedia, who was a Hereticke, but by some other Catholicke Prelate, &c.

THE LIFE OF ARCHIMEDES, a Philosopher of Greece.

Ann. Mund.
3739.

Ant. Christ.
209.

His great Geometrician, and most admirable Contriver Archimedes, whose Picture I present you here with, to the Life, which I brought from Sicile made in Brasse, like unto a rare Medal which is usually found in the Foundations of such Cities as are built by the Roman Emperors, he was so incomparable in his time, that all the Greece and Latine Historians thought it no incumbrance to manifest his subtil Inventions, Sciences, and those admirable Parts wherewith he was endowed: so that of old when a man would expresse how exquisitely a thing was done, he needed but to say, that Archimedes himself could not have better described or set it forth. Cicero also recites this Proverb or Probleme of Archimedes, to signifie a question unknown, abstruse, and difficult to be resolved, and which ought to be examined with exquisite industry. The Inhabitants of Sicile did formerly so highly reverence him, as that they caused a costly Statue of Marble to be erected in honour of him; which was of that immensity, as being beheld afar off it seemed to be a second Colossus of Rhodes. True it is, that this personage born at Syracusa, a City in the Isle of Cyprus, living in the time of a mighty and rich King Hiero, effected such things as were never heard of before, and almost incredible; which he hammered out by his own invention. Now if any one desireth to be satisfied as concerning those marvellous things, which he by his rare Genius brought to perfection, let him read Plutarch on the Life of Marcus Marcellus, and Titus Livius in the fourth and fifth of his third Decade; where he shall finde, that the onely Engines and Instruments which Archimedes did make, were sufficient to defend the place for a long time against all the assaults of the Romans. For he caused a flinging Engine to be made of a wonderful height and greatnesse, the which from the top of the Tower of the said City did cast out a hundred great Stones, Bullets, or Darts, upon the Enemies Camp. For which reason Eustathius calls him a Giant with an hundred arms, casting forth a hundred heavey massie stones at one shock; which though doubtless were admirable works in themselves, yet he made no account nor esteem of them; reckoning them not as his Master-piece, but onely as Geometrical toys and pastimes, made at the request of Hiero King of Sicile. Amongst other things it is related, that when all humane force was not able to draw a great Ship out of the water, with an infinite sort of Cables and other Engines. Archimedes alone drew it on Land, as if it had sailed on the Sea. During the Siege of Syracusa by the Roman Army, he made such Instruments, as that casting over the Walls great Iron Grapples fastned to it on Chaines, giving them their Counterpoize within the

the City, he lifted up a Galley into the aire, and drowned all the men that were in her in the Sea; for he caused the said Galley to fall perpendicularly or downright, so that it brake in pieces. And with other Instruments and Grapples, he did wonderfully shackle the Gallies and Ships, as that he forcibly drave them against a Rock, and bruised them to shivers. Also he built such like Engines on Land, with which he usually destroyed many of the Enemies. In which resistance which Archimedes made in Syracuse, the General, Consul, Marcus Marcellus, that excellent Capitaine, was forced to alter the disposition of his Campe, and to seeke out another way and manner to besiege and assault the City; in which Siege he found himself in a great deal of peril and confusion. For Archimedes had put the Roman Souldiers into so great an amazement, that when they saw the least Chain, or but a bare Pole let downe from the Walls of the City, they retired and fled away, being terrified at the Inventions and Engines of this great Artist. The Mathematicians and Astrologers attribute the Invention of the Materiall Sphere to this sub-til Philosopher, by which the Motions of all the Planets, with their Conjunctions, Passions, and Aspects, may be plainly perceived; although Diogenes Laertius seems on the contrary to believe, that Anaximander the Philosopher, who was a Milesian, was Author and first Inventor of so rare and excellent a piece. Which we were willing to note by the way, to leave every man to his owne liberty to judge thereof. For my part, I have Cicero that great Orators Warrant for what I say, who in the first Book of his Tusculan Questions, is pleased to give Archimedes on-ly the commendations to have been the first Inventor of the Sphere. With whom Claudian the Poet agrees; who saith that he made one of Chrystall. And Ovid also confirmeth it, alleadg-ing that it could not be very difficult for him to frame one of Chrystall, since he had sufficient means to perform it, and industry enough to invent one; yet I would have you to know, that I relie not so much upon these Poets verbal expressions; since I must acknowledge, that by the Chrystalline Sphere which they attribute to Archimedes, their meaning was onely to ascribe unto him the invention of the Sphere. because that by the Circles and other properties of it, he did represent unto us, as in a faire Chrystall Glasse, the severall Motions, Aspects, and Conjun-cti- ons of the Orbs: And certainly he must needs have been as studious as contemplative, and as wise as judicious. Now when as Syracuse was taken by assault, after it had been solely by his industry for a long time defended: the Consull Marcellus gave strict charge that no man on paine of death should dare to kill Archimedes, although he had destroyed so many Romans. Yet a Souldier meeting him by chance (happily not knowing him) as he was busied in draw- ing a Scheme in the sand, and asking him who he was; or (as others say) commanding him to go and speak with Marcellus, Archimedes gave him no answer, or was so attentive and set upon the placing of this Figure, as that he minded him not. Whereupon the Souldier being angry, killed him, which highly displeased Marcellus, who caused him to be honourably in-terred. Others say, that he made no other reply unto the Souldier, save that he was so deeply engaged in the description of his Figure, as that he could not well tell how to dis-entangle himself. And it is very remarkable on the death of Archimedes, that the apprehen- sion of death which was set before him, could not divert him from his Mathematical ploddings. Hereon I say, that the diligence which he used is very much to be commended, because he was so much bent upon this worthy Employment; whereby he ought to be admired above all other Philosophers, forasmuch as all of them did reject and despise the Goods of Fortune (as men call them) but at the time of the Soules separation from the Body (when as we must leave this World) there were very few of them that did not renounce the bargain. We reade that Carneades an ingenious and laborious Philosopher was so addicted to his Studies, that he would not admit of the leisure to eat: yet however he had one Melista his Concubine, whom he ac- counted of as his Wife, and who to hinder him from Starving when he fasted too long, would bring him such things as were fit to nourish him. Anaxagoras also, and Democritus, did so much despise Wealth, as that the one gave the greatest part of his Estate to his Countrey; the other was not displeased in the least, when he saw all his Goods and Possessions lost and ru-ined; because they accounted it but a tye, whereby being as it were chained, they could not freely re- signe themselves to confer with the Muses. To speak the truth, all these Philosophers did things worthy of great commendation; but there is not one of them like unto our Archimedes. For they could not choose but apprehend the ensuing dangers and incumbrances. But had they been like unto Archimedes in the sacking of a City, having the Sword set upon their throats, we should have found very few Archimedes's, who would have continued their Descriptions and Demonstrations. Some write of him, that oft times he was taken from his Study, and con- ducted to the Baths, and was there washed and anointed, without any outward sensibility, deline- ating alwaies his Figures upon his body with his fingers; so attentive was he on his Speculati- ons. I had forgotten to mention the ingenious Discovery which he made, to know how much Gold might have been taken away from a Crown, and Silver mingled instead of it: But because the History hath been largely handled by some Moderne Writers, I remit the curious Reader to a Discourse made thereon by Peter Messias in his Forest of divers Instructions. Cicero gloried that he first found his Sepulchre, which by age and neglect was unknown; and he made great ac- count of it. So likewise the Spirit and Industry of a learned man can effect more than the force of thousands of ignorant men. He lived in the time of Sulpitius Gallus, of great Onias the high

High Priest of the Jews, of Aristobolus the Jew, and of Ptolomy Epiphanes the first King of Egypt, in the year 5000. and he was slain at the sacking and taking of Syracuse, as afore- said, the year after Rome was built, 543. He composed an excellent Book of the Cylinders, which Book hath since been recovered, and translated into Latine by the command of Pope Nicolas the fifth.

Moreover it is reported of this admirable Philosopher Archimedes, that his sublime knowledge in the Mathematicks was arrived to so high a pitch, as that he should say, that could he have found any point out of the Terrestrial Globe to have fixed his foote upon, he would have removed the Fa- brick of the whole World, &c.

THE

THE LIFE OF DIOGENES the Grecian Philosopher.

Ann. Mund.
3598.

Ant. Christ.

Though doubtless many have heard some Coridons, or Mechanick fellows, either in jest or earnest, vending their judgements on him whose Effigies or Protraiture is here represented, in the same manner as it was given unto me at the City of Andrenopolis in Greece (being as I was ascertained) found in Culcedonia, in the times of the Emperors Basilius and Constantinus, who were brothers, in the year of our Lord nine hundred seventy and eight: yet however he ought not therefore to be accounted of, as an abject or contemptible person. And if we rather chuse to reflect upon his internal then external parts, we shall finde that he is worthy of a great deal of Honor. For as we read of two Ancient Philosophers Democritus and Heraclitus, who incessantly (the one by his Laughter, and the other by his Tears) did take the Follies of the vulgar; both of their expressions tending to one and the self same purpose. So likewise, amongst the Philosophers, the Stoick was severe; the Academick dubious, the Peripatetick Politicke, the Cynicke, free and willfull; yet however all these had but one and the self same scope, viz. To philosophize.

Now amongst all those who have followed this Cynical manner of living, Diogenes may be placed in the first ranke, as being the sole Philosopher, who did lead a free and careless life, without any goods, or estate; he was born at Synope, a Maritime Town situated upon the Borders of the Euxinian Sea, his Father was named Iscus an Usurer, who put him for a while to School; but at length Diogenes being driven out of his Country, retired himself unto Athen, where he learnt Philosophy of Antisthenes: wherein he made so good a progress, as that he became one of the most excellentest Philosophers of all Greece. His Life was most strange, which he lead in the greatest Poverty that possibly could be; for despising the pleasures of the world, he contented himself a great while with a Tub for his habitation, the entrance of which in the Winter he did turn towards the South, and in the Summer towards the North. He did aske Almes, carrying a stick in his hand, and a wallet on his shoulders in the same manner as you see him described. He was so great a lover of the Philosophical faculty, that his Master threatening to beat him out of doors with a stick, because that he did not take any Scholars to teach; Diogenes profering his head unto him, said, Strik on I pray, for you shall not finde any stick hard enough to drive me out of your School. Many memorable sayings and speeches are recorded concerning this most excellent Philosopher; some of which (although facetious, yet full of Learning) I have thought fit to insert in this present discourse. When he saw Physicians and Philosophers in company together with other men, he would usually say, That

amongst all the Creatures, Man ought to be the most circumspect. And on the contrary when he met with Southsayers, Fortune-tellers, and others puffed up with the splendor of their wealth, he would say, That he esteemed nothing more vain then Man. Being at a certain time in the publicke place of the City, discoursing of weighty and grave matters, and perceiving that no man drew near to him, he fell a whistling and singing; whereby a great multitude of people being flocked about him, he reprehended and reproached them, That they were so eager and ready to listen unto follies, but tardis, and backwards in giving ear unto matters of moment. He said, that he wondered at the Grammarians, who were so critical in diving into and searching out the vices of Ulysses; and were ignorant of their own. At the Musicians, who could Tune their own Instruments, and yet retain such unsettled passions of their Souls. At the Mathematicians, who extend their sight, even to the Sun and Moon, and not see those things which are under their very Noses. At Orators who do break their brains to utter good things, and never trouble their heads in the least to do them. He would usually say, That he did much admire, men should quarrel and kill themselves for the honor of a jump or precedence, or some such like say; but never so much as in the striving for to attain unto the highest pitch of Vertue. And an Astrologer one day discoursing with a great deal of confidence concerning the Meteor, and other Celestial influences, he demanded of him, How long it was since he came from heaven? Now the same freedom which he used in his manner of living, the like did he also in his manner of speech; for a certain Eunuch having placed this inscription upon the porch of his door, viz. Let no evil enter here; Diogenes passing by, and reading it, asked those which chanced to be present, Which way shall the master of the House get in? Beholding another Bill upon the House of a great spent-thrift, and prodigal man, specifying that the house was to be sold, he cried out and said, O house! I know very well by your riotousness, that you would quickly meet with your Master. And seeing certain men one day shooting at Buts with Crois, Bowes (one of which usually shoot at a great distance from the mark) Diogenes against that Mans turn came to shoot, placed himself at the Buts, just against the mark; at which the company wondering, he said, I perceive that you Man shoots so wide from the mark which you do aime at, as that I conceive my self to be no where safe, but just in this place. A Player on the Cithern being generally blamed because he was a Corpulent Man, and Diogenes only praising him, being demanded the reason why, he said, Because his vast bulke had made him fitter to be a Player upon Musical Instruments, then a Thief. Another Musician, by reason that he had an unpleasant voice being abandoned by all men, and Diogenes meeting of him, said, God save you Master Cock, the other demanding why he miscalled him so; he answered, Because your singing makes all the company rise. Being moreover demanded, What was the greatest misery in this world? He answered, To be old and poor. Being asked; Whether he had any servants? He answered, No: and the other replying, Who do you imagine will carry you to your Grave when you dye? He answered, He that shall have need of the House. Being asked, What he would have to receive a Box on the ear, or a blow on the face, he said, A good steel casket unto my head. Plato, seeing him one day busie in washing of herbes, whispered unto him, and told him, Could you but court Dionysius you should not need to wash herbes; to whom Diogenes replied, And if you could wash herbes, you should not need to court Dennis the Tyrant. Being arrived at the Town of Minda, and finding it ill peopled and but a little scurvy hole, yet with great Gates, he said to the inhabitants, Pray, shut your Gates, lest your Town do run away out of them. Perceiving an untoward wrastler took upon himself the curing of mens diseases; he asked him, Whether by that means he intended to cast those to the ground, who had formerly worsted him? Some one asking him, Whence he was? he said, He was a Citizen of the whole World. Hearing a proper handsome young man utter unseemling and dishonest language, he asked him, Whether he was not ashamed to unsheath a Leadon sword, out of an Ivory scabbard? To a Logician, who by his Arguments went about to prove there was no motion at all, He only walked along, and asked him what he thought of that? Alexander the Great having conquered Greece, and being at Athen, he was desirous to see Diogenes, by reason of his great Fame; and being come where Diogenes was sitting in the Sun, he asked him whether he needed any thing, and though it were never so much he would give it him. To which he answered, Pray Sir stand a little backward out of the Sun shine, and take not that from me which you cannot give me. Whom thinks you of us two is in most need? My self who desire nothing but my wooden dish, and a morsel of bread; or thou, who being not contented with thy Kingdome of Macedon, exposest thy life to so many dangers, for to extend thy Dominions, in so much as that the world is not capable to satisfy that Avarice? At which answer, Alexander was so astonished and rejoyced, that turning back to some who stood thereat, he said, I would assuredly chuse to be Diogenes, were I not Alexander. Moreover the sentences and rare answers pronounced by this Philosopher were numberless, so that we shall pass by divers of them to avoid prolixity. He was very well versed in all Arts and Sciences. He said, That knowledge is correction to the young, comfort to the old, riches to the poor, and ornament to the rich. He despised those Arts which were unprofitable, and such persons as study, rather to acquire knowledge, then to practise Vertue. He compared a rich ignorant man unto a Golden sheep. In Summer he laid on the sand in the Sun. And in Winter he would graspe the Statues and Trees which were covered with Snow, the better to accustom himself to support both the heat and the cold.

And as aforesaid he carried a Waller, in which he put his victuals; and had he a wooden dish, out of which he drank, but he brake his dish, seeing a childe drink out of it's hand; and admiring the childs wit, said, it was not requisite for a man to trouble himself with a vessel to drinke out of, since Nature furnished him with one. He also flung away his wooden Trencher, seeing another cut his meat upon his bread. Being demanded, Why some did call him a Dog? He answered, Because I shake much of those who give unto me; I bark at those who deny me, and I bite the harsh and forward. He would not be buried after his death; whereas his friends wondering, represented unto him, that being left upon the ground, without Sepulchre or Grave, the Beasts would devour him. To which he answered, That they may not do so, pray lay my sticks by my side? At which they laughed, telling him, That the dead did neither see nor feel; whereunto he replied, If therefore the dead do neither see nor feel? what is it to me, whether the Beasts do eat me, the Birds do pick me, or the Wormes of the earth devour me? And as he was thus fantastical in his manner of living, in his speeches, and Actions, yet far more singular was he in the rule and conduct of those whom he had under his charge. And namely in the bringing up of Xenias and Corinthians children; unto whom he was sold at Crete or Candie by Scirpalus, the great Pyrate, who took him at Sea as he was going to Aquinas. And these were the Rules which he prescribed unto his Scholars. First, he would have them to addict themselves unto those good and sound disciplines on which he did read most admirable Lectures unto them: afterwards he caused them to ride the great horse, to shoot with the Bow, and to be good fencers; chiefly forbidding them to strain themselves in wrestling; enjoying them moreover, not only to Learn and Con all his sayings by heart; but also all the Poets rare compositions; would suffer them to eat but a very little meat, and drink nought save water. He caused them to be shaven to the very chin, and made them go abroad unready without shoes, willing them to dress themselves as they went through the streets, because they should lose no time. And for all this harsh demeanor and austerity of Life; his Scholars did love and cherish him extremely, and mediate to have been treated and used more humanely and courteously in the house of Xenias than his quality of a servant and a slave deserved, which is a most remarkable acknowledgement of Scholars towards their Masters, and whereunto common sense and reason might easily induce them.

Which Alexander the Great testified, by bearing as great a reverence unto Aristotle his Master, as unto Philip of Macedon the King his Father; because that by the one he had received his Life, and by the other the manner to live Well. But to return unto Diogenes, he was highly esteemed by Xenias his Master, not only for his rare Wit and knowledge, but for the great care and diligence wherewithall he employed himself in his Domesticke affairs, who otherwise had not long harbored him in his house; and Xenias at length being constrained to acknowledge, that Diogenes had brought good luck to his house, he took such an affection unto him, as it is believed he never parted with him till his dying day; and divers are of opinion that he dyed at his Master Xenias house, at a place called the Crone at Corinth; grounding this their belief on Diogenes his answer to his Master, that he would be buried with his face downwards; and they do add that his Scholars Xenias children did bury him. However some will not let them reap the honour thereof by reason of the contests which were amongst his friends concerning his burial; and therefore they are of opinion, that all his friends jointly did make him a Tombe, and placed a Colonne upon it, on the top whereof there was the figure of a Dog engraven (It may be because Plato had called him so) As also that to outvie each other, they adorned his Grave with several Brass Statues, placing this like inscription upon his Tombe, translated out of Greek.

Eternally shall last; no Age shall taint thy Baies,
To us thou hast prescribed these Rules, whereby we may Eternal bliss atchieve; What mortal could more say?*

My self being in the Isle of Crete, or Candie, about half a league from the place where the Labyrinth or Maze was, which is so much written of by the Ancient Authors; some Grecians of the said Island did shew unto me certain ruines and very great stories which favoured much of Antiquity. In which place they told me Diogenes had for several yeers read his publike Lectures (according as it was contained in the vulgar Greek Authors) and called that place Staphylia, by reason (as I do conjecture according to the most proper signification of the word) of the many roots that are there. And as there were diversity of opinions concerning his Sepulchre, so likewise were they worse divided concerning his death. Some say, that as he was very careless of his Diet, he did one day eat an whole cold Oxe foot, whereby he drew down a Rheume into his mouth, as that he dyed thereof: others have been pleased to say, that being overburdened with old Age, and regretting his long life, he did wrap himself up in his Cloak, and so smothered himself. However it happened, all do agree in this, that he died of a violent death, being of the Age of fourescore and ten years. Having left behind him a signal renown of his most admirable examples and worthy instruction; aswell for his strange and singular manner of Living; and the excellency of his knowledge and wit, which was so much admirable, as that several famous professors have oftentimes come from foreign and remote parts purposely unto Athens to hear and see him, &c.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE PALEOLOGUS, the last Christian Emperor of Greece.

Ann. Mund.
5403.

An. Chris.

Some men have very inconsiderately dived into this nice inquiry and scrutiny, why Empires, Kingdoms, Principalities and States, have sometimes been subverted, destroyed, and brought to nought; and at other times raised up, restored and exalted: Finally, why Empires have so often changed their several Masters, who were dissenting both in Customs, Laws, and Religions. I have met with some of these who would even winde and screw up their Speculations to the very Skies, and rashly do fancy to themselves, that they are the Almightyes Privie-Counsellors; carrying on their said conceits with so much efficacy and self-belief of the truth, as Triumpho of Camarin did (a Triumpho of Camarin's Phrenzy. A curiosity very prejudicial to be condemned.) fantastically did imagine and persuade himself, that really and truly, at a certain hour in the day, he was assembled together in company with the Pope, the Emperor, and the several Kings and Princes of Christendome (although all that while he was alone in his own Chamber by himself) where he entered upon, debated, and resolved all the States Affairs of Christendome; and verily believed that he was the wisest man of them all; and so he well might be, of the company. Others again, relying upon the vicissitude of things, do forge a like necessity, That Empires and Kingdoms having once attained their appointed periods, are necessitated to cast up the Cards, to shut the Tables, and to resigne the Game to the better management of those who successively are enthroned and invested therein. As for my part, I had rather resign my self to the Almightyes will, unto which the cause of the translation of Scepters ought to be solely attributed, since he maketh them to fall into such hands as he pleaseth. For a most evident testimony hereof, we cannot make choice of a fitter Portraiture, than this of our first Constantine, which I recovered at Constantinople, engraven in a Mosaic stone. This was he, who bearing the same Name as he did who transported the Roman Empire into Greece, did lose it, eleven hundred twenty and one years after Constantinople was built by Constantine the Great, as I shall proceed to relate unto you. He was the Son of Emanuel the Son of John Paleologus, who was most renowned for the several Heroical Actions which he did; as well by fortifying of Greece, walling about the Isthmus or Hesiaride of Corinth, and the maintaining of his Empire in Tranquility, Repose, and Peace, which he had made with Emanuel the first of that Name, but the third King of the Turks. I thought good also to note, that this Emanuel caused a Synod to be assembled at Constantinople, unto which the Patriarchs of Constantinople, of Antioch the great, of Jerusalem, of Aegypt, together with divers other Prelates, were called to resolve on the interpretation

The pernicious effect of it. The pernicious ill advised men did deduct a most pernicious and damnable consequence, by inferring some degree and difference between them, or to their Natures. But to return to our purpose. Though Emanuel did maintain his Empire in rest and quietness, yet his Children indeavoured what in them lay, to rend it asunder. For against John the fourth of that name, Demetrius his Brother, rose up in competition; and for his better support, he entered into a League with the Turks, who attempted to rush into Moravia, but were forced to desert that design till another time. And Constantine himself brake down that Wall which Emanuel had caused to be built at the Straights of Corinthus; evidencing that he aspired to the Empire, and to the Dominion of Morea. And so it was, that when John Paleologus, Constantine's Brother died, he was in Morea: where for those valiant Exploits he performed against the Turks, whom he sharply infested, he was surnamed Draco, or Dragon. And it was ten to one, but he had been frustrated in his succession of the Empire; for Demetrius his younger Brother being at Constantinople when this Emperor died, would have usurped the Empire, although Constantine was his elder Brother. And it is very probable, that unless the Strampolitanians had withstood his indeavours and Forces, he had very easily introned himself, taking the advantage of his Brother Constantine's being so deeply engaged at that time against the Turks; and that no consideration whatsoever was able to reclaim him from pursuing of them. However, as I was a telling of you, the Inhabitants of Constantinople would not permit him to assume the Imperial Dignity, fearing that their City might come to be ruined, in case they had admitted and favoured the younger Brother against him, unto whom of right the Empire did belong. Wherefore it was agreed upon, that Constantine should be Emperor; and that Demetrius and Thomas should equally inherit the Dominions of Morea betwixt them. But it had been far better, that either the one of them had possessed it alone, or that both of them had gone without it; by reason that their differences and jars gave an admittance and footing, into so gallant and strong a Countrey, unto the common Enemy of Christendome, the Turks, who became at length absolute Masters thereof. And as for our Constantine, he enjoyed no long repose nor tranquility in his Dominions: for after the death of old Amurath (who died in the year of the World, 4511. and in the year of our Lord and Saviour, 1450.) Mahomet, the second of that Name, succeeded him (and not Mahomet the first, though the first Emperor, as by a mistake it was set down in the Life of Constantine the Great) who puzzled the Emperor extremely, and all those who were Subjects unto his Dominions. And that I may not too much enlarge, I shall content my self to recount unto you, how he besieged Constantinople in the Moneth of February, in the year of our Lord, 1453: and continued the said Siege until the 28 day of the Moneth of May, and gained the place on the fifty fourth day after he had besieged it; causing all the Grecian Nobility (who were in the place) to be put to death; and likewise among the rest, the Emperor Constantine himself: who for a long while before had both required, summoned, and conjured the Christian Princes to lend him relief, but they could not attend the same. For the fatality of those times had imbroyled all Christendome in Wars amongst themselves: The Emperor against the Swisses, the Hungarians, and Moravians; the French King against the King of England; Italy was full of Leagues, Confederacies, Factions, and Partialities against each other. However, the Pope, the Venetians, and Alphonso King of Naples, did promise to send thirty Gallies to his relief; and indeed the Venetians did send thither James Lauré, with a gallant equipage; but he came too late; for the Turk had already mastered the place, not without a great deal of resistance, which was made by the besieged, as aforesaid; for the space of fifty and foure daies. And really the Turk did lose many thousands of men before it: and the same day when he gained the City, the Emperor Constantine did not onely content himself to encourage his men to withstand so furious a monster: but himself being armed, de cap-a-pe, from head to toe, and being seconded but by a handfull of men onely, did for the space of five hours most gloriously withstand all the Turkish Forces. But finally seeing himself abandoned by the greatest part of his men, and having but two persons onely who stood by him, and stuck unto him, (viz. Theophilus Paleologus, of the Stock and Imperial Race, and a Slavonian Slave, though most illustrious and noble in his gallant Actions) was constrained to retreat; and indeavoured to save himself amidst the multitude, he was either pressed to death, or (as others will have it) trodden under foot, and sisted. And thus the last Christian Emperor of Constantinople most miserably ended his daies, after he had reigned three years and three moneths. The Town being taken, you may imagine the cruelties which Mahomet did there exercise; however he could not choose but reverence the dead body of our Constantine, which (as three very ancient Adamelians of Egypt did tell me) he caused to be fought for throughout the City, and having found it, he took him by the hands and head, and bedewed them with so many tears which flowed from his eyes, as that the standers by could not refrain themselves from weeping: and afterwards caused him to be entered in his Sepulchre; but I could never learn where it was; and this reason thereof was given me by certain Mahometans: That Mahomet would have but four persons know where he was buried; apprehending, lest those Souldiers, who being numberless, and had been wounded and maimed by that valiant Emperors own hand, through rage should pull him out of his grave again. And this was the cause, why after his death his head was carried on the top of a Lance, by way of derision, through the whole City; as also the Image of our Saviour and Redeemer was dragged through the dirt in the streets, with the greatest indignity that possibly could be; having this Inscription affixed upon it, This is the Christians God.

Finally, I cannot choose but wonder why some have accustomed themselves to assure the World, that that this Constantine was the seventh of that Name, when as by the List of the Grecian Emperors, we shall finde that he was the tenth; which for your better satisfaction I shall here insert, viz.

The end of the Life of Constantine Paleologus.

A Catalogue of the Grecian Emperors.

The first was Constantine surnamed the Great; of whom we have formerly spoken.

The second was Constantine the great's Son, of the same Name.

The third Constantine, was Constantine the Son of Heraclius.

The fourth was Constantine surnamed Pogonatus, that is to say, with the great beard; who reigned seventeen years.

The fifth was the Son of Leo Isaurum, a wicked and depraved person, and who was no better then his Father.

The sixth is that Constantine, for whom Irene his Mother indeavoured to procure in marriage a Daughter of Francis, being the Son of Leo the fourth, who was chosen Emperor in the year of the Worlds Creation, 4744. and after our Saviours birth, 782. who was married unto Mary the King of Armenia's Daughter; and not to Charles the Great's Daughter, as some do suppose.

The seventh was Son unto the Emperor Leo, surnamed the Philosopher; who at the beginning of his Reigne was molested and opposed by Constantine Spartanum, the Son of Andronicus, that valiant Captain, who approaching to kill the young Constantine, knocked his brains out against a Wall, and falling off from his Horse, his head was immediately stricken off in the same place. Which had been foretold him by Leo the Philosopher. And though this Constantine was molested and disquieted in his Reigne, yet I see no reason therefore (as some would have it) to leave him out of the Catalogue of the said Emperors.

The eighth succeeded Basileus Porphyrogenitus, a man abounding in all luxury, and unlawfull pleasures; whose Son-in-law was Romanus Argiropolus, the third of that Name.

The ninth was that Monomachus Constantine, who was so besotted with Scelerena his Concubine, as that he became her Slave; however he esteemed and cherished learned men; and he was called the Gladiator, or Great Sword-man.

The tenth was that devout and religious Duke, who was more given to his Prayers, than to wield a Sword; so likewise did he heartily detest War. He was taxed of being over-covetous; he died being threescore years of age, having reigned seven years and six moneths; leaving the Empire to his Wife Eudoxia, upon her Oath never to marry, left his three Sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine, should have been frustrated of the Empire.

The eleventh, is this Constantine (though but the tenth of that Name) whose History we have even now epitomized, &c.

Laws & Arms

Princes.

Ristotle in his Politicks, and many other Philosophers, who employed themselves to prescribe means for Civil Government, have very carefully debated the matter concerning Monarchy, and how it may be maintained. Some have Hieroglyphically represented Kingly Government by the Forraiture of a flaming Sword, thereby giving to understand, that the principal end for which it must be used, is to drive forth the wicked. Others would have Kings contemplative, and thought none fit for to bear rule, but such as were Philosophers. Others joyned the sword and Philosophy together, but they have discoursed so rawly on it for the most part, that they seem rather to have set forth their writings to sharpen the Readers appetite, then to satisfy it. The reason may be (as I thinke) because they had not the Crown on their own heads, and therefore they reasoned to slightly of it. But now I represent unto you one, who hath not onely set forth in writing, wherein the conservation of principality consists; but he did effectually perform that by Governing, which he wisely prescribed. This we shall demonstrate, after that we have in passing along, cleared that which concerns his descent, his life and manners, as also the degrees by which he was unexpectedly raised up to the head of the Empire. He was in a very mean condition, in so much that Historians report that Justin the first, his Uncle took him from the field; others that he was a poor Shepherd, and made him his Foot-boy. After that by little and little he made him ascend to honors, & raised him so high, that he adopted him for his Son, and then took him to be his companion in the Empire; whereof, four moneths after, he was made the sole Commander, by the consent of the Senate and the People. Here it were very fit to confute the opinion of some, who thought that Justinianus was the Bastard Son of Justin, because in some passages of his institutions, he is called his Father. But since we have before noted that he was his adopted Son, we need say no more. As for the names which were appropriated to him, the Title of Cæsar was, as the name of Ptolemy to the Kings of Egypt, to shew that he was the successor of the great and invincible Cæsar, who was the first Emperor. So in like manner he was called by the name of Flavius, because he proceeded from that family. The other Titles which men commonly gave him, were only marks and remembrances of the people he conquered. Let us now see what exercises this no less wise then valiant, Emperor thought good and convenient to be possessed by a person that was to command; which he hath at the beginning of his institutions, expressed very pertinently. It is not fit (saith (saith he) that the Imperial Majesty should onely be adorned with Arms, but it must be armed also with Laws, to the end that the times of peace and War may be well ruled and governed; And that the Prince of the Romanes, may not be onely victorious in battel against his enemies, but also by lawful means, may drive away offences of calumniators and evil doers, and that he make himself as careful, and as great a Lover of Justice, as he is a magnificent conqueror after he hath subdued his enemies. This is a brave speech, and we need not doubt but that Plato and Aristotle would have said something very like it; but had it been to have been undertaken by them (perhaps) they would have said, is it possible? and could not have confirmed by their example what they had very well approved in their writings. Justinianus hath shewed himself to be none of those great boasters, that can say much, but cannot do what they undertake to teach others. When he was inaugurated and set in the Imperial Throne, he mustered a very potent Army, of which he made Captain Morad, the chief Commander, who with his Son, behaved himself with such courage, that he lost his life there, and brought under the power of his Master, Dalmatia and Salanum. After that he sent John, a most valiant Captain into Africa, to free it from the incursions of the Moors, and to bring it under the obedience of the Roman Emperor, which he accomplished. Lastly he dispatched Belisarius against the Persians, which he overcome in a very short space, and triumphed to the Emperors content; who acknowledging the prowess and good success that this valiant Commander was accomplished with, sent him back against other Nations which rebelled against the Roman Empire, which he so forcibly quelled, that according to some Writers, he was therefore surnamed, Almanicus, Gothicus, Francicus, Germanicus, Alaminus, Wandalicus, Africanus, for that he subdued the Almans, Goths, French, and other Nations; Titles which Justinianus himself especially affected; which was the cause, according to the opinion of some discreet men, that made Belisarius fall into disgrace with Justinianus, who suspected him of ambition, and that he aspired to the Empire. Others hold that the Goths would have chosen Belisarius for their King, after that he had captivated Viages; and although that Belisarius had refused it, as Procopius witnesseth, yet Justinianus began to fall at odds with the Prowess and fidelity of so warlike a Captain, and in place of requital caused his eyes to be put out. But this I cannot believe, since that Hymonius the Monk writes, that Justinianus was driven out of the Empire by Florian, and that he was not restored but by the help of Belisarius, who being called back by Justinianus, laid hold suddenly on this occasion to return into favor, and with a great Army of his followers he marched toward Florian, compassed in with villains, all enemies to Belisarius, which he cut in pieces, and chopt off the head of the new Tyrant. But methinks that Ayman the Monk hath falsified the truth very much, when he saith, that Belisarius a private man, and being cast out of his command, did ordinarily maintain twelve thousand men to follow him; as also where he seeks occasion to speak of the credit and authority Belisarius had with the Emperor Justinianus; he saith, that those two persons during the life of Justin, made a mutual promise, that he that should be most advanced, should be his companion, with his means, power and dignity; and from thence he would infer, that Belisarius was made General of the Army, as the second person in the Empire; and as one who pretended right unto it. If that were so, how comes it, that when he was made Emperor, he sent not Belisarius at first into Dalmatia and Africa, but committed the expeditions to Mondus and John? And farther, it is not credible; that Justinianus, who saw the Empire could not fail to descend to him, would make a bargain with Belisarius, whom he could outstrip when he pleased.

There is even as much shew of truth in that which the same Author alleageth, that Justinianus and Belisarius going both to one Stew, they saw two beautiful harlots, Amasonians, Sisters, which they brought into their Palace, and that Justinianus took for his wife her that was called Antoine, and Belisarius took the other, whose name was Antonine: forasmuch as he is the only writer of this matter, and besides that, he hath intermingled so many fooleries with his History, that at first sight a man may perceive the cheating he hath used. And that which further makes him to be mistrusted, is, that he makes no mention of any other but this Antonine, and did quit Theodora his lawful wife, of whom he makes mention so oft in his Reports. But let us leave this digression. Justinianus continued with great eagerness to immortalize his name by many Heroicke and warlike exploits: therefore (as Pomponius Letus and others write) Belisarius was sent back into Greece (without being devided of his Patrician Dignity, or having any act of inhumanity done unto him, wherewith Justinianus is charged) to prepare himself to wage war with the Parthians. In his stead he sent into Italy, Germanus the Senator (who died of a disease by the way) and Narses the Eunuch, who by the relief of the Lombard defeated Totilus and Thois, the Kings of the Goths. Here, before I pass to the other point propounded by Justinianus, concerning the duty of Princes and Lords. I am constrained to make a stop to search out the occasion why this Emperor took upon him to be surnamed Francicus, because most men are of opinion that the Romanes never conquered the French. As for the Gauls, no man can deny but that they were made subject to the Roman power, as also some part of the French, but to grant that the Franks (who passed over Rhein, and seized on one part of the Gauls, which therefore was called France) were ever subjects to the Romanes were voluntarily to contradict the truth of histories; Yet we may not understand the name Francicus, which Justinianus attributed to himself, to have been any otherwise then by reason of these things, and to insert here all that men have devised to this purpose, is not my intention, holding it but for a mockery to the French that Justinianus usurped this title, not that he ever vanquished or overcame them, but in respect of their great rashness. Forasmuch as if Theodebert had followed his fortune well, after he had chased out of Italy,

The praise of
of Aristotle re-heared by dumb Heraulds.

Many famous and excellent persons have mainly busied themselves to finde out, whether the Estimation and Repute which men had of Aristotle, was because of his Magnanimous and Heroique Prowesses, or rather for the inestimable Excellence and Rarity of the Knowledge where with he was endued. I will not lose any time to relate in particular, what he may have done as to Feats of Arms, though I account that the highest, and most admirable Victories obtained by Alexander, did chiefly proceed from the Counsel and grave advice which he received from Aristotle; since the account I am now upon, requires not that one should make the hideous flashes of Arms, and warlike furies to sound here: and also seeing the Writings which he left to Posterity (though they be as it were but dumb Heraulds) do cause the Praise and Renown of this incomparable Philosopher, sufficiently to shine through the whole World. Such as gaze at the vain glory and vanities of this World, and esteem nothing but that which makes a great noise, will admire that I proffer our Stagiritic Books and Writings to speak his praise, being they are dumb Orators, which cannot make any noise at all, nor have they any organical or articulate sound. But if they will please to have so much patience as to consider with me, that a Lute or Timbrel, or any other Instrument of Musick, should it remain five hundred thousand years in its case, of it self would not make us enjoy its melodious harmony, nor delight our ears, unless the skilfull hand of some well experienced and able Musician touch it, and causeth it to sound by striking its strings, whereby it will (as it were) speak and be pleasing to our hearing, and add to our content beyond expression. So they must needs grant (unless they be of very shallow capacities) that I do not wander from the bounds of reason, when I go about to make the worth and esteem of this our Aristotle to resound, not upon a Lute, but by those Books which he published. The inequality of which comparison lieth only in this, that though an Instrument of Musick in it self be excellent in all respects, yet if it chance to light into the hands of a mean Fidler, it would not content us so well as being plaied on by an Orpheus, or some other rare Musician. So that the melodie we enjoy, is not so much tied to the Instrument, as to him that playeth on it. In like manner, the excellence and commendation of Aristotle, is chiefly annexed to the Worth and Learning which is contained in his Writings, and not in regard of the little, which I am able to specify concerning them. If any man desire more acutely to proceed upon this Comparison, he shall farther finde, that one might in a manner maintain some equality therein. Let him onely suppose the Books to be instead of Instruments, and that Aristotle is the Musician that plays upon them. Since therefore we must evidence this Person's Excellence by his Books which he left to Posterity:

so likewise will I here give you a Catalogue of the Books which he wrote, that every one may understand there was no Science, whereof he hath not onely given us a taste, but hath proved himself to have excelled in them all. Whereunto possibly he was moved by an ambitious desire of Aristotle ambitious vain glory, seeing he was supported by so powerfull and dreadful a Monarch as Alexander the Great was. Nor can he be innocent of this imputation, though many Peripateticks make a noise purposely to palliate and smother such a kinde of deformity, which for the most part is a blemish incident to all such noble Spirits. Otherwise we must deny Aristotle and other Peripateticks, those Books which are called Acromaticks, Epopticks, or Speculations, which a man must have heard from Aristotle's own mouth to have understood them; since it is well known that they were penned in such a manner, and for such an end, as that the common People should understand nothing by them. Which is very plain and evident by the Letter which Alexander wrote unto him, being passed into Asia, and hearing that Aristotle had published some Books, he did chide him. But, if to preserve Aristotle's Honor any one shall reply, that it is not reasonable all things should be communicated so as to be easily understood, because of the contempt they would quickly fall under, nor is it possible they should be so published. Moreover I shall recite the trick he put upon his Scholar Theodore, whom he had desired to put forth his Books of Rhetorick, which Theodore accordingly did; and they were so well approved of by Alexander, as that Aristotle grew envious that Theodore should have the Name to have been the Author of such a Work; wherefore he could not contain, but sought a revenge, complaining that his Scholar had done him wrong, by publishing the said Books, and not setting his Masters Name to them. Upon this account it may be, several Books were ascribed to him which he never wrote; and which he had willingly acknowledged, had he perceived that there had been something in them, which might have quenched the thirst of his ambition. The Catalogue of them I would have here registred, did I not fear to make this Philosophers Life swell with such Works which he himself would not own; besides that we want not other Birds feathers to set forth his Praises. Nor need we to borrow the renown of Socrates or Plato, who doubtless did excell in admirable Knowledge; but chiefly Plato, whose Scholar Aristotle was for about twenty years. Though in many things he forsook their opinions, and surpassed them in all knowledge. As to Poetry, he left such clear and copious instructions, that there is no man, but upon just occasion, will grant that he was excellently skilled in it. Some I know do think that this peece was no part of his workmanship, by reason of its familiar stile, and for some other particulars, all which cannot hinder us from believing that Aristotle was the true Author of it, because it is inserted in the number of those books which our Philosopher made: to be published to the generality, and to be understood without a Teacher, for which cause, he called them vulgar and popular. The rest of Aristotle's books must be referred to his Philosophy, which he divided into two parts, namely, speculative and practical; which is the most beneficial and reasonable division that can possibly be made. Because it is grounded, as well upon the end of Philosophy, which is to make us comfortable unto God by contemplation and action, as also concerning the double faculty of our souls, which is not onely intention for knowledge, but also to desire and long after. And according to this division, that which remains of Aristotle's books, are so fitted to the several parts of Philosophy, that at this day, without our travelling to Athens, though it be a vast time since this Peripatetick Princes death, we may communicate with him at Lyceum, as to all those things which are requisite in Philosophy; and to that part of contemplative Philosophy, he hath left us those beautiful and divine books of his Metaphysics; in which he hath so dexterously plaid the Philosopher by a kinde of a Traditionall Method (although so hard or occult abstruse) as that the ablest Scholastick Divines of our age, have been sufficiently troubled, to comprehend the method of them. Nor am I of their opinion, who alledge, that the Tracts which he hath framed in his Logical Organ, ought to be referred to the said contemplative part. For though I would not reject their opinion, who held that the true subject of Logick, was that which many call, ens rationis; yet I believe, that Aristotle never intended that work, save as a guide to a greater knowledge of the parts of Philosophy; whereunto the most excellent men of our dayes had respect, when they called it the hand and instrument of Philosophy; and under the banner of this contemplative Philosophy, we must also ranke natural Philosophy, wherein Aristotle was so superlative, as that, whether we compare and match him with other men, or whether we consider by what Art and Industry he hath proportioned that which he hath left to us thereon, we cannot possibly content our selves with the admiration of the rare knowledge of this personage. And, first of all, doubtless he surpassed all the excellent Naturalists that ever were before him, in so much, that from the time of Thales, Milesius (who men say were the first Physicians) of Anaximander, and Anaximenes, who a little after the Flood, awakened the Grecian Spirits to seek out the cause of natural things: from that very time, I say, men could but very obscurely discover any of the causes, except the material cause; so that the formal, the efficient, and final causes were altogether unknown. As for the Pythagorians, they indeed augmented Philosophy, not a little, but yet that which they wrote, was so stuffed with riddles and ambiguities, figured under their Numbers, as that it was impossible to extract any knowledge at all from thence. Plato also and Anaxagoras, who lived afterwards in the fourth age of the Philosophers, did very much clear the Pythagorians mists, and observed something concerning the four causes of natural things, but that was so imperfectly done, that had not Aristotle left of all set his hand to the work, that part of Philosophy would at present have been, as to the knowledge of the causes, the beginnings, and accidents of things in Nature. And herein he surpassed Plato; for speaking of the principles and beginnings

Seven learned

 Aristotle.

And were there but these few verses to express the praise of Aristotle, yet it would be elegantly enough set forth; forasmuch as by them he hath covertly represented unto us the excellency of spirit which he perceived in Aristotles works, who will not have him to have treated onely of natural and earthly, but also of heavenly causes. And to speak truth, there is no part in any Region of the Aire but he hath examined it accurately in his books of Meteorology. And as to the description of the Heavens, one would suppose he had been transported thither, he speaks so resolutely of them. Nor must I here linger to note, that besides our Aristotle, there were seven other learned men, that bore the same name: the first whereof had charge of the administration of the Commonwealth of the Athenians, who made very brave and elegant Orations. The second was he that wrote on Homers Iliads. The third was an Orator of Sicilie, a very able man, much reputed in his time. The fourth was a great friend of Ischines the Socraticke, called Mintimus. The fifth was a Cyrenian, a great and famous Poet. The sixth is he, of whom Aristoxenus makes mention in the Life of Plato. The seventh was a poor and silly Grammarian. These wrote in divers Ages, and the greatest part of their books came not to the hands of the Latins, but as yet remaine in the Grecian Libraries.

THE LIFE OF HOMER the Grecian Poet.

Pliny, in the second Book of his Natural History, in the ninth Chapter, doth complain, that we do not sufficiently commemorate the Vertues of those excellent Personages, who by their Learning and rare Inventions have enriched and beautified the life of man, expressing himself in this manner, Assuredly we bear but a slender affection and good will unto those who by their labor & industry have laid open and manifested unto us that admirable resplendency which was manifested by Homer. And I might justly be thought to be of the number of those who are here taxed. Should I not have endeavored to render unto Homer the honor which is due unto him, as being the Prince of Poets. Let us therefore not only observe the features and lineaments of his visage, but also consider most exactly the disposition of his Divine Spirit. And that which may augment our curiosity herein, may be the reflecting on this eminent personages height of courage and as Dion Chrysostom very well observes his hatred of vain glory; by his concealing not only his parentage and despising the place of his Nativity, but also his own name, whereas other Authors, as well in the Frontispiece, as throughout their whole works, affect to praise and set forth their own persons and qualities. And however Homer concealed the same, yet I will touch upon his parentage, only percursorily, for that I intended chiefly to insist upon his excellent parts. Ephorus the Cumean Historian doth assure us, that he was the son of a young maiden called Crisheida or Crisheis, begotten by a young man called Meleonus, who being her Guardian, had got her with childe, and put her off in marriage to Phemius a Gramarian of Smyrna, and a little after his Mother going unto the Bathes near unto the River Meletus, she was there brought to bed, and therefore called her childe's name Melesigenes; who being in his youth brought up in learning, became so great and excellent a Poet, that all the world admired him, by reason whereof he was sent for unto several famous Cities, where he was allowed a handsome subsistence to have the oversight of their Schools, having no great means of his own to live by. Now whereas he was overmuch given to his studies and reading, and that he spent whole dayes and nights therein, thereby it chanced that he was taken with a rhume, which falling upon his eyes did blinde him; and for this cause his name was changed for instead of Melesigenes, he was called Homer, which in the Cumenean language, doth signifie, a deprivation of sight, or a blindness. Which accident however did not debar him from the composing that most excellent and exquisite peece of Poetry, which at present is extant among us, divided into two parts, viz. his Iliades and his Odyssea; by the one he related the Trojan wars; and by the other (under the name of Ulysses) he describes unto us a prudent, sage, and well advised Captain, as the verses of a

Greek Epigram, speaking of his Poems, do expresse. But least some might doubt, or call in question how there could be so great a perfection in Homer, and how he should be able to compose such rare books being blinde? I shall answer, that though the sight be mans guide, yet several blinde men have been very learned, Nature having supplied the defect of their sight, with a superabundance of knowledge and wit. And to remove this scruple which those seem to harbor who do oppose themselves to the effects of Nature; I shall here insert several examples of blinde men, who were very famous; As the great Orator Appian Claudius, who was so highly esteemed by Cicero and by Titus Livius; that although he was blinde, yet he was chosen Censor at Rome, in which dignity he comforted and maintained himself in such an esteem, as his sole Authority hindered the ratification of the Peace which the Romane Senate had concluded with King Pyrrhus, and Dionorus the Stoick Philosopher, who although he was blinde, yet he studied in the night time, and played in the day upon the Viol (after the Pythagorian manner) and which is more, he publicly did teach Geometry which is almost a thing incredible, being a Science which can only be practised by the eye. Cajus Aufidius a great friend and a companion of *Cicero*s having in his youth been made Pretor at Rome, being blinde, ceased not to assist and give his advice in the Senate; moreover he made a notable Chronicle in writing, which was much esteemed. Antipater the Cyrenean, and Asclepiadus the Criticke, were both blinde; however they continued their studies in Philosophy, and became very learned. Didimus the Alexandrian, who being deprived of his sight in his very youth, became an excellent Dialectician, had studied all the humane disciplines, and made a rare Commentary upon the Psalms. Demonstus his Act putting out his own eyes to the end that he might be the freer in his contemplations, which astonished all men and made him be derided; was (as Tertullian a credible Author saith) to refrain the disordinate appetites of the flesh, caused by his lascivious and wanton looks. Moreover *Cicero*s the Bohemian is worthy to be noted, who being blinde was chosen the Chieftain of his party, and so well performed his duty as that he obtained several victories over his enemies. Also Belas the second King of Hungary, whose eyes were put out by his Uncle Coloman (who usurped the Crown) being retired into Greece, he did so well behave himself there, as that after *Coloman*s death King Stephen, *Coloman*s Son, sent for him home, and gave him the Earl of Socines daughter to wife, and after the said Stephens death, he was chosen King of Hungary notwithstanding his being blinde, and reigned nine yeeres, during which time he waged several wars, and chiefly against Brocius, *Coloman*s Ballard, whom he defeated, and left the Kingdom of Hungary peaceably to his children. Finally John King of Bohemia (who reigned much about the year 1350. was so courageous, although he was blinde, as to come in person to the aide of Philip the King of France his Kinsman, against whom Edward King of England waged wars, and did engage in the battell, where he was slain, together with the Earl of Flanders, and several other French Princes. But to return to Homer, whose Poetry was so much esteemed, as that not only the Greeks did greatly admire it, but also the Barbarians, as also the Indians, who did cause them to be translated into their languages, and recited them as familiarly and frequently as their own. Alexander the Great most highly accounted of them, saying, that there was no Poet deserved to be read by a King but Homer, he carried his Poems with him into the wars, and was never at rest untill they lay under his Pillow, desiring not to be deprived of Homers Muse neither by day nor by night. Moreover a little rich Coffer having been found amongst *Darius*s, his household-stuffe, and presented to Alexander admiring the beauty and excellency of the workmanship of it, he asked, What might be worthy to be inclosed in it? And several answers being returned, he answered, That for his part he thought nothing worthy to be contained therein but Homers Iliades. And the said Alexander, beholding the place where Achilles was buried, cried out, O most happy youth! that had so famous a Herald to blazethy praises, for doubtles he had it not been for him, the same Tombe which covers thy body, had also interred thy Memory. Moreover I have been told by some very wise Grecians who lived at Constantinople, that in their vulgar Greek Histories they finde; that Mahomet the second of that name, after the taking the City Constantinople being requested by Scolarius, a Greek Monk of that Patriarchy, who was the Monarks familiar friend, to preserve several ancient famous books which were in the Library of his said Patriarchy, from the fury and pillage of his souldiers, who were enraged against the Christians by reason of the great slaughter which they had made of the said Infidels. The Grand Signior demanded whether Homers works were amongst those books, which he would have preserved, and being answered that several of Homers works which were never come to the knowledge of the Latins had bin there kept since Constantine the greats time; Mahomet out of a curiosity to so great an antiquity, commanded his officers to take a strict charge of them, and to have as great a care of them as of his own person; a commendable action in such a Prince. And truly the most sublime knowledge of this our Poet Homer was such as that I may well say (as Strabonius the famous Historiographer did before me) That all the best learning whatsoever hath for the most part been extracted out of his works. For there was not any wise man whatsoever, whether he were a Physician, Politician, Mathematician, a Divine, or a Lawyer, who hath not grazed and fed upon Homers Cates. Some of them having all their life times received their nourishment and entertainment with him and from him, and others by making use of his writings, having enriched themselves by his works and labors. The Orators by sucking eloquence from him in their declamations. The Grammarians who cannot subsist without him. The Poets who never give over studying and imitating of him. The Geographers do admire the perfect knowledge which he had in Kingdoms and Provinces. And finally from the least Artist to the most sublimest strain of wit, each of them might be to seek, and to learn by his Poems. But that I may not too long dwell upon upon the rare qualities and ornaments wherewith this exquisite Poet was endowed, and the profoundness of his doctrine and writings: I shall add that he was not only praised, esteemed, and valued in all Greece, but that although the place of his birth be almost unknown, every City in Greece doth appropriate it unto themselves, coveting to make him their Citizen, as it appears by some Greek verses which mention the same, viz.

That seven famous Cities as Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Ithacus, Pylas, Argos and Athens, did contest for his birth. Nor must we believe that which some have written concerning his death, viz. That having demanded of certain Fishermen what they had taken, they should have answered thus, Those which we have taken, we have let go; and those which we have not taken, we carry about us. Which, by reason he could not understand, and being troubled that he should be over-reached by such illiterate people; It is said he dyed for grief, but I account it a Fable. The truth is, that having attained to the Age of one hundred and eight yeeres, being overwhelmed with maladies, having layen in a languishing condition for several dayes together. He dyed and was buried in the Isle of Chios, as the inhabitants of the said Island have assured me, who shewed me his Tombe hard by the Castle of Valizo, in the ruins of the Castle of Saint Elia; upon which Tombe a long while after some Greek verses, bearing this inscription, were engraven, viz. In this place the earth doth cover the body of that Divine Homer, who wrote the Lives of the Hero's, or Demy-gods. And being in the Isle of Samos, I was there shewn a Sepulchre towards the North, which was a very ancient one, two poles in length and in breadth, being sunk very low into the earth and newly discovered, the foundation whereof was Marble whereupon was written and engraven in old vulgar Greek characters, which were so wore out that those which were upon the place could hardly know what to make of it, the interpretation of which words, was, Under this Sepulchre of Marble doth lye the body of the great Homer. And as there were several opinions concerning the place of Homers birth; so there were as many concerning the times wherein he lived, and the reason is because there were several Homers, who lived in several yeeres, which hath caused these doubts. For the first Homer was born at Smyrna, being a powerful man, a great Lord, and his Kings Lieutenant or Deputy, who lived about the time of Troyes being taken. The second Homer was fourscore yeeres afterwards, born at Chios, being a great Philosopher, versed in the secrets of Nature, and lived much about King Dauids time, who I do conceive to have been the Homer which we have at this present spoken of, and whose Pourtraiture I have hereunto prefixed, and the which I did cause to be drawn after an Antick Meddall, which I did bring with me out of the said Island. There was a third Homer, who was born at Salamina, but he was never famous save for his wealth; as on the contrary our Poet Homer was remarkable for his Poverty, and was not at all known or taken notice of, during the time of his studies, or whilst he penned those rare things (which usually befalls Philosophers) but rather after his death. Moreover I was conducted by some Greeks to the village of Cardamillum a very solitary place, five leagues from the City, on the left hand towards the Sea coast, where the inhabitants do believe by tradition from Father to Son (which is also consonant to the ancient Histories) that it was the self same place where Homers Library was built, and where the said Greeks did assure me, that Visions and Ghosts, with such like apparitions were usually seen both in the day time and in the night. And as concerning that other Homer, who is said to have been born at Colophon, he was an excellent Painter, and Sculpter of Images; wherefore those of that City must also yeeld their claim, as to our Homers birth, there. But he that was the Citizen of Athens, and who lived in the time of Rooboham King Solomons Son; he was an excellent Orator, and was in such a repute in his own City, as the Athenians permitted him to make Laws, and to Govern them. And the sixth Homer which I finde, was a Grecian born at Argos, being both a great Geometrician and a good Poet, but there is no appearance at all that he should have compounded the Iliades. For Herodotus himself doth confesse, that betwixt Homers time and his, there was four hundred yeeres difference, which could not be since that Homers time whom we now immediately have named. The seventh and last Homer was a Maonian, who lived during the reign of Numa Pompilius, who was so wise and so well versed in the Greek Language, that he was permitted to Correct and amend such imperfections as he conceived to be crept into that speech, which was refined by the judgement of so excellent a man. And thus you have the several opinions reconciled concerning the seven several Homers, which were extant: and the famous Homer hereafter affixed, &c.

Poetry was in such a height of esteem amongst the Ancients, as that divers accounted the Poets to have been the first who have written concerning Divine, Natural, Moral, Political, and Military Affairs. Such a one was David the Royal Prophet, who ordained those which were under his obedience to celebrate the praises of God, in Verses and Hymns, and to sing such Psalms as he had composed; such were Lirim, Musam, and Orpheus among the Greeks. And if Poetry hath been so highly honoured and valued, as that Virgil himself accounted Musam to have been a Prophet, and terms him a most signal Poet in a sublime degree. I would willingly demand of those who endeavor to obscure that resplendency which themselves cannot behold why the Poets were formerly called Diviners? Was it not by reason that it is manifest such an Art doth add unto mans intellects a more then ordinary wit? The interpretation which was formerly made of this word Poet (which in the Greek doth signifie an Artist, or expert Workman) what can it be but skilful, or advised? And truly, a good Poet doth in all places deserve to be acknowledged for a very wise man. No one Science almost being a stranger unto him; wherefore Divine Plato calleth the Poets, Gods Interpreters. Strabo himself admiring this Science, saith, that all the Philosophers, Law-Makers, and Historiographers, have taken their fundamentals from Homer the Poet. However the effects of Poetry have not only by the Muses been infused into men (whereof France more then any other Country seems to abound, as Dorat, Ronsart, Baif, Desportes, and several others) but also unto women, several of that Sex having most ingeniously employed themselves in that Art; and to avoid prolixity, I shall only give you the names of some of them, who may serve as a precious ornament to that Sex. Amongst such as have therefore excelled in that Art we may well give Proba the first rank, wife to the Roman Consul, who being as Beautiful as Learned, did in the year of our Lord 424, couch in Heroick Verses, the contents both of the Old and New Testament, as far as the coming down of the Holy Ghost. Secondly Corinna, who was Ovids beloved. Elpis the wife of Boetius. Polla wife to Lucian the Poet, who often helped her husband in his composure of his Pharsalia. Lesbia, Mistress to Catullus. Cornificia the Roman Poetess. Thesbia, who was named the compositeress of Epigrams; and the other famous Poetess Corinna, who five times had the advantage of Pindarus the Poet, who in the City of Thebes had publicly challenged her to contend in the Poetical Art, upon which and the other liberal Arts and Sciences, once a year there was a solemnity of representations and prizes. SAPHO, the Lesbian Poetess.

logue of so many worthy women? Since Sappho the Lesbianite (so surnamed from the place of her birth, viz. the Island of Leibos called Methelin, seated in the Archipelagus or Mediterranean Sea, and usurped on the Venetians, some fifty yeers since by the Turkes) may justly pretend to the second best place amongst those who have been versed in this Science; and whereby in her days she attained to so great a renown, as that the Romanes erected a Statue of Porphyre, most richly ordained to eternize her memory; and Serapio himself had so good an opinion of her, as that he decreed no one woman may be compared unto her, as to the Art of Poetry; which Enstathius doth also confirm in his Commentaries on Dionysius. And indeed there are very few sorts of verses in which she excelled not, which caused me to insert her Picture in this place, which I ordered to be drawn after an old Meddall of hers which I did purchase and bring from the said Island. The like whereof was given (together with several others) unto the Barron de la Garde, at that time Ambassador for the King of France at Constantinople by Sultan Solymans chief Physician. She was very expert in the compounding of Lyrick verses which she evidenced in several Epigrams, Elegies and other pieces, which were translated out of Greek into Latine; besides many others which were lost by the neglect of our Ancestors, or by the destruction of the Cities and Towns of Italy; and specially of the Isle of Leibos; she also did invent a certain kind of verses, which are called Sapphicks by her name. As to her Father, Authors do vary, who he was; some say Scammon Dronymus, others Simon, others Eunonimus, or Eumenes, others Erygius, or Eucrytus, others Semas, others Camonus, and other Etarcus.

But for all these supposed Fathers, we must not therefore be induced to believe that she was a Bastard, nor that Cleis (who without doubt was her Mother) had miserably prostituted her Chastity to so many several men, it being only the uncertainty of Writers which hath caused these various suppositions concerning her Father: she had three brothers, viz. Laryeus, Eurygus, and Cheraxus; who although they were her brothers; yet our Poetess had several sentiments of them, for by how much she loved and cherished Laryeus, by so much did she hate Cheraxus, against whom she wrote several Invectives, because he had associated himself with Rhodopa the Thracian Whore, and with her had spent the greatest part of his Patrimony; which is the ruine of all those who do suffer themselves to be inveigled by such infernal Hags, who like Horse-leeches sucke them dry, and are the cause that they are constrained to abandon all Amity, Concord, and brothership with their friends and Allies, to cleave unto such a kinde of vermin. Sappho then was constrained to estrange her self from her brother by reason of a Whore. And those who read in Horace and Anthonius that Sappho was surnamed Mascula, were mistaken in their most injuriously and calumniously laying to her charge that she abandoned her self too much unto men and women. Nor can I likewise bespeak her over Chast, or untainted, since she was too much surprised with the love of Phaon (though some believe it was the other Sappho called Ereneas.) However I think it very unreasonable to suppose, that she should have perpetrated that crime which will be better concealed then mentioned in this place; and those Authors assuredly were to blame, when they gave her the surname of Mascula, and did not specify the reason why, seeming thereby only to imply, that her Actions were more becoming a man, then a woman: Or whether it was by reason of the rare verses which she composed; or for that she adventured to enter into those fair walks of Leucados, unto which none but men durst ever approach. But that which gave the greatest cause of this suspicion, was, that we read she had certain women who were her constant friends and companions, viz. Anagora, Milefianina, Gongyla of Colophon, Eunica of Salamis, Erymna, and several others; but, and if upon that account we should suppose her guilty of that horrid crime which is laid to her charge, we might aswell conclude that the other Sappho who was a company keeper, aswell as this our Lesbian, should be as guilty as her self; and likewise all women in general who frequent company. Wherefore it is a great injury done to our Sappho to asperse her in this manner without any lawful reason or occasion: Whereas the Divine Philosopher Plato, did highly admire the dexterity and vivacity of her wit, aswell as the profound knowledge wherewithal she was endowed, and whereby she excelled all men and women, how eminently learned soever they were.

And to returne to our Sappho again, we finde that she was joyined in Marriage unto an honest considerable man, abounding in wealth, named Cercola, or as others Cercylla, by whom she had one only daughter named Cleis, by her Grand-mothers name. And during her husbands life there was not the least speech of any misdemeanor at all in her; but when she became a Widow, some say (as we have already hinted thereon) that she fell in love with a certain man called Phaon, who being gone into Sicily, and the mistrusting that he bore her not a reciprocal love equal to hers, fell into such a rage and impatience, that for to free her self from so disordinate a passion, she cast her self headlong from the top of a Rock into the Sea. And thus our famous Poetess did end her dayes, who lived in the year of the world 4684. and before our Saviour 515. yeers. At which time there flourished Xenophanes the Philosopher, Theognus, and Pindarus the Grecian Poets, and the choice Roman Matron Lucretia. This said Isle of Leibos did breed a second Sappho called Erexera, famous in the Art of Poetry, who invented the Cittern or Rebeck, and composed many Lyrick verses, though she was very unchast, as several Writers have noted, &c.

THE LIFE OF SALADIN, the Sultan of Egypt.

Ann. Mund.
1137.

C. N.

Some men descanting on the approved Axiome, That a thing which is ill-got, cannot be of long durance, do think that they have hit the nail on the head, when they urge Saladins History. And then they suppose this Allegation doth halt, because the Historians do recount, that Syrracon the Mede Saladins Father, was invested in the Kingdom of Egypt by very unlawful means, viz. By his treacherously killing of Calyplus the Sultan of Caire (under whom he was a Captaine and received his pay) whereas he pretended to salute him And by this means he seized both the Treasury and sovereignty of Egypt. Some writers say, that this Syrracon, or Syrracuin, was not Saladins Father, but his Uncle, and that his Father was Megemedinus. However it was, The Dominion of Egypt fell into Saladins hand by the means of this perfidious personage Syrracon, who afterwards was so highly exalted by the said Saladine, that he was esteemed to have attained unto the greatest glory that ever any warrior did achieve. And to avoide prolixity I shall omit to specify those courses which he ran to compass his ends. This present History being sufficient to give you his Character, wherefore I shall only say, That he was the sole Sultan, who was endowed with a surpassing profound prudence and Judgment; for he spared neither Gold nor Silver, to gain such men as he conceived might be useful unto him. He conformed himself unto the fancies and humors of those, of whom he stood in need, and had to do withal, not so as to render himself subject unto their said dispositions, but that having once founded them, he might be the better able thereby, to make his advantage according as it should best fit for his turn. And the better to compass these his said designs (as Bocartius the Historiographer Writes) he travelled in the disguise of a Merchant throughout all France and Italy, to inform himself of the Christians Forces and designs; by which means he did so well discover their intentions, that afterwards taking his opportunity, he quite outed them of all the Territories and Dominions which they possessed in the Levant. And being sent for by the Damascenes, he went unto their relief, and in a little space of time he made himself Master of the whole Province, usurping the same against his Master Melech Sali. His picture (as you see it in the Frontispiece of this History) I brought from the City of Damas, it being given me there by an Armenian Bishop, together with some others. Moreover he made himself Lord of Bosra of Malbec, which formerly was called Helipolis, and of Camelus. And to the end that the Christians should not rush in upon him whilst he was gaining the Territories belonging to the heir of Noradinus. He made a league with them, which lasted only until such time as he had fortified himself.

The means whereby Saladin attained the Kingdom of Egypt.

Saladin King of Damas.

For

For in the year one thousand one hundred seventy and six, in the month of December, he pitched his Campe before Ascalon, in which Baldovinus the fourth of that name, King of Jerusalem, had a Garrison, and was present there in person to defend the place; and here Saladin was handfomely beat to dirt, and lost the best part of his Mamaluks; and had he himself not ran away, he might have happily been worse served. But he suffered not the Christians long to boast of their glorious conquest; for he suddenly charged them again to furiously, that Baldovinus the King had like to have been slain, as well as the great Commander of the Knights Templars was. And Saladin remaining victorious, took the Castle which Baldovinus had caused to be built on the River of Jordan, killing or making all those slaves which he found in the place; and demolishing the Fort, quite to the ground. After which a truce for five yeers was agreed on between both parties, which lasted not long, for Saladin having discovered that the Count of Tripoli, did bandy against the Christians, relieved (notwithstanding the promise which he had made) to side with him. Whereupon Baldovinus was constrained to take the Field; and the Turks did so likewise, and the battel was fought neer unto the Castle called Trobolet, where although the victory was dubious, yet Saladin had the worst. And therefore in rage and despiht he caused his Army to march out of Egypt by Sea; and besieged the City of Barnut on three several sides, but finding the King at his heels, and not daring to stand him, he raised the siege, and marched into Mesopotamia; and on the other side the Christians invaded the Territories of Damas, and endeavoured to repulse their enemy; who strove to root them out of Palestine. To which end that Saladin might be the better opposed, an inspection was taken of all the Goods, Estates, and wealth which the Christians had in those parts; And an Imposition or Taxe was laid upon all those who were worth one hundred Bejants; and the Churches were likewise assessed, whence some persons who were ill vert, in History, or in the management of the Exchequers did say, That this taxe or impolt was the Saladine Decimation; conceiving that all monies which the Clergy doth pay either severally or jointly with the generality of the people, is of the Nature of a Decimation. Such people should only consider the distinction of Taxes, subventions or subsidies and such contributions; or the nature of such monies as are raised upon the Church by the Prince, and they will finde them to be Subsidies, Loans, Voluntary Gifts, and other extraordinary disbursements, which in no wise do favor of Decimated Taxes; although the leavying of monies in such a manner be granted by the Pope unto such Kings, Princes and States as are under his obedience; and therefore although the Christians of the Levant and of Palestine did impose a Taxe upon themselves to Arme themselves, and to withstand Saladine; yet it cannot be said that these monies which they disbursed, can properly be termed a Saladine Decimation. To which may be added that it was both leaved and payed at far different times. As it may appear by what Rigordus (who hath written the life of King Philip Augustus) saith concerning the difference betwixt both the one and the other contribution. The first Taxe, saith he, was raised upon those of the Eastern parts; the second upon the Western inhabitants, who had not taken upon themselves the Croisade for the holy journey; and its well distinguished by the ordinance concerning this said Decimation which expressed all those who had taken the Croisade upon them to be exempted (and cleared from the paying of their debts) as also the Abbots and Monks of the White-friars; and the Hospitals, Almshouses and Infirmaries, with their Revenues and the Religious Nuns of Font-Eurauld. But to the contrary, those who had great revenues and enjoyed the high jurisdiction, and did not prepare to go beyond Seas, they were subject unto the said Decimation; and every Gentleman that had not taken the Croisade upon him, was to pay unto the Lord under whom he resorted the tenth part of his proper Goods and Chattels, or of the Mannor or inheritance which he held of him; and if he had not any inheritance which depended of the said Lord, yet he was obliged to pay him the tenth part of his goods, although his person had any dependency upon the said Lord. This said Saladine Decimation contained several other particulars which I shall here omit, having onely inserted these foregoing ones, to shew the difference between these two manner of wayes of leavying of monies; and to evidence the great streight wherein all Christendome as then was; and whereunto Saladin had reduced them; which (as a man may say) did constrain all Christendome in a manner to abandon their own dwellings and Countries to oppose and make head against this perfidious and disloyal Saladine, to whom we shall return; and demonstrate what slight account he made of his promises, and the word which he had once passed. Thinking himself no longer obliged to keep the same then his Avarice, Ambition, and his own Conveniences would give him leave. Wherefore, although the Truce which he had made with the Christians had bound his hands from attempting any thing against them, yet being stirred up by the Count of Tripoli, who was displeased and enraged against Gay of Lusignan, King of Jerusalem, he also caused the Arabians to rise in Armes, and to ransack the Territories belonging unto Renould of Chefikon Lord of Montreal beyond Jordan; who setting upon them, beat them soundly, and took from them all their spoil; entred with a stronge Army into the neighboring Arabia, and made a terrible rout amongst them. Mean while Saladin (who took not King Lewis, though Saphendin his Son did) having reigned sixteen yeers, departed this world in the yeer of the incarnation of our Lord and Saviour, eleven hundred four-score and seventeen, to the great joy and repose of all Christians, had they been so well advised, as to have made use of the advantage and opportunity which was presented unto them by the dissention of Saladins Sons, who falling foul amongst themselves destroyed each other.

Saladins will. Finally, Saladin being sensible of his humane and frail condition, and perceiving that he could not survive that sickness, making his will, commanded that there should not be any Funeral pomp used at his burial; but that only a black mourning vestment should be carried upon the top of a Lance before his Corps; and that one of his Priests should rehearse unto the people the tenor of certain verses as they are contained in Docarin; and for the Readers better understanding have been Englished thus,

THE LIFE OF EDWARD Prince of Wales; Surnamed, the Black Prince.

Ann. Mund.

Christ. Nat.

Am sorry that I cannot so particularly trace this History, without inserting a just reprehension, which I am necessitated to urge against John the first of that Name, King of France; who although he was a Prince endowed with several commendable Graces, yet he could not so well season them, as to make that good use of them which he might have done, by his prudent taking the advantage of a fit and commodious opportunity, to vanquish his enemies: Nor can it be said that he was backward in giving sufficient orders to his Warlike preparations, he having framed so Puissant and Strong an Army against a very inconsiderate handful of English; for Edward at his landing had not above three thousand English, and at the utmost his Army, after he had united all his Forces, exceeded not twelve thousand fighting men. The fault which King John committed (and which was none of the least) was, that both Armies being quartered so nigh unto each other, he suffered his Enemy (who was sensible of his condition) to take so much rest, and gave him leave to fortifie himself. For this young English man, finding that meer necessity enforced him to fight, and that he was unequal in Forces; during the time which was spent in Parleys, ceased not to surround his Camp and to encourage his Souldiers with the Victory, which he already promised himself, and held for assured, by the relief and succour which he had received from the Lords Capeaux de Buch, Rauson, Muridan, L'Esquire, Albret, Montferrand, Tartes, and others of the Nobility of Aquitaine: And I finde that the said Prince was so assiduous in the reviewing and animating of his said Forces, as that he would scarce allow himself time to eat; and so farre was he from sleeping, as that he hardly was known to close his eyes till he had gained the Victory: Fencing himself so well between the Villages of Banuvir, Maupertuis, and the Abbey of Neuville, in the Vineyards and Inclosures, as that he quite disinabled the French Horse from approaching him, and facilitated a means for his own Men, whereby to defend themselves; The Honour therefore of the Victory fell to the lot of this brave English Warrior, by the indiscretion and improvidence of King John of France, who seeing he had permitted his Enemy so strongly to recruit himself, ought to have forecalt with whom he was to deal, viz. with desperate men, who finding that those tenders of submission which they had proffered to the King (by the intercession of the Cardinals of Perigord and Urgel, delegated by the Pope, to make up the breach between these two Princes) did not at all move the Kings heart, but that he would wilfully drive them upon the precipice (as it were) of despair, they were constrained (as a man may say) to hazard the whole, and play at quit or double: and they taught the King, as things fell out, that there wanted little or nothing of their having caught Fortune by the Fore-lock.

The Prince of Wales his fair protest to the K. of France.

And to speak the truth, he had done farre better, if he had graced Prince Edwards Forces a Peace, who desired but to have gotten off with their lives, and promised to put into his Majesties hands, all those Places which he had formerly taken from him, as also to return him all the Prisoners, Booty and Plunder, which he had gained since his return from Bourdeaux: Finally, That he would not take up Armes, nor suffer his Subjects to Arm themselves, for the space of seven years against the Crown or Kingdom of France. By this means he might have gained the Victory, and needed not to have hazarded the chief of his Nobility, his own Person, and his state, in the very heart of his Kingdom. But I doubt not after the fault was committed, that he repented himself of his bargain, and acknowledged his error, but it was then somewhat too late, and when no means were left of raising up again, those Princes, Lords and Squires, who were most miserably slain in the Battel of Poitiers, which was fought on a Monday, being the ninth day of the moneth of September, in the Year of our Lord, one thousand three hundred fifty and six, when there was no time to retreat. Dennis of Morbegne (an Arthesian Knight, of the City of St Omers, who had been banisht out of France) seized on the Kings Person, and delivered him up into the Prince of Wales's hands; Philip Duke of Touraine, and the Kings last sonne, was taken Prisoner, and the Flower of the French Nobility, who accompanied the King, were either mowed down with the Sword, or taken Prisoners. In so much that Prince Edward (according to all appearance) had occasion enough to be puffed up with glory; yet however (although he was an English man) he knew so well how to temper the fruits of so signall a Victory, that in lieu of being exalted thereat, he humbled himself very much unto the King his Captive: And the very evening when the Battel was won, the Kings supper was prepared in the English Camp, and the Prince of Wales served him bare-headed; the Captive King several times prayed him to sit down by him, but Edward desired to be excused, saying, That it behooved not a Subject to sit down with his King: The King told him, I had resolved to have given you a supper this night, but the fortune of the Warre hath made you give me one. So likewise do all Writers confess that the Kings imprisonment, although it continued a long while (even from the Year of our Lord one thousand three hundred fifty and six, untill the moneth of July in the Year of our Lord one thousand three hundred and threecore) yet it was not at all in any away of restraint, for the King enjoyed all the possible liberty that might be in England, and was delivered out of that Captivity, by the means of the agreement which was made and ratified at Bretigny; Nor will I adde all the Articles of the said Treaty, but only one; viz.

The Article of the Treaty of Bretigny upon which the French King was released.

That the King of France for his Ransom did leave unto the King of England, who was to retain his Title of Lord of Guyenne, all the Country of Aquitaine to the very River of Loyre; and particularly the City of Engoulesme, with the Province of Angoumois. And here I shall make a kinde of a digression, only to tell you how and in what manner this Prince Edward did Govern and Rule our Province of Angoumois for the space of ten years. He caused that great and stately Tower to be built which is yet extant in the City, and several other Fortresses, and sumptuous Buildings. And as he was much devoted unto the Priory of Nonseville (which is situated five leagues from the City of Engoulesme, founded by a vertuous Matron named Hildegarda, as I have read in the old Annals of that Province) he did benifice the said place extremely, and caused a great Hall to be built there, and new glazed the Church with stately painted glass windows, in one of which his own Picture (just as I have here prefixed it) was drawn after the life, and being very like two other of his Pictures engraven in Rome, one of which was placed over one of the Gates of the Tower of Cogniac, and the other over the Gate of the Castle of Montignac; which two Statues the Regent Madam Lewis of Savoy, Mother to the late King Francis the first, caused to be thrown down. But to return to our History, The French King, the better to accomplish the aforesaid Treaty, did cause those Cities to be delivered unto the English, which he had promised them: And although he sent them his Letters Patents thereon, yet the Inhabitants of Engoulesme would not consent thereunto, untill such time as Chandownes, the King of Englands Lieutenant or Deputy in Guienne, entered into Angoulesme, and took possession thereof on the six and twentieth day of the moneth of October, in the Year of our Lord one thousand three hundred threecore and one; whither also a little while after the Prince of Wales, together with his Princess, came to dwell, making it his chief residency, both by reason of the commodiousness of the place and its strength. Towards the end of the Year one thousand three hundred sixty two, the Princess of Wales was brought to bed of a Sonne, in the City of Angoulesme, who was also named Edward; at whose Christning several of the chief Nobility of the adjacent parts did assist to honour the same; As also Peter of Lusignian King of Cyprus, who at that time was come into France to sollicit the Christian Princes to relieve the Holy Land.

The birth of Edward the Prince of Wales his son. The difference concerning Richard the Prince of Wales his son being called to the Crown of England.

Moreover the difference betwixt several Historiographers concerning Richard the Sonne of Edward, seems to me not at all difficult to be reconciled: For although Richard was the younger brother, having been born at Bourdeaux a great while after the Warres between the Prince of Wales and Henry of Castile; yet however he might easily attain unto the Crown of England, either because his brother Edward died before him; or that finally Edward the third King of England of that Name, was pleased it should be so: whose Testament and last Will I shall here insert, because it may the more conduce to extoll the Praise, Renown, and Excellency of this said Prince of Wales; whom, as it may be conceived, he would have called to the Crown, as being the Eldest of his Sonnes, in case his death had not prevented the same: Wherefore the said King Edward the third, because he would not frustrate his Sonnes succession (who died a year before) would have the said Richard, his last Sonne, to succeed him in the Royalty, in the Year one thousand three hundred seventy seven, and he was Crowned King of England, being but eleven years of age; although King Edward had five several Sonnes, who ought to have preceded the said Richard in the Regal dignity, viz. Lionel Duke of Clarence, John of Gant Earl of Derby, Agmond of Langley Earl of Cambridge, and Duke of York, Thomas of Briffall Earl of Buckingham, and the Duke of Gloucester; However their said Father, rather chose to preferre their Nephew Richard before them all, by reason of the great confidence he had of the Magnanimity and Valour which was innate in him, by inheritance from his eldest Sonne the Prince of Wales. True it is that Henry the fifth of that Name, Sonne of John of Gant the Earl of Darby, did by force Depose this said King Richard; but the said violent depoposition and illegall proceeding, doth not at all prejudice the right which King Richard had to the Crown; Nor in the least that acknowledgement which was made thereon by King Edward the third of that Name, because that his Grandfathers Will and Testament had enfranchised him above any degree or preheminance, which the other Brothers could lay claim unto; or rather this King Richard was promoted to the Crown, by the Law of being presented thereunto, and nominated and confirmed therein by King Edwards last Will. But being we were insensibly engaged in this discourse, only out of favour to, and in admiration of the Prince of Wales, and that doubtless, contrary to all right and justice Richard was Deposed, least we should too deeply engage our selves in an endless discourse, we will rather return to our former track, and follow the proceedings of Edward the Prince of Wales, whom we left busied in solemnizing his Sonnes Christning at Angoulesme, where we must by no means leave him; for as he was a man of Business, very active and of high Enterprises, we may not conceive that he would suffer himself to be transported with the over-glibby pleasures of the Angoumoisins: And that he might not remain idle, in the Year one thousand three hundred sixty six, he undertook to defend Peter King of Castille, against his bastard brother Henry, who had made an insurrection against him; wherefore the Prince of Wales assembles all the Forces he possibly could, and with them did those innumerable memorable Exploits, attested by all our Historians: And it cannot be denied but that he had severall weighty Affairs at that time in hand; for although he had made sure of the King of Navarre, who (breaking the Alliance which he had sworn with this Henry the new King of Castille) had promised passage unto such English as were to have been sent to the Prince of Wales his aid; yet he had enough to do with the King of France, unto whom the said bastard Henry was fled for relief, and who by all his subtilties and diversions which he caused to be made against the English in the Kingdoms of Arragon, and near unto the City of Tholouse, could not hinder Prince Edward from joyning his Forces, and exploiting Valiant Feats on that occasion. And here the Historiographers do again mightily differ, concerning some Taxes which were raised by the said Prince of Wales: For, say some, the said Prince, being solicited, or requested, by his Father, to take King Peter of Castille into his Tuition and Protection, he made use of all the possible means he could invent, to raise and pay that Army which he then Conducted, and that having exhausted his Exchequer in that Warre, he assembled the Heads of all his Provinces at Angoulesme; and imposed a Tax upon the people, of ten fold Tournois, for every Fire (the rich paying for the poor one year) which said Tax was to last five years (others say the Tax was farre greater) whereby there arose a general discontent, as we shall hereafter declare: However others, who have runne through Froissards History, do say, that this same Prince of Wales, because he would not oppress the people with extortions, (having not wherewithall to make his Army subsist) did borrow vast summes of Money of his Father the King of England, and even did cause all his Cupboards of Plate, both of Gold and of Silver, to be melted down, and to be Coynded: But and if we narrowly pry into both these reports, it will not be hard to reconcile them; for it is not probable that King Edward having engaged his Sonne in a Warre, and finding that he was in want of Moneys, should have raised a summe of Money by way of Subsidy, to furnish him. For the repayment of which, the said Prince Edward should have afterwards been constrained to have laid the said Tax upon his Subjects; and to speak the truth, there cannot be any other construction made of the foregoing passages: Besides, it is evident the discontents and distastes of the inhabitants of Angoumoisins, and the rest of the Aquitains, did not arise thence, but from the ill will they bore unto the English, and by the regret which they had to see a stranger Beece them, thereby to enrich their general Enemy: so likewise do I know that there were other occasions of discontent; and especially, because Prince Edward could have made up that summe of Money which he had borrowed of his Father, by the ransoms of those Brevenfals, and French Nobility which he had taken, amongst which the Earl of Narbonne was one, who together with the rest, he released upon their bare words and promises. this new Imposition, together with the ill-will which the said Angoumois bore unto the English, who became too much puffed up, and ingrossed to themselves all the Dignities, preheminences, and Offices of the Countrey; without the admitting of any French man amongst them, which did beget such a heart-burning in divers, that at length the Lords of Labreth, the Earles of Armaignac and Perigord, and several others were on the point of rebelling against Prince Edward. However, they rather chose to apply themselves unto the remedies of Justice, and retired themselves unto Charles the fifth of that Name, King of France, and there became Plaintiffs against Edward their Prince; who was summoned to make his Personall appearance in the Chamber of Peers (or in the Lords House) at Paris, to give satisfaction on the complaints of the people of Aquitane. Who answered, that indeed he would appear there, but it should be with a Casket on his head, and threescore thousand men at his heels, (to which others adding one Cypher increased it to six hundred thousand men.) And thence began that furious Warre which was so violently pursued on both sides; though it fell out ill for Prince Edward, who besides the great losses which he sustained, got a fit of a Dropfie, or a swelling, occasioned (as it is furnished by some) through poyson which was given him. And being reduced to so great an extremity of weakness, as that he was forced to be carried in a Litter, he retired himself into England, in the Year one thousand three hundred threescore and eight: And during his abode there, you may imagine how things were carried on in France, for in the Year one thousand three hundred seventy two, Henry Hayes the Governour of Angoulesme was no sooner taken at the siege of Soubize by the French, but the inhabitants of Angoulesme, being cloyed with the English, taking the opportunity of freeing themselves, surrendered the City of Angoulesme (the place of my birth) into the hands of Charles the fifth of that Name King of France; who to acknowledge their sincere affection towards him, did grant unto them severall Priviledges and large Immunities: And by their example the rest of the Aquitanes did successively proceed to shake off the English yoke; nor could King Edward the third ever after reclaim them, although he did promise them to abolish all those new burdens and Impositions. Nor do I here pretend to justify the said Prince Edward, thereby to lessen or suppress the right which our Kings have unto Aquitane; However I must needs averre, that it would be a difficult matter to meet with a more Generous and Magnanimous Prince than this Edward was, unto whom all distressed and oppressed Princes took their refuge, by his means to recover their Liberties. We have already touched upon his endeavours to assist Peter of Castille; and I shall also hint upon the King of Majorca's repairing to Bourdeaux unto Prince Edward to demand relief of him against the King of Aragon, who caused this poor Insular Kings Father, to be put to death in prison, and detained his Lands and Dominions: After Prince Edward had heard his complaints, he promised him all possible relief, and took him to be his Sonne Richards Godfather, who was born at Bourdeaux: Notwithstanding he could not re-establish him, for Henry King of Castille having surprized this King of Majorca being sick, he set him at a Ransom of one hundred thousand Ducats, because he was in company with the Prince of Wales, when he restored that disloyal false Peter unto the Kingdom of Castille: After which, the said sickness killed the Majorcan King. And as to our Prince Edward, after he had thus valiantly finished the course of a most Renowned life, he deceased in the Year of the Incarnation of our Lord, one thousand three hundred threescore and sixteen, at a Palace near unto London; much about the time when (at the Assembly of Bridges in Flanders) the Marriage of Richard his Sonne with Mary daughter of Charles the King of France, was by him set on foot; which said Match was so long and diversly debated before it could be concluded, as that Pope Gregory being much offended, for meer spight left Anignon, and returned to Rome.

However, because that particular doth not much concern Prince Edwards life, I shall not say any more thereon, but rather proceed to recount unto you the disloyalty and perfidiousness of Peter of Castille, who finding himself restored to those Dominions and Territories for the which he contested with Henry of Castille, and that also those of Toledo, Lisborne, Galicia, Seville, and severall other places in Castille, were come to do him homage, he did pay them in the like Coyne, as usually such unworthy Personages do recompence those who have contributed to their re-establishment; For when this base, false, and treacherous person found that Prince Edward did press him to pay those Forces which he had levied for to recover his Countrey again, this sneaking hound, retired himself to Sevill, on a pretence to leavy the Moneys for the said Forces payment, promising to return within some certain weeks, by himself prefixed: The Prince of Wales expects his performance, the time expires, and no payment, but in words; whereupon the Prince sent some Gentlemen to know the occasion of this so long delay, who were sent back by Don Pedro with this answer, allcading that he had already sent the said Moneys by his own men, unto the said Prince, but that they had been encountered by the way and robbed: And by such like shifts and put offs, he so long detained the Prince of Wales in a bootless suspence, as that his Forces by a long and tedious expectation, being weakened and disbanded, he found himself in a sad exigency; for he was constrained to retire into his own Countrey, without the receiving of one farthing token, and was forced to oppose Henry of Castille, who the better to reward him for the the relief he had afforded the perfidious Don Peter, endeavoured to invade some of his Territories in Guyenne.

However, the Prince of Wales found out a means in time to frustrate all the said Henry's designs, although it was not in his power to hinder the Aquitaniens Rebellion; who finding themselves mightily oppressed by the excessive Imposition which was laid upon them, for to supply those summes of Money which Don Peter should have payed; revolted against Prince Edward, and dispossessed him of all Guyenne; which was all he got by ayding and restoring the said perfidious, ungratefull Don Peter of Castille, &c.

THE LIFE OF CHARLE MAINE or CHARLES the Great, King of France, and Emperor of Rome.

Overall men have over-much busied themselves to finde out, upon what account this Emperour was honoured with the Title of Charles the Great: Nor will I satisfie my self with the reason which is thereon given by the Author of the Triumph of the Nine Worthies; being unwilling to believe that because this said Charles did kill that Bear, whereof he maketh mention, he was therefore surnamed the Great, although I do not deny, but that the Counties of Poitou, and my native Country of Angoumois, were shrewdly infested by this furious beast; but to believe that for this sole action he should have been qualified with the Title of the Great, I must desire to be excused. And will rather choose to derive the cause of that said Denomination, from the Heroicall and Magnanimous Exploits which were by him performed, and which made him to excell beyond the rest of the Kings, Princes, and Famous men of his time, in the same manner as the Victories and Conquests of Alexander (the Sonne of Philip the Macedon King) did acquire unto him the Property and Possession of the Title of Great. Nor shall I dare to adventure upon a Comparison betwixt them, this Discourse being not capable to contain their incredible number of Actions; However, I dare be bold to assert, That this our Charles, was not at all inferior to Alexander, as the description of his Life, Victories, and Valiant Atchievements, will sufficiently manifest. He was born at Ingelheim (according to the opinion of the most part of the Historians) which is a place two German leagues distant from the City of Mayence, or (as others will have it) from Liege: He, together with his Brother Carlo Main, succeeded King Pepin, (the first of that Name, and the first that was called The Most Christian King.) These two Brothers shared the Kingdom of France, in such a manner, as that Charles, who was the elder Brother, had for his part France, and Aquitaine: which before were fallen unto Pepin their Father, by the division which he made with Carolo Man his Brother, who in the Year seven hundred forty and seven, went to Rome, and there became a Monk, and retired himself unto the Mount called Sorathes, where he caused a Monastery to be built, and had designed to have remained there with some other Religious men; but because that place was too publick, and that he was resolved to sequester himself from the world, and from the frequenting of such of the French Nation, who came thither to salute him, he removed to Mount Cassin, which is in the Land of Samos, and there shut up himself in the Benedictine Monastery, Italy, where he ended his daies: Others, however, do beleve that he died at Vienne, upon the River of Rhyne, in the Year seven hundred fifty four, whence he was carried and buried in his own Abbey.

Moreover the Kingdom of Soissons, with the Territories beyond the River of Rhyne, fell to Carolo Man share, the Brother of our Charles, who having reigned jointly together with his said Brother for the space of two years, deceased on the fourth of December, in the Year after our Saviours Nativity seven hundred seventy one, which was the third year of Charles his Reign; and after Carolo Man death, Charles was made King of all France, by the generall consent of all the States of the Kingdom; which particulars I thought good to specify in this place, not that I do intend to track the succession of the times in which he lived, and to specify all those generous Actions which he so happily effected: But because I have resolved to follow quite another strain in this Discourse; and to take a farre higher rise, that so I may the better descend to describe this great Monarchs Magnanimous Actions. But first I shall give you a kinde of a Catalogue of his Stature, Manners, and usuall Exercises. Turpin the Archbishop of Reims tells us that he was of an extraordinary Stature, a Body very well proportioned, being eight foot high; his Face was a span and a half long, and his Forehead was one foot in breadth, his Head was thick, and the distance between his Eyebrows was a span long, his Nose was little and flat, his Countenance was fierce, and his Eyes were Lion-like, big, green, and sparkling like unto a Carbuncle; inso much as when he was transported with rage, his very countenance did frighten and terrifie his Enemy. At his Meals he did eat but very little bread, and did often eat Venison, which he much loved, being, as some say, very much addicted to hunting. At his dinner he usually had a quarter of Mutton, a Peacock, a Hern or Crane, or a couple of Hens, or a Goose, or a Hare, besides the other services at the beginning and ending of his Meals; his ordinary custom was alwaies to have four Messes, besides the roast meat, which seems to be an excessive Ordinary for such as had not so good an appetite as himself; for had he not eaten thus superabundantly, he was troubled with terrible gripings and crudities of the Stomack: He was satisfied with a very little Wine, and drank but thrice at most, whence sprang the Proverb, Ter bibere in mensa Carolinum, You must drink but thrice at Charles his Table; which is the more to be admired, since there are but few Germans who do not exceed that way. In summer he did usually strip himself and sleep two or three hours at Noon-tide, after which he did eat some Plums: He was clad after the French fashion, and alwaies wore a short sword hanging at his girdle, in the pommel whereof, his Seal, being the Coat of his Arms, was engraven; and at the Sealing of any Laws, Ordinances and Statutes, he was used to say, Behold the Sword that shall maintain my Ordinances, and which shall wage Warre against those who do infringe them. He was perpetually in action, and did usually rise in the night time, to peruse his Memorials, and to prepare the weighty affairs of his Kingdom: At night he had fourscore Gentlemen Pensioners, or Yeomen of his Guard, who being compleatly Armed watched by him, viz. forty before, and forty after midnight; ten of which were placed at his Beds head, ten at his feet, and ten on each side, having all of them their Swords ready draws in their right hand, and a burning Taper in their left.

And that which is told of his extraordinary strength is almost incredible, as that with ease he could lift up a Knight in full Arms, from the ground as high as his head: and with his hands he would open and extend four Horse-shoes being joyned together: He had such an extraordinary force in his Arm, as that with one blow he would cleave asunder a horse man in full Arms, and his horse to boot, so that doubtless he laid on with a good heart. And as his Stature and Corporall strength was great, farre greater was his Magnanimity and Courage, as his actions have evidenced, which I shall only superficially touch upon, in this relation, remitting the curious Reader, who shall be desirous to know those particulars which I may have omitted, to the writings of several other Authors. Before he had put his foot into the Royal stirrup, and during King Pepin life, he commanded that Army which his Father had raised against Warferus Duke of Aquitaine; he subdued Poitou, Berry, and Clermont in the Province of Auvergne; together with several other Cities; in which encounter Chilpingus, and Aminius were killed, the one Earl of Auvergne, and the other of Poitou: After this Victory he passed from Aquitaine, into Biscay, to help the Biscains, who were almost quite disheartened by reason of the frequent Inroads and Plunders of the Saracens, who as soon as Charles the Great was come amongst them (foreseeing that he was to be their Deliverer) they took so much heart of grace, as to re-assume their lost hopes, and defeated the Saracens. And having thus successfully performed their Exploits, he was no sooner called to the Royal Dignity (which was in the Year of our Lord seven hundred threescore and nine) but the self same year he was constrained to raise a powerfull Army to march against Hannault Earl of Provence, who having rallied the remainder of Warfers, the Duke of Aquitaine, Forces (whom Pepin had caused to be taken and strangled) had without any resistance almost at all usurped the Dutchy of Aquitaine: In this Warre he was so successfull and happy, as that the inhabitants of Xaintonge, Poitou, and of Angoumois, having refused to rise in Arms for Hannault, against their King; he forced Hannault to fly for his safety, and to take Sanctuary with Duke Loup in Gascogne; who although he did not side with Charles the King, yet apprehending his too near approach with his Army towards his Limits, delivered the said Hannault, together with his Wife and Children unto the King, who were sent prisoners into France; and by this means the King was reconciled to Duke Loup, and the Aquitaine Warre was also ended: At the same time, viz. in the year seven hundred and seventy, the

the King caused Fransac to be built (which is as much as to say Frans Saracenorum, being at this very present a strong place, situated upon the River of Dordonne, hard by Libourne in the Bourdelois) to make head against the Saracens, who at that time did dwell beyond the Rivers of Gironde and Dordonne; In the ensuing year the whole Monarchy of the Kingdom of France fell unto him by the death of his Brother Carolo Man; whose Widow being accompanied by a brave and gallant French man of great power named Antbor, or Anthony, did retire her self, together with her Children, unto Tassilon the Duke of Bavaria; and from thence she transported her self towards Disier the King of the Longobards. For the which, Charles the King was very wroth, and by reason hereof he repudiated Hermingarda, the said Disiers Daughter: (Others write that her Name was Theodora, and that she was Disiers Sister,) whom he had Married the year before by the command of Bertha his Mother: Although Paulus Emilius doth attribute the cause of these two Princes enmities by reason of the said Hermingarda's Divorce, which caused several and many cruel Warres betwixt those Kingdoms, and finally the subversion of the Longobardians. The original of which Warre was founded on Disiers pretending to have a hand in the dividing of the Kingdom of France, and because he fomented a partiality between King Charles, and the Children of the late Carolo Man his Nephews; and that which exasperated King Charles the more was, because Disier had harboured Hunault his ancient Enemy, who having obtained leave of the King to go in Pilgrimage to Rome, sided with Disier, who made him General of his Army, and had given him the keeping of the straight Passages of the Alps. However King Charles being sent for to relieve the Pope, passed over the Alpes, and waged fierce and cruel Warres against the Lombards, as well in the Province of Piedmont, as in the place called Murtri, where he so valiantly charged Disier, as that he constrained him to shut up himself in the City of Pavia, and where the said Disier did so valiantly defend himself, together with the Longobards, as that the French lay six months before the place; by which long siege Disier being tyred out, besides the contagiousness of the Plague, having much diminished his Forces, he was constrained to surrender himself unto King Charles his mercy, who afterwards banisht him and his Wife, and Children, unto Liege. And thus in the year seven hundred seventy three, the Kingdom of Lombardy in Italy was ended, which had lasted 224 years, (or 213, or 205, for the Writers and Historiographers do so much differ) after Disier had Reigned eighteen years. And in the year seven hundred eighty one, Charles caused his younger Sonne Pepin (whom he had by Hildegard, Daughter of Hiltebrand Duke of Suevia) to be Crowned King of Lombardy; the Confines of which Kingdom (by the Emperors consent) he caused to be settled by that which is contained between the Appenin, the Alpes, the Lake of Garde, and the River Mincio, or otherwise, according to the ancient Lombardian Chronologers, by those Territories which are separated from the rest of Italy, by the Rivers of Pau, and of the Rhin Boulonois. After Pepins death, which happened in the year eight hundred and eleven, on the eighth day of July, Charles gave, (in the year eight hundred and eleven) the Kingdom of Lombardy unto Bernard his Grandchilde, Pepins Sonne, to whom he gave a certain person named Walic to be his Governour, who was a wife and experienced Man, Sonne of Bernard, his Uncle, who he left at the siege of Pavia, when he went first to Rome. He commanded the young King and his Governour to repulse the Barbarians, who with a Fleet ransacked and burnt all the Coast of Italy: which was a little after performed by Hermangerus the Count of Empau, who lying in an Ambush, by Majorca, surprized the Saracens, who were on their return from Sardinia into Spain, their Ships being laden with Booty, the greatest part whereof he took, and recovered, besides the great Booty which he found, above five hundred Sardinian prisoners, which the Barbarians were carrying away.

During the remainder of King Charles his Reign, France had several Warres, which the King fo ordered and disposed, according to his excellent virtue and faculty, as that they but little endamage the people of France: Whereby this Prince's Magnanimity is highly to be extolled, especially in his having quelled his enemies, without the burdening of his own Subjects. And amongst others, the Saxons, with whom he warred so long, as that he overcame them, and quelled them eleven several times; and yet he could never reduce them to that perfect fidelity nor loyalty which Subjects do owe unto their Prince, although he endeavoured by fair means to gain them, by punishments to suppress the treachery of those which were feditious, and by force of Arms to countermeine their perfidiousness and revoltines; till at length, being weary of their impieties, and of the effusion of their blood, which he had been forced to continue for the space of thirty and three years; he rather chose to transport them, together with their Wives and Children into France, that so they having changed their dwellings, and having sucked in the sweet and milde air of France, they might become better settled in their obedience towards their Prince, than they were before: And gave them all the Coast along the Ocean to inhabit, commanding Liderick the Lord of Herlebec (who was great Forrester or Governour, and Admirall of that Country (the same which we now call Flanders and Brabant, which is the reason those inhabitants do yet retain the Saxon Language) viz. to have a watchfull eye over them, and to keep them there secure. And that their former habitations might not remain unpeopled, he sent the Abrodises thither in the year after our Saviours Birth eight hundred and five. In so much that all men who heard of Charles his happy Victories, and admirable Successes could not choose but admire them; and some others again were so surprized with astonishment, as that they submitted themselves unto him, beseeching him to admit and preserve them under his Protection, and to save them from the incursions of their Enemies; And amongst the rest, that part of Spain, which was infested by the Saracens, not knowing which way to turn themselves, nor whose assistance

crave, to avoid the storm of the Saracens inhumanity, had recourse unto King Charles, whose Puissance was dreaded throughout the whole world, and who once before had given a proof of his Prowess against these Infidels, by the relief which he afforded the Biscians in the year of our Lord seven hundred fifty eight, before he was King. And after several solicitations from the Spaniards, King Charles caused his Army to march and to fight the Saracens, in which occasion the French men shewed themselves so valiant, as that they mastered the Town of Pampeluna, which they sacked, and found abundance of wealth in it, which the Saracens had plundered almost throughout the whole world: And to strike a terror in the rest, the King caused the Walls of Pampeluna to be demolished; by which means Sarragoce stood out but a short siege, and surrendered it self to King Charles, who caused Ibnabal to be acknowledged there for their King, he having been formerly driven out by Abnaurm, and Denisturm, who being startled at these successes, came in unto King Charles with Presents, and surrendered themselves his Tributaries. And the Warre which he waged in those parts, was so fierce, as that all Spain trembled at the very Name of Charles; and abated very much of the Saracens power, who could never be subdued by any body before, save by himself. Wherefore Adelphus the second of that Name King of Esturia and Galicia (surnamed the Chaste) having obtained a signal Victory over the Saracens, wherein he defeated three score and ten thousand men, sent Ambassadors unto King Charles, laden with the Enemies spoyl, acknowledging that he accounted the Victory which he had gotten, to have been effected by his means. And with the rest of the said spoils he caused two Monasteries to be built, viz. Oventenosa and Esturissa. But whereas those Infidels did continually break forth again upon the Spaniards, King Charles sent thither Adamarius Count of Ganes, Hermongarus Earl of Empus; and the Lord High-Confable Bouchard, under whose Conduct, he acquired ten signal Victories over the Enemies; having sustained but one memorable loss, during his Reign, and that was at the battel of Roncevaux; where, by the Treason of Ganes (who being corrupted by the great Presents and Gifts of the Kings Marfillon and Baligant) delivered into their hands, Romland and Olivier, with the flower of the Nobility, and the choicest Troops of France, which were all put to the sword; for which Charles sought a revenge and obtained it in this wife; Near the River Ebra, hard by Sarragoussa, he defeated thirty thousand Saracens, and with his own hand kild the King Baligant, and afterwards caused Finabel, Ganes his Cousen, to be hanged, because he was accessory to the Treason; and as for Ganes himself, he was sentenced by Naymes of Bavaria, and the other Nobles of France, to be quartered and pulled asunder by four Horses at Laons. True it is, that in King Charles his return from Spaine, in the year seven hundred seventy nine, his baggage was almost all plundered, but it was not by the Saracens, but certain Gascoones, who were displeased at the Souldiers making a longer stay in their Country then they desired they should, which Robbers were so well versed in the adventures and coasts of the Country, as it was impossible to track them, and did so cunningly carry on their Pillagings, as that the best of the Army mistrusted no body save Ibnabal; and had not this said company of Theeves been discovered by chance, the blame had remained upon that poor Prince: But they at that same time brake forth in a publick way under the Conduct of one Burgandus, (of whom mention is made in a Council which was assembled at Thionville, and in an Epistle written by Pope Nicolas unto the Archbishop of Bordeaux) and who ruined and plundered the very Churches; and therefore in horreur and detestation of such sacrilegious villains, all Robbers have been since called by the name of Brigands. Nor had Charles left them unexterminated, had not the Saxon Warres hindred him, they revolting against him, in the year seven hundred and fourscore: And because we have already discoursed of that Rebellion, Disloyalty, and how they were punished, we will not trouble our selves further with them, but will turn towards the Brettons, who also in the year seven hundred fourscore and six, did begin to rise in Arms, and would not obey his Commands, disavowing that they owed any obedience to the Crown of France, but they were quelled, Charles sending a Puissant Army against them, under the Conduct of Adulphus one of his Generals, who did so well abate their pride and presumption, that they were glad to cry him mercy, and to submit.

In like manner Tassilon the Duke of Bavaria was subdued by King Charles, who (by the Council of his Wife, the Daughter of King Disier, to be revenged of that which Charles had done to her Father and Mother) had leagued himself with the Huns, and raised an Army to his own confusion, for hearing that Charles was arrived as far as the River of Lech, which divides the Territories of Germany and Bavaria, he was constrained to submit, to humble himself, to resign his Interest, and to deliver his Sonne Theodon for an Hostage, wherewithall Charles not contenting himself, he would also have the Father to boot, and caused both of them to become Friars, in the year seven hundred eighty eight: And deeming it not yet sufficient to have purged that age of such Rebels, he took from him his Dutchy of Bavaria; in which he placed no more Dukes, but disposed of it unto Earles: Nor will it be needfull to insist any longer upon the several Nations, People and Provinces which were subdued by this Puissant Monarch, since our Histories publish nought save the Victories by him acquired. And so great was his renown throughout the whole world, as that his greatest enemies (against their wils) were enforced to curry favour with him, to league themselves with him, and to acknowledge him to be their Superiour, witness the presents which the King of Persia (who entitles himself to be the King of Kings) did send him; which was rather by maxime of State, than for any good will he bore him: And to speak the truth, the Greeks did not only dread the Puissance of so great a King, but the Romans likewise; whence the Greek Proverb seems to have had its rise, Englished thus,

The Lord of Hesfel named Ace, did in like manner send the Keyes of his Town unto Charles. Abdelle sonne of Ibmangus the King, came from Mauritania unto Aix Lachapelle to Charles, with severall Prefents, and in such an humble manner, as it sufficiently demonstrated how great a blis he esteemed it to enjoy the good graces of a person whom Hirenu the Emperour of Constantinople so much redoubted, as that to hinder him from enterprising any thing, against his Empire, he sent unto him to Rome, to demand one of his Daughters in Marriage with his Sonne Constantin. Sonne to Leo the Emperour of Constantinople, which was doubtles a great deal of honour offered unto Charles: who notwithstanding denied him, at which he was so much displeased, as that he would needs vent his wrath upon the Territories of Spoletto and Benevento; where he lost abundance of men; so likewise did the Ambassadors of Abraham King of Barbary come unto Charles, bringing him other rare and magnificent Presents; so that it seemed all the severall Monarchs of the world did strive to embrace this French Monarchs friendship. And to conclude, we will only here adde the alliance which Acacius the threecoreth King of the Scots made with him in the year eight hundred and four; which was ever since that time kept and observed by the Scots, so likewise did their Kings adde unto their Coat of Armes, a double streak of Gules with Flower de Luces round their Scutcheon, to shew that the French alliance hath conducted much to the support of their Kingdom: Which is the chiefeft consideration that made me speak of this League, before I did enter upon the discourse of Charles his Actions after he became Emperour, that so the world may take notice, that this League with Scotland was made whilst Charles was yet but King of France. Wherefore after an infinite number of Victories obtained, Charles was declared Patricius or Senator of Rome, by Pope Adrian, in the year of our Lord, seven hundred seventy three; which was a degree to succeed in the Empire, just as the High-Constableness, or Prince of the blood of France, was a step to the Crown. And finally Charles attained to the Empire of the Romans, on the 25th day of the moneth of December, in the year of our Lord eight hundred and one, and the three and thirtieth of his Reign; which was the day of the celebration of the Birth of the Saviour of all the world; During the solemnity of which day, Pope Leo proclaimed Charles Emperour of the Romans, by the general consent of all the Princes, who from all parts of Christendome were assembled at Rome to see so Great and Magnanimous a King. After which the Pope put the Imperial Crown upon his head: Whence it came to pass that ever since till this very day the Emperors are Sacred, and Crowned by the Pope of Rome; At which time all the people did cry out together, Happiness, long life, and Victory to Charles Augustus, Divinely Crowned, most Great and Peaceable Emperour. Some there be that would needs defant upon the like New Creation, allegorizing upon the comparison which they make between the Saviour of the world and Charles the Great, because that on the same day whereon the Saviour of the world was born, Charles was installed in the Imperiall feat; as presaging the re-iteration of the Roman Empire, which succeeded in his Person; because that having been transported into Greece, it was fallen into the hands of those who were not of the Imperiall race; Others do Philosophize upon the day whereon Charles was declared Emperour. But for my part I see no great reason they have so to do, in case we do but reflect upon the new Reformation of our Kalendar, which doth abolish such kinde of formalities; which I shall leave to return to our new Emperour, who continued in the performing of his former Glorious and Heroick Feats of Armes, the recital of which I shall omit to avoid prolixity, besides that I suppose I have heretofore sufficiently discoursed of his Warlike Incounters, Victories and Prowesses, to make him admired of all men. At present therefore it will not be amiss to let you see that the clattering of Weapons did not banish this Magnanimous Prince from the professing of Piety, and the love of Learning. And as for his Piety, he could not choose but bear a great affection to Christianity, being defended from a Father, who had the honour to be the first King of France that bore the Title of Most Christian King. For the proof whereof I shall urge the Voyage which he made into Italy, to repulse Disier King of the Lombards, who was leagued against the Pope; And (in the year seven hundred, seventy four) in a full Council of one hundred and thirty Prelates, caused the Priviledges to be given of choosing the Pope, the Archbishops and Bishops of the whole world.

And in reference hereunto I might also alleadge the Liberalities towards the Church of Rome, by confirming the Donations which Pepin his Father had granted the Church, besides those which he himself did give unto the Sea of Rome, and the making over of the Deputiship of Ravenna, which from thence forward he would have depend of the Popes obeysance; As also the Donation (as some say) which was by him made to the Church of the Island of Corfica, and all the Continent of Liguria, from the old ruines of the Town of Luna, to the very Alpes. And however all these are very excellent and remarkable Actions, yet they seem not unto me to have been the chiefeft testimonies of his Piety; wherefore I shall only set down three others, which may justifie his Integrity and Holy life; The first is the good order and discipline which was observed in his House, for you could not perceive in the Court of so great a Prince, the usuall excesses and Courtly dissolutions, and loosenesses which were wont to be present in other Courts. For in lieu of Fools, Naturals, and such like Gulls, whereof the most part of great men do make use (as jesters) to recreate their ears, during their repasts, with some pleasant tales and stories; this this Emperour had alwaies a person who did reade unto him, either the holy Scriptures, Histories, and chiefly the Books of St Augustine of the City of God; all which were so pleasing unto him, as that he was never satisfied with seeing, reading, and hearing of them. A fit pattern for all Princes, who desire to attain unto the highest pitch of Honour and Felicity, whereunto they should conform themselves, and drive away from their presence those babblers and prattlers, who for the most part poyson the Courts of Princes and Monarchs with Cruelties, Lubricities, Vice, Corruptions, and all kinde of other villanies. The second example concerneth the Charity which he performed towards the poor, which was so great, as that he sent great sommes of Money as farre as Egypt, Jerusalem, Africk and Syria, to be distributed amongst the poor Christians who lived in Captivity under the Sarracens. In France and Germany he founded severall Hospitals, and left Legacies in Money, which he devoted to the nourishing and maintenance of the poor: He had alwaies twelve poor men in his Train, who lived at his cost and charges; but after that King Ageland did reproach him that they were not so well entertained as his servants, they were more honourably treated. Thirdly, We shall represent his Magnificence towards the Churches, which would take up too much time to repeat particularly: To the Churches of Maynce, Strasbourg, Cullen, Trier, and others, as well in Germany as in France, he granted large Priviledges, and endowed them with vast Revenues: In Germany he built severall Cathedral Churches, as well as in France, their numbers being infinite; all which might be sufficient to Eternize this Princes memory, who the better to Immortalize his Name, erected four famous Universities, the one at Padua in the year seven hundred ninety one; after he chased Disier out of Lombardy: I know some would attribute the institution thereof to Frederick the 2^d, but they are grossly mistaken. He sent unto Pavie in the year seven hundred ninety two, John Maitres the Scot, who was the Companion of John Duns, and of Alcuin (the Emperors Tutor) who was one of those two Friers who cried through the streets of Paris, that they had knowledge to sell, and demanded but meat and cloth for it. He gave unto him the Abby of St Austin hard by Pavie, that there he might begin to plant the first Stock of Learning; and there he ended his daies. As to the University of Boulogne, some do also endeavour to bereave him of the honour of the Institution of it, to conferre it on the Emperour Theodofius, but they are farre to seek on that particular: And it is void of all doubt that he was the first Founder of the University at Paris, at the solicitation of his Tutor Alcuin, I deny not but Sciences were taught in this great City, but they were expounded by some so grossly and ignorantly, as that it was rather a dishonour than a commendation to good Learning; and by this means he prepared the way for his Successors to perfect so happy an undertaking. Nor shall I stop here to enlarge on the praises of this most famous University, I intend to be as brief as possibly I can in this Discourse. Our Emperour was none of those great undertakers, who talk much, but when it comes to the point (as it is truly said) withdraw their hand and do nothing. He thought it no dishonour to cause his daughters to learn to fow, and to be exercised in the art of good Houffery; And her sonnes were instructed in all the profitable Sciences, and Liberall Arts: But now advaies forsooth, we meet with some Buffoons, who are willing to dispend with Princes in the troubling of themselves with knowledge and the Contemplative Sciences; because, say they, it would crack their brains, but I pray, Where are these mens brains? and was there ever a more active man than our Emperour? who notwithstanding was very studious, well spoken, and Eloquent. So likewise was Peter Pifa his Tutor for the Grammar, and Alcuin the Englishman for the other Sciences; by whom he was instructed in the Rhetoricall, Dialecticall, and Astrological Arts: He began a Vulgar Teutonic Grammar, and he corrected many vitious Barbarismes and corruptions which were crept into it; inserting in it the most memorable and praise-worthy Acts of the Ancient Kings, and Valiant Captains, and caused his Subjects to learn it. And for the better Governing of the Commonwealth he established excellent Laws and Ordinances, which were reduced into four Books, by Ansegisus Abbot of Lob, and afterwards Archbishop of Sens. So likewise was he minded to have altered the ancient Laws and Customs of the French, but fearing least such a change might breed a Sedition and Mutiny, he quitted that design, and did nothing therein. But it was he, (as Paulus Emilius and Gnaquinus do write) who first instituted the Twelve Peers in France, in the year of our Lord, eight hundred and twelve, viz. three Dukes, the Archbishop of Rheims, the Bishop of Laon, and the Bishop of Langres; three Counts, or Earls, the Bishop of Chaalons, of Noyen, and of Beauvais. The other six were secular ones, viz. the Dukes of Burgundy, of Normandy, and of Guyenne, and the Counts or Earls of Flanders, Tholouse, and Champaigne. However there have been great alterations as to these Peers, and it is a question whether or no they were instituted by the said Emperour, as I have observed in my Geographieall description. And the more I enter upon this said Discourse, the more matter I do still finde therein with so much superabundancy, as that should I set down all the particulars, I could fill up whole Tomes, without the reciting of several things which were done and undertaken by this our said Emperour, who (as we are made to beleive by the Author of the seven Worthies) had been at Jerusalem, which is contrary unto the Truth; for there is no mention at all made of him, in the Catalogue of the Christian Princes, who were in the Holy Land, and several other Historiographers speak not of it; which they would not doubtles have omitted, if he had gained such famous Victories against the Infidels, as are there specified; and by reason of which some Writers have been so impudent as to frame a number of Fables, and such like incredible forgeries, against this Emperour; others have presumed to controul his Actions and Deeds, taxing him for having led an ill life, and being cruell and disloyall; Grounding this their said calumny upon

THE LIFE OF TAMBERLAIN, Emperor of the Tartars.

Ann. Mund.
5365.

C. N.

Hether we consider the commentements, which gave life to the Sovereign Empire of this same furious raging Tamberlain; or whether we delight our selves by observing the means whereby he scrued himself up unto the summit of Glory. We must needs confels (although we were never so void of reason and judgement) that it is scarce possible, less credible, that so despicable a vessel should contain so great a stock of admirable Actions, and that thence a branch should have sprung, which did subvert the Turkish Monarchy, and several other Potentates, as the sequel of this present discourse will manifest. As to his off-spring, Historiographers do much vary about the truth of it. Some say he came from the midst of the Parthians, a people very much redoubted in the Romanes times, though but slenderly famous. Others say he was a Turke, a Scythian, a Zagataean, a Tartarian, because it is apparent he was born at Samercaud which is adjacent unto the River Taxartes hard by the Country of Zagatai. And as there is some difference concerning the place of his off-spring; so we shall meet with a far greater concerning his qualities and extraction. Some deriving his descent from Ginges Cham, and make him to be the Son of Zain Cham, the third Emperor, who usually is called Bachii. Others suppose him to have been but an inconsiderate person, of a base extraction, but who afterwards caused himself to be reputed to be the greatest and most powerful Prince of all the East, in so high a degree, as that he termed himself to be the wrath of God, and not a man; in regard whereof, some do compare him to Hannibal, taking it for granted, that the earth never bore a more fierce, severe, obstinate, and self-willed man, then this same Tamberlain; and that none ever punished thefts and plunders in such a manner as he did, although himself was the greatest thief and robber, and the most detestable villain (as to his Actions) which ever any History did set forth or could produce. And on the contrary, he was again so excellent a personage (as to his Intellects) that by his audacity and assurance, he facilitated those things which all others judged to be impossible. Moreover he was so highly befriended by Fortune, that he never attempted any thing, but he came off with credit: Nor did he ever wage war, but he remained Conqueror. However some do scruple the meanness of his birth, not judging it possible that so inconsiderable a man, as he is said to have been, should attain to such a pitch of greatness, as to shake the Turkish Empire which was so long a settling. But since I finde, that the generality is of that opinion, It will not be unbecoming my joyning with them therein; and to say that he was the Son of one called Sangali, a man who was none of the wealthiest in the world, inasmuch as that Tamberlain was constrained (in relation to his Fathers profession) to keep Cattel and Herds in the Fields, but he had not long followed that vocation, whenas entering into a certain Treaty and League with the rest of the shepherds of that Country, they chose him to be their King, and did enroll and lift themselves under his command. Finally, some others do conceive him to have been a poor souldier, but a subtle and circumspect man; who wanted no wit, being of a lively and quick spirit. To which they add, that being got up on the top of a Stable wall, whence he had a minde to have stolen some horses, and perceiving that the owner had discovered him, he flung himself down the wall, and in the fall hurt his thigh, by reason whereof he ever since remained lame. However he performed gallant Actions; and he was mightily praised for the equity, policy, and good discipline wherewith he maintained his Army. So that had he not a little too much slackned the reigns of his Cruelty and Ambition, he doubtless had excelled all the Warriors that ever were in the world; for no Chieftain had ever attained to the practical part of ranging and disciplining an Army, so exquisitely as he did. And should I relate the several good orders which he caused his souldiery to observe, it would be an endless work; I shall only tell you in what manner he prevented the coming of any spies into his Camp, and how they were presently discovered; for which cause he built a house without his Camp for all strangers that arrived, who were there lodged and treated, having any business to communicate unto him: whereby he prevented their sneaking into his Camp, and their prying into and discovering what was there done. Every evening the watch word was distributed, and each man was to repair to his Quarters. And if any one was found out of his rank, or gadding abroad out of his Quarters, he died without mercy; so that there was no shelter or safety for spies. I shall omit the several manners of repartitions of his Quarters, and under what penalties he caused his Military orders to be observed; since the reader may be better satisfied therein by several other Pens who have most amply written concerning this famous Capitaines deeds; and shall proceed more particularly to describe his life. Now by his robbings and thieveries he had so well thrived on all sides, that at last, he was not a little troubled, how to preserve that which he had thus unjustly acquired. And therefore he took two puissant men among the Massagethians to be his Associates, viz. Chaidarus and Mirxenus, who being gained by the presents which he gave them, came unto his relief with their Forces, and with this support, he fell upon the Tartars, overcame them and defeated their Cavalry, which gained him such a repute, as that the inhabitants of Samercaud furnished him with Gold and Silver, and Forces to go through with his undertakings. So likewise the King of the Massagethians made Tamberlain General of all his Forces to his own ruin, for at the taking of Pogdatus a City in Tartary, Tamberlain (on purpose to usurpe his Kingdom) did cause a Fig to be given him, and after his death married his widow. And immediately after made himself King of Samercaud, and of the Massagets. Harboring a design at that very time to conquer the Empire of Asia; whereunto he was much solicited and edged on by Chaidarus, who brought Myrxenus in disgrace with Tamberlain, to whom he had reported some words which Myrxenus had too freely and unadvisedly spoken of Tamberlain, whilst he was only General of the Massagets, which cost Myrxenus his life. Afterwards he began a war against the Hircanians and Caducians whom he conquered. And because the Arabians did ravage the neighboring parts, and gave relief unto the Caducians; he thereupon took an occasion to invade all the Nations which were subject to the Sultan of Persia, of Baldacia, Damania and of Egypt. However though he could not conquer them, after he had well nigh tyred them out; he agreed on a Peace with them, conditionally, that they should furnish him with Forces to serve him in his wars, and to pay him an Annual Tribute as a signe of their submission.

Nor did he therefore spare the Assyrians, Persians and Medes, who had given the Arabians relief, but plundered all their Country, took some Cities, and quite ruined all the lower party of the Country. After which he returned to Samercaud again, to suppress the Scythians who had invaded his Dominions; so that with a puissant Army he passed the River Araxa, and did set upon the Scythians, who at first did repulse him most valiantly, and for the most part did give him scurvy foiles, but at length he reduced them to that pass, that being not able to recoile any further, or to give battel, they were forced to come to daggers drawing, and to trust to the keenness of their Scimeters or Sabels, who giving the Scythes a terrible overthrow, all the Hordes of the Scythians were forced to come to a peace with Tamberlain. And as soon as he had settled all things there and was fure of them, he faced about towards the lower parts of Syria to conquer it; and assailed the City of Damas, where he made a pitiful deluge of blood, and a terrible havock of the wealth which was in that City, being the chief of all the East for the Levani in traffick with our Europeans. And being not satisfied with that booty, he marched towards Alep which Town surrendered it self, being unwilling to incur this cruel Champions displeasure, of whom it is reported, that in his assaulting of places the first day he set up a white Banner or Ensigne; signifying that if the besieged did surrender themselves that day, they should have their lives and goods preserved. The second day, he caused a red one to be displayed, his pleasure then being, that in case they yielded that day, the Masters and chieft of the families should onely be put to death to save the rest. And the third day he caused a Black Banner to be set up, denoting that he was resolved not to hearken to any capitulations at all, nor to give any Quarter, so that those who were taken in that or the following dayes, should be put to death, both Men Women and Children, small and great, the Town pillaged, and afterwards fired. Wherefore those of Alep having seen the miserable punishment which he inflicted on those

But whilst he was busied in this manner, tormenting some, and undermining others, flattering himself with the vain hopes of the great Conquest he should make, he was called home again by the troubles which were arisen in his own Country. For the great King of Catay, who is one of the nine Indian Hordes, and the Sovereign of all the Tartars had made a pretty spoil through all Tamberlain's Country, who in the beginning thought to have thundred him out again, but finding with whom he had to deal, apprehending least if he should exasperate the great Cham of Catay too much, it might endanger his possessions, was constrained to come to a Treaty, and to demand a Peace, which was granted him, conditionally that Tamberlain should do him homage, and should pay a yearly Tribute for the Messageres Country which he held. Nor need we to doubt but that Tamberlain, might have withstood the great Tartar, but that he was loath to diminish his Forces, with which he was resolved to wage war against the Ottoman Family; being spurred on thereunto by the great Ambition he had always to undertake some considerable expedition or other against his Neighbors. Wherefore being entred Cappadocia, he besieged the City of Sebastia, and fought against it with so much dexterity, as that the Turks being discouraged, and having lost all hopes of being relieved, had not the heart to defend themselves against the Scythians, Persians, and Bactrians, who having taken the Town put all to the sword whom they found in the place, so that it is said there dyed that day, above sixscore thousand souls, besides some persons of quality, which were taken, and amongst the rest the Son of Bajazeth the first of that Name, who by his Father had been put in the City of Sebastia, the better to provide for the defence of it; but he had not long kept it, before Tamberlain made him pass under the merciless cruelty of his most impious rage. After which he sent Ambassadors unto Bajazeth, commanding him to render unto all those whom he had dispossessed, whatsoever he most unjustly detained from them (which was but a meer pretence in Tamberlain to pick a quarrel with Bajazeth) as also to pay unto him vast and excessive Tributes. Nor will I here venture to contest whether Tamberlain had just cause to war against Bajazeth, as being a Tyrant; for all the world knows this Tartar, made use onely of this cloak or pretence the better to collour and disguise his design to out this poor Turke; who on his part was nothing inferior to Tamberlain, who although he was called Temis Cuthlu, which in the Tartarian Language signifies a Fortunate Iron; because he was not onely happy in his enterprises, but as Valiant as his Sword; inasmuch as that he made a great part of the world tremble. So on the other part Bajazeth was surnamed Lelapa, which signifies a Furious Wave, and Hildin, which signifies Boisterous and Impetuous. Notwithstanding Tamberlain did make him know, that his Fortunate Sword, did not apprehend the being shaken or broken by the Turkish Waves and Thunderbolts; but that to the contrary his name Lelapa was rather to be filed a Whirl Wind, but by reason of Bajazeth's virtues and valour, but because of his passion and hastiness, whereby those fortunate enterprises were dissipated and confounded, which he might have carried on gloriously, had he suffered reason to have been his guide. And it even fell out so, for Bajazeth returned a very smart answer unto Tamberlain, and unadvisedly tainted the Tartars Wives honour; which words cost him dear. For as Tamberlain did not bear any goodwill to Bajazeth at all; so his Wife being enraged at the indignities which were put upon her by the Turk, did so highly incense her Husband, as that he was not to expect any peace with his Wife, unless he pursued the Turk with fire and sword.

Wherefore Tamberlain assembled a formidable Army of Tartarians, Scythians, Persians, Armenians, and Bactrians; amounting unto the number of eight hundred thousand fighting men, and passed through the Provinces of Lydia and Phrygia, which caused Bajazeth to raise the siege of Constantinople, and to march unto Asia; to hinder the Messagerian from coming into his Country, resolving before Tamberlain should have time to proceed he would encounter him, and fight him in Armenia, or upon the banks of Euphrates, and although they fought each other yet they could not meet along while. Bajazeth's Council in the interim were of opinion that he should do well to treat with Tamberlain, seeing he was not strong enough to resist him, and would not dispend his Treasury to raise new Forces. After which the Turk having intelligence that Tamberlain marched in Bithynia, to besiege Pruse (heretofore Bruse) the chief City of the Country and the Royal Seat, he resolved to fight him in that place. And both Armies joyned battel on the Mount Stella (where Pompey fought with Mithridates in the year one thousand three hundred ninty and seven) and the Turke chancing to be worsted, there were above two hundred thousand of them slain in the place, and an infinite number taken. Now Bajazeth perceiving that the day was lost, began to acknowledge his error, when it was too late, wherefore he resolved to repaire the faults the best he could, and save himself by flight, being mounted on a Mare; which was as swift as the wind. But the misfortune of his disaster following him; he was pursued by the Tamberlainists, who overtook him, by the fault which Bajazeth committed in letting his Mare drink, who thereby became so heavy and replenished, as that she could not make so much way as she did before; besides all which this poor King was troubled with the Gout, which had disabled his hands and his feet. The Tamberlainists having ving ceased on so rich a booty, as also on all the Bashas, Beglerbys, Agaz, and Sangeas of the King of Turky; he was brought unto Tamberlain, who taking him by the shoulders said these words, Thou displayst Coward thou art now my Slave, and shalt receive the reward of thy desert. Bajazeth being full of amazement, answered him, I pray you Sir, kill me, but the Conqueror replied, Let's go, let's go, there is no man can save thee. Wheras this miserable captive forgetting the miserable estate wherein he was, returned harsh language unto his conqueror, and with injurious terms began to inveigh against Tamberlain, reproaching him with his base extraction, and with his former profession of thevery. So that it was a wonder this Zagathian did not cause him immediately to be slain; for on a less occasion he caused his great friend Mirza to be put to death, because he only had adventured to say that the principality of Samerand was too well settled, to fall into the hands of so inferior a fellow, and so inconsiderate a robber as Tamberlain was; although these words were not spoken in his presence, nor after he had attained to that dignity. But it seems he reserved the venting of his choller upon Bajazeth, because he would not put him to death before he had observed all the formalities of justice. And truly the captive King had little reason to rail at him, for immediately he caused him to be fet upon a Mule, and in a way of derision to be led through all the enemies Camp, and afterwards caused him to be tyed in Golden Chains, and to be put in a Cage, carrying him up and down with him wheresoever he went, and when he got upon horseback, he caused him to kneel down, setting his feet upon his neck and shoulders, making him his footstool (as formerly Sophorus the King of the Persians did unto Valerius the Emperor of Rome) and fed him only with crumbs of bread and broken morsels which he flung unto him just as if he had been a dog. However Bajazeth's courage could not hereby be abashed, as it appeared when Tamberlain caused that Sultane's which the Turk loved best (and who was taken with the Kings children and all Bajazeth's Concubines in the Seraglio of Pruse or Bruse) and made her serve him at table. At which sight, the miserable captive flew out into howlings and roarings reproaching the Conquerors baseness and pride, in making so little esteem of the Kingly race, for this Lady was the daughter of Elsazor King of Servia. Moreover these conquests so puffed up this Tartars heart, as being not able to contain himself within any compass, he had designed to pass into Europe to conquer it, but his death put a period to all his ambitious enterprises, in the year of our Lord fourteen hundred and three. He was the most Ambitious man that ever was heard of, and who would by no means be rendered civil nor familiar. Whereof a certain Genua Gentleman, who was one of his great favorites can give a testimony, and who essaying to break him of his rudeness and inhumanity wherewithal he treated those which he had overcome, he answered him, How now thou Dog? dost thou think I am a man? I am the wrath of God, and the ruin of mankind; nor have scarce any exceeded him in cruelty. Two examples whereof I shall set before you: The first was when he caused that most barbarous inhumanity to be exercised at Damas on the maidens and young children, who came out of the said City to meet him, clad in white, and bearing Olive branches in their hands for a token of peace and submission; this unworthy and cruel Tyrant set his Cavalry to Maffacre and trample underfoot all that flower of youth, and taking the City, he put all the inhabitants thereof to the sword. The second was the impiety which he committed against the Spittle of Lepers which was joyned unto the City of Sebastia; where by reason of their not communicating with the rest of the people, and so consequently were not in a capacity to prejudice the Tartar; and whereby they might have promised themselves a privilege of security, yet he caused them to be inhumanely Maffacred, alledging, That they infected the Aire. But for all this I must not rob him of that honor which he acquired for his strict observance of Justice, even against his own souldiers, who as soon as they were taken in any offence, were most severally punished, which we may observe by the sentence which he caused to be inflicted upon one of his Captains, who walking on the Coast of the Caspian Sea, three leagues from Tamberlain's Camp, and espying a very fair maiden who went to draw water, he ravished her, whereupon the said maiden, together with her Father, complaining to Tamberlain that she had been violated as she was a going to fetch water by a disloyal and perfidious Tartar, and desiring him to do her justice; he returned her a most Kingly and gracious answer, that he would most severally punish him, and so he did, for as the Tartarian Histories relate; he caused him to be impaled or spitted on a stake alive. Finally least the Reader might be mistaken, and might conceive, that in my description of this Tartarian Emperors life, I was ignorant that he was called by another name besides Tamberlain. I would therefore desire him to take notice, that I have called him so; To follow the general denomination of him in this manner, that so all men might know, who it was of whom we do write these praises. For according to the Tartarian appellation he was called the great Tamirham, although others baptize him Timir Langue, and these latter as far as I can conjecture (by the several comparisons which I have observed) do come the nearest to the Truth; at least do approach very nigh to the definition of the condition and qualities of the said Tartar, whose true name was doubtless Tamir; and by reason he was lame, they added the quality of Langue thereunto, which in the Tartarian language signifies no other thing save a lameness; and so called him Tamir Langue. However though he were never so lame, yet he caused several men to go upright, who accounted themselves to be in a better plight, and abler men then himself was, &c.

The end of Tamberlain's Life.

The meaning of breaking Priscians head.

A fimilitude between falfe coiners and thofe who break Priscians
head.

Mongft all the Ancient and Modern Writers, both Grecians, Latins, French, and others, there is scarce any one who hath with fo much indutry facility, and certainty prefcribed the precepts of well and congruous speaking, as this Priscian, who hath gained fuch a Prerogative above all the reft of the Grammarians, that all the faults committed againft the conftitutions of the Syntax, or which do favour of a Barbarifme or blemifh in the Art of well-fpeaking and accurate writing, are imputed to fo many injuries done unto Priscian, as if the property of well fpeaking, and excellent writing, did of right belong folely unto him; and that he was guilty of high Treafon againft Priscian, who had failed in thofe prefcriptions which were by him dictated for the Grammatical conftitutions, and for which he was to make him an amends. Moreover to the end that all men may the better comprehend what a kinde of preheminance I intend to allow him above the reft of the Grammarians. I will make a comparifon (although I defire not that any confequences fhould be deducted thence) between fuch as break Priscians head, And thofe who counterfeit their Princes coine; for thefe by falfe coines (which are not warranted, and againft the Laws) do make fuch money as is neither allowable, nor valuable, and fo commit a double crime, as well by their attempting to ufurp the Royal priviledge of their Prince, as by the expofing to the publike fuch mony as will not pafs. And therefore fuch men may be faid to break their Princes head, that is, to ufurpe his authority; and (by a difdain and mifprifion of their Princes) to deceive and cheat their fubjects. In the like manner thofe do break Priscians head, who having not the capacity, and being not verft in the Art of well fpeaking, will however venture to rattle, and in ftead of uttering neat and quaint fpeeches, do produce nought but defpicable, ridiculous, and forged patcht up ftuffe, under a falfe coine; and being not fo well verft or ftored as to pick out the quainteft allay or expreffions, do publifh the moft impertinent, unpleafingft ill couched peeces, as ever came to light, having no regard at all unto Priscians authority. And truly he might very well have ftilenced fuch kind of pretenders to learning untill they had attained to a higher degree of perfection in the Art of well fpeaking and excellent penning. But they on the Contrary by their overmuch prefumption have even enforced their way, and emancipated themfelves fo far, as to obtrude moft abortive difcourfes, which are fo obvious to the fhalloweft brains, as that without the bringing of them to the touchftone of wit, It may be eafily difcovered that they were not forged in Priscians Study, but coined in fome fordid Kitchen-ftuffe-tubb. But I fhall quit this unfavoury difcourfe, relying upon the general confent of all Judicious and Learned per- fons;

fons; That this our Priscian is defervedly reputed to have been the Prime Chieftain of all the Grammarians; And therefore the King of Persia, did moft highly efteem him, by reafon of his fingular and furpaffing knowledge, which he fufficiently evidenced by feveral books which he compofed upon the Grammar, having not left the leaft parcel of it unrefined. Befides which, he was an excellent Philofopher, which we may difcern by his books of his Natural questions, and thofe he wrote on the Art of Cosmography. He flourifhed (as Trithemius faith) in the year of our Lord, fix hundred and twenty. And I do finde that there were two perfonages of this fame name; the one was Priscian the Heretick, who lived about the year, three hundred fourfcore and three; the other was this Lydian Philofopher, who wrote upon the books of Theophrastus, concerning the Sence, the Phancy, and the Intellect. As to the place of Priscians birth, divers have itrangely miftaken themfelves, in faying that he was born at Cæsarea, although feveral grave and credible Authors do teftifie that he was born at Rome; and amongst the reft, Babifpa Guarinus of Verona hath molt elegantly proved it. That which caufed the miftake was, becaufe Priscian intitles himfelf of Cæsarea, and whereby fome believed that Cæsarea was the place of his birth; but it was for another reafon he was called a Cæsarean, viz. becaufe he had perfected moft of his Studies at Cæsarea, and had gained a marvellous reputation in that place; infomuch that he rather chofe to be called by the name of the place where he had ftudied, then by the name of his Native Country. Whence fonte have inferred that he was tranfported with an unjust ambition, by reafon he difdained the place of his Nativity, to give himfelf to a ftrange place, that he might thereby only make the repute of his fame fpread the more abroad; nor do I doubt but that he was a little too much guilty of this crime, when he made that ambitious and lofty Etimology of his own name, for he fhould rather have derived it from Prifcus, then from the Verbe Præcio; but was willing by the faid Derivation the world fhould take notice that the faid name had been given him, becaufe of his profound knowledge in the feven liberal Arts and Sciences. But that we fhould thence infer that he was more covetous and ambitious of honor then he deferved, truly I cannot well aver; for that I am of a contrary opinion, and that he cannot be fufficiently praifed for his not having been ungrateful unto the City, which had given him a diftinction from the ignorant animals, although the faid City was far inferior indeed unto Rome (which at that time was the chief City of the whole world) and this Cæsarea was but a mean Town of Paleftin built by Herodes, whereof Eufebius was Bifhop. And at this day the faid Town is called Balbee and Belme, as I have declared in my Cosmography. Moreover the fuppuration of the time wherein this Priscian lived, is much different; for Trithemius the Abbot faith, that he did flourifh in the year of our Lord fix hundred and twenty; and by the denumerment of the Roman Confuls, we finde that he lived long before, becaufe that he dedicated his chief book to Julius the Conful and Roman Patrician (who afterwards is faid to have been Emperor) in the year of our Lord three hundred threefcore and fix. But Raphall Volateran, in his Anthropology, differs yet more, for he faith, that Priscian was in repute and did flourifh in the City of Athens in Greece during the Emperor Julianians reign, and that he there compofed feveral Books, and amongst the reft his Latin and Greek Grammar; which if it were true, Priscian muft have lived along after, feeing that Julianian the elder (who fucceeded Julian the firft his Uncle) reigned in the year, five hundred twenty and eight; and Julianian the fecond fon of Constantin, reigned in the year fix hundred fourfcore and feven. Mean while that which is moft certainly apparent, is, that Priscian lived much about Saint Jeroms time, who (as the Abbot Trithemius fays) deceased in the year of our Lord four hundred twenty and two, on the laft day of the month of September being of the Age of ninety and nine years old. So that we muft conclude Volaterans calculation to have been erroneous, as alfo Jagues Bergamos, who tranfports Saint Jeroms life, unto the year four hundred twenty and nine; in which time he will needs have him to have flourifhed, which according to the former calculation would have been feven years after his death. And that which troubles me moft of all, is, that Volateran doth confels that Priscian did very much affect Chriftianity, but afterwards he alfo faith, that he had gathered out of certain Authors, that afterwards he recanted. But by reafon it is not fpecified wherein he failed, & in which points of Doctrine he was not refolved; moreover unlefs there be more proofs then thofe which are extant in his writings, for my part I cannot thence infer any fufpicion of Herefies in him. Unto this our Priscian the Tranflating of Dionyfius Africanus his book (concerning the fituation of the world) is attributed, although the Grammarian Phemius Philamore did it, which faid work was after put into Latin Verfes by Simon Lemnius. This work is very much praifed by all good Authors, becaufe (as Pliny tell us) Dionyfius was ordered by the Emperor Auguftus, to make a difcovery of all the Dominions of the Levant, and to fet down his obfervations in writing concerning them, the better to inform his eldeft fon, who had undertaken the expedition of Turcomania againft the Parthians and Arabians; fo that it is no wonder Priscian was reputed to be the Tranflator of the faid work which is the more commendable and credible by reafon it was framed and compofed by a Geographer, who believed not the report of others, as our Modern ftripling Geographers do, who doubtlefs were hatcht in fome of your frozen mufky Scotch Ilands, &c.

However some may have despised the burying of the dead, yet it hath al-ways been had in an extraordinary recommendation amongst the ancients; which the Holy Writ it self doth manifest unto us, in the time of Joachim Son of Josias the King of Israel, whom God threatened by his Prophet Jeremy, Chap. 22. that he should be buried in the Sepulchre of an Ass. That is to say, that his body should be cast upon the earth without any Sepulchre at all. Cicero likewise in his Oration which he made for Midas doth very much blame Clodius, because he was not honoured with the Funeral rights which were in use at that time, viz. with the representation of Images, mournful ditties, publick shews, lamentations, hymns, verses and orations appropriated unto the praises of the deceased party. And truly the Romans so much honored Interments, as they accounted it a great infamy and disgrace to be deprived of it; and even appointed it as a punishment to some notorious criminals, as unto murderers; such as had deserted their parents in necessity; and other offenders, contained at large in their Funeral institutions. And because several Nations have used sundry sorts of ceremonies at the burying of their dead, we will briefly set down some of them. The Romans did sometimes use to bury their dead bodies and put them in the Graves before they burned them; only erecting earthen Sepulchers made of great clods over them, instead of Marble monuments, which custome lasted for a long while amongst them. But finding at length that they could not easily draw forth of the earth the bodies, or bones of such as had been long buried, they then began to burn the said bodies, and to reduce them to Ashes; which having assembled, they preserved them in certain vessels call Urnes which they caused sometimes to be made very richly and costly; like unto those wherein the Emperor Severus his Ashes were preserved, which were of Gold enchaufed with costly Pearles. I my self have seen such like vessels which were made of earth, and some of Glas, as in Greece, in Egypt, in Italy, and in France, about the Provinces of Bourdeaux; but especially in the Isle of Zant belonging to the Signiory of Venice (and not unto the Turks as Munster sayes) where the Ashes of the great Orator Cicero were preserved, as I have already described in my Cosmography and thus much may suffice concerning the Romans Funerals. Other Nations who were less civilized, had likewise their particular wayes and manner of burying their dead. The Lotbophagians did cast them into the Sea, in stead of burying them. The Hircanians exposed exposed them unto Dogs and Birds to be devoured, which creatures they purposely kept. The Tibrians hanged such upon Gibbets as became very old. The Messageres and Trogodites (a people of Ethiopia who have but one eye as Pliny writes, though I believe it not) did eat their dead themselves, giving this reason, That it was better they should eat them, then the Worms. The Scythians did interre those with their dead, who were best beloved of them in their life time. And the Egyptians and Syrians (observing a greater humanity to the dead) did as much as in them lay strive to hinder their dead bodies from rottenness and putrefaction, shutting them up in certain small Chests, after they had well Enbalm'd them with Myrrh and Aloes, the juice of Cedar, stroing Salt withing; and several other Aromaticall Drugs and Scents. But leaving this discourse, let us proceed to our intended purpose; and dilate on the particular of this most excellent Queen Artemisia, whose Portraiture I do here with, present you in the said manner as it is exprest in an Antick Meddal which I do keep in my Cabinet, not much differing from a Marble Statue which I did see in the City of Rhodes.

Artemisia therefore was the Wife of Mausolus King of Cacania called Caria, and of old Halicarnesses, a rude barbarous Country, of little or no esteem, before it was inhabited by the Grecians, and whence the Proverb sprang, In care periculum: There's danger in Caria: which said Artemisia, by reason of the extrem Love which she bore unto her husband; after his death caused his body to be burnt; and conceiving with her self, that she could not finde a more commodious place to bury him in, then her own body; she caused his Ashes to be preserved in a rich Urne of Gold, and daily amongst her Wine, drank a certain quantity of them; mourning all the rest of her life time for her deceased husband; and thus you see what an admirable Funeral obsequie she prepared for him. But not contenting her self therewith neither, she caused such a Tombe to be built for him, as never was heard of before, and the which she called by her Husbands name Mausoleum, which said Tombe was accounted one of the seven wonders of the world; being built in a square form, containing seventy foot in length, four hundred and eleven foot in circumference, and eight cubits in height. And to cause it to be the more exquisitely finished, she sent for the four rarest Architects of all Greece and Asia, viz. Saprus from the Isle of Mileta, who built the East side of it: Bryax the Silaeon Eunuch who built the Northside of it, Timotheus the Phrygian who built the Southside of it, and Leocares the Lavian who built the Westerside; and although Artemisia chanced to dye before it was quite finished, to the full perfection of it; yet however the said Artificers did not give over the work until they had quite finished it; and it is worthy to be observed, that four thousand men labored in it daily. Moreover the said Queen, to render her Husbands Funerals more famous, caused, & ordained a prize of Plate and of other precious Gemms to be given to him who should in a most elegant manner set forth her Husbands praises in a Funeral Oration; which is a rare demonstration of a Womans love and liberality towards her deceased Husband, manifesting that it ended not in her death, but that she desired to have it live to all posterities that should succeed her. And so it did, for this unparalleled structure of Queen Artemisias Funeral Monument, for her deceased Husband, gave a name to all the Tombes which were ever after erected for Emperors, Kings, Princes, and Potentates; and the which have ever since (as Presfortius writes) been called Mausolea: and moreover thus much we may read in Martial concerning Artemisias praise on that account, viz.

The Mausolean Tombe, which seems
To raise it self unto the Skie, Thy praises (Artemisia) deems,
To echo forth eternally.

Which serving as a president to Posterity, was imitated by some others, whose fame will never dye; and that we may not be taxed to have passed them under silence. Behold Porcia the daughter of Cato and the Wife of Brutus, who hearing of her husbands death, the sooner to end her dayes and follow him, swallowed down hot burning Coals. In like manner Agria the daughter of King Adriasus, and the wife of Polianthus, the son of Edipus King of Thebes, hearing that her Husband was slain in a Salley which he made against the enemies who besieged the City, got her self out of the place, and without the least apprehension of the adversaries cruelty, or the fierceness of savage beasts, she went unto the place where the battel was fought, and sought for her husbands body in the dark of the night, which having found amongst the dead, she brought it back with her into the City, and causing it to be burnt, after she had bedewed it with a torrent of tears, she put the Ashes into a Golden Vase, and at every new Moon drank a certain quantity of them; vowing at the same time a perpetual Chastity, which she observed all the dayes of her life, and thereby did imitate Artemisias glorious resolution. But if by these superstitious actions Artemisia rendered her self commendable: How much more ought we to admire her for her gallant conduct in the managing of a war? For having been constrained to desist a little from those moans which she daily poured forth (in imitation of the languishing Turtel Dove, after her mates death) and for a while to quit her dismal lamenting life, to resist an Army of the Rhodians which invaded her Territories, she therefore assembled her Forces, and marched towards them to prevent their further proceedings, defeated them two several times, and gained their Island. In testimony whereof a Statue was erected to her honor in the City of Rhodes, hard by the place where formerly the Colossus stood: And had she been the first of her Sex who had given this proof of her Prowesse, her Heroical magnanimity might have been doubted of. But since there have been several famous Ladies who have far exceeded the strength and valour of women, men, I may promise my self that a greater belief will be given to this foregoing recital which I have made. And for example sake, I shall only alledge one, viz. Semiramis the Queen of the Assyrians, who being entred upon the possession of so great a Monarchy as that which was afterwards held to be the first of the whole world under the Banner of a poor dismall and rejected Dove, did subdue all Ethiopia; withstood Staurobales King of the Indes, who (although its seldom known that the Dove dares contest with the Hawke) she overcame not only in words but in deeds, as Dion the Historian relates, who tell us, that the said Queen Semiramis (having understood that the Indian King slighting her Feminine frailty thought to have out-dared her with high language) not being able to brook his insolence, sent him this message, I be effects of a combat, are deeds, not words Staurobales; and in effect she fought and vanquished him. So likewise that which Iustin relates of her, is very considerable, and worthy to be had in remembrance, viz. That news being brought her that the inhabitants of Babylon (a City, by her self restored and built up again) were in a high Mutiny, and tending towards a sedition; although she was a dressing of her head when she received the news; yet however she got up and on horse back with her hair hanging about her ears, and being accompanied onely with those which were about her, she took the field and rushing into the midst of the mutinous rabble, she behaved her self so discreetly and prudently, as that she appeased the sedition, and settled the inhabitants of Babylon in their accustomed obedience and loyalty. For testimony of which noble and heroick attempt of hers, and high resolution (not to lose so much time as to stay and put up her hair) there was a Statue erected in Babylon representing her just in the same posture as she was when she accomplished so memorable an exploit. But to return again to our Artemisia the Dowager Queen, she having laid by her Widows habit upon force (the dayes of her mourning also being expired) was constrained for the good and future defence of her Country, to re-assume the Robes and Regal Ornaments belonging unto her; which she was perswaded to do, not without a great deal of reluctancy. But finding that States affairs were too burdensome for her dejected spirit, she disposed of the Government of her Kingdom, unto those of her Council, whom she best trusted; and because her very Palace grew distastful unto her, by reason of the non consociety of her dead Lord and King, she chose to abandon it and her very Country to boot. Wherefore having given sufficient orders for the compleating of her Husbands Monument, she resolved to engage in some Foreign adventures. And it so fell out, that at the same time Xerxes the great Persian Monarch (ambitiously aiming to reduce all Greece under his subjection) raised an innumerable Army by Land, and an invincible Navy by Sea, with whom Artemisia siding against the Grecians (her Husbands ancient Foes) rigged and manned out three Ships of her own, of which she was Archi-Talassa, or high Admiral; and so putting her self under the Persian Emperors protection, she joyned his Fleet, and behaved her self so valiantly in a bloody Sea-fight which happened between the Persians and Grecians, as that her Ships (particularly known by their Flags and Ensigns) were observed more to endamage the Grecians Fleet, both in an offensive and defensive way, then all the Persian Fleet besides; and although the Persians had the misfortune to be vanquished in that Sea expedition (though far excelling in number) yet Queen Artemisia, with hers, narrowly escaped and got in safely to Phalerum; although she was closely pursued by Aminim Palenau an Athenian Commander, who not being able to come up, or cope with her, relinquishd the pursuit of her, and only contented himself to send better failed vessels after her, and to set ten thousand Draghues upon her life, deeming it a high indignity, that a woman should affront the whole Athenian Navy, and afterwards make her way through them all. And Xerxes himself, as Hierodotus in his Urania reports, beholding how bravely above all his Fleet Artemisia and her Ships behaved themselves, and how courageously they forced their way when all his Navy was in a manner quite defeated, fetching a deep sigh, he said, Viri quidem exultant mihi femina, femina autem viri. My men this day have stood me in no better stead then Women, and the women only have behaved themselves like men. And thus much we thought good to note concerning this most eternally glorious and famous Queen Artemisia.

Mixt learning hath seemed so strange to some that they have dared to say it was not only mis-becoming a man to addict himself to several kinds of discipline, but that it was impossible any man should attain to a perfection in them, and do little regard the complaint of that no less grave Philosopher then excellent Physician, who complained of nature, That the life of man was so short, and yet one only Science was so long, as that a man (how able diligent or subtill soever) could hardly attain to the height of its perfection: For my part, I shall willingly set down my Judgement and freely confess that the weaknes of humane understanding is such indeed, as that to attain to the perfection of any one Science, the life of two or three men, (though four times prolonged) would scarce suffice. But to exclude some lively wits, and to conclude that an active spirit cannot perform that which many others could not do without a great difficulty, would be altogether void of reason, and would confine the capacity of all humane industry, within the levell of some few mens weakneses; And although this Axiom may be verified both by reason and arguments, yet because it would require a longer time, and be subject to uncertainties, I have rather chosen to propound one Person who will give us an assured proof of the Paradox which I maintain (that is to say) That a man may be very well versd in severall Sciences.

And this our Varro was born in the Province of Narbonois in France, a man so generally versd in the knowledge of most Sciences, as that it is a hard matter to beleieve what I propose, viz. That there are very few Arts upon which he hath not left some observations in Writing of his excellent Learning: Moreover the Catalogue of the Books he composd (which was learnedly collected by Gesnerus) will give a sufficient Testimony to what I say, and will clearly manifest, that there are few points, either in Divinity or the Liberal Sciences, which he hath not plainly illustrated, according to the time wherein he lived; And was for this reason much honoured by S. Augustin in his sixth Book of the City of God, where he thus saith concerning Varro, Varro praised Who is there that with more curiosity hath dived into those things which have been surmized concerning the Godhead? Who hath found them out more Learnedly? or who hath more seriously considered them? who hath distinguished them more subtilly? who hath written more diligently and largely thereon then he? Abounding in learned sentences, and though his language be not very pleasant, yet those who delight to learn according to the Rules of Discipline may the better profit

Divers changes in the Persian Monarchy.

F any Kingdom, State or Empire in the world hath been turned to and fro like a weather Cock, with divers changes of Governments, it is that of Persia, which was first of all usurped by Alexander the Great, who spoiled Darius of a Monarchy he had held by the space of six years, and turned topsie turvy the state thereof in the year of the world three thousand thirty five, in the hundred and twelfth Olympiade, and since Cyrus usurped it from the Medes, two hundred twenty and eight years: And after it had been under the slavery of the Macedonians, for the space of two hundred ninety three years, as well as of the Arsandes or cut-throats, and murderers, the space of five hundred and forty years, and under the Disciples of Mahomet and the Tartars a very long time: The Sophi seized this fair and spacious Kingdom in the year of our Lord one thousand four hundred seventy and eight, as Chronologers tell us, who have described to us the extraordinary Courage and Valour of Assamby, or Usuncassan Grandfather of Hismael, in memory of whom we write this present History. He had by Despinacaton Daughter of Carlo-jan Emperour of Trebizond, one Sonne and three Daughters: The eldest was married to Secaidar Father of this Sophy, who waged a grievous Warre against Rustan and Alumut his Sonne, but was forced to yield to his misfortune, and was slain in a totall Rout of his Army at Derbent, his head cut off and given to be devoured by Dogs; So great and implacable was the hatred of the Persians towards the Sophies, that where-ever any of them was found, it was impossible to save his life. The occasion of the hatred was this, Secaidar had deposed those from the Government, who seemed to have descended in a right line from Jacob; so that indeed there are some by whom this Sophy hath been evil spoken of, accounting him a Seducer, and to have got the Scepter by secret and undue practises: but they considered not that those who commanded in person after Zulaver, were illegitimate, and enjoyed the Kingdom without any just Title. And that it is so, Baytingir was the Adulteress that conspired with Patirsa the Wife of Jacob, Daughter of the Lord of Sammutra, to poyson her Husband and Sonne, with whom she died likewise. As for Rustan there was no right to prefer him to the Kingdom before Secaidar, but only in case the Race of the Usuncassans should fail: for he was not called to the Persian Crown, as Son in Law to that great Assamby or Usuncassan, who after the death of Tamberlain, (which happened in the year one thousand four hundred and three) delivered the Persians from the Tyranny of the Tartars. And if Secaidar were much opposed and entangled in his affairs, his Son Hismael had no better fortune, for as soon as the first news of his Fathers being murdered founded in his ears, he and his two Brothers, whose lives were envied and likewise sought, fled away hastily to save themselves, the one into Naxos, another to Aleppo, and the third, which was our Hismael to the Island of Arminig, situate in the lake of Vasthan, or Gelucalat; and having taken refuge there, he found an unexpected good reception, by the means of a certain Priest of Armenia, who pretended to Judicial Astrology, beholding earnestly his face and Physiognomy, found so great hopes of his excellent graces and perfections clearly appearing by the lineaments of his face and body, that he took all the pains and care he could to bring him up. And besides the Prefage of the Constellations, there was hopes that the Kingdom of Persia would descend to him, if he could be kept safe from the pursuits of Amclut; and that being advanced to the Crown, he hoped he would not be ungratefull, but would advance, cherish and honour him; and hereupon he kept him privately, for fear it should be discovered where he was, and endeavoured to instruct him in the Christian Religion; but this young Prince being puffed up with Ambition, little regarded any Religion at all, accounting no otherwise of it, than according to the advantage he received thereby, to compass his desired ends; which was the cause he could not long endure to live with his Master, although he gave him great respect, and for his sake shewed much favour, kindness, and friendship to the Christians, when he came to his Crown, which he obtained not without a great deal of difficulty. After he had taken his leave of this Priest, he retired to Chilan, and lives with a Goldsmith, much devoted to his fathers family, and by his dexterity, underhand made his friends understand secretly living at Ardovill, how earnest his desires were to recover his Liberty, whom he so well allured, that with a common consent they resolved to revenge the Defeat which they received at Derbent, and the Massacre likewise of Secaidar, unto whom they bore a great affection, because they held him to be their Prophet, having withdrawn himself in a manner from the Mahometanism; nor would he suffer the Alcoran otherwise to be allowed of, save according to the interpretation of Huly, sonne in law, and Cousin to Mahomet, who had set up a new faction among the Sectaries of that damnable Doctrine of Mahometanism. And for this reason Secaidar was by Belle Forest erroneously compared unto the chief of the Reformed Religion, because they receive not the Word of God, save according to their own interpretations, rejecting those of the Catholick Apostolick Roman Church, in like manner as the Sophies did concerning the Alcoran; which Conclusion, were it a proper one, we must either confess the Alcoran to be good, or believe that there is some correspondence or sympathy in it which may make it sympathize with the purity of the Gospel. But peradventure the good man did not pry so narrowly into the matter, as he ought to have done, but only as to the quality, and not regarding the consequence thereof, he would needs spend his verdict on these Reformations. But the truth is Secaidar, by his having changed some particular points in the Mahometan Religion, did thereby in such a manner gain the hearts and affections of the Sophies, that he became Lord and Master of the Kingdom of Persia; and his sonne Hismael remained King, notwithstanding Alumut used his utmost endeavours to keep the possession of the Kingdom, which he pretended descended to him by just right from his Father Rustan.

The first gallant Exploit which Ismael did, was upon the Castle of Maumutaga, which he possessed himself of, by surprisall. Now the place being impregnable, by reason of the situation of it, and the great Treasures found in the Village under the Castle, eclipsed greatly the designs of his Enemy, who durst not send an Army to besiege it, being sure to lose his labour, and therefore would have the world to believe it was a Policy in him, to have this bone fall on purpose into Hismael's hands, thinking that being a young man, he would continue gnawing upon that, and not have attempted any further upon his Estate: But reckoning without his Host, he found that he was mistaken, for Ismael, with the Treasure he found, drew unto him people from all parts, levied men, and made up an Army, and managed his affairs so well, that in a short space he was followed with five or six thousand Sophians; whereas at the taking of Maumutaga, he could hardly muster two hundred. With these Forces he advanced to Sumachia, a great and Capitall City of the Kingdom, and the siege having not lasted long, Sermangoli the King thereof, finding himself too weak to resist the Forces of the Sophians, resolved to retire to the Castle of Calistan, and abandon the City to the mercy of Hismael, who took it, and with the spoils thereof made large Presents to all those of his Army, whereby he did not only captivate and assure their hearts to him, but the same thereof spreading abroad, caused new and fresh Troops to resort to him daily, which highly displeased Alumut, who was well assured, that so soon as the Sophy should gather strength enough, he would fall upon him; And therefore he assembled his Forces together, and Hismael did the like, sending to Alexanderbey, Gurguramby, and Mirzamby, Kings of Iberia, to desire aid from them, who upon his promises sent each of them three thousand Horse, and about six thousand Iberian Foot; all Valiant and stout Souldiers, with the which, and those Forces he had with him, he marched and became Master of the Field; whereat Alumut who was but a young man, (not above sixteen years old,) was much perplexed, hearing of the great preparation which his enemy made. Whereupon he came to Tauris, and from thence marched towards Sumachia, between which two Towns the two Armies met in a posture to engage in battell, but the great River standing as a Barricado between them, hindered their design for some daies; till at last the Sophy had found out a Foord, and by night, whilst the enemy lay secure, charged Alumut so furiously, that the Sophy had cut off the most part of his men before they were well rouzed out of their sleep, and Alumut himself had likewise fallen by the Sword, had he not in all haste saved himself in Tauris, which was also taken by the Sophy about four daies after: who knew not, as he ought, how to gather the fruits of his Victory.

story, but abandoned himself to all kinds of cruelties, manifesting his nature was bent to all kind of inhumanities, not at all favouring of the milde and sweet disposition of a Persian. I will not mention the search he made for the bodies of Jacob and other Nobles who fell in that memorable Battel of Derbent, in regard (that I may speak like a Courtier) a naturall instinct drove him on to revenge the injuries done to his Father, which may in some measure excuse the errors which he committed by surpassing the bounds of discretion. But his causing of women great with child to be ripped up and opened, and the fruit of their wombs to be plucked out, was not only an inhumane, but a most unnatural action. So likewise after the taking of Tauris, he caused three hundred common Strumpets to be beheaded, a good sport indeed for Nobles, though it's only pleasing to those who use it. Nor know I how to alleadge as a proof of his inhumanity, his causing four hundred of King Alumut's followers to be kil'd, because it may be objected, That the evil affection he bore to the Master, might justly provoke revenge upon the servants: neither ought I to place in the first rank the cruelty he shewed in commanding all the Dogs in Tauris to be killed, though it were a manifest token of his brutish severity, some in Egypt having drawn the hatred of the people upon them, for exercising such like cruelties upon brut beasts. But this man spared not his own Mother, commanding her to be beheaded in the City of Tauris, because he had a suspicion that Sacaidar was treacherously sold; and more miserably murdered by her procurement, at that fatal and unhappy encounter at Derbent, in regard he had married a great Noble man who was present at the overthrow: Whence this wretched unnatural Sonne took an impression against a good Mother, that because she had married a man who assisted at the assassination of his Father, she must needs have had a design to defraud her own children of the succession in the Persian Monarchy, which descended to her, as being the daughter of Ussumcassan (as you have already heard) and settle the Kingdom on her Husband. This kind of excessive cruelty which he used, seemed to have lifted him up to the highest degree of his glory, and caused those to pluck in their horns, that had lifted up their Heads against him, of whom the most part were constrained to come and do him homage, to stoop (though with great regret) to his commands, and to receive the Capebas or red Turbant the Ensign of the Sophies. But there was one that declared himself an open Enemy to him, which was Muradcan the Sultan of Begadeth, who contended with him for the Kingdom, pretending to be right heir to Ussumcassan, and capable of succession.

When it came to a fight, there was a great Defeat, and the Victory fell to Hismael, who being not yet twenty years old, gave so great and solemn an overthrow near Tauris (about fourscore and four years since) that of thirty thousand fighting men which were in the Sultan of Babilons Army, there hardly escaped one.

And yet he was not so fast seated in his Dominions but that some nails were always wrong driven, which I do not alleadge in regard of the Province of Durbeib, having always been under the Kings of Persia, was now disjoyned from it, for the Sultan Calib, Lord of Afanchif came to present his humble service to the Sophy received the Turbant, and offered to be his loyal and faithfull subject and servant, which pleased Hismael so well, that he confirmed him in his Government, and gave him his sister to wife; But that familiarity and friendship was of no long durance, the said Sultan shewing himself disobedient in some things to the Sophy, he took an occasion thereupon to displace him (though he were his Brother in Law) and advanced Ustagiulu Mammutbey to the superintendency of the Cities of Afanchif and Amida, who was lately come from Natolia to present his service to the Sophy, and receive the Turbant, and became so acceptable to Hismael, that he married his other sister, whereby he was no great gainer; Such marriages serving only to divide great persons, which was his design, Sophy knowing very well that those that were newly raised to honours, and were strangers, could not suddenly so strengthen their wings as to be in a condition to fly above his reach. After he had thus dispersed the strength of those which were in a capacity to oppose him, he raised a powerfull Army against the Alidulians, whom Ustagiulu could not overcome; desiring the Turk and the Egyptians, not to intermeddle in this business, in regard his design was no other than to recover his own Countries, which had been usurped, with promises to both not to encroach upon their Dominions any where. As soon as he had an assurance from these two Princes (in the year one thousand five hundred and ten) he fell so furiously upon the Alidulians, that had not the excessive cold countermined his Forces, without all doubt he had gained all their Country, however he won many Towns and fortified places, in which, with his own hands, being much enclined to cruelty, he committed incredible inhumanities. He beheaded with his own hands Becabey the Sonne of Aliduli and Alimulur his Predecessour, who was treacherously delivered up unto him by the Traitor Amirbey. He could not in honour abstain from renewing his quarrell with Muratcan Sultan of Babilon, who had seized upon the great City of Sirau, being the Metropolis of Persia, but this pursuit was without effect, for the Babilonian retreated with three thousand chosen men unto Alex, and coming to the River Euphrates, caused all the Bridges to be broken down, which was happy for him, for that the Sophy had sent six thousand resolute fighting men to cut him off in his retreat. Nor did it trouble Hismael much that Sermandoli King of Servan had broken the peace to which he had sworn, such a petty Rebellion, giving him opportunity to over-run all his Countreys, and to take all the Government from him: And he tamed him so well, that all the rest of the Lords and petty Kings of that Country, strove which should come first to offer his service, and receive the Turbant. There remained none but the Tartars who pretended to give a stand to Hismael's growing state. And hereupon Jafelbas Cham of Tartaria, and Usbec began to invade the Territories of Corasan,

rasan, where they got nothing, save being taken in a Battell which they lost (in the year one thousand five hundred and twenty) were both by his command beheaded, yet would he not defraud their Children of their Dominions; But they not at all acknowledging the great favour and humanity shewed to them, when they were a little settled in their great Estates, fomented a Rebellion against Hismael; and moreover killed as many Sophies as came under their clutches, which gave him occasion to arm himself a new against the Jefelbas (so called, by reason of the green Turbants they wear on their heads, but the Persians wear them red, and the Turks white,) and charged them so furiously, that there remained not one man alive.

While he was busied in curbing these cowardly Tartarians, the Curdes who inhabit mount Bichib, persuaded Sultan Selim to invade his Country, flattering themselves that it was impossible for the Sophy to escape out of the Tartars claws: But it so fell out that the Turk got nothing but shame in that expedition; and had it not been for the valour of Sinambey Basha the Turks had undoubtedly lost all their Baggage and Artillery.

I may here also make a recitall of the Victory this Sophy obtained against Soliman, who came with force enough to swallow up the Country, (in the year one thousand five hundred thirty and four) which he might easily have done, had he not met with one, who being not able to put on the Lions skin, covered himself as well as he could with that of the Fox: To speak the truth, finding himself too weak, he retreated in such a manner, as he seemed always to provoke the Enemy to fight; but he would not engage in earnest, till he saw his opportunity to fight them, and rout him with small force: Finally he so amused the Turk, that at last he drew him into a very narrow passage, then divided his Army, and sent away three score thousand men, who about the middle of the night regained by assault the City of Tauris, (taken a little before by the Turk) who had left great Treasures and provisions in it. The other party charged the Turkish Army in the Rear with such resolution and success, as that they were forced to fly hastily away out of the Sophies Territories, in the year one thousand five hundred thirty four, with the loss of half the Army. And in the year one thousand five hundred forty and nine, he assisted the eldest sonne of Solyman, who perceiving his Father did shew more favour and affection to his younger sonne, fled into Persia, and fell upon his Fathers Territories upon the confines thereof: And although the Turk came with an Army of five hundred thousand men, yet could he gain nothing at all upon the Sophy, a great part of the Turks Army perishing by the Famine and the Sword, so that the Turk was at last forced to a retreat. The year before he subdued the Country of Corassan, which had withdrawn its obedience from him, and made a cruell slaughter of those that occasioned the revolt, enforcing those that survived to wear the Turbant, and exercise the Religion of the Sophies. But why should I dwell upon the particulars of the Conquests and Victories of this great Sophy, since there is hardly a Prince that hath been so successful and happy in so many Victories as he was, and for that reason his subjects accounted him among the gods, going to the Warre voluntarily, meerly out of pure affection to him, fighting with their breasts and stomacks quite naked, crying in these words Schiach, Schiach, which signifies in the Persian tongue, a God, a God. Whence some have attributed this name peculiarly to the Sophy, and in his Titles he is called Scheech Ismael: But others to qualifie the presumption which might be attributed to the Sophy, say that the word Scheech is never taken but for a Prophet, and that the name of Sophy was indeed principally, but not exclusively derived to him, Sophy in the Arabian tongue signifying Well: But let the excuse be as it will, there was an excess of arrogance however, for he was no Prophet neither, unless a Title appropriated to the Father can be derived to the Sonne by reason of the first rise he gave to the sect of the Sophians.

Some Authors have attributed his death to I know not what destiny, which they appropriate to a certain wood called Servan, for my part I think his excessive eagerness and passion in the prosecution of his enterprises brought that disease upon him, which cast him into his grave; to the great regret both of his friends and enemies.

The great Turk himself having notice of his death, expressed much sorrow for it.

THE

THE LIFE OF GEORGE CASTRIOT, called Scanderbeg Prince of Epire.

Ann. Mund.
5433.

Castriot greatly esteemed by the Turks.

Paulus Jovius
reprehended.

LI those, that have written of this Captain, seem to me to have chosen this subject to lay open the treasure of their eloquence; so many praises do they publish of this Epirote, among which Marin Barlet, a Native of Scutary in Epire is one. And this hath not been done after the manner of some idle fantastical writer or pratter, who stuffs a History or Discourse with eloquent and high expressions of desert and merit, whereas the object it self most commonly deserves not a single commendation. But Barlet and other historians knew not sufficiently to celebrate the renown of George Castriot, in regard his Heroick and generous Actions had gained him such reputation, that he was not only revered by his friends, but his very enemies had sufficient cause to admire his valour and noble acts. The Turks themselves, whom he had often conquered and vanquish't, notwithstanding the great evils and extraordinary losses, they sustained by him, could not forbear to extoll his ever undaunted valour and courage, wherewith they were so much taken, that after his death (if we may believe Paulus Jovius) having made themselves masters of almost all Epire, at last seized upon his Sepulchre, at Aleissio, which having found, they worshipped, and adored it very devoutely; at length these superstitious people pulling out his dead Bones, pillaged his Sepulchre with a shew of Religion, thinking themselves to be invincible, and safe in Battel, if at their going to fight they had but the least piece of a Relique of this invincible Captain, hung at their neck in Gold or Silver. But I suppose Paulus Jovius the Author of this story hath failed in this particular; because it was contrary to the Law, usage, and custome of the Alcoran, to suppose the Turks did worship the body of Scanderbeg, who no more then the Jews, Moslems, Tartars, Arabians, and other Mahumetans, will not receive their dead bodies into their Temples, and much less into their Cities: far greater reason should they therefore have to refuse to worship and reverence the Bones of Scanderbeg, (how great, valiant, and renowned a Captain soever) in such a sort, as Paulus Jovius supposeth. Moreover they use no such Ceremonies to their Prophets Mahomet, Haly, Oclan and others, whom it is most likely they would rather invoke to their aide in opposition to the Force of their enemies then the Reliques of Scanderbegs body. But as Paulus Jovius (finding that our Castriot deserved to be magnified and praised,) hath exceeded the bounds of reason and credit, and to extoll him, hath found out things too ridiculous to be believed, and too light for the gravity required in in a History of so high a nature. Besides it is directly contrary to the rule of the Alcoran: however I will proceed to set forth the Noble Acts and high deserts of this great Epirot according to the truth I finde of them. He was son to the Lord John Castriot, Lord of Epire, formerly called Emathia: his mothers name was Voisava, daughter of the Lord of the Pribullians or (as others will have it) of George Scanderbegs parents and sisters. Poland, which is part of Macedonia and Bulgaria; he had three brothers, Repasius, Stanisius, and Constantinus, five sisters, Mary, Jella, Angelina, Valica, and Mamsia; This said John Castriot was valiant, courageous, and of an illustrious family, who possessed a great estate in the Country of Epire. His habitation was in a City called Croy, being the chief of his territories, allied to the ancient Kings of Macedonia and Grecian Emperors of Constantinople. And as he far exceeded all his Predecessours in prudence, gravity, magnanimity and an invincible courage; so his youngest son followed his steps, and soared somewhat higher in reputation: whose lively Pourtraicture I here represent, the same, as it was procured by me at Bouthe a City of Epire, and had since lent it to Montieur James de la Bardin, to enrich his History withall, which was printed at Paris in the year 1576. who confessed that he had it copied from my original; whose example I could have wished, they had followed, who disfigured, and counterfeited the Picture of Plutarch, which I lent them to be put into the Lives of that Author which they Printed in the City of Paris, this present year 1583. they might have confessed to have had that Plutarch from me, which they could not so much disguise, but that it plainly appears, they drew the design from that Effigies which they importuned me to lend them. This George Castriot therefore did not at all degenerate from the excellent and rare virtues of so noble a father, but rather, from his valiant and heroick exploits, he seems to have elevated the race of the Castriots to its highest degree of honour and renown. And though I do not much value the Prodigies and observations, which many men as it were adore at some Nativities; yet will I not conceal, what was prognosticated of the glory, that should accompany this famous person; his mother dreaming, as soon as he was conceived, that she had brought forth a Serpent of that bigness, that it covered almost all Epire, and stretching out its head upon the Dominions of the Turks, it swallowed them up with its bloody throat, dipping his Taile in the Sea, that looks towards the Christians, and especially towards the confines of Venice. I know many will be apt, to be encouraged upon this relation to flatter themselves with hopes upon the like predictions; and others too superstitious will endeavor to unfold the secrets, that lye hidden under the shadow of such a Dream: for my part I shall acknowledge, that by the effects, the advertisement which nature here gave, was not altogether frivolous, whereby every one might know that this George Castriot should be eminent in Armes and warlike exploits; a scourge to the Turkes, a successful Captain, and a true Defender of the Christian Faith; ever retaining an honorable esteem of the Venetian State. In a word, the experience and progress of his whole life do manifestly verifie this supernatural Prophecie. From his youth he applied himself so much to the Bow, with other military exercises, and acts of valour, that no Historian makes mention of his equal; neither could any famous Captain ever compare with him in warlike exploits. It is supposed that upon this occasion the Turks gave him the name of Scanderbeg, which signifies in the Turkish language, Great Alexander; and to speak the truth, he was a true Alexander indeed, having conquered many Provinces, for the Turke, among others Misia, forcing George Uncherich the Despote into his City called New Mount, Metropolitane of that Country, where it is reported there are Mines of Gold and Silver. But the name of Scanderbeg doth more justly belong to him from another title more eminent and honorable, which is, that being converted to Christianity, he behaved himself so resolutely in all his undertakings, that he became very formidable and a terror to the Turks, remaining victorious in two and twenty Battels, which he fought against Amurath King of the Turkes, and Mahomet the second his son. In revenge whereof, their malice could reach no further, then to reproach him with ingratitude for his good usage they gave him whilst he was of their party, and called him an ingrateful son, for not acknowledging the great benefits, and honour, whereunto he was advanced by them, yet were they nevertheless much engaged to Scanderbeg, as well for the great defeat which he gave the enemies of the Turkes in a pitched Battel, as for particular Duels, which he had fought in Andrinoplis against the Scythians, who had defied all the Court of Amurath also in the City of Burse (which is now the principal of all Asia) against two Persians called Juia and Zampza. These tokens and tryals of his courage so captivated the hearts of the Turks, that to oblige him the more, and allure him to their party, there was no honor, which in reason could be bestowed upon a subject, but was liberally cast upon him. However after the death of that brave personage, John Castriot, it was necessary for Ottoman to be more prodigal in his bounty and munificence towards George Castriot, the more deeply to engage him to himself, and either to keep him from aspiring to the Kingdom of Epire, whereof he had made himself Master, and Possessor, by sending thither a great Garrison under the conduct of Sebalic, suddenly after the death of John his Father; or at least to keep him from seeking revenge for the death of his Brothers, who were treacherously and secretly made away by poison soon after the death of their Father. But as this kind entertainment of the Turks, served only to cloak and cover the double heart of those Infidels towards Scanderbeg, from whom they could not detain that Kingdom without incensing him too highly. In like manner Scanderbeg was no less wary, and subtle to dissemble the desire he had to repossess that Kingdom, which this Tyrant had usurped, and to shake off the yoke of Alcoranisme, wherewith he was more entangled, then he desired, he made shew to be so well satisfied with the Turke, that above all others, he confided in the wisdom and loyalty of this Epirot, who knew so well to temporise on this Account, as that being invited secretly by his subjects to recover his liberty, he sent them away without any certain hope, or appearance of any magnanimous or generous thoughts.

thoughts which might encourage them to recover that, which being justly detained by Amurath, might be restored to him again by the assistance of his said subjects. But having been too long under the terrible yoke of Turcisme, waiting daily for a fit opportunity, he did march off much about the time of the battle which was fought between Hunniades General for the Hungarians, and the Turks (in the year 1440.) whereby so great an advantage was given to the Christians, as that the Turkish Army was for the most part defeated. I shall omit to discourse here with how much care (by the Turks order) this Castriot was instructed in the most impious Religion of the Alcoran by one Hogia (to wit) an old Philosopher, which the Arabians call a Siaic; but I will rather observe what a loss it was to the Turks to be forsaken by one on whom he had conferred, the greatest honors and fairest estate, that any favorite of that Grand Seigneur ever attained to; and had likewise been employed as his Lieutenant as well against the Christians, as Pagan Kings and Princes, so that indeed besides the disfigurement of the Turks by Hunniades by the retreat of Scanderbeg (which gave him the said opportunity) the Turk found himself bereft of Epire, and had acquired an enemy, who being a man of great undertakings, and a high spirit, would not suffer him to be idle or without employment: and as Amurath understood it very well, so was he not deceived in his opinion, for Scanderbeg having taken the City of Croje by means of his Nephew Amefius and some other friends, and having made a Law that all the Turks who still persisted in their savage and obdurate opinions of the Alcoran should be put to the sword: Being three and thirty years old he went to the City of Alessia, where he made a League and Alliance with the Albanian Princes; which City was then under the Dominion of the Venetians, & in it was held a Diet of all the principal persons of the Country being assembled there at his request, and among others there was Paul, and Nicholas Ducaginnus, Peter Spainus, Lech Dufmanius, Lech Zacharius, Aranish Conyno, afterwards father in law to Scanderbeg, Andrew Thopia, and the magnificent Rectors of the Venetian State. At which assembly, Scanderbeg made an eloquent speech above an hour in length which was very pleasing to all those which were present, who having highly praised the wise advice of this Prince, every one put himself in a posture to reach out a helping hand to restore him to the possession and enjoyments of those Countries, Territories and Dominions which were unjustly detained from him by the Turks. And he on his part ceased not to be active every where, to besiege, force, and constrain those, which endeavored to continue their obedience to the Turk. One thing very observable, is, confidently related of him, that from the very day he entered into Epire, until the perfect recovery of his Estate, he scarce ever took two hours sleep together at any time, so earnest was he to re-establish himself in that right which belonged to him: besides he was so well hardened to heat and cold, and all other inconveniences, that he regarded not the constant travail, and continual watchings which of necessity he must daily endure. It is reported by some Authors, that he was a great eater and a lusty drinker; and that he fought alwayes with his Arms stripped, not fearing either cold or heat: But as he with all eagerness pursued his design of making himself Lord and Master of all Albania. Intelligence was sent him by a spie, he left at Andrinopolis with the Turks that Alibeg Basba (accompanied with 60000. Janifaries, Archers, & Musquetiers, and 40000. horse advanced towards him) whereat he was not at all discouraged, although at that time he was but newly declared King of Albania and his forces far inferior in number. But with great cheerfulness of heart, as if he already held the victory assured, being followed only by fifteen thousand Albanians, and twelve thousand other foot, he bent his march towards that place, where he presumed he might encounter the Turks, and made all possible diligence to advance his Army so neer to that of Alibeg the Turkish General that as they might be necessitated to fight, and charged them with so great fury and violence, as he soon put them to a miserable route; every one wondered how in so short a time so great an execution could be made, in regard the battle lasted but from Sun-rising until the third hour. In this battle were taken four and twenty colours, two thousand Turks were made prisoners, and two and twenty thousand slain upon the place: of the Christians side a great number were wounded, and about a hundred found dead Alibeg General of the Turkish forces saved himself, and returned into the City of Andrinopolis, called by these barbarous people Hedrea Valdom, where Amurath was, who had well nigh caused him to be put to death, reproaching him that this Army was betrayed, as well as that wherein Castriot dealt fairly with him. To whom this poor old man with cries and sighs replied in these words, Vallab et bishab benea, Verraim hernigustice: which signifies, O Sir! by the Grace of Almighty God, I confess all that thou sayest for the present. As if he meant I have nourished and brought up a man, who now takes up Arms against me, and torments my soul. But that which troubled this poor Turk most of all, was, that a peace being concluded between him and the King of Hungary for ten years (by the mediation and practise of George Despote of Servia and Rascia which is the upper Asia, by the Turks called Segoria) and though respectively sworn to by them, upon the holy Evangelist, and the Alcoran, yet he much doubted it would not be of any long continuance, as in effect it was soon broken. And moreover he having newly received this rude overthrow; there came sudden news that the King of Caramania or Cilicia, was preparing a strong and powerful Army, therewith intending to invade the Turks of Natolia, called Great Turkey; which perplexed him very much being thereby necessitated to go into Asia with the Reliques of his routed forces to secure that Country. And on the other side the Hungarian threatening the same danger with the Caromanian and Albanian, it behoved him to look about him. And hereupon he thinks fit to send an Ambassador to Scanderbeg presenting him rich gifts, endeavouring thereby to hinder the Albanians, who were, as yet, but newly fresh as it were (with the Turkish blood) from advancing further, and from irritating the Ottoman fury, desiring his friendship, and that he would abstain from all enterprises that tended tended to his prejudice. Amurath's letter being read, dated from Andrinople the fifteenth of June, in the year of our Lord 1444. five dayes after Airadin the Turks Ambassador was returned with an answer bearing date the twelfth of July of the same year, wherein Scanderbeg utterly refused the truce; which letter Airadin brought to the Turk as he was a hunting, and by word of mouth delivered to him all the rest of Castriot's deliberations; wherewith this poor Infidel was so ill satisfied, that he could not contain himself from crying out before his Basba's, in this sort, Senica gunu seyiban binnur, as if he would say, I think Scanderbeg is possessed by the devil, that he so little regards my power and greatness. But Amurath being a man experienced in affairs, knew well enough in case he should seem to be discouraged, there needed nothing else to make all the rest Cowards, and therefore to express his cheerfulness, he smiled playing with his Beard, and spake againe these words, Thou covetest, O unhappy, man! thou covetest some memorable death, believe me thou shalt have it! we will assist, and without thy command will be present at the obsequies of him who was nourished by us, but now become our utter enemy and will accompany thy funeral pompe to the grave for fear thou shouldst complaine in hell, that thou camest not thither honourably enough.

And however his countenance was compos'd, he had sad apprehensions to himself aside, and thought on other matters, which occasioned him a long time to remain in a musing doubtful posture, and at last understanding that Scanderbeg had disbanded many of his forces, keeping the field only with some few light horse, without any body of an Army, he sends for his Basba Ferife, appointing nine thousand chosen horse encouraging them with large promises, in case they could conquer the Albanians; Ferife discharged his duty with all diligence, approaching secretly to the Frontiers of Macedonia. And though he marched towards the Albanians, more like a thief than a warrior; yet he came not before the news of his approach; Castriot being advertised thereof by a spie who came to him from the Sultans Court, and so possessing himself of a Straight and narrow Vally called Mocrea, the only passage for the Turks; It served for a burying place for the most part of Ferife's Army, who were so furiously charged by the Albanians, that the Basba himself was forced to flye, leaving the best part of his forces either dead in the field, or Prisoners, Ottoman finding himself so rudely dealt withall by the Albanians, sends Mustapha his Basba with five and twenty thousand men into Epire expressly charging him to be wary and not entangle himself in the Ambushes of the Albanians, but only pillage and lay waste the Countrey, Scanderbeg advertised (by some horse he had sent forth to that purpose) of the spoile Mustapha made throughout all Epire takes horse immediately, and being followed with three thousand horse onely, and four thousand other good souldiers, led them as privately as he could between two vallies where the enemy was to pass, who as soon as they came neer the place separated and dispersed themselves into several companies, the Christians falling upon them in their disorder, soon made their way to the Turks Trenches, instantly gained them, and made so great a slaughter that none escaped save only a few that followed the flying Mustapha, preserving their lives by the sharpness of their Spurs. So Scanderbeg recovered not onely the Pillage they had taken from him in Epire, but also all the spoiles of the Turks, who had no leisure to save their baggage, being so closely pursued by Scanderbeg. But this overthrow did not discourage Amurath who commanded Mustapha, to raise new forces, forbidding him to spoile the enemies Country or engage in a Battle with Castriot, but only to hinder his advancing towards them, which fell out happily for this Christian Prince; for soon after he had a war with the State of Venice, by reason of the succession of Lech Zachary which shall be declared hereafter, because I intend not here to make a diversion and to omit the happy success which Scanderbeg had against Mustapha the Basba, who seeing the Christians warring among themselves, very furiously; thought during their disorders, to fish in their troubled waters, and obtain the fruit of a victory, which he earnestly desired, and was very much hoped for by him, whereupon he so much importunes Amurath, that he obtains order to begin a new war with the Christians, in which he was no great gainer, for Scanderbeg quitting Dadine charged that Pagan Army so furiously, as that ten thousand of them fell upon the place, fourscore and two were made prisoners, and fifteen Standards taken; on the Albanian side scarce three hundred men were lost. If this signal victory much puff up the hearts of the Albanians; Amurath's (that plodding blade) was the more dejected, who could not so well disguise his intended enterprise of setting on foot a mighty and powerful Army against Castriot, but that it took vent, and was discovered (by his neerest and greatest favorites) to Scanderbeg, who hereupon slept not in security; but gave a general order to raise instantly the forces of his whole Country, and to fortifie and strengthen the Fortresses, Cities and Garrisons throughout all Epire.

In the mean time the Great Turke transports all his Army into Europe by long marches, computed by some to be an hundred and fifty thousand fighting men (to wit) fourscore and ten thousand horse, and threecore thousand foot, others reckoning them but an hundred and twenty thousand in all, deducting twenty thousand horse, and ten thousand foot.

In this Equipage he comes to besiege Alba and other Cities, upon which he gained nothing but the diminishing of his forces, which though daily recruited by the new supplies which came to them, yet so mouldred away, that the poor old Ottoman affamed of the loss of so many of his men, was constrained to retreat, quit Epire, and in all hast march away: whilst Scanderbeg with all might and main pursued them, and gleaned up and destroyed such a multitude, as the shame thereof made the Great Turk at last so impatient, that he commanded the Basba of Romania to stay behinde with thirty thousand horse to secure the safe retreat of the residue of the Ar- my. But Amurath had scarce taken up his Quarters in his own Country, when news was brought him that Scanderbeg had laid siege to Sferigrade, whereupon he determines to return by the same way he came, and sends Sebalim to besiege Croje, and he and his son Mahomet invaded Epirus, about the end of April, and came himself in person before Croje, and held it besieged above four months; in which time a very great number of his Forces were lost. He endeavoured to batter it with thirty peeces of Cannon, and other warlike instruments, and Engines, but could do little execution, the place being very strong on all parts, and replenished with a lively fountain of water within, and another in the side of the hill behinde a Rock. Nor must I forget to tell you that at the end of four months, a general assault was given by the enemies, and maintained so furiously on each part, that lasting but five hours, four thousand men remained dead upon the place, although the Turks power, strength, and cunning, could gain the place (as I have said) but after all this, the said City rather lifted up her head against the Ottoman fury as Vilfrice.

Amurath's second voyage unto Epirus, and siege of Croje in vain.

Nor will I not derogate from Urancontes, but allow him all the honour due to his great desert: and as this Governor appointed by Scanderbeg to command Croje, was vigilant and dexterous to oppose Amurath; so his Prince was not asleep in creating other employment for his Forces elsewhere; for as Ottoman had given a very hot alarm, Scanderbeg with a party of his choice horse falls so desperately upon the Enemies Tents, at the said siege, as that Amurath could not at that time compass his designs, nor take the place, although he dispatched away Seremet with four thousand horse to repulse Scanderbeg, and Mahomet likewise though in vain pursued him with all possible speed, conceiving so great a hatred against him, as that after the death of his father, he abated nothing of his pernicious and evil affection towards him.

And though death prevented the malicious designs of Amurath, yet it could not make any alteration in the heart of his Son Mahomet the second (and not the first, as by a mistake it slipped in this work) who took Constantinople, and was thereby the more enraged against the Christians, then he was before. However the state of affairs at this time so distracted him, that he was constrained to send Ambassadors to desire a Truce, which was refused him, and an answer was returned to Sangeas the Deputy, who was sent to conclude the peace, that he should be gone presently; as for Castriot he would not make any peace or agreement with the Infidel, unless he restored him those Cities which Amurath had unjustly usurped. In the mean time Mahomet retires, and was a long while before he could settle himself in his Fathers Dominion, and therefore could not for that time do Castriot any great harm. And Scanderbeg being willing to have an heir to succeed him (and being thereunto requested by his subjects) took to his lawful wife the most virtuous and fair daughter of Prince Aranish Conyno, called Donca; with whom he could not live long in quiet. For so soon as this new Turke was settled in his Fathers Throne, he began to threaten Castriot our Christian Prince, being not able to endure he should have such Dominion over Croje and the rest of Epirus. Nor did I here intend to have set down the undertaking of Scanderbeg to assist Ferdinand the Son of Alphonso King of Naples, had not the several Historians who have written thereon; omitted how he did redeem this poor King, who was reduced to that misery and non-plus, as that he was imprisoned in the Town of Bary, by the siege which the Count Picevin had laid to it, who made as sure of him, as if he had been already intangled in his net. But as soon as the arrival of Scanderbeg was known, Duke John of Sore, and the Count Picevin packed up their baggage, raised their siege, and in great haste, marched thirty miles from thence, to avoid the fury of that Fleet, and those which accompanied Scanderbeg, who had so good success in repulsing Ferdinand's enemies, that to him alone doth belong, the honor of recovering of that Kings Crown. But the affairs of his own Kingdom wanting his direction, he was constrained to quit all, and to return to Croje, near unto which place the Christians had erected an inexpugnable Fortrefs (sufficient to hinder the passages of the Infidels) upon an exceeding high Mountain called Modrica, and having furnished it with Victuals, Artillery, and Munition, made such opposition against the attempts of the enemy, that it secured the pass; wherefore Mahomet fainting under so many attempts made upon him, dispatches away a famous Captain called Sinam, with five and twenty thousand Turkish horse against Scanderbeg, to surprise him on a sudden, thinking the war of Naples from whence he was but lately returned, had made him secure and careless. But Scanderbeg who always slept with his eyes open, had opportunely, since his arrival, sent his Spies abroad, and renewed his intelligence with those near the Sultan, whereby he had timely notice to prepare and to get the first into the field. But kept himself private and close, expecting the advance of the San-jac Sinam, and then marched the whole night towards him, during the obscurity whereof, and contrary to the knowledge of his adversary, with eight thousand fighting men horse and foot, he possessed himself of the Mountain Mocrea, and there resolutely expected Sinam, that being the Avenue through which he was of necessity to pass, and falling upon him unawares, defeated him with all his Army, where the slaughter was so great that two parts of three fell upon the place, and all the Ensignes and Baggage became a Prey to the Christians; and all the General could do was to save himself in this desperate fight, by avoiding it with extraordinary speed. And already Assambeg or according to others, Amesabeg was advanced already on this side of Ocride, accompanied accompanied with thirty thousand fighting men, but Scanderbeg being accompanied only with four thousand, encountered him in so opportune a place, that he soon vanquished them: the Guards on each side of this Turkish General were smitten down to the ground, his horse hurt, and himself wounded in the right Arm with an Arrow, knew no better way at last to save himself, then to make trial of a Christian Clemency as well as of the Martial fury of an enemy. Before whom being brought, together with divers other Captains, the tears standing in his eyes, and his hands lifted up to heaven, he spake in this manner to Scanderbeg. That being in the service of the great Turkish Emperor, his honour obliged him to serve him faithfully, and therefore implored his mercy, favour and clemency; whose speech took so well with Scanderbeg, that he pardoned them all, and gave them their lives, paying ten thousand Ducats for his own, and four thousand Ducats for the ransom of the rest, which was performed accordingly. I know many have accused Scanderbeg for being so easily persuaded by the Turk, and blame him that he knew not how to use his advantage against the Sferigradians, who indeed surprised him at that time.

But here we are not upon the same terms, the victory was already in Scanderbeg's hands, whose humanity becomes so much the more to be admired, as being exercised against a Capital enemy, whom we can seldom spare when he is once intrapped. But he shewed a far greater mildness towards the Venetians, with whom (to his great regret) he had a sharpe and hard war. But in regard it would have been accounted a folly, and have proved a great disparagement to lose a mans right for want of looking after it, he would not therefore seem easily to quit the succession of that, which he pretended was fallen unto him by the death of Lech Zachary, and wherein the Venetians opposed him, by reason of an agreement made between them and the Lady Bosse, the mother of the deceased party. Notwithstanding which, Scanderbeg claimed that there being no Will, he ought to succeed Zachary (who was murdered by Lech Dulagin, the son of the Lord of Saint Paul) and seemed to have the best title as lawful heir to the estate. But after a great contestation, they resolved the sword should decide the quarrel on both sides, wherewith he pressed them so hard (although he abated very much of the rigor he exercised towards the Infidels and Turkes) that the Venetians had no other expedient, but to desire a Peace with him, which yet they would not conclude it but upon their own conditions, though they were reduced to such extremity, as that if Scanderbeg had not condescended, they had in all likelihood been destroyed; but he considering, That the virtue, valour, and magnanimity of a valiant warrior, appears not in being cruel to an enemy, chose rather to mitigate the appetite of revenge, by mildness and kindness; and therefore yielded freely to forgo that which of right belonged unto him, although it was never his custome to quit any thing to Infidels, as appeared clearly in the encounter with the Tyrant Sebalie, who besieged Beke Grade, where he defeated four and twenty thousand Turks, took six thousand prisoners, and set at liberty four thousand Christians, who were detained by the Babines, Moyes, Assambeg, Isaac, and Sinambeg, and put to death more then fifty thousand of his enemies; and almost as many more two years after, under the command of the Basha Ballaban.

These and the like valorous exploits, pleased so well the most part of the Christian Princes; that they were thereby provoked to take up Arms against Mahomet, and Pope Pius piously moved, seeing the affection of this noble Captain, to the utter extirpation of the Infidels, stirred up all Christian Kings, Princes and Potentates to Arms themselves against the Turke, and knowing that there could not be an abler Captain chosen to that purpose, then Scanderbeg, to curb and tame the Barbarians, elected and named him the Captain of the League, with promise to make him King, not only of all Albania or Epirus, but also of Macedonia, which holy undertaking was interrupted by the death of Pius and Pope Paul the second; although our Albanian King travelled since to Rome, to summon the Pope to joyn in a design so profitable for the safety, and enlargement of Christendom. Finally, finding himself frustrated of the succors he expected from the Kings and Princes on this side, he went to Lissa upon the River of Clira, to consult of the Occurrences of the war with the Deputy Proncedor of Venice, where he was seized on by a deadly Feaver, and feeling himself stricken by death, he made his Will, and recommended his little son John, his wealth and Country to the care of the State of Venice, who in remembrance and gratitude for the advantageous peace he had freely granted them, created him and his posterity (after they had called lots) with an universal consent to be Citizens of Venice. A few dayes after he departed hence to the other world, in the threeseore and third year of his Age, and four and twentieth of his Reign (for he began his Reign, the eight and twentieth day of November, in the year 1443. and dyed in the year 1467.) his body was interred in the Church of Saint Nicolas in Lissa, with great Pompe and magnificence, whose bones rested enclosed in this place in peace, untill Mahomet came into Epirus some four yeeres after, to assault Scutari. I have formerly observed the great care the Barbarians took to finde out the bones of him whom they so much feared, whilst his soul and body acted so vigorously together, as that they would fly away in a maze at the very sound of his name. However I can hardly be induced to believe that the Turkes honored him so much as Paulus Jovius affirms they did; nevertheless I will not say, but that they might have a greater esteem of his Noble Acts; then of another mans, sith those many famous exploits which are recorded to have been done by him by natural strength and dexterity of body, might induce the Turkes to have a reverent esteem of him. As that wilde Savage Bull of an extraordinary fury and greatness, committing a thousand spoiles and murders in the Country of his Sister Mamiza, whose neck he quite cut through with one blow of his Cimier on horseback. That monstrous Boar of Apoville, which had wounded so many of King Ferdinand's Courtiers, which beast he assaulted in the same manner ner and with like dexterity he cut off his head in the open field before the King, as they were a hunting. And it is also reported of him, that after the encamping of Ballaban before Croje, there being brought to him chained and fast bound together, Jonima and Heder, the brother and Nephew of Ballaban, their fight (putting him in remembrance of the cruelties acted through Ballabans occasion, upon the person of Moytes and his companions) put him into such a vehement Passion of anger against them, that he had no patience to suffer others to fall on them, but in great fury fell on them himself, and at one blow hewed them both through the body with his Cimeter; Which was a Damasked one, of an excellent goodness, two of which he alwayes wore in one Scabbard, both which were often broken or spoiled in one Battel. And Mahomet having heard of the excellency of such a sword which would cut asunder Gantlets, Helmets, and other strong Armour) as they were once in a Treaty, sent to desire it for a present, and the Sultan causing tryal to be made thereof by the best Armes of the Court and the strongest, and no such miracles proceeding from it as was boasted of, he thereupon caused it to be returned to Scanderbeg, saying, That he gave him no thanks for such a present, when he could buy as good and a better one for his money; and that he would no longer believe that which was reported of it. But Scanderbeg having made more extraordinary proofs thereof in the presence of the Messenger, sent him word, That the vertue was not altogether in the sword, but in the Arme which he reserved to himself, to be employed against his enemies. And Mahomet might believe him, having seen the victories he gained in Duels, and particular Combats, when he fought at Andrinoplis, against a Scythian; and at Burse, against Jaja and Zampza, &c.

THE LIFE OF TAMOMBEUS the last Soldan of Egypt.

An. Mund.

Christ. Nat.

Here is no man of judgement, but is sufficiently perswaded that the City of Grand Caire (by the Turks now called Adizur, or Nizrulatick) is Grand Cairé. not so populous, nor of such a length and breadth, as to contain fifteen German leagues in compass, as Munster in his Cosmography hath falsely described; seeing himself doth therein assure the Reader, that it cannot be above half a league more in extent than the City Paris in France. It was of old held, and Governed, by the Soldans of Egypt, who reckoned their originall from the time of Hanibass Captain of Howar the seconds Army, who succeeded Mahomet in the Priesthood of the Alcoran, about the year of our Lord six hundred fifty six, and reigned fifteen years, bearing the title of Admirall, which the Arabians called Charadinkia d' Emir Quibir, which signifies in the Moravian tongue Great Lord, or Captain of the Sea. After which the Governours of Egypt took upon them the name or title of Soldan, which signifies as much as King or Lord; which title continued under the Name of Chalippe, untill the time of Saladin, who conquered Jerusalem, taking it from the Christians, and who strengthened himself (chiefly) with the power and valour of the Mammelucks, a name which signifies no other thing in the Syriack and Tartarian Language, then Slaves. About the year eleven hundred eighty seven, Saladin being dead, and they Royall race failing, the Mammelucks put it to an Election, and (accordingly) among themselves made choice of one Piperick Soldan, who was a valiant and expert Captain. This man caused many lofty Buildings and Edifices to be erected, most part of which are at present ruined, as I my self have seen. But the Arabians have often told me, according to what is written in their Histories, that those buildings were finished by a Governour of the Countrey, called Gelin. This custom of Election continued untill the year five hundred and seventeen, at which time Sultan Selym the Turkish Emperour, and Solymans Father, put to flight and vanquished Campson Soldan of Egypt and Syria, by reason that this man (who being but a childe, was brought from the cold Countrey of Tartary, and was bred a Slave in the Seraglio of Caire, and growing up to years, did learn amongst them the Discipline of the Mammelucks, and attained to all the degrees of knowledge in the Military Art) Selym his enemy being advertised that he favoured the King of Persia, warred against him; in which Warre Campson was slain in a Battel, being seventy years old: Presently after which the Mammelucks, and the Arabians (at that time their Confederates) made choice of Tamombe Circasse for their Soldan; and Tamombe succeeds Campson.

Hemir being at that time a valiant man of Alexandria, and who altogether addicted himself to Warlike affairs; he having (often times) fought against divers parts of Asia, and afterwards put the Turks to flight, to their great confusion; Being certainly advertised that Selym was coming against him with full resolution to fight him, he did make preparation to receive him, and pitched his Camp without the City of Caire, in a place called the Matairre, being the most beautifullest and pleasant place which was about the City, on that side on which Selym made his approaches; who marched towards him with great courage, Tamombeus having fortified himself with Artillery, Trenches, and Pallizadoes, sallied out, and when both Armies were come up to each other with great courage and equall hope of victory, which depended on the sole hazard of one Battel, (neither part being ignorant that the contest was both for life and Empire) The Turks according to the Turkish manner; sounded the Trumpets, and beat the Drums, and their enemies being over-matched by their strength, the Mammelucks were enforced to retreat into the City. At the first entry the Turks made, four and twenty thousand of the Citizens were slain, and as many more, (if not a greater number) at the taking of the City. In the mean time there was a very great multitude of women, children and slaves, and all sorts of Tradefmen, in the windows, casting out great square pieces of stone, beams, and timber, barres of iron, wilde-fire, and scalding water, and other things of defence, and engines of Warre upon their enemies: The fight was so fierce for eight hours together, that you might behold slaughtered men lying by heaps, tumbled one upon another, and their blood running down the streets like a river, which I heard from above four hundred old Mammelucks and Jews, who were in this Warre, in the life of the Soldan. Which fury of the Citizens caused Selym (to the intent he might thereby terrifie the common people) to command certain houses, in the City, to be set on fire, by which means, and the noise of the Cannon, and volleys of shot, poured forth by the Janizaries, he did so affright the inhabitants, and the stoutest Mammelucks, that seeing all things in a deplorable and a lost condition, they began to cry out from all quarters (thinking thereby to mitigate the Turks cruelty) Long live great King Selym, the favourite of the great God, whom we humbly beseech to cease his fury, and to have pity upon his poor slaves, who do submit to his greatness and mercy. Yet all this did not suddenly appease his rage, by reason of his great Governour; and friend, named Gann Bassa, who was killed very near unto him, with an iron Mortar, cast down upon his head. Tamombey having now left the defence of his Trenches, Rampars and passages in the City, could not longer withstand the fury of the Enemy, but beholding the loss of his valiant Captains, and the flower of his Cavalry, betook himself to flight, and happy were those Lords, who were able to gain the River Nile, and fly for succour to the strong Piramides; some of which being three leagues distant from the City, were (the next day following) besieged by their Enemies, and were enforced, for want of victuals, (which Piramides were erected in a barren and solitary place, as I can testify, having seen them) rendred themselves to the mercy of the Conqueror, who gave them their pardons; but ceased not (with five thousand horse) to pursue Tamombey, who had gained the ground of them, but being wholly routed, he rid with all speed (directly) to a fenny place or morish ground, full of Canes and Reeds, and his horse falling under him, and he seeing his enemies at his very heels, hid himself amongst the Reeds, but being discovered by two young boyes, he crept along a little forwarder, (according to the opinion of the Arabians, and old Mammelucks) into a large vaulted Cave, at which I have been, and seen it, and not above six yeares since, there were found in it many fair Sepulchres, made after the Antique fashion, containing several mummyed bodies; and hard by it, in my time, there were also found more then three hundred bodies, amongst which were certain Idols, some of Copper, others of hard stone, which (I conceive) they worshipped in their life time, in the like manner as (heretofore) the Greeks and Romans did.

I know that Doctor Claudian Guichard, who hath collected the Funerals of the Ancients, makes a mock hereat, and seems not to beleve that which I have said and written in my Cosmography; whereunto I answer, that I speak not this by hearsay, but have travelled into, and seen those Coasts and Places; and if he think it not creditable, I will shew him six of those said Idols, which were found in the like mummyed bodies, and also two feet of a Childe, brought hither by the Consul of Alexandria in Egypt, and presented unto the Queen-Mother of the King, who (afterwards) sent them unto me, knowing that I delighted very much in such rarities; and although this Doctor cannot finde these secrets in his Bartole, Galen, and other famous Doctors, yet ought it not therefore to be concluded, that these things are not to be received by lovers of truth. But the Geographer Nicholas Nicholay opposeth him directly, and writes that such bodies were found from time to time, in the deserts of Arabia, by Merchants who travell from Egypt, to the Red Sea; and that they make great esteem of them. But leaving the errors of Nicholay, I will return to our poor and wretched Tamombey, who thinking to save himself in the said Cave, could not be so well concealed there, but was taken, to the great regret of all the people of Egypt and Arabia; with three hundred of the bravest and eldest Captains of his Army, most of which standing upon their guards, (as foreseeing what would become of them) chose rather to lose their lives valiantly, then to be put to ignominious deaths; the rest were taken alive with Tamombey, and led to the City of Caire, where the next day, and for three severall daies after, Selym (forgetting all Regall clemency, and just humanity, which (in reason) he might have nave suffered his cruell heart to have been possessed with) behaved himself most inhumanely towards Tamombey, to make him confesse where his Treasure was, which he had inherited of Campson: and being thrice tortured and racked with grievous torments, yet would he not confesse any thing; wherefore Selym would needs see him, to question and conferre with him, who being brought into his chamber, remained as resolute and constant as ever he had been. Afterwards, when he had been ignominiously led up and down the streets upon his Camel, his throat was cut in the common Shambles, on the thirteenth day of the moneth of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand five hundred and seventeen, being of the Age of threescore and five yeares. But he was not publicly hanged; as (amongst others) Paulus Fovim, and Munster have exprest in their Writings.

Tamombey shamefully put to death.

The Inca's were the most Noble, Richeſt, and powerfullſt men of the Land of Peru; a cruell, warlick, and extream politick people, deſcended from Tiguicala, (a People ſo called) deriving their names from a City, ſituated near to a Lake in the Province of Colao, about ten leagues from Cusco, ſo called from the abundance of Lead and other mettals which are found there, (by the inhabitants called Tichior.) The firſt King was called Zapalo, of whoſe linage Papaopangui and Guyanacapa were deſcended, who was the Grandfather of Atabalipa, who as he boaſted, came from towards the River of Maragnon, being of the race of the Cannibals, which he evidently manifeſted by his bravado's, and the ſmall account he made of Chriſtians, whenſoever he could but get footing in their Countries. Yet the inhabitants are a civil people, peaceable, and of a reaſonable good behaviour; but that they are as much troubled with deſires to attain unto the honours and great preferments of the world, as the people of Cusco, and thoſe of Papaian and the bordering Provinces do. Now Atabalipa King of Cusco had a Brother called Atoco, who was a Inca, that is a King of Guiaſcart. This Atoco being arrived at Canna, was very well received, honoured and revered by the people, though he were cruel. Atabalipa being jealous of the fortune of his Brother, procured his death; and ſeizing on his Dominions, he made choice of the City of Cusco, the chief and Metropolitan of all Peru to dwell in, it being the ancient habitation, and Court of the Inca's and Kings, as Rome formerly was of the Emperours; Conſtantinople of the Turks; Tauris of the Sophi's; Cathay of the great Cham of Tartaria; and Grand Cayro of the Sultan of Egypt. The ſaid Cusco being beſt ſituated in all Peru, in the middle of thoſe Provinces which were formerly governed by the Inca's. After the death of Atabalipa's great great Grandfather, he enlarged his Kingdoms, as well on the ſide of the Sea of Su, or peacefull, as on the ſide of the great Ocean, making the people tributary unto him. But as miſfortune falls often upon great ones, as well as upon poor men, it happened in my time, that the Spaniards being covetous of the worlds wealth, ſailed toward a Land called Nombre de dios, under the conduct of a great Souldier, named Francis Piſarre; who having got footing in thoſe parts, and continued there a while, fortified themſelves, and by degrees attracted unto themſelves the one half of thoſe barbarous people; and being informed of King Atabalipa's Treasures and Riches, to gain his friendſhip, Piſarre ſent unto him many gifts and preſents; letting him underſtand that they were offered him by his Maſter the Chriſtian Emperour, and that he deſired to contract an Amity with him, and to

to treat freely with his Greatneſs without any fear; and that in caſe he did come to viſit him, he ſhould not be frighted to ſee them mounted on ſuch great creatures which were very docile, and the which they had brought with them out of their Countrey, to carry them through the difficult paſſages, Rivers, Sands, and other inconveniences, which as he was told were in his Countrey, and could not be paſſed on foot without a great deal of danger to their perſons. The Barbarian hearing this meſſage, began to laugh and mock thoſe which were ſent by Piſarre, ſaying that thoſe great Muſtaches (meaning the Spaniards) if they attempted any further than they had done, upon his Dominions, he ſwore by the Sunne, and the Image which he worſhipped, that he would cauſe them all to be cut in pieces: But Piſarre not being diſmaied at Atabalipa's threats, performed an Exploit beſeeming a very valiant Commander; for being aſſured that the Enemies Army was not aſſembled, and that it was but eight daies ſince he had ſummoned his Captains of the Provinces of Cusco, Quiso, Calicuciva, Caxamalca, Tumbez, Puno, Nicaraga, and being moreover informed that he could not aſſemble his Army on a ſudden, Piſarre ſent other preſents to the Heathen King, purpoſely to gain time, and the better to ſtave him off from uniting his Forces, he ſent him two Horſes richly harnessed, and Capariſon'd, and thus by degrees gained upon him, deſiring that before he went out of his Countrey, he might be permitted to ſee the great magnificence and glory of his Court, that ſo he might make report thereof to the Emperour his Maſter; who would be very much pleaſed to hear of the greatneſs and magnificence of ſo powerfull a Prince, as Atabalipa was. And the better to entrap him, he cauſed him to be informed of the great Maſteſty and excellency of ſuch an Emperour as his Maſter was, unto whom the Chriſtians did take it for a great honour to render obeſſance, and to be ſubject unto him: Inviting him by theſe means to be pleaſed to make a League, Confederacy, and Alliance with him, to the end that by this proceeding of his, two ſuch great Princes might have the better opportunity to keep all ſuch men under, as ſhould dare to attempt any thing againſt their eſtates; which indeed is the true way, whereby States and Principalities may be ſettled, for as much as it is an uſuall praſtice; and that Force cannot ſo ſoon break an united body, chiefly when it is thus powerfull and ſtrong. But this was not the thing Piſarre aimed at; for he only attempted to get footing on the Frontiers of Atabalipa's Territories, aſſuring himſelf that he would quickly ſet it on his neck, as afterwards he did, as we ſhall underſtand by the enſuing part of this diſcourſe.

Now this Maſter Spaniard obtained ſo much by his ſmooth language, and forged inducements, as that deceiving him thereby, and approaching with all his Horſe and Foot near unto the City of Caxamalca, he diſcovered the Enemies forces to be at leaſt thirty thouſand in number, being for the moſt part naked men, ſome excepted which were clothed with Cottons, interlaced with divers colours, and with plumes of Feathers, having for all defence nothing ſave wooden ſwords, clubs, and Bows and Arrows. Piſarre beholding the fierce countenances of the ſavage people, approaching by degrees the one near unto the other, gave order to the Spaniſh Cavalry to ſkirmiſh them on all ſides, and by their alluring them to Battel, to make ſeverall ſhews as if they did run away, and the Foot to do the like; whereupon the Enemy began to take courage, chaſing the Chriſtians cloſe at the heels; whereas Piſarre commanded two and twenty pieces of Cannon to be fired upon them, which ſore amazed theſe poor people, who had never ſeen any Horſes before, much leſs heard ſuch a noiſe of Ordnance, whereby above ſeven thouſand of the Heathens were ſlain out right: The reſt took their flight to the upper grounds and mountains, being ſwiftly purſued by the Spaniards, who that day and the next killed twice as many of them, ſparing neither ſtrong nor weak, old nor young, except Atabalipa, and ſix more of his Counſell, who were taken in a Tent, bravely adorned with Feathers, near unto a River called in their Gibbridge Chelcaion, as I was told by a Spaniard in the City of Sevill, who was in the Battel, and had received two ſhots with their Arrows. Piſarre having got the Victory, came near to Atabalipa, and laying his hand on his ſhoulders in token of friendſhip, he held many loving diſcourſes with him; which being ended, the Captive King privately drew out of his boſom two round fine Pearls, as great as a Date-plum, joyned together with two Emeralds, the one made like a little Bell, the other like an Oval, of an incredible value, which he gave to the Conqueror, that he might be alwaies continued in his favour, and that his life might be ſaved, promiſing unto him infinite Treasures; and endeavouring by all means poſſible to content the covetous minde of the Spaniards, whoſe only aim was to enrich themſelves. But this Cacique now Captive Atabalipa could never ſatiſſie Piſarre; although he had paid him his ranſom in pure Gold, which he had ſent for from all the Provinces which he poſſeſſed, even to the ſpoiling the golden Idols which were in the Temples, to the value at leaſt of ten millions of Gold, which did him but very little good, for as much as a few daies after, his body was bound and made faſt to a Tree with cords (as if he had been the moſt miſerableſt creature in the world) three whole daies and three nights together, to make him confeſs if he had any more wealth; upon which occaſion, not apprehending death in the leaſt, he uttered a thouſand reproaches againſt Piſarre, aſſuring him, that the God which Piſarre worſhipped (and whom he ſaid was a juſt God) would in a ſhort time puniſh him and his brother alſo; which likewiſe happened, for a while after Francis Piſarre was killed, and his brother Ferrand Piſarre was beheaded in the ſame Countrey. Now thoſe of Piſarre's Counſell being at odds, and diſagreeing, whether or no they ſhould kill this King, or ſend him to the Emperour Charles the fifth, at laſt they concluded that he ſhould be ſtrangled, which was done, the night after he was condemned, by the advice of a Counſell of ſome Biſhops and Monks, for fear he ſhould be reſcued by his own ſubjects. An error that Printing should have been used in the Territories of Mexico.

two, as we have formerly said. True it is that Paul the Venetian did four hundred years ago, or thereabouts, write the first description and situation of those Countreys, and their Customs, but he doth not at all mention that Printing was in use there; And that which makes me the more confident is, that both the Grecians, Armenians, Mingrelians, Abissinians, the Turks, the Moors, the Arabians, and the Tartars, do write all their Books: Which became in use amongst the Turks, by the command of Mehazeth their Emperour, the second of that Name, by a Decree which was published in the year one thousand four hundred fourscore and three, forbidding Printing, or the use of printed Books, upon pain of death; which said Ordinance was confirmed by his Sonne Selimus, the first of that Name, in the year one thousand five hundred and fifteen: Moreover my self being in Egypt, I did there see several long Table-books, composed of the barks of Palm trees, which were so well written, that you would have thought they had been Printed. And likewise the Merchants who travel from the Indies by the Red Sea, and who do traffick amidst several Nations; do only write upon such Table-books. Some other Writers have maintained that the Art of Printing was extant even in the Territories of Mexico, which is quite opposite unto Cathay, the one being in Asia towards the Arctic Pole; and the other in America towards the Arctic Pole: but the said Authors are mightily mistaken, for as much as the Mexicans did never make use of the Art of Printing. However, I must needs confess that the Mexicans do make use of several Characters, resembling several Terrestrial, and Aerial creatures, as also the head, legs, arms, and other members of man, whereby they do explain their conceptions, as formerly the Egyptians did by their Hieroglyphicks, and likewise the Ethiopians; several of the like Characters having been publick and extant, whereof I my self have a couple, which were written in the City of Themistion, full of such like Figures and Characters, together with the Interpretation of them: Now as the Antients did suppose one Goddess Pallas, who presided over Learning and Warre, as having founded Learning, and invented Warlike instruments; so the Germans above all other Nations may attribute this glory unto themselves, to have born away the prize of both these faculties; Bartholdus Schwartz a German, having been the first Inventor of Powder and Guns, and John Guttenberg of the Art of Printing: one only default there is, which doth not a little dimme the lustre of their glory; and by reason whereof they may be very well likened unto the Magnanimous and Warlike General Flannibal, of whom it is said, That he very well knew how to overcome and assuage the fury and impetuosity of an Enemy, but that he made no good use of his Victories, suffering himself afterwards to be overtaken by carelessness and neglect. In the like manner the Germans are full of Invention, but they are so negligent and careless in the thoroughly polishing and bringing their inventions to perfection, as by reason hereof, the same thing befalls them which happened to the Hebrews, who, as they may justly term themselves to have been the first Inventors of all Sciences, yet however other Nations by their labour and industry, do appropriate them unto themselves, by their refining of them, and thereby in a manner laying a certain claim unto them, and accounting them as their own, they do rob the first Inventors of the honour which they ought to reap upon that account.

Finally, This Noble Art of Printing cannot be sufficiently praised and valued, by reason of the manifest and great benefit which, as we see, it doth daily bring along with it: For thereby we are assured that the Law of God is spread abroad throughout all the world, even amongst Barbarous and Savage people; that ignorance is hereby suppressed; and that all the liberal Arts and Sciences have been and are as yet thereby greatly Illustrated and Ennobled, by the multitude of rare Treatises and excellent Books (unvitiated by the hands of such ignorant Clerks, as had well-nigh corrupted all the good Authors, by their erroneous Transcriptions) which at present are extant; and do daily flow as it were unto us by the facility and easiness of this admirable Art. And that we may not omit those who have embellished this famous Art, we shall only name some few unto you, whose memories deserve to live to Posterity; as Aldus Manutius at Venice, Frabennus and Operinum at Basilea in Germany, Christopher Plantin at Antwerp, Robert, Stephen, Henry, and Francis, Plantin brothers, at Paris, Griphius; and Toornes at Lyons; and several others most learned and exquisite men in this Art, who have enriched the same, and still continue so to do with a great deal of Honour and applause throughout the world, &c.

Pollo's darling; Of the Muses Nine Sole Favourite: thou offspring most Divine O'th' Gods: Splendid Adorner of our Age:
The Memories first-born: On this our Stage
Times Looking-glass: of Ages long since past Sublime Recorder; Thou who didst make hast T'outstrip thy Grandfirs; and first to Essay
This rare Composure; Thou didst leade the Way
By Characters, well marshald, to disclose (Upon the back of Nimble Time) to those Of future Ages, Mysteries unknown,
Wrapt up in such dark shades, and shapes, that none
Could them unfold; had not thy skilfull Art
A means produc'd, whereby thou dost impart
What ere th' Almighty, by his powerfull hand, Effected hath, i'th' Heavens, i'th' Sea, on Land:
And unto us his Lawes thou settest forth,
In such an ample manner, as their Worth Eternally to all Mankind appears;
Their Praises shall outlive the length of Years.
Thy rare Invention, Guttenberg, doubtless,
Not brooking Error should our Age oppress,
Nor Ignorance should gain the upper hand
Of Knowledge, Learning, Science; and withstand
The Truth; thee mov'd, these Treasures to bestow
On us, which secrets were; and ne're did flow
Save mid'st the Gods; from Mortals being reserv'd, Least such a knowledge (by them undeserv'd)
Might elevate their generous Souls too high (AsSouls too subtil, should the soar too high Th' Eternals secrets) and plod so attain
To hidden Mysteries; a Science vain, Which draweth down th' Almighty's wrath on those,
Who thereby strive his Dictates to oppose.
But thou content'st thy self to make us know
Th' Ethereal Fabrick, and the Orbs below;
And dost confine thy self within the bounds
Of th' Earth's round form, the which the Sea surrounds:
The ruddy circle of the daily Torch;
The radiant Planets; and the Zones which seereh:
The wondrous Changes of fair Cynthia's bowrs, Causing both th' Ebbs and Floods, at certain hours,
Which Noble Sciences, and many more,
By Printing are disclos'd, and kept in store:
And Guttenberg by his most Noble Art
To us a thousand such like doth impart.
Thou caus'st Savage Nations to be milde,
By reading of such Books as are compil'd
